The Third Western Training Laboratory in Group Development will be held at Idyllwild, California, between August 15 and 27, 1954.

The Laboratory is intended to provide understanding and skills for individuals who want to improve their effectiveness in working with groups. Participants with a variety of occupational backgrounds are expected to attend. The training staff will be made up of faculty members from various universities as well as of active group leaders in business, government, industry, public health, education, social welfare, and the like. For information, write Department of Conferences and Special Activities, University Extension, University of California, Los Angeles 24, California.

The Sixtieth National Conference on Government of the National Municipal League will be held in Kansas City, Missouri, November 7-10, 1954.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Political scientists and others contemplating research in Japan will be interested in a new residential center, International House, which will soon be opened in Tokyo. Construction was started this spring, and the building is expected to be open to its first residents early in 1955. International House has been made possible by a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation and from funds raised locally in Japan. The managing director is Shigeharu Matsumoto, Tokyo lawyer and writer. Dr. Gordon Bowles, formerly Executive Secretary of the Conference Board of Associated Research Councils, and now teaching anthropology at the University of Tokyo, is co-director.

The facilities of International House will be primarily for scholars who have completed their training. It is being constructed near Tokyo Central Railroad Station—in the heart of Tokyo. The building will contain lecture and dining halls and residence quarters for a maximum of fifty guests. Conference study rooms will also be available. The library will emphasize current periodicals from many foreign nations and will include special collections of books on contemporary Western and Asian problems. It is not expected that the House will engage directly in research and translation projects, but it will assist persons and organizations employed in these activities, and special attention will be paid to visiting and resident foreign scholars engaged in Asian studies. Inquiries concerning facilities which will be provided to visiting foreign scholars may be obtained by writing to the International House of Japan, Inc., Bank of Tokyo, Marunouchi Branch 2, 1-chome, Marunouchi, Chiyoda-ku, Tokyo.

Harold Stassen, Director of the Foreign Operations Administration, delivered an address on February 22 at the University of the Philippines during the dedication ceremonies for the newly constructed Rizal Hall. The Institute of Public Administration of the University of the Philippines, now located in Rizal Hall, was established under a contract between the University of Michigan and the University of the Philippines, through the assistance of FOA and the Philippine Government. Ferrel Heady, on leave from the University of Michigan, is the present director and chief advisor of the Philippine Institute.

On March 1, 1954, through private funds made available by Chancellor Rufus B. vonKleinsmid, there was established in the School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, an International Public Administration Center in order to provide special service for the foreign professors and students who are taking advanced graduate training. In effect, this is an extension of the work which the School has been doing under government contract, first for a group of Turkish professors, 1951-1953, and then for a group of Brazilian professors, 1952-1954. The present participants and associates in the International Public Administration Center are: Arif Payaslioglu, Ankara, Turkey; Reyhan Toluner, Istanbul, Turkey; Paulo Neves de Carvalho, Belo Horizonte, Minas Gerais, Brazil; Chukuemeka Okeke, Nigeria; Evangelos J. Rizos, Greece; Nouri Al-Kadhim, Iraq; and Raphael Velasco, Mexico; Vinod Pathak, India; Miss Eila Ketola, Finland; Madanjit S. Malik, India; Celodonio E. Felix, San Juan, Puerto Rico; Wedding Fricke, Germany; and Fernando Segurra, Costa Rica.

The Rutgers Lincoln Prize of $1,000, to be offered annually for the best manuscript on Lincoln or in the Lincoln field, is announced by Rutgers University Press. The winning manuscript will be published jointly by the Abraham Lincoln Association and Rutgers Press, and the award will be divided equally between an outright grant and an advance against royalties. The purpose of the Lincoln Prize is not merely to stimulate continuing work in this field, but particularly to find books worthy of the centennial significance of the years from 1954-1965. Manuscripts must be submitted to Rutgers Press before October 1 of the year in which they are to be considered. Authors or agents are invited to write to Rutgers University Press for further details before submitting any manuscript.

The Association of Research Libraries has approved a program for making promptly and inexpensively available all doctoral dissertations currently accepted by colleges and universities in this country. Forty-three institutions are now publishing all or part of their dissertations under this plan. As expressed by the ARL, the general objectives of the dissertation publishing plan are as follows:

1. All doctoral dissertations should be published immediately upon acceptance to facilitate more effectual communication of new research material than is now possible through the existing costly, inefficient, and incomplete system of interlibrary lending of typescripts of dissertations.

2. A permanent central repository for doctoral dissertations, from which copies could be inexpensively procured at any time, should be maintained to simplify the distribution of this new research material.

3. Uniform listing, indexing, and abstracting of these dissertations, in one central bibliographical source, should follow as soon as possible upon their acceptance.

To achieve these objectives, the ARL endorsed publication of dissertations in microfilm and formulated the basic plan which makes use of the services provided by University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Michigan. Various levels of participation are possible, and each participating university makes its own decision as to whether the university or the student pays the fee. Any institution granting doctorate degrees may participate in the plan or secure more detailed information by writing directly to University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The Washington Semester at the American University was honored recently by the Freedom Foundation by the award of the George Washington Medal for outstanding contribution to American citizenship.

A third unit of the Washington Semester has been announced for the fall of 1954. This expansion of the program will permit the addition of approximately twenty colleges and universities. Institutions sending students for the first time in the spring of 1954 were: Augustana College, Florida Southern College, Monmouth College, Pomona College, University of Redlands, Rollins College, Syracuse University, Valparaiso University, and Wabash College.

The American University is offering a six-weeks Public Affairs Laboratory in Washington, D.C. from June 21 to July 30. The program includes background lectures by the faculty of the University, seminars with public officials, field trips, and individual projects. Six hours of graduate credit will be given to students participating in the Laboratory.

The department of political science at Duke University will offer a special course in Japanese civilization during the 1954 summer session in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the opening of Japan by Commodore Perry. Through a recent grant by the Japan Society, a number of scholarships will be offered to graduate students who have had no opportunity to make a special study of Japanese affairs. Professor Ralph J. D. Braibanti, of the political science faculty, will conduct the course.

A new undergraduate program in world studies will be offered by the University of Rochester beginning with the fall semester. This program will place emphasis upon the political, economic, social, and cultural forces that have molded the civilizations of Eastern Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Latin America, and Africa, and that are forging new societies in these areas today. This program will be directed by Vera Micheles Dean, of the Foreign Policy Association. Mrs. Dean has been appointed visiting professor of government at the University of Rochester.

Recent guest lecturers before the political science graduate seminar at Duke University include the Hon. George McGhee, former Ambassador to Turkey and Assistant Secretary of State, and Dr. Lujo Tomic, member of the House of Representatives of the Austrian Parliament.

Guest speakers on the annual federal lecture program of the School of Public Administration at the Florida State University during the spring semester were Francis P. Brasseur, Executive Secretary of the new Hoover Commission, Eugene M. Zuckert, member of the Atomic Energy Commission, and a number of other prominent federal officials.

Fifteen members of the department of political science at the University of Pennsylvania appeared in a television series over Philadelphia Station WFIL from February 5 to May 14, 1954. The program is entitled "The University of the Air," and the topic of the political science series was "This World of Politics." Lincoln Harter, assistant professor of political science, was moderator of the series on political science.

Six professors of political science have been appointed to the research staff of the Missouri Little Hoover Commission. The three full-time members are: Carl A. McCandless, of Washington University, who is the director; and Henry Schmandt, of St. Louis University, and John W. Schwada, of the University of Missouri, who are serving as assistants. The heads of the departments of political science of the three universities named above have been designated as part-time consultants. They are: Thomas H. Eliot, Washington University; Paul Steinbicker, St. Louis University; and Martin L. Faust, University of Missouri. The three full-time members are on leave from their respective universities for a year beginning February 1, 1954.

Lawrence L. Durisch and Robert E. Lowry, both of the TVA, received the Louis E. Brownlow Citation and Award at the annual meeting of the American Society for Public Administration in March, 1954. The award was for the best article published in the Public Administration Review during 1953. The title of the winning article was "The Scope and Content of Administrative Decision."

A new chapter of Pi Sigma Alpha, political science honorary, was established at the State University of Iowa this spring. Thirty members were initiated, including five undergraduates, seventeen graduates, and eight faculty members.

Marver H. Bernstein, of Princeton University, gave a course on regulatory commissions during the spring session at Columbia University.

Arnold Brecht, since 1933 professor of political science at the New School for Social Research, became professor emeritus on March 15, 1954. His students honored him on this occasion by publishing six of his papers on relativism and related problems as a book under the title The Political Philosophy of Arnold Brecht, with an introduction and a bibliography of his writings. Professor Brecht has accepted an invitation from the University of Heidelberg, Germany, to deliver a course of lectures on the comparative history of political institutions and a seminar on problems of twentieth-century political theory from May through July as a guest professor. In the fall, he will return to the United States to lecture at the New School and to write.

Professors James M. Burns, of Williams College, and John P. Roche, of Haverford College, were members of the faculty of the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies, Salzburg, Austria, for the January, 1954 session. Professor Burns lectured on American political parties and offered a seminar on the American experiment in government, while Professor Roche devoted his lectures to American political thought and his seminar to American constitutional law.

Lynton K. Caldwell, of Syracuse University, served as a consultant in public administration to the Institute of Public Administration at the University of the Philippines for a two-month period beginning February 5, 1954.

Carl Q. Christol, of the department of political science at the University of Southern California, has been appointed a member of the Committee on International Law in the Courts of the United States, Section on International and Comparative Law, American Bar Association.

During the winter quarter, Gordon R. Clapp gave six Walgreen Foundation lectures on the TVA at the University of Chicago, and George S. Pettie presented another Walgreen series on "Soldiers and Civilians."

Dorothy I. Cline, assistant professor of government at the University of New Mexico, has announced her candidacy for the city commission of Albuquerque.

James S. Coleman, instructor in political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), delivered a series of addresses in seven cities in western Canada during January. The lectures covered various topics relating to political developments in Africa and were given under the auspices of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Robert A. Dahl, of Yale, offered a course on the policy-making process during the spring session at Columbia University.

David Fellman, professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin, was a participant in the social science seminar at Iowa State College on March 11, speaking on the subject of civil liberties. He is scheduled to deliver five lectures on the same subject at the Utah State Agricultural College in June.

Russell H. Fifield, associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, was awarded the 1953 George Louis Beer Prize of the American Historical Association for his recent book, Woodrow Wilson and the Far East: The Diplomacy of the Shantung Question.

Charles Gilbert is working in the office of Senator Hubert Humphrey in Washington while teaching a seminar on politics and legislation at Swarthmore College.

W. Leon Godshall, professor and head of the department of international relations at Lehigh University, absent on leave, 1952-54, completed a tour of duty as visiting professor of international relations at the University of the Philippines on March 15. On his return voyage to Lehigh for the summer session, he will visit Singapore, Suez, Cairo, and various points of interest in Europe.

John H. Hallowell, of Duke University, recently gave four lectures at the University of Arkansas. These were part of a lecture series on moral philosophy which the University of Arkansas is sponsoring with the aid of the Rockefeller Foundation.

J. Eugene Harley, of the University of Southern California, delivered the principal address at the Pacific Southwest Regional Conference of the American Association of International Relations Clubs, held at Redlands University, February 19-20, 1954. His subject was "Recent Important Developments in International Law and Organization."

Majid Khadduri, Professor of Middle East Studies at the School of Advanced International Studies of the Johns Hopkins University, has been awarded the Rafidain Medal by the Government of Iraq. This medal is for scholarly and literary accomplishment and was awarded to Professor Khadduri for his recent book, Independent Iraq.

Louis E. Lambert, of the department of government at Indiana University, is serving again this summer as director of a three-week workshop in state and local government. The purpose of the workshop is to encourage the teaching of state and local government in Indiana high schools. The method used for the presentation of material is a roundtable with panelists selected from among leaders of Indiana local government and politics.

Arthur W. Macmahon, Eaton Professor of Public Administration at Columbia University, is spending a sabbatical leave in Europe; he is lecturing this spring at the College of Europe in Bruges. Professor Macmahon was chairman of the Columbia University Bicentennial Conference on Federalism which was held at Arden House between January 11 and 14, 1954.

Roy Macridis, associate professor of political science at Northwestern University, read a paper on "Political Science and Comparative Politics" at the International Political Science Association meeting in Florence, Italy, April 4-11, 1954.

B. Mirkine-Guetzévitch, Dean of the Faculty of Law and Political Science of the French University of New York, offered two courses in the department of government at Harvard University during the spring semester. He participated in a conference held as a part of the Bicentennial Celebration at Columbia University in January.

Robert G. Neumann, associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), was one of eighty Americans selected to visit Germany as a guest of the German Federal Government. Professor Neumann spent part of February and March observing political developments in West Germany.

Professors Russell M. Ross and Vernon Van Dyke, of the political science department at the State University of Iowa, are participating in an evaluation of the general education courses, a project undertaken on the basis of a grant from the Ford Foundation. Professor Van Dyke is also directing a survey of the role of the State University of Iowa in world affairs, a project undertaken at the suggestion of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

John F. Sly, professor of politics at Princeton University, was in Liberia, West Africa, in January, 1954 as a consultant to the Department of State to examine and report on the management and fiscal policies of the free port of Monrovia.

R. G. Whitesel, of the political science department of the State University of Iowa, was on half-time status during the spring semester while working on a Ford Foundation project in educational television, "Freedom in a Democracy."

Arthur M. Wilson, professor of government and biography at Dartmouth College, has been awarded the 1952-1953 Modern Language Association-Oxford University Press Award for a manuscript entitled "Diderot: The Testing Years, 1713-1759." The award consists of a prize of $1,000 in addition to royalties.

POLITICAL SCIENTISTS AS AREA SPECIALISTS

It has been common to assume that American scholarship in the social sciences and humanities has been oriented to Western cultures. Valid though this assumption may be, the results of a recent report prepared by the American Council of Learned Societies suggest a much wider specialization in Asian, African, and Eastern European studies than many of us had realized. Of particular interest is the fact that political science seems to reflect a greater scholarly concern for these areas than many of the other social sciences or the humanities. The report, Preliminary Analysis, American Personnel in Asian, African and Eastern European Studies (Washington, D.C., November, 1953) (mimeo. 16 pp., 17 tables, 5 maps), was prepared by J. F. Wellemeyer, Jr. and Max H. North. It resulted from the National Registration of the Humanities and Social Sciences (in which the American Political Science Association participated when it circularized its membership in 1952) and is based on the registration of some 25,500 members of twenty-three professional societies. The project was financed by the Office of Naval Research, but the report summarized here was made at the request of the Board of Overseas Training and Research of the Ford Foundation which needed the information to review its programs in Asian and African area studies.

The report classifies as an area expert anyone who has done research, published papers or books, or taught courses relating to the area. Incidental travel and military intelligence research were not included in this consideration, unless such experience was combined with language competence or other professional training. The report aims to give a statistical description of scholars competent in Asia, Africa, and Eastern Europe, but does not seek to evaluate the supply of experts or to appraise their qualifications.

Two screenings of the rough data indicated that 3,218 persons reported themselves as area specialists. This constituted about one-eighth of the registrants in the National Registration. From the data submitted by these 3,218 persons, the analysis in this report is made. The areas of specialty and the special characteristics of expertness in each area are shown below.

Near and Middle East. This includes North and East Africa, Turkey, Asia Minor, Israel, Syria, and Transjordan. Of the 544 persons who recorded their principal specialty in this area, the largest group (82) were specialists in biblical literature. Political science and economics ranked next, each claiming 54 specialists. History, geography, archeology, sociology, anthropology, and literature each had between 40 and 50 specialists in this area. Oriental studies and linguistics had 37 and 22, respectively. Art, statistics, philosophy, musicology, aesthetics, and education had fewer than 10 specialists. Religion and classical studies account for much of the interest in this field. A slightly higher proportion of native-born American citizens and a slightly smaller proportion of women are found in this group.

Far East. This region includes China, Japan, Korea, Formosa, and the Ryukyu Islands. Of the 883 persons who reported their principal specialty in this area, 357 persons were specialists in Japan, 222 in China (general). Political science ranked first in number of specialists (146) with economics, history, and oriental studies second, third, and fourth, respectively. Sociology, geography, and literature have between 56 and 82 each. The Far East group contained a higher proportion of native-born Americans than the average, a higher proportion of government employees, and a lower proportion of persons with doctor's degrees.

Eastern Europe. European Soviet Russia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, the Baltic countries, and the Balkans are included in this area. Of the 1,175 persons with a primary specialty in this area, 214 had a specialty for Greece alone, leaving 1,085 persons who might be considered specialists on Russia and her European satellites. Political scientists were second in number of specialists (213), being outranked by history (217), and followed by economics (205). Classical Greek literature, sociology, anthropology, and geography were represented by 72, 43, and 55 persons, respectively. This group had the lowest proportion of native-born Americans of all the regions, reflecting, according to the report, considerable immigration of specialists to the United States.

South Asia. India, Pakistan, Nepal, and Ceylon was the area of specialty of 200 persons. The most numerous were economists, with 33 specialists. Political science and history ranked next with 29 and 27 specialists, respectively. History was represented by only 14 persons, which seems low for this field, considering the extensive interest of historians in the remainder of the Far East. Fewer South Asian specialists have master's and doctor's degrees than is the case for most other regions.

Southeast Asia. In this region, consisting of Malaya, Burma, Indo-China, Thailand, the Philippines, the East Indies, and Melanesia, 191 specialists were registered. The most numerous group was in economics (47), but political science ranked second (26), followed by anthropology and sociology. Other disciplines were represented by fewer than 20 persons each. The highest proportion of native-born Americans was found here, but there were fewer women and fewer persons with doctorates than in most other fields.

Northern Asia. Only 27 specialists registered for the area, which includes Siberia, Manchuria, Mongolia, and the Kazakh, Uzbek, Turkmen, Tadzhik, and Kirghiz Soviet Republics. There were 10 economists, 4 anthropologists, 6 geographers, and only 2 political scientists. Other disciplines were represented either by one or no specialist.

Central, Western, and Southern Africa. This area south of the Sahara Desert was listed as the first specialty of 85 persons, the most numerous group being the anthropologists with 23 persons. Political science ranked next with 12 persons. Sociology, geography, history, and economics came next with 11, 10, 9, and 7 specialists, respectively. Other disciplines were represented by fewer than five persons each.

Selected Pacific Islands. Of the 39 specialists on Micronesia and Polynesia, 19 were anthropologists. The next most numerous group is not clearly given. Table II of the report lists political science as ranking second, with 8 specialists. The text of the report (p. 12) lists 8 economists, although Table II shows no entry at all for economists. This, however, is an oversight, for subsequent correspondence between this reviewer and the principal author of the report confirms the impression that the entry should be for political scientists. Geography, sociology, history, and linguistics are represented by 4, 3, 2, and 2 specialists, respectively.

The report tabulates other data such as citizenship, age, education, type and location of employer, total professional income, employment status, and sex of the area specialists registering.

A few minor errors and organizational deficiencies slightly mar the report, but this is understandable since, as the title indicates, this is a preliminary version. It has been submitted to several specialists in the areas under survey and is being revised on the basis of suggestions received. It is planned that the revised form will be published probably this year.

The report suggests several observations of pertinence to political science. These observations cannot be regarded as definitive since they are based only on the data used in the report. Hence some comment on the possible limitations of the data as described by the report's authors seems pertinent here.

Undoubtedly there are more area specialists in the United States than those who completed the questionnaires used in this study. Schedules (as the report calls them) were mailed to some 55,000 persons, of whom only 25,500 responded. There are probably many among those who did not respond who would qualify as area specialists. If, as the report states (p. 2), the proportion of area specialists is the same among non-respondents as among respondents, there would be 3,424 more qualified persons. Very likely the same proportion would not hold, for many of those who did not answer probably correctly assumed that they were not qualified as area specialists. Another limitation of these observations is that of time. The data were collected in 1952: a more recent collection might yield different results. Obviously, the observations which follow share the limitations of the basic data.

Probably the most startling observation is that political science is very much concerned with Africa, Asia, and Eastern Europe. We appear to be much more culture-area oriented than this writer had supposed. Of the total 3,618 political scientists in the National Registration, 13.7 per cent of our members claim to be specialists in these areas. Political science thus ranks seventh in claimed area competence. This percentage of competence is more significant than our seventh rank indicates. The first five disciplines which show a higher percentage of area competence (Table I) are archeology, anthropology, geography, biblical literature, and linguistics. All of these are disciplines which have some special historic or substantive claim to the areas considered. History ranks sixth (with 13.9 per cent of the historians claiming competence), and economics comes below political science (with 12 per cent of the economists claiming competence). Among disciplines having no historic claim to interest in these areas, then, political science ranks a very close second, being out-ranked by history by only .2 per cent.

The extent of our professional interest in these areas is indicated in another way. Of the eight areas considered, political science ranks first in declared competence on the Far East.

This is surprising (at least to this writer) when one considers that a generation ago the number of political scientists interested in Asia could be counted on the fingers of two hands. In six other areas (Near and Middle East, Eastern Europe, South Asia, Southeast Asia, Africa, and selected Pacific Islands) political science ranks second. Only in the study of North Asia (Soviet Asia and Manchuria) are we less well represented than economics, geography, and anthropology.

This significant concern for area studies will undoubtedly influence the character of our teaching and research for some time to come. Yet it is worthy of notice that there seems to be a lag between the immediate political importance of an area and the universities' response to its importance. Hence, in 1954, more than a decade after the height of concern for understanding Japanese, Chinese, and Korean culture, we find ourselves with what appears to be an oversupply of specialists in this area. It may well be that interest thus reflected in universities will be in areas of recent past importance rather than of anticipated future importance.

Such studies as this can be of great use to organizations like the Ford Foundation Board of Overseas Training and Research in preparing specialists for areas likely to become important in the future. These studies should be frequent and regular, perhaps annual, for the value diminishes sharply with the age of the data. It is hoped that the American Council of Learned Societies will continue these studies and make them widely available to institutions of learning and professional associations. It is reasonable to suppose that universities will find significance in such studies for planning curricular emphases. If we would keep the peace through understanding of other cultures, we might find value in empirical studies which show where the gaps in our knowledge are.—

RALPH BRAIBANTI, Duke University.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Orville Alexander, chairman of the department of government at Southern Illinois University, has been granted a leave of absence until December, 1954 to serve as director of research for the Illinois School Problems Commission and the Ohio School Survey Committee.

Vincent M. Barnett, Jr., of Williams College, will be a visiting member of the faculty of the department of political science at Stanford University during the summer quarter of 1954, offering courses in constitutional law and in the administration of foreign aid programs.

Carl E. Barch, Foreign Service Officer, has been transferred from the American Embassy at Caracas, Venezuela, where he has served as second secretary for the past two and one-half years, to the American Consulate General at Toronto, Ontario, Canada. Mr. Barch entered the Foreign Service in 1948 and previously served at the American Consulate, Nicosia, Cyprus.

George C. S. Benson, president of Claremont Men's College, has taken a six months' leave of absence to serve as director of research for the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

William W. Boyer, Jr., who received his doctorate from the University of Wisconsin, was appointed instructor in government and international relations at the University of Connecticut, effective in February, 1954.

Alfred G. Buehler, professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed by Governor Fine as Chairman of the Pennsylvania Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. Professor Buehler has been serving as Chairman of the Pennsylvania Tax Study Committee.

Edward H. Buehrig served as acting chairman of the department of government at Indiana University during the past academic year.

Franklin L. Burdette has been appointed head of overseas libraries operated by the United States Information Agency. He is in charge of cultural activities in 158 libraries in 63 countries, including translations, grants, and the $10,000,000 information media guaranty program for the sale of American books abroad. The University of Maryland has granted him leave of absence from his position as head of the department of government and politics.

George P. Bush has been promoted to a full professorship in public administration at the American University.

Henry C. Bush was a visiting member of the political science staff at the University of Alabama during the past academic year.

Anthony P. Campanella has been appointed instructor of government and politics in the Iceland Center of the University of Maryland.

Edward S. Corwin, of Princeton University, was a visiting professor in the department of political science at Whittier College during the second semester of 1953-54.

Cecil Van Crabb has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science at Vassar College.

Frederick S. DeMarr has been appointed instructor of government and politics at the University of Maryland with assignment to Newfoundland centers.

Joseph Dunner has resumed his regular duties as chairman of the department of political science at Grinnell College after a year's leave of absence.

Lawrence L. Durisch, of the Tennessee Valley Authority, was a visiting professor of political science at the University of Alabama during the spring semester.

Robert E. Elder, associate professor of political science at Colgate University, spent the spring semester in Washington, D.C. in charge of the Colgate University Washington Study Group.

Mohammad Hasan El-Zayyat, cultural attaché at the Egyptian Embassy in Washington, served as a visiting associate professor of government at Columbia University during the spring session.

Ludwig F. Freund, of Roosevelt College, was a guest lecturer on international organization at Northwestern University during the winter quarter.

John D. Gerletti, Jr., of the School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, is on a year's leave of absence in New York during 1954, in order to act as the general manager for the International Fire Chiefs Association. Professor Gerletti's place is being filled by Richard Gable, recently of the Stanford political science faculty.

L. Jay Gould has been reappointed instructor in political science at the University of Vermont.

John Green, who recently received his Ph.D. degree from the University of Chicago, has been appointed assistant professor of government at the University of South Dakota.

Morton Grodzins has been appointed Dean of the Social Science Division, University of Chicago, and promoted to a full professorship in the department of political science. For the past two years he has been director of the University of Chicago Press.

Thomas T. Hammond has resumed his teaching duties as an assistant professor in the departments of history and foreign affairs at the University of Virginia after spending six months in travel and research in Yugoslavia and Trieste.

Earl T. Hanson, of Duke University, was on sabbatical leave during the second semester.

Lowell H. Hattery has been advanced to a full professorship in public administration at the American University.

Richard H. Heindel, staff deputy director of the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO, Department of State, has been appointed Dean of the University of Buffalo College of Arts and Sciences, effective July 1, 1954. During the main summer session, Dean Heindel will serve as a consultant-lecturer for Pennsylvania State University's Third Institute on World Affairs and International Cooperation.

L. Vaughan Howard, of Tulane University, will be a visiting member of the political science staff at Duke University during the 1954 summer session.

J. C. Hurewitz is on leave from Columbia University to spend the spring and summer in the Near and Middle East.

Dunning Idle has been appointed assistant professor of government and politics at the University of Maryland with assignment to the Newfoundland centers during the spring semester.

Stanton Jue, formerly of the University of California and research specialist for the Committee for Free Asia, has accepted an appointment to study acculturation and behavioral problems in San Francisco under the auspices of the International Institute.

Max M. Kampelman, recently a member of the political science faculties at the University of Minnesota and Bennington College, and now legislative counsel to United States Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, has been appointed visiting professor of political science at Howard University for 1954.

Joseph A. Kitchin, who is on sabbatical leave from Queens College, New York, and has been a Fulbright lecturer in political science in the universities in Bangkok, Thailand, since June, 1953, was appointed Executive Director of the Fulbright Foundation in Thailand on December 1, 1953, and was requested to extend his stay there through June, 1954. He will return to Queens College in September, 1954.

Frank L. Klingberg is serving as acting chairman of the department of government at Southern Illinois University.

Walter H. C. Laves has been appointed chairman of the department of government at Indiana University. He has resigned as Vice President of the Governmental Affairs Institute and will assume his new duties in the fall. In March of 1954, Professor Laves was secretary-general of a conference on "Organization and Administration of Public Enterprise in the Industrial Field," held in Rangoon, Burma, under the joint sponsorship of the UN Technical Assistance Administration, the Economic Cooperation Administration for the Far East, and the International Institute of Administrative Sciences.

Gerard J. Mangone served as acting chairman of the department of political science at Swarthmore College during the past academic year.

Charles B. McClane, formerly of the United States mission in Moscow and the University of California, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Swarthmore College.

Rodney L. Mott, director of the division of social sciences and professor of political science at Colgate University, returned to the University during the second semester after spending a year in Australia on a Fulbright grant studying problems of local self-government.

L. C. Noonan has recently returned from a special leave of absence, during which he carried on special research under a Ford Foundation grant, and has resumed his duties as assistant professor in the department of political science, University of Southern California.

Andrew E. Nuquist has been named chairman of the department of political science at the University of Vermont to succeed Professor Daniel B. Carroll, retired.

Malcolm B. Parsons has been promoted to associate professor of public administration at the Florida State University.

Nathaniel Peffer has returned to Columbia University from Australia where he lectured at the University of Queensland, Brisbane.

J. Roland Pennock was on leave of absence from Swarthmore College during the past year under a Guggenheim grant to study American and British legislation.

Paul J. Piccard was a visiting professor in the School of Public Administration at the Florida State University during the past year.

John Plamenatz, of Oxford University, was a visiting professor in the department of public law at Columbia University during the spring session.

Elmer Plischke, of the University of Maryland, is serving as acting head of the department of government and politics while Franklin L. Burdette is on leave of absence as Chief of the Information Center Service of the U. S. Information Agency.

Robert F. Ray, of the Institute of Public Affairs of the State University of Iowa, has been appointed director of the Iowa Citizenship Clearing House.

Henry Reining, Jr., on September 1, 1953, became Dean of the School of Public Administration at the University of Southern California. He succeeded Dean Emery E. Olson who had been dean since the School was established in 1928 and was retired at his own request.

John P. Roche has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Haverford College.

Francis E. Rourke, of Yale University, served as an assistant professor in public administration at the Johns Hopkins University during the past academic year.

Eva R. Rubin has been appointed instructor of political science at the Johns Hopkins University.

Francis Shih-hao Shieh, former faculty member of Loyola College, Shanghai, China, and an alumnus of Georgetown University, has been appointed instructor at the Army Language School.

Currin V. Shields, assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), was on a sabbatical-in-residence leave during the spring semester.

Oliver C. Short, recently retired Director of the Office of Personnel Administration, U. S. Department of Commerce, was a visiting lecturer for a six weeks' period in the School of Public Administration, Florida State University.

Lewis B. Sims, of the U. S. Public Health Service, has been loaned to the new Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government to serve as a research analyst with the Medical Services Task Force. During the past year, Mr. Sims served as a visiting professor of political science at UCLA.

Frank M. Stewart, of the University of California at Los Angeles, who has been on sabbatical leave for the academic year 1953-54, will resume teaching in the fall semester.

William S. Stokes was on research leave from the University of Wisconsin during the second semester in order to work on a volume on the nature of power in Latin-American politics.

Ronald M. Stout has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Colgate University.

Robert Sullivant, of the University of South Dakota, has been granted a leave of absence to participate in a research project on Russian government at Georgetown University.

Carl B. Swisher, of the Johns Hopkins University, was a visiting professor of political science at Whittier College during the spring semester.

Nelson E. Taylor, Jr. was a visiting lecturer in political science at the University of Vermont during the second semester of 1953-54.

Manfred C. Vernon, formerly of the Department of State, was a visiting associate professor of political science at the University of Alabama during 1953-54.

H. O. Waldby, currently on leave of absence to teach at the University of the Philippines, has been promoted to an associate professorship of public administration at the Florida State University.

Earl Warner has been appointed chairman of the department of political science at Ohio Wesleyan University for a two-year period, beginning September 1, 1954.

S. Walter Washington, a former officer in the U. S. Foreign Service, has been appointed lecturer in the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs, University of Virginia.

George H. Watson is on a year's leave of absence from Roosevelt College to engage in research under a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education of the Ford Foundation.

J. D. Williams has been named director of the interne program in public administration which has recently been resumed at the University of Utah.

William R. Willoughby served as acting chairman of the department of history and government at St. Lawrence University during the past academic year.

Ellsworth P. Woods, formerly associate professor of political science at Western Michigan College, has returned to the campus after a year's leave of absence to become head of the newly created division of basic studies.

John J. Wuest has been appointed instructor of government and politics in the European program of the University of Maryland.

W. R. Yates has been reappointed instructor in political science at the University of Vermont.

Paul N. Ylvisaker has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Swarthmore College. He is presently supervising a research team studying political behavior in Philadelphia, under a grant from the Social Science Research Council.

IN MEMORIAM

George Edgar McReynolds, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and formerly head of the department of government and international relations at the University of Connecticut, died on March 28, 1954, at the age of forty-four. His brief career will be remembered in the love and gratitude of his associates and students. Dean McReynolds contributed much to the growth of the University and of the department of which he was the first chairman. He saw international relations as an essential element of general education as well as a field for specialization and was instrumental in the introduction of this subject into the freshman-sophomore curriculum of the University.

Dean McReynolds secured his undergraduate education at Indiana University where he was graduated in 1931. He received his Ph.D. degree at Clark University in 1937. His special field of interest was the Far East. He served as a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy from 1942 to 1946. Dean McReynolds was editor of Inside Asia (1942), joint editor of Essays in History and International Relations (1949), and joint author of Japan in American Public Opinion (1937) and China, Japan, and the Powers (1952). He taught at the University of Maine and Indiana University as well as at the University of Connecticut, where he organized the department of government and international relations in 1947 and became Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences in 1950.—G. LOWELL FIELD.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

REPORT OF NOMINATING COMMITTEE

At the coming meeting of the American Political Science Association to be held in Chicago, the Committee on Nominations (Charles B. Robson, Chairman, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill) will propose the following officers for 1954-55: President-Elect, Harold D. Lasswell (Yale University); Vice-Presidents, Hubert H. Humphrey (United States Senate), Lindsay Rogers (Columbia University), Charles S. Hyneman (Northwestern University); Secretary, Harvey C. Mansfield (Ohio State University); Treasurer, Edward H. Litchfield (Cornell University); Members of the Council for two years, Gabriel A. Almond (Center of International Studies, Princeton), Stephen K. Bailey (Wesleyan University), James M. Burns (Williams College), Gwendolen M. Carter (Smith College), Samuel J. Eldersveld (University of Michigan), Avery Leiserson (Vanderbilt University), Leslie M. Lipson (University of California, Berkeley), Norman Palmer (University of Pennsylvania).

BOOK OF THE YEAR AWARDS

This year there will be only two book awards, which will be made on behalf of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Foundation (for the award in the field of Government and Human Welfare), and the Woodrow Wilson Foundation (for the award in the field of Government and Democracy). Each award carries a cash prize of $1,000 to the author, along with an appropriate citation from the Association. Only books by American authors published in the United States during the calendar year 1953 will be eligible for consideration.

For selection of the best books, a General Chairman and a panel of three members for each award have been selected from the membership of the Association. The General Chairman and members of each panel for the 1954 awards are as follows:

General Chairman: Grayson Kirk, President, Columbia University.

Panel for the Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award: Royden Dangerfield (University of Illinois), Chairman; Avery Leiserson (Vanderbilt University); and Clinton Rossiter (Cornell University).

Panel for the Franklin D. Roosevelt Foundation Award: Victor Jones (Wesleyan University), Chairman; John A. Davis (College of the City of New York); and a third member not yet chosen.

Books for the Franklin D. Roosevelt Foundation Award should deal with the ideals, aims, and purposes of government, including, for example, subjects such as civil rights, economic development, social welfare, education, labor problems, labor relations, etc. These categories are illustrative only. Books on international affairs may be included if they deal primarily with the objectives of government.

Books for the Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award should deal primarily with the organization, structure, and functioning of government, including concepts of political theory, party organization and party processes, inter-governmental relations, and comparative government, all broadly interpreted.

The Chairmen and members of the panels will be glad to receive suggestions of titles.

CONGRESSIONAL INTERNE PROGRAM

The Edgar B. Stern Family Fund of New Orleans, Louisiana, has expanded its grant to The American Political Science Association to enable the awarding of ten Congressional Internships for the year 1954-1955. In accordance with the terms of the expanded grant, five political scientists and five journalists have been selected for the coming year. During the first year of the operation of the Congressional Intern Program, four professors of political science, one lawyer, and one journalist were chosen.

The Congressional Internes will commence their work in Washington on November 1, 1954, and continue for a nine-month period until the end of July, 1955. November 1 was selected as a starting date instead of September 1 in order to give the Internes more time in Washington while Congress is in session. However, the Internes will be given an option of starting their work on September 1 if any of them desire to participate actively in the congressional campaign this fall.

The Congressional Internships pay $4,000 for the nine-month period in Washington. According to current information, these stipends are tax-free.

Frequent meetings of the internes are held to exchange experiences and reactions, to interview and discuss legislative problems with members of Congress, staff officials on Capitol Hill, representatives of the executive branch concerned with legislative liaison, and representatives of the leading lobby organizations. During such meetings over the past year, the Congressional Internes have met with several members of the White House staff, the leadership of both House and Senate, a large number of the committee chairmen, about one-third of the members of the Senate and an equal number of the House members, and legislative officials of the Chamber of Commerce, Congress of Industrial Organizations, American Farm Bureau Federation, and Farmers' Union. An off-the-record session with former President Truman was held during his visit to Washington early in May.

The current group of Congressional Internes have held assignments with the following since their arrival in Washington: Legislative Liaison Office of the White House, Senator Estes Kefauver (D., Tenn.), Senate Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, Senator Wayne Morse (Ind., Ore.), Rep. Richard Bolling (D., Mo.), Rep. Brooks Hays (D., Ark.), Rep. Richard Simpson (R., Pa., and Chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee), Rep. Don Magnuson (D., Wash.), Rep. Mel Price (D., Ill.), Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Paul Douglas (D., Ill.), and Rep. Franklin D. Roosevelt (D., N. Y.). The amount of the fellowship pays the full cost of the Internes' stipends, and their services are made available free of charge to congressional committees and individual members.

The Internes have written speeches, handled constituent inquiries, conducted liaison with executive departments, assisted in the drafting of committee reports, done research needed by committees and members, held meetings with pressure group representatives to appraise their position on legislation, assisted in the drafting and introduction of legislation, monitored committee hearings and floor debates to spot loopholes and make suggestions on questions to be asked and information to be presented in future debates and hearings—and participated in scores of other legislative duties.

In nearly every case, the Internes have had access to information, and the opportunity to participate in aspects of the legislative process not ordinarily open to students or to the public in general. For example, they have attended many executive sessions of committees, have had access to the floor of the Senate, and have, in most instances, become members of the "inner circle" of congressional offices.

Close to 200 men and women initially applied under the program. The chairmen of the departments of political science at colleges and universities throughout the country, as well as the deans of Law Schools and Schools of Journalism, were each asked to nominate the one best candidate who had come to his attention. Working journalists, including newspaper and magazine writers and those active in radio and television, were encouraged to apply through their editors, and through stories announcing the program which appeared in Editor and Publisher, the Guild Reporter, and the regular news media.

These applications initially received were screened down to the 45 best written applications. The Screening Committee consisted of Professor Lowell Hattery of The American University, Professor William Johnstone, Jr. of the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University, Dr. Karl Stromsem of the Department of the Interior, Jack Beal of Time Magazine and formerly of the United Press, and Ben Reeves of the Louisville Courier-Journal (one of the 1953-1954 Congressional Internes). The 45 applicants were then interviewed by ten regional boards set up by the Association in New York; Wellesley, Massachusetts; Rochester, New York; Washington; New Orleans; Chicago; Lincoln, Nebraska; Missoula, Montana; San Francisco; and Honolulu, Hawaii. The reports of the regional interviewing boards were then reviewed by the Screening Committee, which recommended the 19 best candidates to the Advisory Committee on the Interne Program for final selection.

The Advisory Committee consists of Dr. Ernest S. Griffith, Director of the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress (Chairman); Senator Irving M. Ives (R., N. Y.); Merlo J. Pusey, Associate Editor of the Washington Post and Times-Herald; Congressman Richard Bolling (D., Mo.); and Professor Stephen K. Bailey of the Department of Government at Wesleyan University.

The Congressional Internes selected for 1954-1955 are as follows:

Clifford D. Coover, 27, of Bozeman, Montana, night editor of the Bozeman Daily Chronicle since 1950. Mr. Coover received a B.A. in Journalism (cum laude) from the University of Minnesota in 1950, and has been with the Bozeman Chronicle since that time, except for six months as news editor of an Algona, Iowa, newspaper. Mr. Coover has been active in Republican party politics in Montana.

John T. Dempsey, 29, of Detroit, Michigan, an Instructor in Political Science at the University of Detroit since 1951. Mr. Dempsey was graduated from Wayne University in Detroit, received his Master's degree from the University of Detroit, and has done work toward a doctoral degree in political science at the University of Michigan. His dissertation is entitled "Control by Congress over the Seating and Disciplining of its Members."

Louis B. Fleming, 29, of Pasadena, California, who has been a reporter on the Pasadena Star-News since 1948. He received his B.A. degree from Stanford University in 1947, following which he edited the San Gabriel (Calif.) Sun, and was valley editor of the Pomona (Calif.) Progress-Bulletin. He has won praise from the community for his objective reporting of explosive issues involving the Board of Education and City Hall.

William C. Gibbons, 27, of Harrisonburg, Virginia, who is completing his doctoral studies at Princeton University, where he received a master's degree in 1952. Mr. Gibbons was graduated from Randolph-Macon College in 1949, and he has served as an Assistant in instruction in the field of political science at both Randolph-Macon College and Princeton University. His doctoral dissertation is entitled "Congress and the International Information Program since the End of World War II."

Marvin A. Harder, 32, of Wichita, Kansas, currently Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Wichita. Mr. Harder received his A.B. degree from the University of Wichita in 1947 and the A.M. degree from the Department of Public Law and Government at Columbia University in 1949. He has been teaching at the University of Wichita since 1947, aside from the period of his graduate studies at Columbia University. He is a precinct committeeman, ward supervisor, and President of the Democratic Club of Wichita.

Daniel B. Jacobs, 28, of Boston, Massachusetts, since 1952 producer of public affairs programs for the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council in Boston (WGBH-FM). Mr. Jacobs is a graduate of Harvard College (1950), where he was a member of the editorial board of the Harvard Crimson.

W. Astor Kirk, 31, Chairman of the Department of Government at Huston-Tillotson College, Austin, Texas. Mr. Kirk was graduated from Howard University in 1946 magna cum laude, and received his Master's degree from Howard University the following year. He has done considerable work toward his Ph.D. at the London School of Economics and Political Science, and the University of Texas, being one of the first Negroes to enter the Graduate School at the University of Texas. He is also Director of the Institute of Politics at Huston-Tillotson College, in addition to his duties as departmental chairman.

Richard T. Mittauer, 26, of Omaha, Nebraska, news editor for the radio and television stations WOW in Omaha. Mr. Mittauer received B.S. and M.S. degrees in journalism from Northwestern University in 1950 and 1951, respectively. He was a news writer and reporter for WDUZ in Green Bay, Wisconsin, and a news editor for the American Broadcasting Co. in Chicago in 1951 before joining the staff of WOW.

Eli Rapaich, 28, of Lewiston, Idaho, currently completing work for Master of Laws degree at Yale Law School. Mr. Rapaich received both the Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Laws degrees in 1953 from the University of Idaho. He also served with the Marine Corps in China.

William L. Rivers, 29, of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, an Instructor in the School of Journalism at Louisiana State University as well as a reporter, columnist, and editorial writer on the Baton Rouge State-Times. Mr. Rivers received his B.A. and M.A. in Journalism from Louisiana State University in 1951 and 1952, respectively. After graduation, he was a reporter and editorial columnist for the Panama City (Fla.) News-Herald, and has contributed some 50 popular articles to various national magazines.

As first alternate to the five awards made in the fields of political science and law, Charles L. Clapp, 31, of Berkeley, California, was named; James W. Pratt, 29, of Akron, Ohio, was named second alternate in this category.

John F. Burby, 29, of Honolulu, Hawaii, reporter for the Honolulu Advertiser, was designated as first alternate to the five awards made in the field of journalism. Robert P. Dorang, 29, of Buffalo, New York, a reporter with the Buffalo Evening News, was named second alternate in the journalism category.

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

RALPH J. BUNCHE
United Nations

President-Elect

CHARLES MCKINLEY
Reed College

Vice-Presidents

TAYLOR COLE
Duke University

J. A. C. GRANT
University of California
(Los Angeles)

CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON
State College of Washington

Secretary

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Executive Director

JOHN GANGE
1785 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Treasurer

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD
Cornell University

Managing Editor

American Political Science Review
HUGH L. ELSBREE
Library of Congress

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers *ex officio*s

WALTER H. BENNETT
University of Alabama
HUGH A. BONE
University of Washington
ROBERT A. DAHL
Yale University
DAVID FELLMAN
University of Wisconsin
VICTOR JONES
Wesleyan University
JACK W. PELTASON
University of Illinois
EMMETTE S. REDFORD
University of Texas
CLINTON ROSSITER
Cornell University

MANNING J. DAUER
University of Florida
EARL LATHAM
Amherst College
ARNAUD LEAVELLE
Stanford University
DAYTON D. MCKEAN
University of Colorado
J. ROLAND PENNOCK
Swarthmore College
C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago
WALLACE S. SAYRE
College of the City of New York
DWIGHT WALDO
University of California (Berkeley)

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMEON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNRO SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER
CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON
ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES K. POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING

"The most solid of recent books published on foreign policy."

—RAYMOND MOLEY

"A massive contribution to 'revisionist' history."

—WINFRED E. GARRISON

PERPETUAL WAR for PERPETUAL PEACE

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF THE FOREIGN POLICY OF FRANKLIN DELANO
ROOSEVELT AND ITS AFTERMATH

• The definitive revisionist treatment of the responsibility for the Second World War and American entry therein, and of the consequences of our involvement in the conflict. The conclusive answer to the defense of the Roosevelt-Hull foreign policy by Professors Langer and Gleason and Herbert Feis.

Edited by

HARRY ELMER BARNES, author of The Genesis of the World War, with the collaboration of: WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN, PERCY L. GREAVES, JR., GEORGE A. LUNDBERG, GEORGE MORGENSTERN, WILLIAM L. NEUMANN, FREDERIC R. SANBORN, and CHARLES G. TANSILL

The book remains an act of outstanding courage which, as far as I am concerned, sets the editor and his associates high on a civic pedestal . . . I cannot help nursing the hope that by some miraculous intervention the book will be listened to and will start a stream of criticism that will push the 'court historians' out of their trenches. I hope the book will escape the doom of silence under which its enemies are probably at this moment conspiring to bury it."

—PROFESSOR FERDINAND SCHEVILL

The most solid of the books recently published on foreign policy . . . It is a series of sharply critical essays by individuals who, like the editor, Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes, cannot be overlooked in the final determination of the wisdom of a course which has cost us so much in blood and resources over the last two decades."

—PROFESSOR RAYMOND MOLEY

The reader who desires a succinct as well as authoritative vision of the distorted writing of American diplomatic history by New Deal advocates will find the present volume invaluable . . . Here is a book that should be in every public library and every school library in this country. The American people deserve the truth, and it should be the whole truth."

—PROFESSOR KENNETH COLEGROVE

"If there is one book that should be read by those who want a straightforward analysis of the official myths about the origins and aftermath of the Second World War, Professor Barnes has provided it. Here in a single volume is material that would otherwise have to be sifted from at least eleven separate works."

—JEANNE DANFORTH, The Freeman

"I wish to congratulate the gifted writers who have described so convincingly the diplomacy of recent years which is still being followed and will end in disaster, sooner or later, to our nation."

—ADMIRAL HARRY E. YARNELL

"Compact and full of good things . . . the arguments remain simply unanswerable . . . The impeachment of the 'historical blackout' makes a first-class introduction not only to the volume but to the study of the entire Kriegsschuldfrage."

—PROFESSOR THOMAS CALLANDER

"The revisionist case deserves to be heard, and we can learn from this statement of it . . . If the revisionists will turn their fire upon today's rapid drift toward the death of Western civilization, they may help us avoid the 'one more war' after which there would be nothing left worth arguing about."

—PROFESSOR D. F. FLEMING, The Nation

679 pages, indexed, $6. At all book stores or postpaid from

THE CAXTON PRINTERS, LTD. CALDWELL IDAHO

★ Brand new, completely up-to-date information on the American States

THE American Commonwealths SERIES

With the inauguration of this series (48 volumes), a vast storehouse of comparative information on the history, development, and present functioning of government in the American states becomes available for the first time. The series is being edited by W. Brooke Graves, and the first two volumes to be published are . . .

THE GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF WYOMING

By HERMAN H. TRACHSEL and RALPH M. WADE, University of Wyoming

THE GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION OF NEW YORK

By LYNTON K. CALDWELL, Syracuse University

★ Penetrating analyses of each state's

History • Politics • Elections • Revenue System • Financial and Personnel Administration • Courts and Law Enforcement • Education, Health and Welfare • Agriculture • Highways • Business and Labor • Municipal and County Government • and much, much more.

- Select Bibliography at the end of each book
- Appendices containing names of state and national officials
- Illustrated with charts and tables
- Fully indexed

Text Edition: WYOMING	381 pages	$4.95
NEW YORK	506 pages	$5.95

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY

432 Fourth Avenue, New York 16, N.Y.

THE POLITICAL ELEMENT IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF ECONOMIC THEORY

GUNNAR MYRDAL, author of An American Dilemma, presents a historical and critical account of the part played by political speculation in the development of economic theory. He discusses the political doctrines that have developed within the province of economic theory proper—the line of thinking which started with the Physiocrats, proceeded via the classical school, and finally branched out in the several variants of neoclassical marginalism. $5.00

MEMBERS OF THE LONG PARLIAMENT

By DOUGLAS BRUNTON and DONALD PENNINGTON. Was the English Civil War and Interregnum of the mid-seventeenth century a class struggle; a stage in the evolution of democracy; or a "Great Rebellion"? This valuable and highly original book, by analyzing the biographies and family histories of all the 800 members of Parliament who sat between 1640 and 1653, reveals greater similarities than differences in the social, economic, and educational position between Royalist and Parliamentary members. $4.25

THE ECONOMIC IMPACT ON UNDER-DEVELOPED SOCIETIES

ESSAYS ON INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT AND SOCIAL CHANGE

By S. HERBERT FRANKEL. This book, written by an expert on economic problems of multi-racial societies, examines past and present concepts of colonization . . . the implications of technical change . . . the position of the UN . . . the rapidly changing situation in South Africa, and the American Point Four Program. $3.25

REALMS OF VALUE

By RALPH BARTON PERRY. What is the role of the state in human life; how well does it perform that role, and by what ideal standard is it to be appraised? Mr. Perry's discussion of this problem forms a part of a wide-ranging analysis—covering, also, the legal system, the economic order, art, science, education, and religion—of the values which motivate the major pursuits and institutions that make up our civilization. 497 pages. $7.50

At your bookseller, or

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

Completely Revised, Reset, and Enlarged

POLITICS AMONG NATIONS

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU of The University of Chicago

It is with special pride that ALFRED A. KNOPF, Inc. announces the availability for next semester's classes of Hans Morgenthau's revised and considerably enlarged POLITICS AMONG NATIONS. Nearly one third of the book has been rewritten, a great deal of fresh material has been added, and the entire text has been brought up to date. A set of new and distinguished maps has been included as well as a useful teaching aid in the form of a unique Historical Glossary.

6 $\frac{3}{8}$ x 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches, cloth, 600 pages, maps and charts,
$5.75 text

Examination copies on request

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Publisher
501 Madison Avenue College Department New York 22

New Mc Graw-Hill Books

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: In the Age of Conflict Between Democracy and Dictatorship. New second edition

By ROBERT STRAUSS-HUPÉ, University of Pennsylvania, and STEFAN T. POSSONY, Georgetown University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press.

Here is a thorough revision of a text for college courses. The book establishes the study of international relations on a scientific basis and adheres rigorously to the scientific method of exposition of fact and logical analysis. The authors evaluate the impact of all significant factors in the field of international relations and combine these individual factors into meaningful aggregates.

INDUSTRIAL CONFLICT

By ARTHUR KORNHAUSER, Wayne University, ROBERT DUBIN, University of Illinois, and ARTHUR M. ROSS, University of California at Berkeley. 544 pages, $6.00.

This work offers significant thinking of 39 authorities in the fields of psychology, sociology and economics in an integrated presentation of the issues of industrial conflict in the United States. It brings the entire field into focus, providing perspective and insight for students and others concerned with labor-management affairs. The viewpoint is that of the social scientist who sees these problems in the framework of society as a whole.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND THE GOVERNMENT

By WAYNE L. McNAUGHTON and JOSEPH LAZAR, University of California at Los Angeles. In press.

Gives students and businessmen a general, practical knowledge of industrial relations law, providing a solid basis for the solution of the problems which they may confront. It covers such areas as collective bargaining, trade agreements, the adjustment of grievances, arbitration, mediation, conciliation, and employer-union cooperation. Controversial issues are presented objectively and impartially and validity is accomplished by the inclusion of original source materials such as congressional reports and court decisions.

THE DYNAMICS OF DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT

By JOHN P. ROCHE, Haverford College, and MURRAY S. STEDMAN, Swarthmore College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 456 pages, $5.00.

Here is an introductory account of democratic government which views democratic institutions not as ends in themselves but as a part of the broader framework of democratic, political theory. By means of a functional approach similar institutions in democratic countries are analyzed and compared so the reader can discover at each operational level the degree to which each institution in each country fulfills or fails to fulfill the requirements of democratic theory.

McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc.

330 West 42nd Street

New York 36, N.Y.

Send for copies on approval

New and Important OXFORD Books

Freedom, Loyalty, Dissent

By HENRY STEELE COMMAGER

"He follows freedom logically and relentlessly, wherever it leads. . . . He unerringly points out that the 'pernicious doctrine' of guilt by association violates every practical and moral and legal canon of Anglo-American law and custom and corrodes the very fabric of American society. . . . In fact, Mr. Commager's provocative book constitutes an admirable primer on just what is the essence of Americanism."

N.Y. Times Book Review

$2.50

The Prophet Armed

Trotsky: 1879-1921

By ISAAC DEUTSCHER

"An able, moving, and fascinating portrait of one of the great makers of the history of our time, and of the stormy events in which he took so large and dramatic a part . . . a biographical history which is well organized, illuminating, compassionate, and fascinating to read."

Saturday Review

$6.00

South Africa in a Changing World

By EDGAR H. BROOKES

Waning British influence, an increasing need for identification with the western powers, and internal policies that are alienating the West have plunged South Africa into a serious dilemma. This timely and thorough study explores the multiple problems of the Dominion and presents clearly the course Mr. Brookes believes it must follow for survival.

$3.00

Politics and Opinion in the Nineteenth Century

By JOHN BOWLE

The main ideas of leading nineteenth-century political theorists are presented impartially, and with emphasis on the social background which conditioned their thinking. Some of the important precursors of contemporary political philosophy who are discussed are, Godwin, Mill, Darwin, Green, Bradley, Marx and Engels.

$4.50

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. 11

Publishers of Fine Books for nearly Five Centuries

Prentice-Hall

NEW!

GOVERNMENT BY THE PEOPLE 2nd Edition

By JAMES M. BURNS, Williams College, and JACK W. PELTASON, University of Illinois.

Here is a new edition of the popular study of American government that stresses people and dynamic processes, rather than minutiae of laws and institutions. The new edition covers the first year of the Eisenhower Administration; added factual material is presented, and the book has been reorganized in such a way that facts are more easily grasped by the student.

N.B. This new 2nd Edition is available in both a NATIONAL-STATE-LOCAL Edition and a NATIONAL Edition.

960 pages • 6" x 9" • April, 1954

INTRODUCTION TO INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By CHARLES P. SCHLEICHER, University of Oregon.

Drawing upon several of the social sciences to give students an integrated approach, this is a clear and comprehensive introduction to international relations. The text focuses upon the dynamics of the international political process, national power, nationalism, sovereignty, international law, war, and pacific settlement of disputes. It discusses the attempts to organize a world society, describes the machinery for conducting interstate relations, explains the foreign policies of many nations. It concludes with a summary of the major problems and trends of contemporary international society.

960 pages • 5 $\frac{5}{8}$ " x 8 $\frac{3}{8}$ " • Summer, 1954

For approval copies write

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc. • 70 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 11, N.Y.

New Manuscripts Welcome

In expanding its publication program, Public Affairs Press, one of the nation's leading publishers of scholarly works since 1938, is seeking authoritative manuscripts in the fields of political science, economics, history, and sociology.

We furnish complete publishing facilities for books, pamphlets, and monographs. Our services include expert editorial assistance, dignified publicity, and intensive sales promotion.

If you have a manuscript which you would like to have considered, please send an outline or description to The Editor, Public Affairs Press, 2153 Florida Avenue, Washington 8, D.C. For details regarding our services and facilities, send for our free pamphlet "New Horizons of Scholarly Publishing."

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California;
R. Vance Presthus, Michigan State College

THIS UP-TO-DATE Third Edition of a well-known textbook already has a notable record of acceptance. It realistically analyzes the dynamics of public administration, administrative organization, personnel management, financial administration, administrative law and regulation, and administrative responsibility. Draws upon recent research in the social sciences that sheds light on the nature of group action, individual motivation, and leadership. Throughout, public administration is viewed as part of a larger social process which includes legislatures, pressure groups, and the separation of powers. 626 pages.

JUDICIAL LEGISLATION

Fred V. Cahill, Jr., Yale University

A STUDY in American legal theory which analyzes modern developments in jurisprudence, and examines arguments for modifying the lawmaking function of judges, particularly in the light of recent significant decisions of the Supreme Court. Discusses these decisions in terms of effect upon social legislation, civil liberties. Presents a balanced survey of legal theory from Holmes to Frankfurter, illustrating the increasing shift from rigid, literal interpretation to a flexible, realistic application of the law. A sound textbook for advanced courses in Constitutional Law, Legal Theory, the Judiciary. 164 pages.

Federal Administrative Law

Rinehart John Swenson, New York University

THIS INCLUSIVE study of the growth, nature, and control of administrative action thoroughly examines administrative law in the U.S. today. Emphasizing the various forms of administrative action and the means of their enforcement, it analyzes the development of the administrative process and shows the need for formalizing administrative action into a coherent body of law supervised by special courts of limited jurisdiction. Important consideration is given to the review of administrative action by the regular courts and the role of Congress in controlling administration. 376 pages.

Fundamentals of Political Science

Edited by Ossip K. Flechtheim, Colby College

INTRODUCTORY TEXTBOOK integrates the entire field of political science. Basic theory, principles, and problems are fully expounded and soundly supported with specific examples. The book surveys, compares, and evaluates the ideas and practices of all major nations. Recognizing the social aspects of politics, it stresses philosophical, historical, psychological, sociological, and anthropological elements. Each of these areas is covered by a specialist, thus affording soundness of text and breadth of viewpoint. 587 pages.

YALE BOOKS

THE REGULATION OF BUSINESSMEN

Robert E. Lane This study focuses on the social relations aspects of regulation and shows economic control to be a case of regulation of businessmen as well as of business. The author has interviewed businessmen, examined business law violations, and analyzed business publications to trace the present patterns in regulation. $3.75

THE REFUGEE IN THE POSTWAR WORLD

Jacques Vernant The past and present circumstances among refugees of the free world outside the Iron Curtain. "The absence from official endorsement and freedom from governmental inhibitions have enabled M. Vernant to make this prodigious study surprisingly human." The Economist, London $6.00

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE
YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
NEW HAVEN 7 CONN

PUBLIC POLICY: A YEARBOOK

*Published under the auspices of The Graduate School of Public Administration
Harvard University*

The Graduate School of Public Administration announces that the publication of PUBLIC POLICY has been resumed. Volume IV (1953) ready now.

Prepared under the editorial direction of Carl J. Friedrich and J. K. Galbraith this volume contains a broad series of studies of public policy problems of immediate pertinence to the special interests of the administrator, the lawyer, the businessman, the economist and the political scientist. The next, Volume V (1954) to be published in June 1954.

List price $4.75—make checks payable to Harvard University send orders to M-31 LITTAUER CENTER

Harvard University
Cambridge 38, Massachusetts

IS THERE A REPUBLICAN MAJORITY?

Political Trends: 1952-56

By LOUIS HARRIS

Research Executive with Elmo Roper

What novel factors contributed to the Republican-Eisenhower victory? How will such crucial elements as the women's vote, the "Solid South," the farmer, the suburban vote, affect the next elections?

Based on analysis of the numerous polls relating to the 1952 presidential election, this book is a fresh, fascinating and shrewdly informed estimate of the current and future political alignments in our two-party system—of vital interest to all teachers and students of political science, as well as to political strategists, journalists, and political leaders.

Just Published

$3.50 at your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS, N.Y. 16

2 in The HARVARD ECONOMIC STUDIES SERIES . . .

Here are two new Harvard Economic Studies, the distinguished series which includes such books as The Theory of Monopolistic Competition and Foundations of Economic Analysis; and such well known authors as Arthur N. Holcombe, E. S. Mason, F. W. Taussig, Joseph A. Schumpeter, Edward H. Chamberlin and Paul A. Samuelson. A complete list of all books in the series will be furnished on request.

METHODS OF CROP FORECASTING

FRED H. SANDERSON, in the first book on the subject, examines in detail the different approaches to crop forecasting, and the principal uses for which accurate forecasts are needed. There are chapters on principal statistical tools . . . various methods of estimating acreage . . . different approaches to forecasting in the U.S. and abroad. $5.00

THE WORLD WHEAT ECONOMY, 1885-1939

By WILFRED MALENBAUM. "The reader is given a very clear picture of the maladjustments to be encountered in the up and down trends of the world wheat industry during a 55-year period, taking into consideration the acreage, yield, production, carryover, consumption per capita, supply, and demand in the older and the new countries."— The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. $6.00

At your bookseller, or

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

The American Political Science Review

VOL. XLVIII

SEPTEMBER, 1954

NO. 3

PRESIDENCY AND LEGISLATION: THE GROWTH OF CENTRAL CLEARANCE

RICHARD E. NEUSTADT

Columbia University

Ten months after President Eisenhower's inaugural, an article in Fortune extolled a presidential aide in terms which would have seemed familiar ten months before;¹ the picture of his role in Eisenhower's entourage might easily have been drawn in President Truman's time. The subject of this piece was Roger W. Jones, an Assistant Director of the Bureau of the Budget and chief of its Office of Legislative Reference. In Fortune's terms, here was a confidential, if "non-political," member of the White House circle performing tasks of great importance to the President, trusted, respected, and relied upon by all of his associates. As an analysis of governmental functions and relationships, this testimonial was scarcely definitive, but its mere publication testifies to the continuation of the Budget Bureau's so-called legislative clearance operations, handily surviving the Great Transition of 1953.

What are these clearance operations? Essentially they amount to central coordination and review of stands taken by the various federal agencies at three successive stages of the legislative process.

Large numbers of the public measures introduced in Congress are formally proposed by agencies of the executive branch; departmental drafts officially en route to Congress first have to clear the Bureau of the Budget for interagency coordination and approval on the President's behalf. Once bills are introduced, regardless of their source, congressional committees ordinarily solicit views from interested agencies; official agency responses—in whatever form, to whomever addressed—first channel through the Budget Bureau for coordination and advice on each bill's relation to the President's program. When enrolled enactments come from Congress to the President for signature or veto, the Budget Bureau, as his agent, obtains, coordinates, and summarizes agency opinion on the merits, preparing in each case a presidential dossier complete with covering recommendation.

¹ Katherine Hammill, "This is a Bureaucrat," Fortune, Vol. 48, pp. 156 ff. (Nov., 1953).

These are the components of "legislative clearance" as the term is normally employed.² In practice, these operations are much more complex and a good deal less absolute than this simple recital would indicate. But generally speaking, central clearance has proceeded along these lines for many years.

Last year, despite the change of Administration, 380 agency drafts, 3,571 agency reports on pending bills, and 525 enrolled enactments were processed by the Budget Bureau.³ In 1954, the Bureau's Office of Legislative Reference, control center for clearance operations, is handling an even larger volume—with President Eisenhower and Budget Director Hughes earnestly supporting clearance regulations in effect since 1948, signed by a Budget Director long out of office, issued "by direction" of the President whose term expired January 20, 1953.⁴

Here is presidential machinery to coordinate a vital aspect of executive policy development; machinery to control, in some degree at least, the means by which the diverse elements of the executive express and implement their own designs. In Truman's time this mechanism was, as one observer put it, "the only clearing house that operates regularly between the multitudinous departments and bureaus . . . sometimes the only possible way to get government agencies working together. . . ."⁵ In the present Administration, it may well be that legislative clearance is losing this particular distinction. Elsewhere in the Executive Office of the President, new life has been breathed into the National Security Council, as an apparatus of policy coordination and control. Even the Council of Economic Advisers, with its revised chairmanship and interdepartmental advisory board, shows signs of institutional advance in these directions. So, indeed, does the Cabinet—though history suggests this may not last.

But if legislative clearance is no longer unique, it is by far the oldest, best intrenched, most thoroughly institutionalized of the President's coordinative instruments—always excepting the budget itself—receiving new stability and new significance by virtue of its demonstrated power to adapt and to survive. And this power is not something suddenly achieved and first displayed in 1953. The central clearance system has surmounted every governmental transition since the 1920's, preserving into Eisenhower's term not only the accretions of two Democratic decades, but even the inheritance from Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover.

² Agency proposals for executive orders, proclamations, and certain other formal presidential actions are also coordinated and cleared through the Bureau of the Budget, as are feasibility reports on proposed public works requiring congressional action.

³ Source: Office of Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget. In addition, there were 889 "direct referrals" from congressional sources asking Budget for views on pending bills.

⁴ Budget Circular A-19, Revised, dated October 25, 1948 sets forth coordination and clearance procedures and requirements concerning proposed and pending bills. Budget Circular A-9, Revised, issued at the same time, deals with enrolled enactments. Both circulars codified and brought up to date earlier usage and regulations.

⁵ Bertram M. Gross, The Legislative Struggle (New York, 1953), p. 169.

What is the nature of this mechanism? How has it adapted? Why has it survived? These are the questions to which this paper is addressed.⁶

I. FINANCIAL CLEARANCE IN THE TWENTIES

When President Harding approved the Budget and Accounting Act on June 10, 1921, the federal agencies lost their historic freedom to decide for themselves what appropriations they should ask of Congress; now the President, alone, was to decide and to request, with a new staff agency, the Budget Bureau, to help him do it. Moreover, in accordance with the Act's intent, but one committee in each House of Congress was to receive and review appropriation requests.⁷ Here, prescribed in law, was a new restrictive way of handling the life-and-death concerns of every agency—and most congressmen. And here were new organizations with a tremendous institutional stake in the successful assertion of that new way: the presidential Bureau of the Budget and the congressional Committees on Appropriations. Furthermore, these organizations had a clear mutuality of interest in closing off, as nearly as might be, all avenues to action on appropriations save their own. Substantive congressional committees, no less than executive agencies, were potential conspirators against the exclusive jurisdictions conferred by the new budget system. Facing common dangers, the system's beneficiaries made common cause. Central legislative clearance was a principal result.

It is significant of this community of interest that the original proposal for some form of central clearance came not from the new Budget Bureau, but from the House Appropriations Committee. In November, 1921, less than a month before the first presidential budget went to Congress, the Committee Chairman voiced to the Budget Director his concern about two minor measures—introduced at an agency's request and referred to a substantive committee—which authorized diversion of appropriated funds from the purposes originally specified. In the Chairman's view, "... matters of this character should come through the Bureau of the Budget . . . I have called them to your attention in order that you may take . . . steps . . . to include [such] requests . . . in the control which the Bureau has over direct estimates."⁸ It was this congressional observation which precipitated the first presidential effort to assert central control over agency views on proposed and pending legislation, an effort embodied in Budget Circular 49, issued December 19, 1921, "by direction of the President," after clearance with the House Committee.

⁶ This article deals with legislative coordination and review centering in the Bureau of the Budget. At a later date the author hopes to deal with a related process, planning the President's own legislative program: a process but newly and incompletely institutionalized, centering more nearly in the White House than the Budget Bureau, yet also exhibiting a high degree of continuity from Truman's time to Eisenhower's.

⁷ As an integral part of the budget reform, the House of Representatives changed its rules in 1920, at the second session of the 66th Congress, to reduce from eight to one the number of committees authorized to deal with appropriations. The Senate followed suit two years later, at the second session of the 67th Congress.

⁸ Letter from Chairman Madden of the House Appropriations Committee to Budget Director Dawes, November 17, 1921. Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 1. The measures in question were Senate Joint Resolutions of very limited significance, affecting War Department obligating authority. Madden's concern was clearly not with these specifics, but with their procedural implications.

This first approach to legislative clearance was a rather curious affair. The language of the Budget Circular was very sweeping, requiring—in accordance with the "spirit" of the Budget and Accounting Act—that all agency proposals for legislation or expressions of views on pending legislation "the effect of which would be to create a charge upon the public treasury or commit the government to obligations which would later require appropriations," be submitted to the Budget Bureau before presentation to Congress. The Bureau was to make recommendations to the President, ascertain the "relationship of the legislation to the President's financial program," and advise the agencies accordingly. Agency proposals for legislation were to go forward only if approved by the President; agency views on pending legislation, when presented to Congress, were to include a statement of the advice received from the Budget Bureau.⁹

Here, at least on paper, was a new assertion of presidential control over the agencies, a new form of continuing staff intervention between President and department heads, conceptually a radical departure in American administration matched only by the new budget process. Yet the official sponsors of Circular 49 avowed no such intent. There is nothing in the record prior to the order's issuance to show that either the Budget Director or the President grasped these implications in the language they approved.¹⁰ But there is plenty in the record demonstrating that the members of the Cabinet did not leave them long in ignorance, once the order had gone out. The subsequent course of legislative clearance in Harding's time is mainly a matter of apologies, concessions, limitations tacitly approved or self-applied, to soften agency reactions against Circular 49.

The agencies were aroused both by the Circular's potential coverage—broadly interpreted, its criteria reached virtually all subjects of legislation—

⁹ In contrast with the asserted presidential veto over agency proposals volunteered to Congress, this circular and its successors have carefully refrained from claiming any right to stop or alter agency responses to congressional requests for views on pending bills. Formally speaking, the only requirement has been that the President's position, as expressed by Budget, be stated in an agency report along with the agency's own views. Furthermore, by long custom now acknowledged in current regulations, an agency's response to congressional requests for "technical drafting service" is exempt from clearance so long as it carries no official endorsement. Thus has the Budget tried to duck the charge of "interference" with congressional access to agency opinion or expertise. In practice, this means non-interference with agency calculation of the risks involved, if any, in holding to views which do not square with those of the Executive Office.

¹⁰ Dawes obtained Harding's approval in advance, sending him the proposed circular on December 3, 1921, with the notation that it "needs no argument," being intended "simply to insure that all estimates and requests for appropriations [are] presented in the manner provided in the Budget and Accounting Act." Dawes may have said less than he believed, but there is no hint of this either in the official files or in his published memoirs, The First Year of the Budget (New York, 1923).

and by interposition of the Budget Bureau between them and the President on such a range of measures. In beating his retreat, at the President's behest, Dawes did not try to find fixed subject-matter limits for his procedure; instead he let it be known that matters of importance could be cleared with the President directly. Only on routine affairs would the Budget act as agent.¹¹ In practice, Dawes went even farther, leaving interpretation and compliance to departmental discretion. The Budget Bureau neither guided nor protested; the agencies proceeded accordingly.

For two years Circular 49 remained in limbo. Then a new Administration seized on this empty order and within it built a strong and well enforced, if narrowly defined accessory to central budgeting. The forms of financial clearance are traceable to Harding's time. The actuality begins with Coolidge.

By early 1924, the presidential budget system was a going concern, veteran of three "budget seasons." The Budget Bureau had been staffed and organized, routines established, procedures set. The Bureau's leadership had passed from Dawes to his handpicked successor, General Lord, a zealot for the small economy.¹² And the presidency had passed to perhaps the most determined economizer ever to hold the office. "I am for economy and after that I am for more economy," so Coolidge put it, conceiving economy not merely as a matter of politics or economics, but as an exercise in personal morality, an ethical principle, a constitutional requirement, an end in itself.¹³ In the Coolidge Administration the theme of budget policy was reduction: reduction of expenditures, of taxes, and of the public debt, with presidential budgeting mainly a means of cutting back on current outlays and avoiding new commitments. It is in this context that legislative clearance was revived.

Early in 1924, the Budget Bureau, with presidential support, began a vigorous campaign to activate Circular 49. For nearly two years, Lord peppered key departments with letters of warning, abjuration, and complaint, backed by a considerable amount of Budget staff investigation and analysis.¹⁴ By 1926, he was able to report that agency compliance had become "practically universal."¹⁵ Of course, the Coolidge clearance system, thus successfully asserted, was carried on within a very narrow frame of reference. Cabinet officers were constrained to accept Budget Bureau placement between them and the President, but only on proposals clearly costing money, and only with respect to cost, not substance. The Bureau's task of ascertaining the relationship of agency proposals to presidential program was rendered relatively safe and sure by virtue of the program's identification with recorded budget policies and estimates.

¹¹ This modification was suggested by Harding himself at a conference with Dawes in January, 1922. A formal amendment to Circular 49 was actually drafted along these lines but was never issued; an oral clarification in Cabinet meeting appears to have been substituted, supplemented by explicit waivers of jurisdiction in Budget Bureau correspondence with particular departments. Budget Bureau, central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 1. For detailed discussion of this and other aspects of the subject, see Richard E. Neustadt, "Presidential Clearance of Legislation," unpub. diss. (Harvard, 1950), pp. 28 ff.

¹² Herbert Lord, an army careerist and wartime associate of Dawes, served as Budget Director from 1922 to 1929. It was his custom, in the search for economy, to inspect his subordinates' desk drawers after office hours, confiscating extra pencils, paper clips, and pads of paper. Note that the total full-time Bureau staff numbered less than thirty in 1924. Ten years later the total was still under forty.

¹³ Addresses of The President of the United States and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget at the Seventh Regular Meeting of the Business Organization of the Government (Washington, G.P.O., 1924), p. 6. See also the corresponding releases for the ninth meeting (1925), and the eleventh meeting (1926). The Business Organization of the Government, including all department heads and bureau chiefs, met semi-annually from 1922 to 1929 for purposes of presidential exhortation on, and departmental oaths of fealty to, economy in government. Coolidge's addresses on these occasions are classics of their kind. A Dawes innovation, becoming more ritualistic with each passing year, these meetings were abruptly terminated by Herbert Hoover when he assumed the presidency after years of attendance as Secretary of Commerce.

The purpose of the exercise is clear from Budget's rules of thumb for processing what came its way. An adverse agency report on a pending measure was usually taken as conclusive. An affirmative report resulted in careful scrutiny of relationship to the current budget and implications for future years. It was common practice to hold favorable agency reports "in conflict" with the President's financial program. Frequently, legislation was held "in conflict" unless the money authorization were reduced. This negative advice also applied wherever a semblance of prior legislative authority could be found to render the current proposal "unnecessary."¹⁶ When the Bureau was confronted with opposing views from two departments, its normal procedure was to endorse the negative position. If this were not feasible, an independent staff analysis was sometimes made the basis for decision. Changes in drafting were sometimes suggested to the agencies, but always as a Budget idea, not as the result of any effort at coordination. Occasionally, the Bureau would attempt to mediate major differences of opinion, but it never undertook to seek them out.

The Coolidge clearance system, then, was quite straightforward in its negative endeavor to buttress the President's control over his budget policies and his—or the Budget Bureau's—forward financial plans. In no sense did the system operate as a coordinative or developmental mechanism in areas of substantive policy. And what was true in Coolidge's Administration was also true in his successor's term. President Hoover not only inherited and applied this form of central clearance, he even refined its terms of reference, emphasizing more than ever its budgetary association and its negative cast.

Shortly after his inauguration, Hoover suggested that the Budget Bureau

¹⁴ For a detailed review of these efforts, see Donald A. Hansen, "Legislative Clearance by the Bureau of the Budget," unpub. staff monograph (Budget Bureau, 1940), pp. 10–19. For Lord's correspondence with departments, see Budget Bureau central files; 1921–38: Legislation No. 1.

¹⁵ Bureau of the Budget, Third Annual Report of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to the President of the United States (Washington, G.P.O., 1926), p. 28. Within his limited frame of reference, Lord's claim for compliance appears reasonably accurate. Apparently he was afforded the opportunity to see in advance those legislative reports and proposals that he and the President really wanted. See Hansen, op. cit., pp. 19 ff.

¹⁶ Hansen, op. cit., especially pp. 17–20. See also Budget Bureau central files; 1921–38: Legislation No. 1 for a variety of typical clearance letters in this period.

take no action on agency requests for clearance unless and until it received a clear intimation of congressional interest. The President intended personally to approve all clearance actions and saw no point in bothering with measures which were not going to receive action.¹⁷ A further refinement followed late in 1929, when Hoover sanctioned a formal amendment to Circular 49 exempting from clearance all agency reports on private bills and all unfavorable reports on public bills.¹⁸

These minor changes simply put finishing touches on the edifice of Coolidge clearance; within these limits, the character of clearance actions remained unchanged through Hoover's term. His budgetary problems became immeasurably more difficult than Coolidge's had been. As the economic decline worsened after 1929 and federal revenues fell steadily, enormous pressures built up for increased federal spending. But the Hoover Administration remained unalterably opposed to deliberate deficit financing, and in its clearance operations the Budget Bureau tried harder than ever to ward off all possible legislative authorizations for unbudgeted expenditure.¹⁹ Of course, after the mid-term elections of 1930 the President was unable either to develop a coherent budget policy and make it stick, or to avoid the opposition's criticism for his failure to do so. And in that painful situation, financial clearance became the least of remedies.

II. THE ROOSEVELT REVOLUTION AND POLICY CLEARANCE

President Franklin D. Roosevelt's inaugural in 1933 was accompanied by a clean sweep topside in all the departments, after twelve years of continuity under the Republicans. The procedures for financial clearance had grown up in those years and concern about them, or even understanding of them, seems to have been carried off with the outgoing Administration. The succeeding regime was enormously busy and very new.²⁰ Only the President himself was really familiar with governmental administration. His cabinet members were novices at it.²¹ Moreover, they were moving at much too fast a pace to stop for the niceties of an auxiliary budget procedure.

¹⁷ Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 1, Budget Director's Memorandum to the files, May 17, 1929. Hoover actually did review and initial virtually every Budget Bureau clearance letter issued during his term of office, an interesting commentary on the presidency of twenty-five years ago. The documentation behind such letters was relatively haphazard in those days, frequently lacking in summaries of the issues, or of agency positions, or even of the bills themselves. The President must often have had to plow through the legislative language to reach an understanding of the subject at hand.

¹⁸ Budget Circular 273, issued December 20, 1929. The Budget Bureau shortly found it expedient to issue supplementary instructions requiring that to qualify for the exemption, reports on public bills must be definitely unfavorable, not merely non-committal. This amplifying note was contained in a "Memorandum to the Heads of all Departments and Establishments," issued April 10, 1930, "by direction of the President." In Coolidge's regime, these types of reports had received almost automatic clearance from the Budget Bureau, usually without referral to the President.

¹⁹ This theme appears strongly in Hoover's last three Budget messages. For example: "... we cannot afford to embark on any new or enlarged ventures. . . . There will be before the Congress many legislative matters involving additions to our estimated expenditures. . . . The plea of unemployment will be advanced . . . but Congress [should] give full due to our financial outlook. . . . In the absence of further legislation . . . we can close [the] year with a balanced budget." Message of the President of the United States Transmitting the Budget for the Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1932 (Washington, G.P.O., 1930), p. XIX.

They moved fast; they moved the federal government into unprecedented ventures, into new spheres of action on many different fronts. The first years of the New Deal released a torrent of measures for reform, and these were mingled with a host of shifting, often contradictory improvisations in the fight against depression. Roosevelt had pledged financial stringency in the 1932 campaign, attacking Hoover on home grounds. During the next two years "sound money" and "economy in government" remained on-again-off-again themes, but sounding ever fainter as the New Deal gathered impetus, their principal adherents mostly out of office before the end of 1934.²²

The motives which led Coolidge's Administration to stress financial clearance were scarcely in the forefront of the new regime's concerns. Not until January, 1934 did the Budget Bureau take any steps to remind department heads of their continuing obligations under the old circulars. And then the Bureau's action was muted, almost apologetic. Taken by the staff, not the Director, it was a bureaucratic restoration of routines, not in any sense a presidentially-inspired campaign for compliance.²³

Roosevelt's contribution to central clearance was of quite another order. Nearly a year after this Budget Bureau "restoration" of financial clearance, the President took the initiative in launching a different kind of clearance: clearance of all agency proposals for legislation, "policy" clearance in substantive terms.

Roosevelt brought the matter up on his own motion at a National Emergency Council Meeting in December, 1934, shortly before the convening of the 74th ²⁰ For sidelights on the "newness" of the incoming Cabinet see Frances Perkins, The Roosevelt I Knew (New York, 1946), pp. 228-30. See also Harold Ickes, The First Thousand Days (New York, 1953).

²¹ Roosevelt's really extraordinary grasp of the tempo and politics of departmental administration comes clear in the meetings of the National Emergency Council, an enlarged Cabinet group which met under his chairmanship from 1933 to 1936. The verbatim transcripts of these meetings, available in the National Archives, preserve intact his "lectures" to his department heads on such subjects as how to manage bureau chiefs, congressional committees, and the press.

²² Notably Roosevelt's first Budget Director, Lewis Douglas, and his first Undersecretary of the Treasury, Dean Acheson. Both returned to government with the coming of World War II.

²³ The Bureau's reminder was contained in a memorandum from the Budget Director's career assistant to the heads of all major agencies, January 22, 1934. It was a gently phrased affair and while most of the agencies replied in kind, the Bureau's records indicate that they were slow to take their duties very seriously. See Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 1. Budget Director Douglas seems to have had no part in this proceeding, nor much interest in the outcome. Two weeks later, when queried by a Cabinet member, he expressed himself as unfamiliar with the "old orders," and uncertain of their scope. See National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Fourth Meeting (February 6, 1934), pp. 21 ff.

Congress. He told the assembled officials he had decided to stop the practice of uncoordinated agency requests for legislation. At the preceding session of Congress he had been "quite horrified—not once but half a dozen times—by reading in the paper that some department or agency was after this, that, or the other without my knowledge."²⁴ He wanted no more of that. In the future, agency officials should come to him with their proposals before taking them to Congress.

One Cabinet officer observed that the departments were already clearing through the Budget Bureau. Roosevelt brushed this aside. "That," he said, "was for appropriations. What I am talking about is legislation. . . . Coming down to legislation there has never been any clearing house . . . and, I think in the last analysis that has got to be tried in and go through the National Emergency Council . . . and up to me if necessary. In all probability it will come to me."²⁵

On December 13, 1934, the secretariat of the Emergency Council followed up the President's remarks with a memorandum to all members, signed by Donald Richberg, then NEC's Executive Director. This instructed the agencies that at the forthcoming Congress all proposals for appropriations and all bills "carrying appropriations measures" should be cleared with the President through the Bureau of the Budget. All "other proposed legislation" was to be cleared through the Council's Executive Director, or in certain cases with special-purpose NEC committees.

While this directive referred to proposals only and contained a caveat on appropriation matters, its language was far from precise. The result was widespread confusion over the relationship between the new procedure and the old Budget circulars. In April, 1935, the Acting Budget Director, Daniel Bell, protested to Richberg; the problem was raised at an Emergency Council meeting on April 23 and the President decided that clarifying instructions should go out.²⁶ These took the form of a new Budget Circular 336, issued "by direction of the President" on December 21, 1935.²⁷

Circular 336 brought together and superseded outstanding NEC directives, as well as previous Budget circulars. It provided that all agency proposals for legislation and all reports on pending legislation should clear through the Budg-

²⁴ National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Nineteenth Meeting (December 11, 1934), p. 7.

²⁵ Ibid.

²⁶ National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Twenty-sixth Meeting (April 23, 1935), p. 8. Bell, at the time a senior career official in the Treasury Department, had taken the Budget Directorship on an acting basis after Douglas' departure. He held the job in addition to his duties as a special assistant to Secretary Morgenthau and this "temporary" arrangement was continued for nearly five years, until Harold Smith relieved him in 1939.

²⁷ This new order was discussed by the Emergency Council before issuance and the President then went to great lengths to emphasize his personal approval. See National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Twenty-eighth meeting (December 17, 1935), pp. 14-23.

et Bureau "for consideration by the President," before submission to Congress; as before, private relief bills were exempted. Agency proposals or reports when subsequently sent to Congress were to include a statement as to "whether proposed legislation was or was not in accord with the President's program." This was also to apply to oral testimony before congressional committees.

Procedurally, the circular provided that the Budget Bureau was to check directly with the President on legislation "solely concerning fiscal matters." Legislation "solely concerning policy matters" was to be referred to the President through the Emergency Council staff. The two organizations were to clear with him jointly on legislation involving both "fiscal" and "policy" matters. The Council was to inform the Bureau of clearances which it obtained from the President independently; the Bureau was to inform the agencies in all instances.

In print—and in practice—these procedures had a very clumsy look; for obvious reasons they proved cumbersome and somewhat unrealistic. Two years later they were superseded. But while the mechanics were transitional, the basic requirements have remained in force, without essential change, for nineteen years.

The Roosevelt clearance system, thus established, incorporated its financial precursor but was no mere extension of the budget process.²⁸ On the contrary, in form and fact and terms of reference this was Roosevelt's creation, intended to protect not just his budget, but his prerogatives, his freedom of action, and his choice of policies, in an era of fast-growing government and of determined presidential leadership.

Roosevelt's statements make it plain that he sought to protect both President from agencies and agencies from one another. In the first place, he wanted the Administration's stand made known on agency proposals, not only in his own defense but for the sake of everyone concerned, including the congressional leaders. Of these proposals he remarked:

They fall into three categories: first, the kind of legislation that, administratively, I could not give approval to—[clearance] will eliminate that; secondly, the type of legislation which we are perfectly willing to have the department or agency press for, but at the same time we do not want to put it in the [third] category of major Administration bills. Obviously I have to confine myself to what the newspapers called last year "the comparatively small list of must legislation." If I make every bill that the Government is interested in must legislation, it is going to complicate things . . . very much; and where I clear legislation with a notation that says "no objection" that means you are at perfect liberty to try to get the thing through, but I am not going to send a special message for it. It is all your trouble, not mine.²⁹

²⁸ In 1937, when a revision of Circular 336 was under discussion, F. J. Bailey—soon to become the first Assistant Budget Director for Legislative Reference—wrote an undated memorandum pointing out that "there is no authority whatever in the Budget and Accounting Act for our procedure with respect to reports on legislation. And I would not try to make believe that there is. The authority we have over [these] reports comes from Executive authority and not from any Act of Congress." Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 2.

²⁹ National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Twenty-second Meeting (January 22, 1935), p. 2.

In the second place, it was good business to have ideas and information contributed by all agencies concerned, not just the originating departments. Having bills cleared through a central agency would, in Roosevelt's words, "give somebody else outside the department itself the opportunity to have happy thoughts."³⁰ Moreover, such exchanges in advance would prevent crossed wires within the Administration. The President did not want the agencies "stepping on each others' toes" and he definitely did not want them "stepping on mine . . ."

Just the other day a resolution was passed through Congress—a House resolution that did not even have to come to me—asking for a certain report on a very important matter from one of the departments. It was a policy matter. The department was asked to send the report up to the Committee and nobody outside the department knew about it. We happened to catch it. If the report had gone up in the form in which it was prepared, it would have been absolutely contrary to the policy of the Government.³¹

On pending bills which the Administration had not sponsored, he wanted the departments to keep out of each others' way:

In all our testimony before Congress and in all our answers to questions, let us stick to our own last and let us be factual about it. This is one of the most important things that has been said for a long time . . . let us say the Secretary of Agriculture goes up there and he doesn't know much about the bill, but he knows that he is going to be asked about it. It might . . . [relate] . . . not only to Agriculture but to Interior and some other departments as well and he ought to in some way find out what the general attitude is through some kind of clearing house. . . .³²

Thus Roosevelt expressed the purpose of his new clearance system: by and large a negative purpose, even as Coolidge's had been. An opportunity for "happy thoughts" apart, the system's new coordinative elements, no less than broadened clearances, were seen primarily as means to keep the many-voiced executive from shouting itself down in the legislative process.

Granting Roosevelt's purpose, what, in fact, did he obtain? Initially, not very much:

Clearance as practiced in the 74th Congress [1935-6] was restricted almost entirely to minor departmental bills . . . nearly all of the really important bills and many minor measures originating in the Executive Branch, did not pass through this machinery. . . . Matters discussed with the President in person by a department head were not submitted for clearance, except in a few cases . . . the President's approval, orally given or read into his statements was deemed sufficient . . . nearly all of the measures about which the President sent messages to the Congress [the major administration bills] . . . [were] . . . exempt from clearance . . . many lesser matters also escaped such checking.³³

This appraisal was based on a study utilizing only Emergency Council records.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 3.

³¹ National Emergency Council, Proceeding of the Twenty-eighth Meeting (December 17, 1935), p. 17.

³² Ibid., pp. 19-21.

³³ Edwin E. Witte, "The Preparation of Prosposed Legislative Measures by Administrative Departments," Studies on Administrative Management in the Government of the United States for the President's Committee on Administrative Management (Washington: G.P.O., 1937), p. 56.

A later survey of the period, based on Budget Bureau files, concluded that there was "less evidence of deliberate agency failure to comply . . . than of Bureau failure to follow the prescribed procedure in the clearance of policy matters."³⁴ Perhaps so—but there is nothing in print or on file to controvert the general tenor of the earlier view.

Yet by 1939 the Budget Director was talking confidently before Congress of the scope and general coverage of central clearance.³⁵ In 1943, an acute and experienced observer could write that Budget clearance was "frequently commanding," the Bureau's influence "very great."³⁶ For this changed appraisal at least four things were responsible: the demise of NEC, the Budget Bureau's great expansion, the slowing down of New Deal creativity, and the formal marriage of central clearance to the veto power.

The Emergency Council was dying on the vine by 1936, commanding little presidential interest, or agency respect. Its diminished status and potential were accurately reflected in the Brownlow Committee's recommendation that the Council be abolished, and its staff activities discarded or dispersed.³⁷ Undoubtedly the Council's relative and growing weakness had much to do with the lax attitude of agencies and Budget Bureau toward the Executive Director's prerogatives under Circular 336. Had he been the sole institutional peg for "policy" clearance, that process might well have gone under also, retrievable with difficulty, if at all. But behind him stood the Budget. When he vanished, it inherited. This happened, actually, as a matter of course, a detail of administrative tidying, a minor item among all the major changes in the Bureau's status, role, and outlook envisaged by and following upon the Brownlow Committee Report of January, 1937.³⁸

In the two years after publication of the Report, the Bureau moved, as never since the twenties, to strengthen and consolidate its clearance operations. In the spring of 1937, Director Bell loosed a stream of correspondence on the agencies, reminiscent of Lord's effort thirteen years before.³⁹ In December, ³⁴ Hansen, "Legislative Clearance by the Bureau of the Budget" (cited in note 14), p. 34.

³⁵ Testimony by Daniel W. Bell, Acting Director of the Budget, before the Treasury Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, Hearings on the Treasury Department Appropriation Bill for 1940, 76th Cong., 1st sess. (Washington, G.P.O., 1939), p. 936.

³⁶ Roland Young, This is Congress (New York, 1943), p. 59.

³⁷ See President's Committee on Administrative Management, Report with Special Studies (Washington, G.P.O., 1937), pp. 15-21.

³⁸ Ibid. The Report recommended essentially that the Budget Bureau become the President's chief staff agent for "administrative management," enlarged, revitalized, and formally made part of the President's own office. In passing, the report endorsed a staff proposal that NEC clearance functions devolve upon the Bureau, with Circular 336 simplified accordingly and then generally enforced. In so urging, the Committee simply followed the logic of events, which fitted neatly enough into its major theme: building up the Budget Bureau.

³⁹ See Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Legislation No. 2, especially entries between March and May, 1937.

1937, Circular 336 was formally re-issued—renumbered 344—as a means of removing reference to the Emergency Council in official clearance instructions.⁴⁰ Henceforth, the Bureau was to be in form and fact the President's sole institutional clearance agent, on matters of substance no less than finance. Internally, also, the Bureau acted—Brownlow Report in hand—to put new life and strength into the job. In 1938, Bell increased the staff assigned specifically to clearance work, reorganized it as a separate, full-time, undertaking and gave it status as a major Bureau function, autonomously organized in a Division of Coordination, precursor of the present Office of Legislative Reference.⁴¹

During 1939, in the first session of the 76th Congress, the Budget Bureau processed agency reports on 2,448 pending public bills. Four years before, in the days of financial clearance, only 300 pending measures had been covered by submissions to the Bureau. Again, in 1939 the Bureau handled 438 drafts of proposed legislation; this compares with 170 proposals sent by the agencies to NEC under the procedure of 1935, or 162 proposals sent to NEC and Budget both, under the procedure of 1936.⁴² These figures are illustrative of the rise in clearance coverage after 1937, though nothing can be more elusive than the search for such objective measurements, nor anything more misleading than raw data of this type.⁴³ But there are other evidences also, in Budget Bureau

⁴⁰ Circular 344—virtually identical in its terms with 336, save for deletion of NEC's participation—was drafted in May, 1937, but for various reasons, mechanical and other, was not released to the agencies until December 17, 1937. Circular 344 was later renumbered A-19.

⁴¹ In 1938, the President obtained from Congress a supplemental appropriation enabling the Budget Bureau to start tooling up for the new or redefined tasks envisaged in the Brownlow Report. For details on the ensuing reorganization and restaffing see Bell's testimony, Hearings (cited in note 35), pp. 936–55. This preceded by a year the Bureau's formal transfer from the Treasury to the Executive Office of the President (Reorganization Plan I and Executive Order 8,248 of 1939). Before Bell's reorganization, clearance work had been handled almost entirely by the Bureau's estimates examiners as an adjunct of their other duties. The new Division of Coordination was conceived, both in the Brownlow studies and by its Bureau sponsors, as a small, full-time unit to guide and coordinate, but not supplant, the contribution of all other Bureau staff to legislative analysis and review. This has remained the concept, though since World War II not just the Bureau but the whole growing Executive Office has become the field from which staff contributions have been sought. By 1939, the Coordination Division's professional staff for legislation numbered five; in the fifteen years since, the comparable figure has never risen above nine. The unit's changes in title have had no substantive purpose or effect.

⁴² Source of Budget figures: Office of Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget. For NEC figures see Witte, op. cit., p. 53.

⁴³ To illustrate: In the 1939 session some 5,000 public bills were introduced in the two Houses of Congress; of these, 452 were passed by both Houses and enrolled that year. But only an item-by-item comparison—which no one has ever made—would show the relationship between the 2,400-odd bills cleared and the 5,000 introduced, or between the 438 drafts cleared and the 452 bills passed. To complicate the issue further, the figures on drafts cleared and on bills enrolled represent separate subjects in virtually all cases; not so the figures on bills introduced, where substantial duplications within or between the two Houses may run as high as forty per cent in the average first session. This is an estimate; firm data are not available.

files of agency and White House correspondence, and in transcripts of legislative hearings and debate, to demonstrate that central clearance was now reaching wider than before.⁴⁴

The climate of the times, perhaps, contributed to this no less than did improved organization and procedure. The main thrust of New Deal innovation was long past by 1939. The emergency had lost its cutting edge; emergency agencies had either disappeared or dug roots into routine. In Europe and in Asia world war threatened. In Congress, the anti-New Deal coalition had become a formidable fact of life. In the executive, sails were trimmed accordingly. Real legislative ambitions for most agencies were now measured largely by consolidation and amendment—goals much more easily contained in clearance channels than the great, unprecedented ventures once hurried before relatively complaisant Congresses.

And one thing more: in 1938, the Budget Bureau gained a new sanction, and an unassailable rationale, for its clearance of proposed and pending measures. That year, the Bureau came into control of agency communications to the President on signature or veto of enrolled bills. Henceforth, Roosevelt's clearance agency was also his chief institutional advisor on the generality of measures passed by Congress. Within this combination lay real power, and the Bureau made the most of it.

III. POLICY CLEARANCE AND THE VETO POWER

Traditionally, Presidents have sought advice from their department heads on disposition of enrolled enactments. Until the thirties, though, this custom had some drastic built-in limitations. When an enrolled bill reached the White House, the President's Secretary or Executive Clerk would hazard a quick guess at the agencies concerned; the bill itself would then be passed by hand to each in turn—a document of state, handled with care—and their replies, filtering back, one by one, would get such correlation as hard-pressed White House aides might manage. All this went on during the ten days within which the President could veto. Frequently he was but poorly served, receiving very late, for fast decision, an ill-digested mountain of material.⁴⁵

From its establishment in 1921, the Budget Bureau had been asked for views on each enrolled appropriations bill. In 1934, Roosevelt told his staff to get ⁴⁴ For examples see Hansen, op cit., pp. 81–84.

⁴⁵ There were other hazards too: "... one enrolled bill was lost and once when we called up one of the new [New Deal] agencies and asked where the bill was, they said they had put it in the files." Testimony of Frederick J. Bailey, Assistant Director for Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, before the House Committee on the Civil Service, 78th Congress, 1st sess. Hearings Pursuant to H. Res. 16., Part 2 (Washington, G.P.O., 1943), p. 361. The writer is indebted to Bailey; to the late Maurice Latta, former White House Executive Clerk, whose tenure in subordinate capacities began with McKinley; to William J. Hopkins, Latta's successor as Executive Clerk; and to James H. Rowe, Jr., a Roosevelt Administrative Assistant, for data on the evolution of enrolled bill procedure. Information here provided is drawn from their recollections, from Roosevelt's enrolled bill files (now at Hyde Park), and from contemporary Budget Bureau records.

Bureau reactions on all private relief bills involving an expenditure of funds. His aides went one step further, urging—as a measure for their own relief—that on such bills the Bureau also seek and summarize the views of other agencies concerned. This worked, and presently, without fanfare, the White House staff began to send across the street all manner of substantive public bills as well, asking the Bureau to circularize agencies and correlate views. By 1938 almost all enrolled bills were going to the Bureau for this handling. That year, the few exceptions followed no clear line of demarcation; after 1939, there were no more exceptions. This process of pragmatic delegation took but five years, from start to finish.

So long as the original enrollments had to be handed around, the Budget Bureau was as helpless as the White House staff had been to make of this anything but a thankless, mainly ministerial performance. In 1938, however, the Public Printer was persuaded to prepare facsimile copies of each enrolled bill; these went directly to the Bureau at the same time the original went back to Congress for signature by Speaker and Vice President. Armed with these copies, the Bureau could put an official text before each agency simultaneously, hours or even days before the bill itself could reach the White House and the President's time began to run.

This was a simple, mechanical improvement, but what it gave was time, and time spelled opportunity. On January 19, 1939, the Bureau issued "by direction of the President" Circular 346, defining agency obligations under the new procedure. For the first time Budget was identified officially as presidential agent on all enrolled enactments. Bureau requests for agency opinions were to receive an absolute priority; agency replies were to be forthcoming within forty-eight hours, and were to include in each case a specific recommendation, backed by as much factual information as possible. Any recommendation against presidential signature was to be accompanied by a draft veto message or memorandum of disapproval (for use with pocket vetoes). In these terms Circular 346 formalized previous practice, giving it a mandatory application beyond anything remotely possible in absence of facsimile procedure.⁴⁶

Within the Budget Bureau, corresponding steps were taken. The chores of asking agencies for views, pressuring the dilatory, correlating replies, reworking message drafts, were all put on a centralized and systematic basis. Summaries and covering recommendations to the President were now developed uniformly, carefully, and in much greater detail than before. All this took organization, specialization, and somebody's time and effort; by 1939, the Bureau had these at hand in its Division of Coordination. There full responsibility for enrolled bills was vested.

This new function quickly became the key element in central clearance. The Budget Bureau's work on agency proposals and reports built up a general, comprehensive record, unmatched elsewhere in government, to buttress its consideration of enrolled bills. At the same time, its mandate on enrolled enactments now lent special point and purpose to clearances of measures in proposed and pending stages.⁴⁷

⁴⁶ "This is a splendid contribution," wrote Rudolph Forster, then White House Executive Clerk, "we could never have got half as far before." Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Enrolled Bills No. 1, undated memorandum from Forster to F. J. Bailey.

The veto power's potency in this connection depends, of course, upon its use, and Roosevelt was a constant user. "If the decision is close," he once remarked to his department heads, "I want to veto."⁴⁸ In 1939, he chose to veto sixteen bills despite approval by the Budget Bureau, remarking to an aide, "The Budget is getting too soft; tell them to stiffen up."⁴⁹ Indeed, he was prone to call occasionally for "something I can veto," as a "reminder" to department heads and congressmen alike.⁵⁰ This was not frivolity; to FDR the veto power was among the presidency's greatest attributes, an independent and responsible act of participation in the legislative process, and a means of enforcing congressional and agency respect for presidential preferences or programs.⁵¹

From the beginning, Roosevelt placed a great deal of reliance on the Budget Bureau's weighing and sifting of bureaucratic opinion. On the generality of measures he inclined to discount Cabinet, congressional, and interest group advices which found their joint and several ways directly to the White House. But he took care that there should be, between him and the Budget, some White House staff review to check the institutional approach against the personal, to balance off the presidency with the President. In 1943, that task went to Judge Rosenman, in his new post as Special Counsel to the President; there, with temporary lapses, it has remained, assumed by each of Rosenman's successors in Truman's time and Eisenhower's.⁵²

The Budget Bureau took its staff work on enrolled enactments as seriously as Roosevelt did his veto power. Here, unchallengably in the Budget's hands, was all-important preparation for decisive acts of state, exclusively in presidential jurisdiction. Of course, on the great, controversial measures, the White House could expect appraisals and advice from many other sources and through ⁴⁷ In order to build up back-ground files for use on enrollments, private bills were brought back under clearance at the pending stage by Budget Circular 390, June 1, 1942.

⁴⁸ National Emergency Council, Proceedings of the Twenty-eighth Meeting (December 17, 1935), p. 17.

⁴⁹ Budget Bureau central files; 1921-38: Enrolled Bills No. 1, undated memorandum from Rudolph Forster to F. J. Bailey.

⁵⁰ See note 45.

⁵¹ All Roosevelt aides consulted by the writer have been emphatically agreed on his conscious adherence to these views and his consistent application of them.

⁵² Review of Budget Bureau submissions on enrolled bills first became a distinct White House assignment in 1939, shortly after the Bureau's formal assumption of responsibility for their handling. Initially, this assignment went to James H. Rowe, Jr., one of the original Administrative Assistants to the President appointed under the Reorganization Act of 1939. Rowe had left the White House by the time Samuel I. Rosenman was appointed Special Counsel in 1943; this work then gravitated naturally to Rosenman, who had performed a similar service for F.D.R. in Albany, a decade earlier. Rosenman was succeeded as Special Counsel by Clark M. Clifford in 1946; Clifford by Charles S. Murphy in 1950; Murphy by Bernard Shanley, the present incumbent, who took office with the Eisenhower Administration.

many other channels. But usually on the general run of bills enrolled at every session, particularly the private bills, the Budget file was the "works." Within the Bureau, priorities were set accordingly.

In Roosevelt's later years, no other element of central clearance received half the attention, time, and effort which Bureau staff gave to enrolled enactments, especially to lesser issues where its word weighed the most. From 1940 on, coordination of proposed and pending bills was routinized increasingly, with stress on negative, protective aspects only, and great reliance on the written word. Rarely were agencies called in for face-to-face discussion; rarely were efforts made to conform clearance actions with the exigencies of the legislative timetable. If agencies and committees wanted such advantages as clearance offered at the pending stage, they could ask and wait their turn; if not, they took their chances when the bills became enrolled.

IV. FROM ROOSEVELT TO TRUMAN

The coming of World War II confirmed this Budget Bureau tendency to concentrate on enrolled bills, its inescapable job, while energy, interest, and opportunity were diverted from staff work on proposed and pending measures. The war itself made operating policies and administrative actions the pivotal affairs of government. Congress lost the center of the stage; the legislative process ceased to be either the Administration's chief concern, or the nation's main measure of governmental progress.

"Dr. New Deal" was succeeded by "Dr. Win-the-War." The new physician prescribed far less than the old in the way of urgent home-front legislation—and most of this in war-related fields, now the concern of new emergency agencies. This was not the stuff, nor these the agencies, to stay confined in peacetime clearance channels. And once their operating conflicts forced establishment of an effective wartime instrument for mediation and control—the Office of War Mobilization—their legislative conflicts and ambitions gravitated toward the War Mobilizer, not the Budget Director.⁵³ The result, of course, was to down-grade all previous coordinators on the governmental stage—not least the Budget Bureau's clearance mechanism. OWM action in the legislative field was limited, deliberately, to matters of the highest policy or greatest urgency. But by the war's end, its successor's interests were proliferating through the government. Most Budget staff accepted, without much demur, OWM's wartime over-shadowing of their coordinating role; they took with far less grace OWMR's widening postwar interventions on the legislative front.

Meanwhile, Truman suddenly succeeded to the presidency. With this the Budget Bureau's role was shaken mightily amidst pangs of transition unmatched since 1933. The two years after Roosevelt's death were doubly transitional: the government was entangled in a complex shift from war to peace and back again to something in-between; the presidency was in process of adjustment from the old to a new personality, and to new work methods and interpersonal relationships. It was a complex, clouded, often contradictory time, climaxed by the congressional overturn of November, 1946. To the great alterations in the executive, there were now added many changes in personalities and power on Capitol Hill, profoundly affecting relationships and atmosphere at both ends of the Avenue.

⁵³ The Office of War Mobilization (OWM) was established by Executive Order 9347, May 27, 1943. It was transformed into a statutory Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion (OWMR) by the War Mobilization and Reconversion Act of 1944. For an admirable summary of OWM-OWMR history, see Herman M. Somers, Presidential Agency (Cambridge, Mass., 1950), pp. 47-108.

In all this swirl, the Budget Bureau stumbled badly, its prestige and position challenged as rarely before or since. Most of the services Roosevelt had charged it to perform were little understood, at first, by the new President and his new team of close associates; legislative clearance least of all. "I simply do not see," allegedly remarked one high-placed Truman aide, "why [legislative] policy is any business of the Budget Bureau."⁵⁴ Truman's three successive OWMR Directors—Vinson, Snyder, and Steelman—were all, in varying degree, much closer to the President than were the hold-over Budget leaders, Smith and Appleby. And in the months after V-J day, it was to OWMR, not Budget, that Truman and his White House aides looked mainly for help on policy problems, legislative and other.

By mid-summer, 1946, the Budget Bureau's status in the presidential orbit had reached its lowest point. OWMR seemed superficially to be assured a strong, perhaps a permanent position. A new staff agency of unknown policy potential, the Council of Economic Advisers, had just been authorized by statute.⁵⁵ Between these two, the Budget's future role, particularly in the legislative sphere, appeared attenuated and uncertain.

Yet scarcely two years later the Bureau was entrenched as the prime source of presidential staff work on the Administration's legislative program, its clearance tasks, especially at proposed and pending stages, more actively developed and more central to the President's concerns than ever in their history. Three things, mainly, lay behind this change: reappearance of the legislative process as the key government preoccupation; attrition or demise of other institutional staff facilities; and the personality of James E. Webb, Truman's new Director of the Budget.

The first Truman term, be it remembered, was a time of executive retrenchment, of climbing down from wartime peaks. The early Fair Deal blueprinted many a large-scale peacetime venture in administration, but save for atomic energy and foreign aid—and the short-lived emergency housing program—these remained largely on paper. For this was a time, also, of congressional stalemate in home affairs, and these new ventures needed legislation. Numerous issues of domestic policy confronting the regime were, therefore, first cast up in legislative guise, then frozen in that status by an unresponsive Congress.⁵⁶ The operating tasks, which in their magnitude had called forth OWM, were finished; nothing comparable took their place. Presidential messages to Congress became the central focus for policy-making; legislative drafts the major means for translating policy into coordinated action. With Congress formally in opposition after 1946, the object of the game—save in the foreign field—turned into record-building, pure and simple. But more than mere demands were needed in the record; for someday there might be response, if not from the current Congress, then the next. Serious proposals had to be specific; specifics meaningful—and viable.

⁵⁴ A comment dating from the early spring of 1946, made by the then OWMR Director to a member of his staff and relayed by the latter to the writer.

⁵⁵ The Employment Act of 1946 was approved February 20, 1946. The Council did not begin to function until the following September.

This called for central staff work, continuous effort on a large scale. Where could it be obtained? The OWMR staff had been dispersed, abruptly, at the end of 1946; Steelman, its last Director, had returned to the White House in the new post of Assistant to the President.⁵⁷ The Economic Council was then untried, preoccupied, and short on staff, its product showing from the first the strains imposed by step-child status and divergent membership.⁵⁸ The White House Staff—the President's Assistant, Special Counsel, and the rest—could guide, review, and interject, but scarcely could engage in all the detailed and continuous endeavors these legislative tasks required.

This left only the Budget Bureau, or some new creation. And at the crucial moment the new Budget Director managed to reorient the Bureau's role anent the Truman White House, thereby giving the President the staff work he required.

By early 1947, Webb had become a principal adviser to the President, a full-fledged member of the Truman team. This built the Budget's entree and Webb made much of it, selling staff services as he sold himself. He broke precedent by making his subordinates freely available to White House aides, on their terms, for their purposes.⁵⁹ He cheerfully acceded to several full-time transfers ⁵⁶ For a survey of Truman's domestic legislative program and the character of congressional response, see Richard E. Neustadt, "Congress and the Fair Deal: A Legislative Balance Sheet," in the forthcoming Vol. 5 of Public Policy, eds. Carl J. Friedrich and J. Kenneth Galbraith (Cambridge, Mass.).

⁵⁷ OWMR was terminated by presidential action through Executive Order 9809 of December 17, 1946. Some of the factors leading to its demise are discussed in Somers, op. cit., pp. 100–1. Steelman's principal lieutenants had planned to move the core of the whole organization to the White House with him, but they reckoned without his sensitivity to Cabinet and congressional resentment over late-coming, subordinate "empires" in the President's own office, especially after the 1946 election.

⁵⁸ Quite apart from the so-called "Nourse-Keyserling dispute," Budget, Treasury, and OWMR each had hoped and planned to assume the staff responsibilities ultimately conferred on the Council. Only the mutual jealousy of these three agencies stalemated executive opposition to the Council's creation. Their grievances did not yield, all at once, to the accomplished fact; and an uncertain performance on the first Economic Report did not enhance the Council's standing with its sister agencies, their heirs and assigns.

⁵⁹ The 1947 veto of Taft-Hartley, for example, was preceded by a special White House appraisal undertaken by the Special Counsel at the President's behest, with the full-time assistance of three Budget staff members whom Webb turned loose entirely, requiring from them neither consultation nor report.

of Budget staff to White House assistantships, thus building bridges which were bound to last.⁶⁰ Above all, Webb turned to his machinery for legislative clearance as a prime means of focussing staff efforts to help meet the President's needs. The clearance of proposals and reports had not been sensitive to congressional schedules; it was to become so. The emphasis of central clearance had been negative; it was to be made positive. It had interpreted policies and programs where it found them; it was to help create them. It had relied on Bureau staff resources; it was to draw, instead, on the expanding Executive Office as a whole.

Those were the goals Webb set for central clearance in Truman's time. To implement them he relied on a reconstituted Legislative Reference organization, now given status as a sort of institutional Executive Office secretariat for legislative policy development, formally within the Budget Bureau but serving, in effect, as back-up staff to Truman's Special Counsel, then chief White House officer in fields of forward policy.⁶¹ Webb did not delegate all responsibility, nor abdicate all interest, but as a practical matter, Legislative Reference's White House ties became both real and generally respected.

V. THE CHARACTER OF CLEARANCE IN TRUMAN'S TIME

All this involved great changes in the character of clearance at proposed and pending stages. After 1947, the Budget Bureau's war-encouraged passive attitude gave way, perforce, to much activity. A first step was the campaign begun early in 1948 to mesh these clearance actions with congressional requirements, and this despite the opposition character of the then Congress:

We had found in the immediate post-war years that there were a great many situations in which the . . . clearance process was an annoyance to the Congress and properly so. . . . Consequently . . . [in 1948] . . . Webb . . . specifically charged me with responsibility of talking with the staff directors and clerks of . . . major committees to see if our . . . process could be tied more closely into the committees' desires for the scheduling of items to come before them. On the other side of the coin, I was to acquaint the committees with the issues and items which . . . were being advanced in priority by the President, or . . . major departments. . . .

With the . . . cooperation of the Public Works Committees it was possible for us to work out . . . almost a precise schedule of what [they] wanted . . . and when . . . and . . . then go back and hasten our clearance process.

From the Public Works Committees this same kind of cooperative effort was extended to other . . . committees.⁶²

⁶⁰ A residual reflection of the then dependence on the Budget, which Webb so strongly aided and abetted in 1947-48, is found in the fact that in 1953 fully a third of the outgoing Truman assistants had come to the White House staff from the career service in the Budget Bureau.

⁶¹ F. J. Bailey retired as Assistant Director of the Budget for Legislative Reference after the first session of the 80th Congress in 1947. His place was taken by Elmer B. Staats; in 1949, Staats was succeeded by Roger W. Jones, the present incumbent.

⁶² Testimony of Roger W. Jones before the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, 81st Congress, 2nd sess. Hearings Pursuant to H. Res. 298, Part 10 (Washington, G.P.O., 1950). Note that the current version of Circular A-19 is printed with Jones' testimony.

Indeed, this operation steadily expanded; by 1950, the Budget was regularly and informally in touch with both majority and minority staffs of most major legislative committees, having by then a record of successful relations with committee chairmen of both parties.

In 1948, the Bureau also embarked on a wholly new approach to the coordinative aspects of its clearance tasks, subordinating negative protection of President and agencies to positive development and drafting of Administration measures. Executive Office "working teams" came into being with "leadership" assigned to the White House, Budget, or the Economic Council, as the case might be, while Legislative Reference served as secretariat and stimulator of them all. Each unit of the presidential staff contributed its experts and its points of view; all agencies concerned were called on to confer.⁶³ A high proportion of the Fair Deal's later measures were worked out in detailed form through this new application of "coordination;" for example, the Housing Act of 1949, and the Social Security Act Amendments of 1950.⁶⁴ On many lesser proposals, involving fewer agency and private interests, or interests lower in importance to the President, the Budget's Legislative Reference staff led similar excursions on its own, sometimes merely tinkering with agency submissions, sometimes redoing the whole drafting job around the conference table.

This new technique—new, anyway, as an adjunct of central clearance—developed alongside and, in part, grew out of efforts to provide fixed meaning, concrete form, and better advance planning for the President's own legislative program. Toward that end, White House and Budget legislative staffs worked in close combination, after 1947, developing relationships which lent both strength and informality to team play on particulars.

Coinciding with these various endeavors came an external change which gave the clearance system a new dimension and new opportunity. In 1947, congressional committees began to ask Budget for its views on pending bills, at the same time that requests for views were sent to the agencies. These so-called "direct referrals" were an 80th Congress innovation; a means whereby Republican committee chairmen could gauge the intentions of the Democratic Administration. Whatever the initial motive, the practice became increasingly popular with the committees in each succeeding Congress, regardless of party coloration. During the 80th Congress there were 370 of these direct referrals; during the 81st, 974; during the 82nd, 1,102. In the 83rd Congress, there were 889 for the first session alone. Of course, this volume has not stemmed equally from all committees of each House in every Congress. For example, since 1947 the Senate Labor and Welfare Committee has referred nearly all bills to the Budget; not so its House counterpart.⁶⁵ Variations have their roots in diverse compounds of committee composition, jurisdiction, clientele. But while they keep the practice less than universal, this has not altered one significant result: the Budget's growing opportunity to register a presidential view directly on a high proportion of the bills considered actively by both houses.

⁶³ After 1949, NSRB, ODM, and DMS staff, and occasionally NSC staff, were also drawn into or given leadership of such Executive Office teams.

⁶⁴ Of course, not all proposals were prepared in this way. For example, the so-called "Brannan Plan" was first set forth informally in the shape of "suggestions for study" put to congressional committees in testimony by the then Secretary of Agriculture. Truman's health insurance proposals were never translated into Administration-approved specifics; nor did the Administration ever commit itself to the details of bills introduced in Congress. As for revenue measures, their preparation, for the most part, was—and still is—dominated by the Treasury.

Moreover, since 1949 other direct channels have opened to the Bureau, further enhancing this opportunity. For example, during Truman's second term the Majority Leader of the House and the Democratic chairmen of several Senate and House committees—including the House Rules Committee—acquired the habit of checking with White House or Budget staff (sometimes both), by telephone or special note, for the current Administration stand on bills nearing the reporting stage.⁶⁶ Wherever addressed, these inquiries almost always passed through Budget hands; responses, however conveyed, afforded vital supplements to clearance actions and formal reports. While these particulars and others have altered since Eisenhower's accession, comparable avenues continue to link the clearance system not only with congressional committees but with the leadership as well.

Here are alternatives to the traditional approach of central clearance, wholly independent of agency action, and compensating for deficiencies in agency compliance, while naturally increasing the incentive to comply. Progressively, the Bureau has inclined to concentrate its energies upon its own responses and those it readies for White House staff use; these rather than agency reports become the key documents of clearance action at the pending stage. Of course, there have been instances—no doubt there will be more—where Budget's direct answers have reflected its own institutional concerns more nearly than the President's personal designs.⁶⁷ But Bureau advice via agency reports has been no less susceptible to such confusions. That problem is generic.

The new spirit of Truman's clearance system affected not only proposed and pending stages, but also operations on enrolled enactments. From 1947 on, the technique of the working team was frequently applied, with varying degrees of informality, to staff evaluation of the major measures passed by Congress and to preparation for the President's own action, especially where vetoes were involved. From time to time, this teamwork at the enrolled stage proved useful in the development of new proposals: alternatives to measures vetoed and additions to bills signed with reservations.⁶⁸ In this respect, a positive note was injected into the review of enrolled bills, equivalent in purpose, if not scale, to the new ventures in coordination of proposals and reports.

⁶⁵ Currently, the committees which engage most frequently in direct referrals are: Senate Interior, Labor, Public Works, Finance, Banking, Commerce, Civil Service, Government Operations; House Agriculture, Commerce, Merchant Marine, Public Works, Government Operations, Civil Service. Source: Office of Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget. Note that the early adherence of the Senate Labor Committee reflects Senator Taft's own view of the need for a formal channel between President and committees on current measures.

⁶⁶ Also in 1949, the Senate Majority Leader arranged to have the Budget report to him the number of each bill cleared and the nature of the clearance given, week by week. These data were then tabulated by his staff for ready reference to Administration stands on the general run of pending bills. So routinized a transmittal of so much information proved of limited utility. After 1950, the practice was curtailed.

⁶⁷ A classic example is provided by Budget reports to the Senate Labor Committee on S. 614, the Hospital Construction Act Amendments of 1949. For details see Budget Bureau central files; Enacted Legislation, 81st Congress, Hospital Construction, R6-15/48.3.

In Truman's time, work on enrolled enactments came to contribute in another way to policy development. On certain classes of enactments, the President found it possible to make consistency in signature or veto a potent instrument for setting and enforcing general policies. On veterans benefits, his vetoes drew and held a general line; on private immigration bills, his signatures held one last entryway wide open. These things were done despite unceasing protest from affected agencies, a testimonial not only to the President's determination, but to the Budget's constancy in finding counter-arguments to justify his action.

From 1947 to 1950, central clearance progressed vigorously in these various directions. New Budget circulars, while adding nothing to the substance of the old, provided literary—and official—recognition of the changed pace and emphasis.⁶⁹ Then in June, 1950 came Korea, and in November, full-scale Chinese intervention. Thereafter, throughout Truman's last two years, the Administration's crucial policy preoccupations were operational, no less than congressional, the legislative focus narrowing, meanwhile, from Fair Deal to defense.

Partial mobilization and limited war had an immediate impact on clearance operations, though the effect was less decisive than in the all-out conflict nine years earlier. During 1951 and 1952, central clearance did not lose its mandate, nor greatly shift its goals; it simply ceased to grow, mirroring thereby the "half-way" character of changes in the governmental climate. With the new Office of Defense Mobilization—nearest equivalent of the old OWMR—the Budget Bureau managed peaceful collaboration in the legislative field, easily adapting pre-existing patterns to the special case of economic controls. Here, by common consent, ODM took the Executive Office "lead," organizing and directing efforts to develop an Administration product, serving thereby as acknowledged "agent" of the central clearance system, and utilizing Budget clearance channels to fortify its interagency coordination.⁷⁰

⁶⁸ See, for example, Truman's message to Congress, July 13, 1951, announcing the signature of S. 984, a bill to aid recruitment of Mexican migrant workers, of which the President remarked: "I could not have given my approval had I not been assured . . . that supplementary [measures] would receive prompt attention." Truman then recommended a three-point supplementing program, produced by a staff team after the bill's passage.

⁶⁹ See note 4.

⁷⁰ The Office of Defense Mobilization was established by Executive Order 10193 on December 15, 1950 within the Executive Office of the President, to exercise direction and control over all aspects of the post-Korean mobilization program. ODM received permanent status through Reorganization Plan 2 of 1953, absorbing the war mobilization planning functions of the National Security Resources Board under the National Security Act of 1947.

Aside from "defense production," only "mutual security"—consolidated, defense-packaging of foreign aid—emerged in Truman's final years as a major, new legislative venture requiring sustained developmental staff work. And here the Bureau worked out arrangements with the Director for Mutual Security similar to those established with ODM. The Harriman Office took the lead, while Budget staff manipulated clearance channels on its behalf.⁷¹ Otherwise, the Budget's clearance system carried on much as before, though with less emphasis on positive coordination, because there was less presidential need; relying heavily, by way of substitute, upon the store of plans worked out and positions clarified in pre-Korean years. The patterns of staff action and relationship which had emerged by 1950 were, in the main, consolidated during 1951 and 1952. But there was little new adventuring in the high policy arena.

Korea and its consequences were not the only factors responsible for this; there was, as well, the President's acute awareness that the presidency would soon change hands. In 1951, Truman appointed as Budget Director a top Bureau careerist, Frederick J. Lawton, charging him specifically, though not publicly, to batten down the institution, readying it for the transition ahead.⁷² There was to be no more expansion in politically-charged directions. The Bureau's reputation for "non-political" expertise, its institutional respectability, were to be guarded at all costs, thereby preserving its utility to the next President.⁷³

VI. THE FIRST YEAR UNDER EISENHOWER

On January 20, 1953, the new President took office, his inauguration marking the first complete party turnover in twenty years. Superficially, this had a sweeping impact throughout the government. But paradoxically, perhaps, the Budget clearance system was affected less this time than in the previous transition years of 1945 and 1933; reasserting, not in years but in months, its old role in the new regime.

Why did this occur, and how? Why not the fall into drawn-out obscurity, the slow revival, that characterized both previous occasions? There seem to be three reasons: some relatively careful pre-inauguration planning on both sides; some vital accidents of personal relationship; and, underlying everything, a very real continuum in the outlook for government.

⁷¹ In June, 1950, Averell Harriman was appointed Special Assistant to the President to coordinate various overseas affairs. Under the Mutual Security Act of 1951, his post was transformed into an Office of the Director for Mutual Security (DMS), within the Executive Office of the President. DMS was abolished by Reorganization Plan 7 of 1953 and its functions transferred to the Foreign Operations Administration.

⁷² Lawton had been a senior Bureau official since 1935, number-three man under Webb, number-two man under Webb's successor, Frank Pace, Jr. He is serving presently as a member of the Civil Service Commission.

⁷³ It is an interesting sidelight on the longevity of Truman's concern for a smooth transition that a number of the preparatory actions Lawton took, both before and after the 1952 election, corresponded with arrangements planned by Webb on a "contingent" basis during the summer of 1948.

In November, 1952, immediately after Eisenhower's election, Truman took a number of specific steps toward the goal of orderly transition, among them an invitation to the President-elect to have his representative participate as an observer in final preparation of the forthcoming (Truman) budget. During the nine weeks before inauguration, Eisenhower's Budget Director-designate, Joseph M. Dodge, worked full time in the Budget Bureau, conducting himself with great discretion, watching the staff at work, learning their problems and routines, winning their confidence as they gained his respect.⁷⁴

Once installed in office, Dodge emerged as a strong member of the new inner circle. His influence, the value of his services, and his ability to act were enhanced, no doubt, by his acceptance, hence effective leadership, of the established staff at his disposal. This set the stage for firm and confident assertion of Budget Bureau functions in the new regime, central clearance no less than the rest. Even before Inauguration Day, most of the Cabinet members-designate were called into the Bureau for Dodge-sponsored indoctrination lectures on its prerogatives and their responsibilities. Clearance regulations received attention at that time. And after the inaugural, Dodge made a point of picking up initial failures to comply, taking a strong line with department heads, reminiscent of Lord's language thirty years before.

The new Budget Director did one thing more for central clearance: to his hold-over chief of Legislative Reference he gave the backing of his own unqualified endorsement, and a total delegation of authority surpassing anything experienced in Truman's time. Between these two men, Dodge and Jones, evolved a personal relationship of greatest moment for clearance's survival. Dodge used his own prestige unsparingly to break a path for Jones into the Eisenhower White House, overcoming tendencies to treat careerists with extreme reserve. He then cut Legislative Reference entirely loose to seek its lead from presidential staff, thus extending under Eisenhower an innovation Webb had introduced in Truman's first term.

It was one thing to open an acquaintance between White House and Legislative Reference; quite another to establish adequate patterns of staff interaction. The Budget's clearance operations were dependent, now more than ever, on guidance from the President and access to him, by and through his White House aides. All the well-worn Truman channels were erased; they had to be rebuilt from scratch around another President, new aides, new methods. That this was done in less than six month's time, as Fortune attests, is tribute partly to the sheer inescapability of so much of the matter grinding through the clearance ⁷⁴ Dodge was not precisely a newcomer to government, having organized War Department renegotiation activities in World War II and having carried out significant overseas assignments for the occupation authorities of both Germany and Japan. His attitude toward his new role was very healthy for the institution he would head, fairly free of the suspicion and uncertainty which plagued so many Eisenhower appointees and their career subordinates. Dodge resigned as Budget Director, April 15, 1954, and was succeeded by his deputy, Rowland Hughes. For information on this and other aspects of the 1953 transition, the writer is indebted to the many officials throughout the Executive Office who have answered his inquiries with candor and good will.

mill. And partly it is tribute to the personality equation, once again: to Jones' success in working with the three key legislative policy officials in Eisenhower's entourage—Adams, Persons, and Shanley.⁷⁵

Reinforcing these relationships were some deep strains of continuity in government's most basic problems. Only on the surface was transition sharp and sudden. There was neither 1945's dramatic plunge from total war to general peace, nor 1933's wholesale experimenting with new rules for the governmental game. True, by 1953 the emergency impacts of Korea were diminishing, economically, psychologically, militarily. The cold war was entering a new phase, the atomic arms race a new dimension, the American economy a new adjustment. But these remained the underlying problems, whatever their changed aspects, with the new President, no less than the old, pledged to collective security and full employment as goals of governmental action. And as the operating crisis faded, policy-making tended to resume its pre-Korean cast.

The new regime brought many alterations of detail, quick shifts of attitude, emphasis, approach, which in the longer course of time may prove profound. But in 1953, at least, the real conditions and commitments—and dilemmas—overhanging from the past left little room for sweeping change, save on the planes of people and "psychology." Particularly was this the case for a regime so "new" as Eisenhower's. The President was new to national politics and civil government, his Cabinet members mostly newer still, his congressional colleagues wholly unused to a Republican Executive. His campaign for election had been influenced by concepts and illusions bred of opposition; some basic a-b-c's had to be learned anew.

Combined with this inexperience, the continuity of problems confronted the new White House with two needs, sharply felt: the need for facts about the past to help project decisions for the future, and the need for caution in commitments until homework had been done. The Budget clearance system proved a handy instrument in both instances. Once the ice was broken, the White House staff, however much mistrusting bureaucrats in general—holdovers schooled for twenty years in Democratic policies—could turn to Budget's, in particular, to tap resources of careerist expertise through clearance channels everywhere in government.⁷⁶ Simultaneously, the White House could obtain from central clearance a series of continuing protections for presidential freedom to withhold decision. The congressional session of 1953 was a time for ducking and dodging on a wide range of legislative issues, while study groups studied and administrators felt their way.⁷⁷ As legislative clearance had once helped protect FDR's own choice of action, it now helped safeguard Eisenhower's choices of inaction.

⁷⁵ Under Eisenhower, Sherman Adams, the Assistant to the President, has a formal, though not always operative, role in the coordination and direction of all White House staff undertakings. Wilton B. Persons, now Adams' deputy, had major responsibility for congressional liaison during Eisenhower's first year and is still heavily involved in legislative affairs. Bernard Shanley, Special Counsel to the President, acquired during 1953 a good share of his predecessors' tasks in policy development, especially on the legislative side, resuming, among other things, the Counsel's old role as regular channel between Budget and President on enrolled enactments and other clearance actions.

⁷⁶ The legislative clearance system was not, of course, the only means employed. The National Security Council Staff—especially the old Senior Staff reconstituted as the Planning Board—contributed importantly in some major areas. Certain of the presidential and agency study groups, among the many operating in 1953, helped also to build effective links between the new regime and its inherited experts; notably in the government organization, psychological warfare, social security, and housing fields.

The gathering of background facts, the sidestepping of new commitments, were the services commending central clearance to the White House staff in early 1953; initially the clearance system's raison d'être in the new regime. The fact that budget-cutting was one measure not deferred that year, soon gave the system added opportunities for service, harking back to purposes three decades old. And when, in August, 1953, the Eisenhower White House faced its first end-of-session flood of enrolled bills, its dependence on Budget aid—and Budget staff's dependability—was demonstrated forcefully, with due effect.

Thus, by midsummer, 1953, it was quite evident that legislative clearance would survive, remaining a close institutional adjunct of the White House staff, retaining a real role in the presidential orbit. But what kind of role, of what significance? The scope and character of Truman's clearance system evolved out of the drive to build a comprehensive legislative program, buttressed by specific measures bearing an Administration label. Nothing of the sort occurred while Congress was in session during 1953. And though the Truman forms remained, the substance of the clearance job, that session, bore less resemblance to postwar operations than to the narrower, more limited approach of Roosevelt's early years—or even, in some aspects, Coolidge's. "The key to this whole operation," remarked a Budget aide, "is whether Ike decides to have a legislative program. We can't interpret, much less help develop, something that isn't there."

In the event, that decision was emphatically affirmative, as demonstrated by the stream of presidential messages when Congress reconvened in January, 1954, and by the prompt introduction of Administration bills to carry out most Eisenhower proposals.⁷⁸ Thereby central clearance gained the last element required for a new start on its postwar course.

This did not bring full restoration of all Truman methods; naturally, there have been adaptations as to ways and means. However, most of the changes made in 1953 and early 1954 relate to a phenomenon which may prove transitory: the imperfect acquaintance, trust, relationship between the new principals and old staffs. No two departments are alike in this, but its effects are widespread still. Hence, much of the informal, day-by-day coordination once carried on through departmental bureaucrats is being handled by the Budget now—no less informally—through “little cabinet” officers or department heads themselves. Much of the developmental effort on main measures, once farmed out to staff-level working teams, now turns on full-dress departmental presentations to the Cabinet, dry-run for White House and Budget staffs well in advance; with essentials of agreement at the Cabinet table providing, then, the base for formal interagency accord through clearance channels. Even where something like a “Truman” working team has been employed—as with Taft-Hartley changes, for example—its membership has comprised principals rather than staff, save at the White House level.

⁷⁷ Note that Eisenhower's inaugural marked the first change of party in the executive under the so-called "Lame Duck" Amendment; the new President was inaugurated only ten weeks after his election; the new Congress was in regular session two weeks before Inauguration Day.

⁷⁸ It has been the custom during 1954 for the White House to disavow Administration "sponsorship" of measures introduced by committee chairmen or other senior members after congressional receipt of presidential recommendations. But in the great majority of cases, as almost any New York Times account will show, these bills actually represent departmental drafts, conveyed with the Administration's blessing to competent authorities in Congress. This is the same route previously taken by most Truman "must" measures, which seldom traveled straight from White House to Congress. In all such cases, denials of Administration sponsorship are merely exercises in semantics, sometimes accepted at face value by the press, rarely, if ever, by congressmen, though giving all concerned a useful "out" for future reference.

It is too soon, of course, to be definitive about the Eisenhower pattern. As this is written—in the spring of 1954—many things remain unsettled and unsure. To cite just one example, there has not been, so far, a single Eisenhower veto of the disciplinary, attention-calling kind which lent its sting to clearances in Roosevelt’s time and Truman’s.⁷⁹ But if one thing is certain, it is this: the pre-existing patterns show a hardy tendency to reassert themselves in Eisenhower’s present circumstances.

VII. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF SURVIVAL

For more than thirty years now, central clearance has persisted, its history marked by a long series of “accidental,” unforeseen accretions. Nothing once absorbed has been wholly displaced; each new element somehow encompasses the old. There have been periods of relative stability, if not stagnation; times of obscurity, even decline. But overall, here is a record of great growth, successful adaptation—this under six successive Presidents, through every variation in national and governmental circumstances since Harding’s term of office.

What contributes to this continuity? What explains this institutional survival and advance, particularly in the years since F.D.R. cut clearance loose from its “financial” moorings? There is no answer in the statute books; no law prescribes this system. There is no guide in partisan commitments; one finds no platform planks or campaign speeches, pro or con. As for old presidential orders on the subject, the signatures of Roosevelt, Truman, Smith, and Webb are not, per se, coin of the realm today. The explanation lies in many things, but in these least of all.

Part of the answer can be drawn directly from events recorded in this paper. Note the impact of personalities, among them Roosevelt himself, Webb, Dodge, Bailey, Jones. Their interactions helped to mold—and to sustain—the modern clearance system. Note also the close correspondence of that system’s varied fortunes, since 1933, to shifting presidential policy preoccupations in an era of "big government," successive national emergencies, and changeable White House political prestige. It is not sheer happenstance that central clearance was but temporarily obscured by operational crises in depression and war; or that its greatest institutional expansions followed the political events of 1938 and 1946; or that its postwar growth, while checked by the Korean outbreak, seems to be resuming in Korea's aftermath, despite the change of Administration.

⁷⁹ This is not to say that the President subscribes to a Whig theory of the veto power. Staff aides contend otherwise and the evidence is not yet in.

Note, finally, the clearance system's formal locale in the Budget Bureau, a fact of real significance for continuity and for survival. Here is the oldest, toughest organism in the presidential orbit. The making of the budget is still the prime general-purpose, decision-and-action-forcing process yet institutionalized in the executive. The budget process, as it stands, is so firmly a fact of governmental life, so thoroughly assimilated in legislative and administrative practice and expectation, that its continuation goes unquestioned; its institutional embodiment, "The Budget," commanding everywhere a healthy measure of respect, if not always regard. Perhaps, as students now are fond of pointing out, the Bureau is by no means the ideal locale—not, anyway, in theory—for policy staff work on the substantive side.⁸⁰ And yet, in practice, nothing is so vulnerable as the high policy performer dangling loose, a ready target and potential sacrifice at every turn in presidential circumstance (e.g., NEC, OWMR). The more immediate the clearance system's policy involvement, the more advantageous, at least for survival, its impersonal exterior, its undescriptive designation, its "budgetary" context.

Theoretically, perhaps, the combination of effective personal relationships, continuing White House requirements, and stable staff resources should suffice to explain survival of a presidential mechanism aimed at administrative agencies. So might it be, were Presidents, in fact, "administrators" of some neatly unified executive. But they are not; instead, the White House looks out on:

... a protean agglomeration of feudalities that overlap and crisscross in an almost continual succession of changes. Some of the lines of control . . . terminate in the Presidency, some in . . . the legislature and some . . . 'outside' the government; a few lie in the hands of 'subordinate' executives; many more involve all of these in collegial arrangements so informal as to be but dimly recognized even by the chief participants.⁸¹

This is the context in which "central" clearance actually operates; its very terminology a contradiction of the feudal order. How then does it survive?

It lasts because most of the wielders of real power in this wilderness find in it net advantage to themselves. Of course, the agency secure in a strong "horizontal" power complex—buttressed by potent clientele and purposeful congressional committees—may have but little tolerance for clearance of its pet proposals. But every agency is not a Corps of Engineers; few, if any, are so “favorably” situated all the time. Most measures of most agencies face an uncertain future in the legislative process. Whatever clearance brings by way of support, even acquiescence, from President and Budget Bureau, from other agencies and, implicitly, their clientele, may help to reduce hazards, strengthen prospects in the Congress. Of course, advance accommodation is the purchase price. Whether to pay or not to pay involves a complex, variable estimate of cost and return, power and position, which bureaucrats must calculate afresh in every case. This does not produce absolute adherence to either the form or the spirit of clearance regulations; it does, at least, give most agency officials a real, long-term stake in the system’s survival. And that is reinforced, for every agency, by virtue of the chances clearance brings to sit in judgment on the other fellow’s viewpoints and designs.

⁸⁰ For examples, see Somers, op. cit., pp. 213 ff., Norton Long, "Popular Support for Economic Programs," this REVIEW, Vol. 42, pp. 326-36 (April, 1948); Arthur Maass, "In Accord with the Program of the President?" in Public Policy, eds. Carl J. Friedrich and J. Kenneth Galbraith (Cambridge, Mass., 1953), Vol. 4, pp. 77-93.

⁸¹ David B. Truman, The Governmental Process (New York, 1951), pp. 437-38.

As for senators and congressmen, they may show small concern for clearance niceties when potent sponsors or committees seize hold of an issue strongly backed by tough and vocal interests stimulating wide support. One thinks of Taft-Hartley, for example, or the McCarran Acts, or the Bricker Amendment. But Congress moves, perforce, on many measures of a very different character: on those the President stakes out for his own, and on a host of others which are neither “musts” for Presidents nor irresistibly appealing to members en masse. On the bulk of this business, overburdened legislators, in committee and out, need a handy criterion for choice of measures to take up, especially when faced with technical alternatives in which they have but little vested interest. They need, as well, an inkling of Administration attitude toward the outcome: how much, if at all, does the President care? What will he stand for when the bill comes down? What will he do thereafter, by way of budgetary follow-through? And save when they themselves choose otherwise, congressional committees need some measure of defense against time-wasting or discreditable cat-and-dog fights on their premises among the agencies concerned in pending bills. These services the clearance system can provide; that Congress wants them as a matter of practical self-interest is demonstrated by committee and leadership initiation of the direct referrals and other links to Budget now so integral a part of clearance operations.⁸²

Naturally congressmen, like bureaucrats, incline to weigh the relative advantages of heeding or ignoring clearance actions, case by case. Particular results have varied greatly from issue to issue, from committee to committee, and even among personalities and between the Houses. But there can be few members who have not found some clearance actions to their taste, few legislative leaders or committee chairmen who have not seen some disregarded clearance warning rise to haunt them in a veto message or a bobtailed budget. Again, this does not make for uniform responses to the terms of clearance; it is productive, though, of genuine concern for the system's survival.

⁸² Another service merits passing mention: favorable clearance gives a sponsor opportunities to wrap his project in the “presidential” mantle; unfavorable clearance lets him rise to defend Congress and the public interest—and his bill—against executive blundering or “interference.” Each tactic has its uses in the legislative struggle; each may bring members and their measures within reach of the publicity inherent in the presidential office. For a recent illustration, see the press treatment of sponsors’ complaints against an apparently adverse Budget report on several House bills depriving Alger Hiss of retirement benefits. New York Times, June 23–25, 1954.

For all these reasons, the "feudalities" at both ends of the Avenue have found that it pays to tolerate the clearance system. They have, indeed, found it quite possible to do so without yielding to the President their underlying freedom to maneuver. Yet simultaneously the President, while also husbanding his liberty to move, has found in clearance means to make these gentry heedful of his powers when they exercise their own. The vitality of central clearance lies in the fact that it can satisfy, at once, both these conditions. The President, as he may choose, gains ample opportunities to make known his desires. But Congress and the agencies are not compelled to notice. And he, meanwhile, retains the right to alter course, or change his mind. The voice that speaks is not the President's; it is the Budget Bureau's. And when need be, the Budget serves as whipping-boy.

This is a neat arrangement; it helps preserve the enterprise. But it can do that only so long as the distinction remains more fiction than fact. Were there to be a demonstration, generally and over time, that Budget really spoke not for the President but for itself alone, then the whole game would lose its point and the participants soon cease to play. Here one is brought to a new set of questions: What is the "program of the President" that Budget claims to interpret in clearance actions? Does such a thing exist and if so how is it constructed, and by whom? These questions lie outside the scope of this paper, but they can serve, perhaps, as curtain-raisers for another study.

A PRESSURE GROUP AND THE PRESSURED: A CASE REPORT*

OLIVER GARCEAU

Bennington College

AND

CORINNE SILVERMAN

The organized interest group does not make the laws of the land. It must devise means for gaining access to and influencing those who are constitutionally empowered to make, administer, or otherwise define the law. This study deals with the efforts of one organized group, the Associated Industries of Vermont, to secure its objectives in the 1951 session of the Vermont legislature. The study is correlatively concerned with the legislator's view of the AIV activities and, more broadly, of the legislative process.

I. THE PRESSURE GROUP

The Associated Industries of Vermont is a "peak" association; an organized business group which acts as spokesman for many diverse business interests in the state. The membership, which ranges from small manufacturers to the National Life Insurance Company, totaled some 450 concerns in 1951, the year in which the events to be described took place. Membership is by individuals, firms, and a few trade associations. Included were almost all the textile, the granite and marble, and the machine-tool companies in the state—representing three of the state's important industries. A rough estimate of the total payroll of the member concerns was about half of the total payroll of the state. A few retailing and other non-manufacturing members had recently been added.

This study does not attempt to deal with all the events of the 1951 session, nor even with the myriad ways in which business opinion in Vermont gained or failed to gain acceptance on a range of issues. It is concerned primarily with the overall strategy of the staff of the Associated Industries to gain access to the legislature, and with the specific tactics used by the AIV.

Access to the Vermont legislature is always difficult for the Associated Industries. No matter what the nature of the issues, the AIV is certain to face a legislature more sympathetic to the Farm Bureau than to a business group. Since each township in the state, irrespective of population, is entitled to one representative in the 246-member lower house, the natural preoccupations of the state with agricultural problems are further magnified in the legislature. Although 30.5% of the population live in towns of 5,000 or more, only 5.3% of the members of the lower house represent towns of that size. More than half of the AIV's membership in 1951 were located in towns of more than 5,000 population, which means, of course, that access to legislators through AIV-member-constituents was singularly limited.¹

* The research, of which this article is one report, was assisted by grants to Bennington College from the Carnegie Corporation of New York and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Despite these characteristics of the state and the legislature, which continually handicap the Associated Industries in attempts to gain access to the legislators, AIV appeared to be in a strong position when the 1951 session opened. Although it could not appeal to the mass of legislators, the formal leadership of both houses was decidedly receptive to consideration of the AIV point of view. In fact, the formal leaders of the houses were themselves key figures in the formation of the AIV point of view. The Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate, Joseph Johnson, was at that time on the Executive Committee of the AIV. He had been a vice-president of the Association, a member of the 1949 AIV Legislative Committee, and had been under consideration for the presidency of the Association until his election as Lieutenant-Governor. In private life he had been vice-president of a large machine-tool company. The Speaker of the House, Wallace M. Fay, was a director and a member of the Executive Committee of AIV. He, too, had been a member of the 1949 AIV Legislative Committee. Fay was vice-president of the Vermont Marble Company. The President Pro Tem of the Senate, and chairman of the Senate Rules Committee, Merrill Harris, who was president of one insurance company and a director of another, was also at that time a director of the AIV.

The chairmen of the standing committees in the legislature are not designated by virtue of seniority. They are appointed by the Speaker or by the President of the Senate. The AIV was directly influential in the appointments of chairmen and members of the committees considered of probable concern to the business group. The chairman of the House Commerce and Labor Committee, Walter Malmquist, president of a wood products company, had been a member of the 1949 AIV Legislative Committee together with Fay and Johnson. The chairman of the House Social Security Committee, while not a member of the Association, was appointed on the recommendation of Theodore Kane, the Executive Vice-President and manager of the AIV. The two other AIV members of the legislature were appointed chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and chairman of the Senate Commerce and Labor Committee, respectively. However, these two, although members of the AIV, were not as active as Fay, Johnson, Harris, and Malmquist, all of whom had held or were holding positions of responsibility in the formal organization of the group.

The AIV also had reason to suppose that the newly-elected governor, Lee Emerson, would have a readier ear for its opinions than had Governor Ernest Gibson. Although both governors were, inevitably, Republicans, this meant less than the fact that Gibson was associated with one faction of the Republican party in the state, and Emerson was allied with the opposing faction.

The development of the factional split in the Republican party is a major part of the story of the progress of the 1951 session, and is tied in some measure to an understanding of the role of the Proctor family in Vermont politics. This role reaches back to 1878 when Redfield Proctor started on an active political career, serving as governor in 1878, as Secretary of War under Benjamin Harrison, and in 1902 as United States Senator. During this period, the Vermont Marble Company, owned by the Proctor family, became the largest single company in the state. The Proctor family continued throughout the years to take an active interest in the politics of the state; and although the process of gaining office is certainly not a simple one, the history of the Proctors would seem to substantiate the folk tale that as soon as a Proctor reached the proper age he was elected governor of the state. Between 1878, when Redfield Proctor was elected governor, and 1944, when Mortimer Proctor became governor, three other members of the Proctor family served in that position. The Proctors were not and are not today political "bosses" of the state. Although the family might almost be viewed as a fixed pole in Vermont politics, it is fixed not in terms of ideology but in terms of repeatedly occupying an influential position in the political power structure of the state.

¹ As far as the party division in the legislature is concerned, it should be sufficient to say that the Democrats counted among their members 21 representatives (8.5%) and one senator. On all matters, including that of organization of the House and Senate, a Democrat in the Vermont legislature is indistinguishable by his voting behavior from a Republican.

Until the middle 1930's, knowledgeable informants agree, there was no serious or lasting cleavage in the Republican party of an ideological nature. But in 1934 appeared the first glimmer of a split which could be viewed as other than over personalities. In that election the Farm Bureau moved toward a formal endorsement of candidates in the primaries, and successfully backed Charles Smith for the governorship. In 1936 George Aiken was elected governor, again with the support of the Farm Bureau, which also supported his successful campaign for re-election in 1938. In these campaigns, the Farm Bureau in effect opposed Proctor candidates. During the war years Vermont politics quieted down, and Mortimer Proctor was elected in 1944, fully expecting re-election in 1946 for the traditional two terms of office. But in 1946 Ernest Gibson returned from the war and upset the proprieties by defeating Proctor in the primary and gaining the governorship, with the public endorsement of the Farm Bureau.

Gibson's election provoked a split in the Republican party of a type and meaning which remain somewhat enigmatic. Part of his opposition was made up of those who were irritated at the violation of the second term tradition, which would have given Mortimer Proctor a second term in office. To some observers, the split is a "liberal-conservative" one, with Gibson as a "New Deal kind of Republican" opposing the "Old Guard." Yet his program and policies in his two terms of office centered around major points which it would be hard to view as the foundations for a deep ideological cleavage. Gibson opposed the construction of a dam on the Connecticut River on the grounds that it would flood good farm land. This endeared him to the Farm Bureau and solidified the Aiken-Farm Bureau-Gibson combination. It also evoked murmurs of discontent from the private utility companies. The utilities were further incensed when in 1949 Gibson proposed to establish a Vermont Power Authority to negotiate for and distribute electric power produced by the St. Lawrence Seaway developments, if and when such developments occurred. The Farm Bureau backed Gibson fervently on this proposal which was, however, defeated. For Senator Aiken this was one facet of his participation in the struggle for federal endorsement of the Seaway. In Vermont, Gibson's proposal brought cries of "socialism" and established him as something of a radical. Other programs included a Department of Health to administer mobile health units, and a State Police system to augment the local sheriffs. He pressed for additional construction of state institutions, projects which had been ignored during the war years. He created a Development Commission to encourage industrial expansion in the state, to attract new business to the area, and thus to stem the steady outflow of Vermont's younger generation. These policies were viewed by many as radical and involving a wanton expenditure of money. They were acclaimed by others as "progressive" and as sensible investments in the state's health. When, in 1949, Gibson resigned from the governorship to accept a Truman appointment to the federal district court, many felt that the accusations of radicalism were vindicated.

The 1950 campaign was a complicated affair, with candidates for the Republican primaries announcing first for one office and then another in a whirl of indecision. When the merry-go-round slowed down there were three candidates for the Republican nomination for governor. One of them, Peter Bove, was generally regarded as "a Gibson man," but without as broad a backing as Gibson himself had had. The second, J. Harold Stacy, although he had been Gibson's Speaker of the House in the 1949 session, was considered to be nobody's man and a middle-of-the-roader, whatever that might mean in the low temperature politics of the state. Lee Emerson, the third and successful candidate, had been Lieutenant-Governor in Mortimer Proctor's term as governor, although this did not necessarily mean that he was "Proctor's man." The Proctors, in fact, did not appear to take much interest in the 1950 campaign until the last two or three weeks, when, it is often reported, they decided upon Emerson as the least of three evils and it became generally known that he had their backing.

The Associated Industries scrupulously refrained from taking any part in the 1950 campaign. Although the AIV had no direct connection with Governor Emerson, the links were there, and the campaign situation did nothing to weaken the possibility of cooperative relationships between governor, legislative officers, and the business group. At the very least, it was clear that the new governor could expect little support from former Gibson associates. As the new administration began and the legislature convened, the AIV made the explicit assumption that the official climate of opinion in the state government would be more congenial than in recent years and its own problems of effective access much simpler and more direct.

II. THE 1951 LEGISLATIVE SESSION²

The AIV did not concern itself actively with the full range of issues in the 1951 session. Rather, the staff focussed a major portion of its energy on one bill, the proposal of the labor groups to include certain occupational diseases under the Workman's Compensation Act. Theodore Kane, Executive Vice-President of the AIV (and for all practical purposes "the staff"), told the Association's members that this was "the most important legislation affecting industry to come before the 1951 session."

The development of this issue in the 1951 session is a not unrepresentative example of a process of inter-group negotiation characteristic of state legislatures when dealing with issues of something less than first-rank drama and political potential. The nature of such negotiations among interests is often assumed to be characteristically one of mutual hostility. Rather than assuming the legislature to be subject to a barrage of independent and divergent pressures, it may be closer to reality to conceive of a pattern, shifting through time, of alliances of interests which engage in negotiations and compromise outside the legislature. The rather picturesque comment of one member of the Vermont House is suggestive. Commenting on the AIV-labor negotiations on the occupational disease bill, he said that there were too many bills to keep track of in the session, and "if it is satisfactory to them you figure you're not cutting anybody's gut." The example of the occupational disease bill is also a cogent illustration of the role such group negotiations play in broadening access to the legislature for one group or another. The labor groups in Vermont had, with the exception of three or four friendly legislators, little or no opportunity for gaining access except through the AIV.

The occupational disease bill story begins in 1947 when the granite workers, concerned about silicosis, sought to have it covered under Workman's Compensation. Procedure followed the pattern prescribed for most legislative proposals of even ordinarily controversial nature: a temporary committee was set up which recommended further study by a five-man commission. The commission was established and reported to the 1949 session, presenting a majority report and a minority report. The AIV, although it preferred the majority report if forced to make a choice, offered still a third course; and the labor groups, although they preferred the minority report if forced to make a choice, came up with a fourth proposal. All four of these proposals reached the floor. The Vermont House normally consists of more than 50% "first-termers" who are unaccustomed for the most part to legislative routine and are traditionally prone to vote "no" on everything when confronted by confusion of amendments, substitutions, and other such sophisticated parliamentary practices. Acting in true form, the 1949 House defeated the majority bill, the minority bill, and labor's proposed substitutions, and passed the AIV's suggestion, which was to authorize the establishment of a Division of Industrial Hygiene in the Department of Health whose function it would be to recommend better methods for preventing occupational diseases.

² Much of the material presented in this section is based on reports of participant observers who were employed in the offices of the Associated Industries and the Vermont Farm Bureau during the 1951 legislative session.

For the time being, this was doing nothing about workman's compensation. However, the granite industry and the AIV, and most especially Mr. Kane, were well aware of the fact that the labor groups would make another try in the 1951 session. Despite the conservative drift of opinion in state and nation, and the exceptional access to the legislature enjoyed by AIV in 1951, it was never concluded by Mr. Kane that business interests could call the tune, even with relation to labor. This, be it noted, was not because labor was strong, but because business interests remained essentially weak. Farm leaders were characteristically Bull Moose progressive on business issues, disliked bankers for the record, distrusted big business and Wall Street to notable political advantage. Vermont legislative policy had, on a number of issues, been liberal to an exceptional degree, considering the conduct of some of the neighboring states and the very limited per capita wealth of the state. Business endorsement of a policy was considered, in the AIV office, a surety of defeat. This gloomy assessment may well have been an exaggerated projection of the 1930's, but it significantly conditioned the course of the negotiations. Since it was judged doubtful that an occupational disease law could be postponed indefinitely, the better strategy seemed to be for industry itself to take the initiative, present its own bill, and start any negotiations in an offensive rather than defensive position. Although it is not possible to place responsibility for this decision, it is more likely that it was Kane's rather than that of the Barre Granite Association, many of whose members were opposed to the passage of any bill.³

In December, just prior to the opening of the 1951 session, a meeting of minds was achieved between the leading members of the Granite Association and Kane, and a bill was drawn up. This bill resembled in its essence the majority bill of 1949, although the form was greatly simplified, especially by the omission of the innumerable "except as hereinafter otherwise provided" clauses to which the minority report had strenuously objected. The bill was taken to the Governor by the AIV and all seemed to be well. Two days later word came from Emerson that there were objections to the proposed bill. Kane would have to reach agreement with labor or there would be trouble in the legislature, trouble in the form of opposition on the floor by one or another of the handful of legislators friendly to labor. Such objections threatened a repetition of the events of the 1949 session, where the confusion of disagreement on the floor led almost inevitably to legislative disapproval.

The course followed by Kane to secure agreement was to set in motion a series of sessions with the CIO, or as some legislators termed it, "a horse trade." The AIV had planned to introduce in this session three bills aimed at tightening the qualifications for workers claiming benefits under the Unemployment Compensation Law. It is not impossible that these bills were planned as bargaining items, although intrinsically they were compatible with AIV aims. Labor in turn hoped for an increase in the maximum duration of unemployment benefits from 20 weeks to 26 weeks, and for an increase in the maximum weekly payments from $25 to $30.

³ The Barre Granite Association included among its members almost all of the 117 granite companies in the state, and had joined the AIV as an association, paying a lump sum annually as dues.

Kane and the CIO representative went into a determined huddle over who would give up what in return for what. Labor's concern was to get an occupational disease bill on the books in some form or other. The AIV, on the other hand, felt that its legislative position was stronger in this session than it had been for some years and that it might be in sessions to come, and therefore wanted to get an occupational disease law in a form acceptable to business. Labor knew that the most it could hope for in a future legislature would be an increase in the number of "friendly" legislators from the three or four in the 1951 session to a possible five or six. Unless the AIV felt that labor was "co-operative," labor demands might be ignored. It was only through the maintenance of reasonably amicable relations with the Association that labor interests could look for success in the legislature. Labor finally agreed to the occupational disease bill in the form in which the AIV had drawn it, and agreed also to withdraw all its proposals for increasing unemployment benefits and extending the duration of payments. The AIV in turn agreed that it would withhold in this session the bills tightening qualifications for unemployment compensation.

These negotiations were carried on completely outside the legislative halls with only two legislative participants. One, Walter Malmquist, was the AIV-picked chairman of the House Commerce and Labor Committee. However, his role was not that of active negotiator but that of liaison between the AIV and the legislature, a role which he played throughout the session on all AIV issues. He kept Speaker Fay and some of the more important legislators informed on this and all other situations in which the AIV was concerned. The other legislator present was the representative from Barre Town, Ralph Smith, who was recognized as the principal legislative spokesman for labor. One or two other legislators were involved in some portions of the bargaining process, and although they did not know the details of all that had happened, they knew that, since agreement had been reached, the bill should be approved. The vast majority of the legislators, however, knew only that both Malmquist and Smith rose on the day of debate and announced that both industry and labor thought the bill should pass. They sat down, the vote was taken, and an occupational disease bill passed the House. The Senate, also noting that Malmquist and Smith urged the bill, granted its approval and the bill became law.

The passing of this bill was not accomplished by any visible lobbying. No attempt was made by either of the interested parties, industry or labor, to "buttonhole" members of the legislature and persuade them of the righteousness of the cause. There was no pleading before legislative committees. Rather, the differences of opinion within industry were first resolved and then agreement on the nature of the bill was reached between the representatives of organized industry and labor. Agreement to pass the bill came as a result of swapping and cancelling out objectives announced for the 1951 session. Bargaining was readily achieved by virtue of a long-standing "open-door" policy which existed between Kane and John Mitchell, the representatives of the AIV and CIO, respectively. Success for each of them depended upon maintaining an attitude of willingness to bargain with the other, although this dependence was more keenly felt by the CIO than by the AIV. The bulk of the legislators were more than willing to accept the bill without feeling a need to know what had happened behind the scenes, or if anything had happened. Their attention was caught by the more dramatic bills which had not been so resolved and which thus resulted in a clash of interests on the floor.

These more dramatic clashes, which in 1951 centered about the problem of the Governor's budget and tax policy, illustrate the limitations of the above methods. One factor important to the success of the occupational disease negotiations was that the bargaining and the legislative action came relatively early in the session. The bill was passed by the House in the last days of March and by the Senate in the first week of April. Up to that point the social and political organization of the legislature had been comparatively unstructured, and factional lines had not yet become sharply defined. Less than a week after passage of the occupational disease law, the entire character of the legislature changed and "the honeymoon was over." If the occupational disease bill had come up any later than it did, Administration support might have proved a liability and the issue might well have become entangled in the struggle which characterized the remainder of the session.

Governor Emerson, in his inaugural address and budget message, proclaimed an era of economy. No state department was to receive funds for additional personnel or new projects; wherever possible duplication was to be eliminated and consolidation of agencies effected. Above all, no new taxes were to be levied, except for a half-cent increase in the gas tax, which in Vermont is earmarked for highway development. This program in itself, while perhaps not entirely realistic in an inflationary period, would not have alarmed most members of the state legislature. What did arouse comment, and eventually deep acrimony, was the detail of this program. For the departments and agencies singled out by Emerson as those in which the greatest cuts could be made performed services inaugurated by his predecessor, Ernest Gibson. The Vermont Development Commission was to be virtually eliminated, and the new State Police was to be merged with the Motor Vehicle Department. Savings from these two reorganizations were budgeted as sufficient to avert tax increases. The Governor warned that if his program were not carried out, the burden of balancing the budget would rest upon the members of the legislature.

These two issues were seized upon by those in the legislature who had been Gibson supporters, and by much newspaper opinion, as purely "political" maneuvers, designed only to "undo all Gibson had done." By the time the two bills reached the House in early April they had become regarded as Emerson's "test of strength." In the event, they demonstrated that the Governor could not effectively "control" his legislature, for the House voted $100,000 to the Development Commission instead of the Governor's proposed $20,000, and defeated the proposed State Police-Motor Vehicle Department merger. The Senate restored another $100,000 to the Development Commission, or all but $40,000 of the Commission's original budget request of $240,000.

It was not to the advantage of the AIV to become embroiled in either of these issues. Factions in Vermont do not have the stability of established parties in other situations. Today's opponents may well be tomorrow's political compatriots. The Association managed to stay clear of the merger issue almost entirely. However, the Development Commission battle was more difficult to avoid. When a public hearing was scheduled on the proposed cut, Kane received word from the President of AIV to appear at the hearing and support the Governor's proposal. However, there were pressures in the opposite direction. Among the more determined opponents of the proposed cut were the local chambers of commerce, and the resort and hotel interests. Many of the latter were recent additions to membership. Kane could not afford to alienate one part of his membership in order to satisfy another. Furthermore, perhaps the most determined opponent of the proposal was the Vermont Farm Bureau. Since the Farm Bureau was unquestionably the most powerful organized group in the state, it was never to the advantage of the AIV to appear in direct, certainly not in open, opposition to it, if such a position could be avoided. The day of the hearing found Kane with important matters to attend to elsewhere.

Although the AIV managed to remain nominally neutral in these two issues, the Governor's defeat affected the AIV in the consequent problem of taxation. When both of the Governor's major proposals for economizing were defeated, and when the legislature also passed a bill raising the salaries of state employees, it was clear the budget would not be balanced unless new taxes were levied. As he had promised, Emerson had no tax proposal to offer. The legislators were in this difficulty despite his warnings, and the legislators would have to get out of trouble by themselves.

This interpretation of the role of the executive resulted in something close to chaos in the legislature. No one in the legislative branch considered himself responsible for working out an overall tax program. As one senator pointed out, "it's not very smart politically to introduce tax bills. That's supposed to be the job of the Administration, and everybody was glad to leave it to them." However, a small group of leaders of the Governor's faction attempted to solve the problem by introducing a series of small taxes which became known as the "patchwork taxes." Rather than raise the state income tax, a policy which Emerson had disapproved in his budget message, and rather than leap to the politically unpopular sales tax, this group proposed increases in the taxes on beer, on soft drinks, and on amusements. None of these proposed taxes had the official blessing of the Governor. Contradictory reports about his preferences flowed freely in the legislative corridors. Since the patchwork taxes were being proposed by legislators regarded as "Emerson men," there was some feeling that Emerson was backing the patchwork program; and in fact Emerson was meeting regularly with this group of legislators to discuss the possible methods of passing these taxes. The patchwork program was speedily defeated.

Kane did not find it appropriate to take the initiative on new taxes. The membership of a business group is not likely to be tolerant of the staff's proposing a more active tax program than those emanating from the executive and legislative branches. Furthermore, over the objections of a number of his members, Kane had actively supported a withholding tax earlier in the session. This was not a "new tax," but a new method of collecting taxes. Since it was to be retroactive, it was to result in an immediate "windfall" of several hundred thousand dollars of revenue. Kane, and the Governor as well, had harbored some hopes that this windfall would lessen the pressure for any further taxes. Having gone beyond his membership in this, Kane was unwilling to approve, in the name of the AIV, any further tax proposals. Finally, though none of the industries presently in the AIV would have been hit by the patchwork taxes, Kane was trying to broaden the base of membership in the Association to include, among others, business at which the taxes were directed. Kane was not prepared to alienate these potential members.

It was now the middle of May. The 1951 legislature had already broken all records for length of session, and a solution to the tax problem was not yet in sight. A sales tax proposal was thrown into the hopper, but did not receive the approval of even 15% of the House. It was generally recognized that a tax of this sort required more preparation than a day or two spent copying a bill currently proposed in New Hampshire.

The legislature finally turned from the confusion to a 15% surtax on the state personal and corporate income tax, a solution proposed and introduced in the House by a legislator readily identified as "a Gibson man." This was the only tax on which the Governor had explicitly taken a stand, stating clearly in his budget message that "I do not favor any change in the existing income tax law at this time." It was the tax which the AIV would logically have wanted to defeat. But the AIV was by this time in a changed position. The Association had, at the outset, enjoyed access to the legislature through the formal leadership of the House and Senate. By the end of the session, the formal leadership did not coincide with the actual leadership. The Governor by his policy throughout the session, and by withdrawing himself from leadership on the whole question of taxes, had precipitated the latent cleavage in the legislature. Two sets of informal leaders had emerged.

It could be argued, no doubt, that the Governor and the AIV had not been wholly realistic in assuming that Emerson's program would be adopted in full and that therefore no tax program would be necessary. It might have been wise to have considered early in January what program would be preferred in the event that some new taxes became necessary. When the major decision of tax policy had to be faced, AIV had neither a policy known and acceptable to its members, nor access to the leadership which had developed in the legislature.

III. THE PRESSURED

After this summary of the 1951 legislative session from the perspective of the Associated Industries, it is appropriate to report how the events of the session looked to some of the members of the legislature. The questions to be explored are how these legislators themselves perceived the legislative process; what they thought was their own role in the process; and what place they attributed to organized group interests and activities. More specifically, what issues stood out for these legislators as "important," and for what reasons? What did they think was the role of organized interest groups in shaping the decisions on these or other issues? How much group activity and what kind of group activity were, in fact, visible to the legislators?⁴

The legislators, who were interviewed from two to four months after the close of the 1951 session, did not tell a uniform story of what had happened during the five-month session. They chose for themselves several different kinds of signposts as guides through the confusion and stress of the session. They had different ways of structuring the experience, different perspectives on the elements of the legislative process.

Among the members of the lower house there appeared to be four different ways of describing the session. One group of House members were distinguished by their reluctance to impose any intellectual scheme or interpretation on the events of the session. All of the many episodes of the session were remembered, often with some difficulty, as so many separate items. There was a striking tendency among these representatives to refer questions about specific issues to the report of the committee which had handled the bill, although this is not to say that they remembered very clearly which committee had indeed handled which of the bills under discussion. Unable to see relationships in the handling of different issues, or relationships among informal groups of legislators, these representatives, making a virtue of necessity, seemed to cut down the confusion by taking the "safest" course. They argued that the standing committee members ought to have the "right decision" on each bill, and that the committee reports ought to be followed by the legislature. These legislators had not evolved broad standards for judging the issues as matters of social policy. They did not see the legislature as a forum for rival parties, factions, or interests. They did not identify leaders in the legislative process. Their interpretation of events was in terms of a traditional democratic morality. As representatives they were under obligation to their own consciences to do the right thing. The standing committee was to define, from its hearings and special competence, what was right. As observers of the interaction patterns in the 1951 session, they were "non-generalizers," and will be so termed below.

⁴ The sample of legislators who were interviewed is not statistically representative of the membership of the 1951 session of the Vermont legislature. Forty members of the 246 representatives were interviewed, and 16 of the 30 senators. Half of the members of the House sample were selected by the participant observers in the Associated Industries and the Farm Bureau as either accessible to the interest groups under study, influential in the legislature, or both accessible and influential. The remaining half of the House sample was selected on a random basis. It was originally planned to interview the entire membership of the Senate, but interviews were completed with only slightly more than half of the senators.

Despite the fact that the entire sample was not chosen on a random basis, the sample as it was drawn is representative in certain characteristics considered relevant. The geographic distribution of the members and the party division in the legislature are quite accurately reflected in the sample, as is the distribution by previous legislative experience. The 40 members of the House under-represent slightly the proportion of representatives from the smaller towns, and the proportion of farmer-representatives, and over-represent slightly the proportion of lawyer-representatives.

A second group of members of the lower house was sensitive primarily to the factional cleavage among the Republican legislators. Although these representatives could identify some of the more specific issues on which the cleavage had been apparent, they tended to discuss the cleavage as a conflict between rivals seeking advancement and power in state politics. For them a great many of the events of the session had turned on which group of factional leaders was the more effective or persuasive. These representatives will be referred to as the "faction-oriented."

A third group of the legislators added a further dimension to the process. They were aware of the factional clashes. They saw also a relation between the Governor's program and the emergence of factional alignment. Among this group, the Emerson supporters felt that his original message of economy in state programs, to avoid tax increases, had been sound. Although they had doubts of varying degrees about the specific proposals which were to effectuate this program, they cast their lot with the overall aim. Those who developed into "the opposition" had in some cases been Gibson supporters in previous years, and in other cases had been uncommitted. But they agreed that the reorganization and decimation proposals were unacceptable, whatever the merit of economy in general. For these legislators, the session was a struggle between factions emerging out of the Governor's program. They were essentially "program oriented" in their answers to questions covering the range of legislative activity.

A fourth group of representatives, "policy-oriented", saw the relation between broad program and faction. But their concern was with their own role as active leaders promoting particular policies or seeking to take care of policy in what might be called an issue area. Three were focussed on the interests of labor, and a fourth dealt with education. To these legislators the story of the session was the story of their own activity with relation to these policy matters and their own negotiations with interest groups and legislative factions. To a degree they sought for themselves a limited and special role as factional leaders; but their purpose and their interpretation of events were in terms of particular policies.⁵

⁵ These perspectives and the analyses to follow must of necessity be impressionistic and based on rough quantification. The sample is too small to allow more rigorous validation. The number of representatives who fall into each group should be kept in mind.

IV. LEGISLATIVE VIEWS OF ISSUES AND GROUPS

The research used a focussed interview. At the outset the legislator was asked what he considered the most important problem of the session. It was mainly from the responses to this question that the varying perspectives emerged.

With one exception, all the "policy" and "program-oriented" legislators selected as the most important problem of the session the question of the Governor's program and budget, which led them immediately into a discussion of the policy of economy, the State Police merger and the Vermont Development Commission questions, the various tax programs, and the split in the Republican party.

Most of the "faction-oriented" selected the merger, the Vermont Development Commission cut, or one of the tax proposals. The biggest difference between this group and the "policy-" and "program-oriented" groups was the failure of the "faction-oriented" to see the interconnections between any of these issues and the entire range of issues which had made up "the problem" for the first two groups of legislators.

As for the fourth group, the "non-generalizers," almost every representative in this group picked a different issue as "the most important problem in the session." A few chose one or another of the tax proposals, but the range of issues selected was widely scattered. Every issue appearing in the interview with a member of this group was treated by him as a discrete issue with no apparent sense of interconnections.⁶

Group	Number of Representatives
"Policy-Oriented"	4
"Program-Oriented"	12
"Faction-Oriented"	13
"Non-generalizers"	11
	—
Total	40

The Senate sample is too small to analyze separately. All quantifications are based on the representatives. The findings reported on the representatives appear as tendencies in the Senate. The two samples have not been combined, since the two populations differ in intrinsic characteristics.

⁶ After the legislator had completed his discourse on "the most important problems," specific issues were introduced unless volunteered by respondent. Since the interest group activity on these issues was available from the participant observers, one purpose of the legislative survey was to complement this story with a picture of how the process appeared to the legislator. Accordingly, it was planned to include discussion of the questions on which the AIV had been most active and interested: the occupational disease and unemployment compensation bills which had been involved in the business-labor negotiations. Each interview was also intended to include a discussion of the Governor's budget, the proposed State Police merger, the proposed cut in the Vermont Development Commission appropriations, the "patchwork" taxes, and the sales-income tax alternatives.

In addition, the interviews were planned to include discussion of two matters on which the Vermont Farm Bureau had been active: a proposal to permit the sale of colored oleomargarine; and two proposals relating to the St. Lawrence Seaway, one memorializing Congress to approve the Seaway, and another establishing an agency in Vermont which would be authorized to negotiate for power resulting from any St. Lawrence development.

The most striking fact which emerged from the interviews as a whole was the extremely low level of recognition of interest group activity. Although every representative interviewed knew of the Vermont Farm Bureau, more than a third had never heard of the Associated Industries of Vermont, and only a few more had any notion that the labor interests in Vermont were organized. One third of the representatives had never heard of Arthur Packard, for a generation the president and lobbyist for the Farm Bureau, and about two thirds of them were unable to identify the lobbyists for either the AIV or the CIO. Even fewer were able to recall more than one issue in which these groups had been interested.

TABLE I. PER CENT OF REPRESENTATIVES INTERVIEWED WHO WERE ABLE TO IDENTIFY ORGANIZED GROUPS, THEIR LOBBYISTS, AND ISSUES IN WHICH THE ORGANIZED GROUPS WERE INTERESTED
(N = 40)

Question	Per Cent Able to Recognize
	Farm Bureau	AIV	CIO/AFL*
Group itself	100.0%	62.5%	77.5%
Lobbyist	70.0	40.0	37.5
More than one issue	60.0	30.0	30.0

* Although John Mitchell, the labor lobbyist identified here as the most active during the session, represents officially the CIO, he was considered to have been representing both the CIO and the AFL. The granite quarry workers belong to the CIO and the stone cutters belong to the AFL.

These differentials in the ability of the representatives to recognize organized groups, their lobbyists, and issues in which the groups were interested are closely linked to the different ways the various legislators structured the session. The representatives who made the more complex analysis of the legislative process, the "policy-" and the "program-oriented," saw more organized group activity than did the "faction-oriented." The "non-generalizers" had the lowest level of recall and recognition of organized group activity. Their concept of the legislative process did not require it of them. Or was it that, lacking recognition of interest groups, their concept of process had to build without such elements? The data allow the question to be raised, but do not answer it.

The level of recognition or recall of group activity involved in this analysis is not exacting. It is based on the ability of the legislator to recognize or recall the existence of the organized farm, business, and labor interests; to recognize or recall the name of any of the lobbyists for these groups; and to link either the organized group or its lobbyist to issues which had arisen in the 1951 session.

The interviews did not follow a prescribed sequence, nor were they confined to these topics. They did not always achieve complete coverage, either because respondent lacked information or interest in the proposed items, or because the interview developed respondent's concepts of party, faction, interest group, executive roles, and issues by other means.

TABLE II. REPRESENTATIVES IN EACH CATEGORY OF PERSPECTIVE ON THE SESSION WHO WERE ABLE TO IDENTIFY ORGANIZED INTEREST GROUPS

Legislative Perspective	Number	Per Cent Able to Recognize Organized Interest Group
		Farm Bureau	AIV	CIO/AFL
"Policy-Oriented"	4	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
"Program-Oriented"	12	100.0	100.0	100.0
"Faction-Oriented"	13	100.0	56.2	76.9
"Non-Generalizers"	11	100.0	45.4	45.4
Totals	40	100.0	62.5	77.5

TABLE III. REPRESENTATIVES IN EACH CATEGORY OF PERSPECTIVE ON THE SESSION WHO WERE ABLE TO IDENTIFY THE LOBBYISTS FOR EACH GROUP

Legislative Perspective	Number	Per Cent Able to Recognize Lobbyist of the Group
		Farm Bureau	AIV	CIO/AFL
"Policy-Oriented"	4	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
"Program-Oriented"	12	75.0	75.0	41.7
"Faction-Oriented"	13	84.6	23.0	23.1
"Non-Generalizers"	11	36.4	00.0	27.3
Totals	40	70.0	40.0	37.5

TABLE IV. REPRESENTATIVES IN EACH CATEGORY OF PERSPECTIVE ON THE SESSION WHO WERE ABLE TO RECALL MORE THAN ONE ISSUE IN WHICH A GROUP HAD BEEN INTERESTED OR ACTIVE

Legislative Perspective	Number	Per Cent Able to Recognize More Than One Issue in Which Each Group Had Been Active
		Farm Bureau	AIV	CIO/AFL
"Policy-Oriented"	4	75.0%	100.0%	100.0%
"Program-Oriented"	12	83.3	58.3	33.3
"Faction-Oriented"	13	61.5	7.7	23.2
"Non-Generalizers"	11	18.4	9.9	18.4
Totals	40	60.0	30.0	30.0

There was far less recognition of inter-group bargaining, techniques of lobbying, and patterns of individual interaction. Only two of the representatives interviewed were fully aware of the inter-group negotiations which had taken place on the occupational disease bill. Two or three others knew that some negotiations had taken place, but did not know that concessions had been made by the two sides. They referred questions about such details to Representatives Ralph Smith or Walter Malmquist, who, it will be recalled, were the two representatives actually involved in the whole range of negotiations. Another two or three representatives knew that business and labor—and they only presumed that it had been Kane and Mitchell—had somehow managed to agree on the occupational disease bill, but had no idea of what the agreement had involved or that it had taken the form of a quid pro quo. The remaining representatives could recall the occupational disease bill only dimly, and associated it vaguely with labor, but for the most part did not recall that the AIV or “business” had been concerned with it, and had no knowledge of “business-labor” conferences, negotiations, or compromises.

This less than a dozen representatives who had been aware to varying degree of the protracted and, to the AIV and labor, highly important negotiations, were almost without exception the only ones who were able to discuss in any detail the nature of the membership of the Associated Industries, and it was not clear to all of them how the diversity of membership had influenced Kane’s ability to act in the development of the tax program. The other representatives were hardly aware of the existence of the AIV and had no conception of the nature of its membership. All those with the “policy-oriented” perspective and half of those with the “program-oriented” perspective knew that the AIV had a high degree of interest in the various tax alternatives which were being proposed, and they had been watching to see whether the group would, in fact, take a position on tax changes. None of the other representatives (who constitute 75% of the sample of the lower house) had any notion that the AIV was interested in the tax proposals.

The dimensions of a legislator’s awareness of group activity do not appear to be related to respondent’s affiliation with one faction or another. Faction was also unrelated to the representative’s conception of the process in the legislative session. As noted above, however, there was a relationship between the way the legislator structured the events of the session and his ability to report the activity of organized groups. Furthermore, it was not unexpected

TABLE V. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PERSPECTIVE ON LEGISLATIVE SESSION AND SOCIO-ECONOMIC VARIABLES

Legislative Perspective	Number	Per Cent of Legislators within Each Category
		From Towns With Pop. of More Than 2,500	With Previous Leg. Experience	With College Education
“Policy-Oriented”	4	100.0%	75.0%	100.0%
“Program-Oriented”	12	50.0	66.7	58.3
“Faction-Oriented”	13	15.4	53.8	30.8
“Non-Generalizers”	11	0.0	27.2	9.1

that the more complex patterns were seen by respondents of longer legislative service, more education, less geographic isolation, and more urban background.

Widely different attitudes and value judgments emerged from the interviews as to the role of interest groups in the decision-making process. A number of the legislators, mostly "policy-oriented" or "program-oriented," recognized the importance of inter-group negotiations in softening the edges of conflict among interests, be they organized or unorganized. Some legislators cited instances when they themselves had urged such negotiations. Others had sought to establish that such inter-group conferences had taken place and that the results were acceptable to the participants. One legislator, for example, discussed the occupational disease bill by saying:

... that was one thing John Mitchell was very interested in. I saw him around and asked him about it, and he told me to vote for it. I asked him if he was satisfied with it, and he said "no," he wasn't, but "go talk to Ted Kane—he isn't satisfied with it either. Or talk to (Ralph) Smith—he isn't satisfied either. None of us are satisfied, but it gets a bill on the books." So it was a compromise bill, and I voted for it.

Then there were the legislators, also among the "policy-" and "program-oriented," who pointed out that unilateral pressure was not ordinarily effective in changing opinions:

Lobbyists are effective only when opinion is not already made up, or when there is a propensity in that direction anyway. I can't think of one instance when an actual switch was brought about by lobbying.

A few others, not so facile with abstractions, confirmed this opinion. One legislator, a farmer himself, told of an attempt made by the Farm Bureau to persuade him to vote against the State Police merger when he himself had been in favor of it:

This was the bill I was most pressured on. The Farm Bureau tried to change my vote. Each county has a Farm Bureau branch, and each branch has a legislative committee of about five people, not themselves legislators. They discuss the issues they think are going to come up and pass resolutions. During the session the local committees meet and talk about bills. The ————— County committee had decided that they were against the merger. After the second reading when they found out that I had voted for the merger they came to me and asked me to change my vote on the third reading. I said I didn't think I would, and I didn't. There was nothing they could do about it.

In another instance a farmer-legislator had been subjected to vigorous argument by the retail grocers, who were working for repeal of laws against the sale of colored oleomargarine: "I guess it will get passed eventually," he said sadly. "More and more seem to be for it; but I couldn't come home and look one of my cows in the eye if I voted for it."

Some of these legislators were anxious to point out that a discussion of interest groups cannot be confined to what is ordinarily termed "lobbying." Said one legislator:

You can't talk about "Farm Bureau" activity on this bill. Farm support or opposition is not always organized. It's the same with any group. For example when this bill came up, or when any bill comes up, the members of the Agriculture Committee sit around for a while in their committee room and discuss the effects of the bill on them as farmers. Sure, they're all farmers and probably all Farm Bureau members. But is this an organized group? Not really. At least not organized in such a way that you can point to direct Farm Bureau influence.

Another legislator talking about the influence of one of the lobbyists who had at one point in his career held state office, had this to say:

It's not so much a question of cornering this one or that in lobbies, . . . had a room on the second floor of the hotel and so did a number of influential legislators. He'd go out about 10 P.M. and get together with a few of them. He's an old guy, very lively and highly respected. They'd pat the man on the back and invite him in. Then he'd say, "you know, about this bill and that. I think this and that." And he'd be listened to. It's much more this kind of thing than actually speaking in hearings, although he did that too.

These were the legislators, too, who considered various organized groups and their lobbyists to be sources of information not only on the actual content of bills, but on attitudes about the bills. A few first-term members reported that they had consulted with the politically experienced lobbyists to get their opinions on techniques of legislative strategy.

In sharp contrast to those who viewed the interest groups as the instruments for softening conflict, defining alternatives, and conveying information, were the legislators who expressed highly negative opinions about the role of interest groups in the legislative process. Some of these fell into the category of "faction-oriented," but most of them were the "non-generalizers." "Lobbying is immoral, indecent, and unnecessary," was a fairly representative statement among this group. "There were lots of lobbyists around, but they knew it wouldn't do any good to talk to me, and I left them alone too," said another. Running through most of such interviews was a concept of an undefined "they." For the most part, unable to fit into their framework of process the activities of organized groups, these legislators could say only that "they killed it," or "they got it passed," but could not identify who "they" actually were, or how "they" had managed to kill or pass the bill.

V. LEADERSHIP IN THE LEGISLATURE

At the close of the interview each legislator was asked to nominate the members of the legislature whom it would be most valuable for the research team to visit and question. A noticeable pattern was a pronounced regional division of the state. Legislators from the southern part tended to suggest only other legislators from the south, and northern legislators tended to feel that only other legislators from the north were "worth talking to."⁷ In addition, a simple count of the number of times any legislator was recommended revealed an informal structure in the legislature. Certain legislators were recommended many times more frequently than others, and their nomination was independent of respondent's factional preference or geographic residence. Without exception, those nominees appearing in the sample interviewed were "policy-oriented" or "program-oriented" in their own interpretation of the session. Parenthetically and understandably, the "non-generalizers" made the fewest nominations, and made them with the greatest reluctance.

⁷ This division was a real surprise. Preliminary talks with knowledgeable people had described the political organization of the Republican party as dividing between east and west, with an alternation in office for the two sides of the mountains.

These nominated legislative leaders, who commanded an important position in the informal structure of the legislature, appeared to have played a significant part in interpreting and reporting events for the others. They seem to have defined for the others both the nature of reality and the alternative means for bringing such reality into better adjustment with the legislator's personal preferences. They did not influence to any noticeable degree the final choice among these alternatives for the other legislators, as evidenced by the roll-call votes on crucial issues, and by the factional allegiances of respondent and nominee.⁸

VI. REVIEWING THE RECORD

The 1951 session afforded the Associated Industries of Vermont some interesting surprises. On the policy issue defined in advance for action, the strategy of inter-group negotiation worked admirably. The advantage of access gained from the 1950 election was put to immediate use. The substance of the bill was satisfactory to the business members. The timing was right in the legislature. The relations with other groups remained cooperative and available for further issues. The tactical moves were made out of the public eye. The requisite appearance of harmony was sustained; there were no complicated reservations, no outcries of frustration, to precipitate a negative vote.

But the case study suggests forcefully that the business group had interests at stake on many fronts, and was far from free to have its own way. Sure of access to the executive and to both houses of the legislature, convinced that the climate of opinion in the election had been sympathetic to its needs and aspirations, careful to avoid the limelight, aware that the label of business was a handicap to a policy proposal, active to form alliances with labor on social insurance and with agriculture on federal control of inflation, the AIV nonetheless ran into heavy weather. Representatives of business had worked closely with the new governor in preparing the budget message. Economy and no new taxes were the keynotes of the executive program. But an absolute freezing of appropriations was not realistic in a year of inflation. The proposed reorganization of agencies became a symbol of factional rivalry. The informal leadership emerging during the session left the AIV with notably diminished access. The timing on the major issue of the new taxes turned out to be all wrong. The AIV had not anticipated the problem, and lacked a policy and a strategic plan. The rotten-borough, rural-dominated legislature, with short tenure, afforded little opportunity for AIV to develop a case for business views of fiscal policy. A final irony of the 1951 episode was the 1952 election, in which Governor Emerson, seeking re-election, was widely criticized for the overwhelming surplus in the state treasury, product of these increased personal and corporate income taxes under the stimulus of the Truman boom.

⁸ Though the data available from the interviews do not bring it into clear focus, there is a further variable related to the informal leadership structure of the legislature. To some members, service in the legislature is a strictly amateur undertaking, pursued for many motives, it is true: out of a sense of civic duty; as an enormously entertaining pastime to relieve the rigor of a northern winter; a varied social occasion; a chance to make business contacts or advance personal status in the home community. To others, it is part of their professional vocation. The professionals may go no further than the legislature, and may not expect to. Or they may be moving rapidly through a series of public offices. They may be freshmen or have many years of experience. In any case, the professional member must bring to his role a different perspective of the process and a different stance in his own activities than does the amateur. Further research is needed to develop the relationships between these roles and the materials analyzed in this case study.

The widely varying conceptions of the legislative process that turned up in the legislative interviews after the session explained much about the cautious approach used by AIV. Kane did not try to be invisible, and there is little to be said for stereotypes of invisible governments and pressure group politics. But, to a political scientist, it is reasonably astonishing to discover how few of the legislators could name the interest groups correctly or associate group executive with group or issue. The amateur legislature, meeting biennially, for nominal compensation, is a remarkably relaxed forum of political behavior. The issues are viewed as postponable. The temperature is kept moderate by this basic technique of resolving conflict. In this case the interest group had to play the game of politics with a legislature that was essentially unorganized until the game was better than half over.

EXTRA-LEGAL POLITICAL PARTIES IN WISCONSIN

FRANK J. SORAUF

The Pennsylvania State University

American political parties have long been the victims of a peculiarly ambivalent public attitude—an attitude which on the one hand views them as perverters of the democratic spirit while on the other hand it gives them a vital role in the political process. Much of the regulation imposed on the parties in this spirit of distrust makes it all the more difficult for them to carry out their political role. To operate successfully, they have been forced to adapt their organization and functions to rigorous legal climates.

The vagueness and flexibility of political organization in the states reflect this constant struggle the parties wage to maintain their vitality and integrity against what are frequently severe legal odds. Parties have learned to create informal organs which will be effective and practical. Consequently, the real centers of political power rarely parallel the orderly, pyramided party organizations that the states create. The state or local party leader who holds no formal party office and the extra-legal organization or "machine" are common-places in American politics.

This paper will examine the efforts of the two major parties of one state—Wisconsin—to develop organizations flexible enough to permit them to operate effectively as political parties, while exposing themselves to the barest minimum of control. These Wisconsin parties have found their answer in a series of extra-legal "voluntary" committees, which today carry on all of the real and important party activities in the state. In their first stages, the voluntary committees were used by dissident groups as tools to win control of the parties and to reorient them ideologically. They later served the parties both as means of establishing more responsible party government in pursuance of that ideology, and as devices for avoiding the demanding regulations Wisconsin imposes on its parties. In fulfilling all of these functions, the voluntary committees provided the parties with a more effective base of operations than the awkward, ill-conceived statutory party structure.

I. STATUTORY AND VOLUNTARY COMMITTEES

The Wisconsin statutes outline a party structure to which parties in Wisconsin are to conform.¹ This "statutory party" organization, growing out of the state's September primary election, is not unusual or atypical. At the primary the voters in every precinct in the state elect a party precinct committeeman for a two-year term. All of the committeemen elected within a city or county meet to form the party's city and county committees.² The county committees in turn send representatives to form the state assembly, senatorial, and congressional district committees.

¹ Wisconsin, Statutes, 1953, Ch. 5.35, 5.36.

² In the city of Milwaukee the committeemen are elected by wards. The Milwaukee county committee, therefore, consists of the ward committeemen from the city and the precinct committeemen from the other governmental units in the county.

This method of electing committees indirectly, originating with the elected precinct committeeman, stops just beneath the peak of the party hierarchy. At the peak, the party's state central committee is chosen by a statutory convention composed of all party candidates for state executive and legislative offices nominated at the primary.³ The convention meets in early October, three weeks after the September primary, and writes a platform for the party in addition to choosing the state committee. This state central committee of each party, consisting of at least two members from each congressional district, chooses its own chairman, who need not be an elected committee member.

This, then, is the statutory party organization that was designed to replace the party organization which had grown from the earlier network of party caucuses and conventions in pre-primary days. When the Progressives abolished the caucuses and conventions in order to give the power of nomination to the voters in 1903, there remained no means through which the parties could write a platform or choose officers. The statutory party organizations chosen at the primary and the new state convention of nominees were intended to fill the gap.

The effective Republican and Democratic party organizations today, however, do not operate through these statutory party committees. Both parties have set up "voluntary committee" organizations that carry on the real functions of a party: raising funds, campaigning, and seeking office. Though popularly known as the "Republican voluntary committee," the Republican organization, founded in 1925, bears the official title of The Republican Party of Wisconsin. The Democratic Party of Wisconsin, the Democratic voluntary vehicle, was established in 1948 as the Democratic Organizing Committee; it changed its name in 1953. Alongside of these organizations within each party, the statutory organizations exist only as shell organizations, performing their statutory duties at the beck and call of the respective voluntary organizations.

The term "voluntary committee" in its most precise usage is a generic term employed to describe the type of non-party groups that spring up temporarily as ad hoc organizations to support a single candidate or issue. As such, their temporary nature is betrayed by names such as "The Smithens for Senator Club," or "The Labor Committee for Justice in Taxation." But more commonly in Wisconsin politics the term is now used to describe the hierarchy of voluntary committees through which each party operates.

In either sense, however, the voluntary committees in Wisconsin derive their legal justification from the same source. Some years before the growth of the voluntary committees into full-fledged party organizations, the Wisconsin legislature attempted to forbid them to make political expenditures except in extremely limited circumstances. The state Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional as infringing the right of citizens to work outside of the established party apparatus for a political cause or candidate.⁴ Ever since then this early precedent has justified the right of the voluntary committees to exist and function, even though the voluntary committees have since developed into complete party organizations.

³ Included in the statutory convention also are the hold-over state senators whose terms have not yet expired.

In structure the two voluntary committee organizations—the Republican Party of Wisconsin (RPW) and the Democratic Party of Wisconsin (DPW)—are similar. The basic unit in both organizations is the county committee, composed in each case of those partisans who merely choose to affiliate themselves. The founders of the DPW (then the Democratic Organizing Committee) envisioned a mass-membership organization in which the members in each county would meet regularly to conduct party affairs and debate political issues, but in practice the DPW county units have not become thriving, year-around organizations. With a few notable exceptions, the average county unit meets only three to five times a year, although activity is much greater at campaign times than in the political “off-season.” Party officers carry on party business in the periods between meetings. The Republican county voluntary organizations generally meet only once in the year to elect officers and to select delegates to the state convention; party affairs are usually vested in a county executive committee.⁵

Both party voluntary groups specify that the delegates to the state voluntary convention from the counties within each congressional district are to meet biennially to elect a congressional district chairman. The Republicans, in addition, elect a district chairwoman. But active district-wide organization is virtually non-existent; the county is still the basic unit of party activity. Aside from their duties on the state voluntary committees, the district chairmen of both parties perform only incidental duties. Provisions in the RPW constitution for a congressional committee and in the DPW constitution for a district caucus of county chairmen have failed to stimulate viable party organization at the district level.

The district chairmen in both parties (and the chairwomen in the RPW) form the nucleus of the highest regular party organs, the RPW executive committee and the DPW administrative committee. In addition, the state officers, representatives of the youth and women’s organizations, plus other party leaders, sit on these state committees. In addition to its 22 voting members, the DPW has added to the administrative committee six non-voting members, including three of the party’s state legislators.⁶

The state-wide voluntary committee organizations of each party are in effect the party. Both at the county and at the state levels, the statutory party apparatus has been bypassed and lies in various states of inactivity that will be discussed later. Both national party committees recognize and deal with the respective voluntary organizations in the state. Finally, each of the organizations vests final party authority in its annual convention. Only the conventions may amend the voluntary committee constitutions. Delegates to both conventions are sent by the county units, the Republicans employing a formula weighting representation by party vote in a county and the Democrats using one considering both Democratic vote and party membership in a county. Both voluntary conventions, which meet in June or July, write platforms, pass resolutions, and hear the usual abundance of speeches.⁷

⁴ State v. Pierce, 163 Wis. 615 (1916). See also State ex rel. La Follette v. Kohler, 200 Wis. 518 (1929).

⁵ The Milwaukee county units within both voluntary organizations are composed of delegates from the active ward groups, most of which also hold periodic meetings.

⁶ The constitution of the RPW also provides for a “state Republican committee” composed of the party officers, the national committeeman and committeewoman, the district representatives, and at least five members from each county. To the best of the author’s knowledge, this elaborate committee has never met.

II. THE RISE AND PERSISTENCE OF THE VOLUNTARY COMMITTEES

The voluntary committees originated as attempts by intraparty dissenters to take over the party label and machinery. In both cases, the challengers for party control could not win their fight within the statutory organizations in use at the time. There was no place for them in the statutory committees, chosen as they were at the primary. One could no longer simply "join" the party organization; one had to be elected. The job of capturing the party organization—much easier when party committees were chosen at caucuses—had become vastly more difficult now that party committeemen were elected. Thus, with the statutory organization so resistant to change, the dissenters chose to commence an assault through special voluntary committees of like-minded rebels.

The Republican party throughout the 1920's had been controlled by the LaFollette Progressives; the Progressives did not, in fact, form their own Progressive party in Wisconsin until 1934. In 1925 a group of conservative Republican businessmen, who had campaigned for the Coolidge-Dawes ticket a year before, set up the Republican Party of Wisconsin. Particularly outraged by the official Wisconsin Republican support for LaFollette's presidential candidacy in 1924, these men declared war on the LaFollette wing of the party by endorsing their own candidates for the Republican primary. Their chief aim was to realign Wisconsin Republicanism with the national party—to pledge it to the same business-oriented philosophy that dominated the national party.

The RPW floundered and failed at first but succeeded in 1928 in winning the gubernatorial nomination for Walter Kohler, Sr. Again in 1932, with the revived Democratic party drawing Progressive votes out of the Republican primary, Kohler beat Phil LaFollette for the Republican nomination. In 1934, their power to nominate Progressives on the Republican ticket lost, the Progressives withdrew to form their own party, leaving the conservatives in control of the Republican party.

Likewise in 1948 the DPW (then the Democratic Organizing Committee) began as a revolt against the entrenched Democratic party leadership in the state. Throughout the 1930's and 1940's the Democratic party had been languishing in the hands of a group of conservatives, many of whom were openly hostile to the New Deal and the national party leadership. They had kept the party in a state of controlled dormancy from 1932 on while they siphoned off the national party patronage. The founders of the DPW, largely an intellectual-labor coalition, were young men aggressively loyal to the principles of the New and Fair Deals. Profiting by the example of Republican success with a voluntary organization, the "Young Turks" contested and won the 1948 Democratic primaries. They have gradually assumed control of the statutory party machinery as their hold on the primary has continued, but some few county statutory organizations are still in the hands of the "old-line" Democrats.

⁷ In the odd-numbered years the DPW convention meets in autumn.

In each party, then, the rebels within the party, realizing they could never win control of the statutory party machinery until they won control of the primary nominations, created the voluntary committee as an action group to win the nominations. Whereas in pre-primary days control of the party could change hands at a convention, control of the statutory organization could only grow out of success at the primary in electing committeemen and nominees to sit in the statutory convention. But once these two voluntary committees had won control of their respective parties, they made no move to return to the statutory party organs. Their reasons provide an eloquent commentary on the statutory regulation of political parties.

In the first place, the Republicans seized on the voluntary organization as a means for making pre-primary endorsements of Republican candidates. The statutory organization, since it grew out of the primary election and was not formed until some weeks after the primary, was unavailable for party activity during the primary campaign. Republicans had long felt that, with the Wisconsin primary an open primary and an important one,⁸ the party had to regain a role in the nominating process. After a vacillating history of endorsing and not endorsing from 1925 through 1948, the RPW amended its constitution in 1949 to make endorsements mandatory for the five state offices and the seats in the United States Senate. The voluntary organization's state convention makes the endorsements and promises its endorsees the pre-primary support of the party and its considerable resources. On the other hand, the founders of the DPW wrote into their constitution a prohibition of endorsement for any office, and a segment of DPW members has been shrill in its criticism of Republican endorsement as violating the letter and the spirit of the primary law.⁹

The value of the endorsement process to the RPW is difficult to assess. In the period 1925 to 1934 the RPW shared the Republican party with the Progressives, and in that period the RPW endorsees won the Republican nomination only six out of 23 times. With the Republican party label to themselves from 1934 to 1952, however, the Republican endorsement average jumped to 88 per cent (30 out of 34). Endorsement has also been potent in reducing the number of candidacies for each office. In the non-endorsement years from 1934 to 1952 (1938, 1940, 1944, and 1948) the number of Republican candidates per statewide office averaged 3.3. But in the endorsement years of the same period, the number of candidates per office was reduced to 1.7. In those instances when no incumbent was running in the Republican primary in the same period, the average number of candidates per office in non-endorsement years was 4.3, while in endorsement years it was 1.4. Endorsement, then, more than accomplishes its purpose if it discourages competing candidates and completely averts a primary fight. Endorsement has, however, failed to unseat incumbents. The party has been reluctant to try to purge incumbents, and its few attempts have been spectacular failures.

⁸ The Republican primary is especially important since most of the Wisconsin political battles are settled there. Only in 1932 did the Democrats elect a governor in this century, and the state legislature is three-quarters Republican.

⁹ While the DPW formally eschews endorsement, an informal consensus among party leaders ("general agreement") often achieves a similar result, but the party, as a party, does not enter the campaign.

At the congressional district level, endorsements have been only infrequently used, and then only to defeat former Progressives trying to reenter the Republican party after the dissolution of the Progressive party in 1946. At the district level, and more especially in the counties, there is strong feeling among Republicans against endorsement. Many partisans fear that endorsements cause personal offense at the local level and violate the spirit of the primary. Furthermore, these local units hold no general caucuses in summer at which endorsements might be made. As a result, endorsement of candidates for local or legislative offices is almost unknown at the county level.

The second broad reason for the continuation of the voluntary organization in both parties can be found in the statutory organization itself. Its many rigidities and restrictions make it an awkward, if not useless, instrument for political action in mid-twentieth century. The county statutory units and the state central committee are entrenched for a two-year period, with no possibility of removal by the party. A modern political campaign is also severely handicapped when the party chairman and the state central committee are not selected until one month before the general election. While year-around political organization may not have been vital to the parties at the turn of the century, it has become so since then. Furthermore, loyal party workers are given little role in choosing the party committees; the primary voters elect the county committees and the party's nominees select the state central committee.¹⁰ Then again, the statutory organization recognizes only one man in each precinct and thereby closes the door on a broadly-based membership organization.

Thirdly, and finally, the persistence of the voluntary organizations can be attributed to their effectiveness in circumventing the Wisconsin statutory limitations on campaign expenditures. The state's corrupt practices legislation, written in 1911, severely limits the expenditures made by political candidates.¹¹ The statutory committees are granted no independent spending power, with the exception of the $10,000 the state central committee is permitted to spend. Statutory committees may spend only on authorization of a candidate, and these authorized expenditures are then charged against the expenditure quota allowed the candidate. The voluntary committees, however, are required only to register with the secretary of state and file periodic statements of receipts and expenditures,¹² since the original attempt to regulate their expenditures was ruled unconstitutional.¹³ There is no limit to the total they may spend.

¹⁰ This problem is heightened, as are so many problems of the Wisconsin parties, by the fact that Wisconsin has an open primary. Party leadership is therefore elected at a primary where there is no test of party membership.

¹¹ The limits range all the way from the $10,000 permitted the candidate for the United States Senate and state executive office to the $400 allowed the candidate for the state assembly. In addition, since 1951 each candidate is allowed to purchase one-fourth page of advertising in newspapers having a circulation within the district he seeks to represent and to mail one communication to each voter in the constituency. Wisconsin, Statutes, 1953, Ch. 12.20.

This legislation assumes that the voluntary committees are operating apart from and without the knowledge of the candidates and their personal committees. Since the voluntary committees are completely independent of the candidates, so theory has it, their expenditures cannot be included with the candidates' expense totals. The Wisconsin Supreme Court formalized this assumption in 1929 by ruling that a voluntary committee expenditure could be charged against a candidate's total only if the committee "acts for him in the sense that an agent acts for and on behalf of his principal. The authority may be expressed or implied but it must exist. Otherwise the disbursement is not made on behalf of the person sought to be charged."¹⁴ This construction, dating from the period when voluntary committees were still only small, ad hoc political groups, has been applied in its entirety to the voluntary committees of today, even though they have become state-wide political parties.

The legal assumption that the candidate is not aware of the activities of a voluntary committee, and cannot be held accountable for them, has frequently been challenged. And indeed, the point of agency is especially strained in those cases where the chairmen of county voluntary organizations are also themselves candidates or office-holders. The assumption then must be that Assemblyman X is unaware of what his county voluntary committee is doing on his behalf in the campaign, when he is in fact the chairman of the county organization.

The voluntary committees have, therefore, succeeded as vehicles enabling the parties to skirt the perils of the open primary, the statutory party organization, and the political expenditures legislation. So successful, indeed, have they been that the Republicans, in control of the state legislature since 1939, have abandoned all attempts to alter the irksome legislation and turn back to the statutory system. As a matter of fact, there is no reason to suspect that the laws could be easily amended, even if the party were so inclined. The traditional LaFollette opposition to strong parties and strong party leadership ("bossism") has not lost its power in Wisconsin. The Republicans fear that any attempt to soften legal control of the parties would rouse the guardians of the LaFollette tradition and give the Democrats a powerful campaign issue. They have not yet forgotten their one recent experience in tampering with the primary law—the unsuccessful and embarrassing attempt in 1946 to keep former Progressives from running as Republicans.¹⁵

¹² The corrupt practices legislation is found in Wisconsin, Statutes, 1953, Ch. 12.

¹³ State v. Pierce, 163 Wis. 615 (1916).

¹⁴ State ex. rel. LaFollette v. Kohler, 200 Wis. 518 (1929), pp. 563–64.

¹⁵ The bill, tabbed the "fence bill" by its opponents, was vetoed with a stinging message by Governor Walter Goodland. The governor, already a popular political figure, was widely praised in the press for the veto. The Republican majority in the legislature could not muster enough votes to override the veto.

A more important consideration, however, is that the Republicans do not want change. Republican leaders are delighted with the voluntary organization and regard it as a "brilliant idea." Through it the parties have found a modus vivendi, and party leaders hesitate to disturb the balance so achieved. For even if—by some stroke of a legislative wand—the statutory organization could be made as commodious as possible, some element of legal control would remain. The beauty of the voluntary committee arrangement is that, with the exception of the need to make financial reports, it is completely extra-legal.

III. THE DECLINE OF THE STATUTORY ORGANIZATION

Accompanying the rise of the voluntary organizations as the effective party organs has been a corresponding decline in the operations of the statutory organizations. Because the Wisconsin statutes allot certain specific duties to the statutory party units, however, the voluntary committees have been forced to activate and control the statutory committees.

To the county statutory committees falls the legal duty of recommending to the local mayor, village president, or town chairman candidates for the paid poll worker jobs. Aside from this voice in filling these local patronage jobs, the county committees participate in the selection of party poll challengers and county canvassers.¹⁶ The statutes also give the state central committee two special duties: the choosing of presidential electors and the selecting of alternates for the delegates to the national party convention.¹⁷ Finally, all statutory committees possess the power to fill any vacancies on the party ticket that occur between the primary and the general election in their respective jurisdictions.¹⁸

The voluntary committee organizations of both parties within recent years have taken the initiative in reviving dormant or defunct county statutory committees. Their procedure simply requires loyal voluntary committee workers to file nomination papers as candidates for the precinct posts. Quite frequently their election is not contested, and even if the voluntary committee member fails to file papers, a write-in campaign to deliver a handful of votes is usually sufficient to elect. After the primary the precinct committeemen elected meet to choose a chairman, who often is an officer in the voluntary organization. The committee may then appoint precinct committeemen to fill the vacancies in those precincts where no committeeman was elected.¹⁹ In this way the county voluntary committee assures its control of the statutory committee's appointments to fill poll jobs and postprimary vacancies on the ticket.

The plan, however, has worked less smoothly in operation than in theory. Many county organizations in both parties have failed to resuscitate the statutory committees; in the press of regular party campaign activities the project was shunted into the background. Furthermore, an attempt to "annex" the ¹⁶ Wisconsin, Statutes, 1953, Ch. 6.32, 6.31, and 6.61.

¹⁷ Ibid., Ch. 5.36 (1) and 5.37 (5).

¹⁸ Ibid., Ch. 5.18.

¹⁹ Traditional as it is, such action has no legal authorization. The attorney general in 1934 expressed an opinion that the committee could fill only those positions where originally a committeeman had been elected. Opinions, Vol. 23 (1934), pp. 709-11.

statutory committee may meet the opposition of the incumbent precinct committeemen, to whom the position is important for its little prestige and power in dispensing poll patronage. The problem is particularly acute within the Democratic party. The DPW, only six years old, still faces in some counties the opposition of the old-time Democrats who have clung to the statutory committees as a final stronghold. In at least one county the local Democratic statutory committee has won the contest for power from the county DPW unit, has dominated the DPW, and has functioned as the Democratic party in the county.

The effectiveness of these attempts to activate the county statutory committees has been less than overwhelming. In 1948 only 55 per cent of the Republican and 27 per cent of the Democratic precinct positions were filled at the primary. The totals for 1952 are similar—62 per cent for the Republicans and 25 per cent for the Democrats.²⁰ In some of the counties where voluntary committee members represent a majority on the statutory committee, they have made no attempt to fill vacancies. Generally, the statutory committees are in voluntary committee hands within both parties, but there are a few counties where the voluntary and statutory committees within a party are at war. Small jealousies or ambitions may thereby split the party within a county.

In an attempt to coordinate this dual organization, the RPW constitution provides that the county statutory chairman be given an ex officio vice-chairmanship in each Republican county voluntary organization. But coordination through overlapping officeholding goes further in practice, within both Republican and Democratic ranks. In some of the counties where the Republican statutory committee is completely organized, the voluntary committee has used it as a block and precinct arm of the voluntary committee for canvassing, distributing literature, circulating nomination papers, and turning out the vote.

One index of the fate of the county statutory committees is the growing frequency with which the county voluntary committees are assuming their statutory duties. In several instances chairmen of RPW and DPW county units report that they, rather than the statutory chairmen, have made recommendations for the selection of poll workers. In one county several years ago the RPW unit named a replacement to fill a post-primary vacancy on the party ticket. County voluntary chairmen have also filled vacancies on the statutory committees. In other instances, statutory committees are merely polled by phone to ratify voluntary committee decisions on poll workers or vacancies.

As for the maze of assembly, state senatorial, and congressional district committees outlined in the primary law, none exist at present, and it is improbable that they ever did exist. Wisconsin party leaders, at least, claim no knowledge or memory of them. In the case of a post-primary death of a candidate, the county statutory committees in the district would have to be alerted to send delegates to form the appropriate committee within a few days. The RPW, faced a few years ago with the death of a legislative candidate after the primary, had to do exactly that.

The state central committees of both parties are organized but inactive. Neither party's voluntary organization makes any concerted effort to influence the statutory convention's selection of a state central committee—doubtless a reflection of their confidence in the friendliness of the nominees that make up the conventions. The two central committees thus chosen meet only to carry out their duties, aided by the audible promptings of the voluntary committees. Some members of the two central committees regard their duties seriously, but most of them accept the position lightly and consider that their chief duty is to keep the committee inactive.

²⁰ John Wyngaard, Green Bay Press-Gazette, Jan. 29, 1949, is the source for the 1948 figures; the 1952 totals are official party estimates.

So completely have the voluntary committees pushed the state central committees out of any active role in party affairs that neither committee received or spent a cent in the 1952 elections. In fact, from 1948 through 1952 the Democratic state central committee made expenditures only in 1950, and then the $2,900 disbursed went for voluntary committee activities. The Republican state central committee has reported no receipts or expenditures since 1946.²¹

Just as both voluntary organizations occasionally face a tiff with an obstreperous county statutory committee, they are also periodically troubled by unexpected independence on the part of the state central committee. In mid-1952 the Republican state central committee rejected by only one vote a proposal to use its discretion in appointing alternates for the delegates to the national convention, instead of ratifying the choices of the RPW and the delegates themselves. The threat became a deed within the Democratic party, however. The party's state central committee refused in 1952 to choose all alternates from the DPW lists, choosing instead one old-line Democrat known to be vocally hostile to the DPW.

These periodic minor revolts indicate the danger the parties face in maintaining the present dual organization. Perfect coordination and harmony are impossible, leaving the statutory organs as inviting positions to which the discontented or ambitious can retreat to harass and embarrass the voluntary committees.

IV. THE SEARCH FOR PARTY RESPONSIBILITY

At the time of their founding both voluntary committees represented efforts to reorient the parties ideologically, and as they remained in existence they became devices for insuring party responsibility to these ideologies. The "responsibility" they sought was responsibility defined in terms of stating ideological principles clearly and unequivocally, working for the election of men loyal to the stated principles, and assuring that their elected members would carry the principles into public policy. As small, homogeneous groups, both of the voluntary committees enjoyed at their founding a high level of agreement on aims and policies, and by maintaining these homogeneous voluntary committees they hoped to achieve a greater party responsibility. As political organizations the voluntary committees offered greater potentialities than the statutory organizations for developing the discipline, control, and consensus essential to party responsibility.

²¹ These figures on receipts and expenditures are taken from the reports filed with the secretary of state.

The Republicans of the RPW, the majority party in Wisconsin since 1938, are, however, less able today to speak their principles in a single, clear voice than they were in 1925. Since the cohesion of the RPW rests on agreement on social and economic individualism, it has been unable to gain agreement on such additional issues as prohibition, foreign policy, and legislative reapportionment. Opportunities for political success also induced the party to temper party stands for wider vote appeal. Republican leaders and candidates differed, too; the party nominees often framed a statutory platform at odds with the voluntary committee platform.

At the next step, that of selecting candidates, the Republicans have used the pre-primary endorsement. Many party leaders view endorsement as the party's great weapon in the fight for responsibility. They see it as a process wherein the party faithful can come together to select future officials loyal to the party creed and to weigh the stewardship of incumbents before according them another endorsement. And once it has placed loyal party followers in office, the party can be confident that the office-holders will be guided by party policy. The value of such a theory, they emphasize, is that in placing loyal men in office, it frees the party of the necessity to supervise their performance while in office.

But in reality endorsement is inoperative at the county level where state legislators are chosen. Some informal endorsement is the rule at the local level, however, and it has some effect without formally committing the party and its resources. At the state-wide level, endorsement has succeeded in averting primary races by discouraging other candidates. It has been a poor weapon with which to purge incumbents, because of the reluctance of party conventions to deny them endorsement, and because of the vote-getting power of a known political name. But even though it may fail to unseat a maverick office-holder, endorsement may achieve some sanction merely as a threat. No candidate, incumbent or not, is eager to fight the fully-marshalled resources of organized Wisconsin Republicanism.

Once the Republican candidates are elected and in office, the party still finds it difficult to insure that the officers will carry party principles into public policy. The relationship between the Wisconsin governors and the RPW has in the past often been cool, if not openly hostile. The governors, men of independent means, have not had to rely on the party for campaign aid and have traditionally tried to make a wider appeal than the party. Their independent appointments and legislative programs have frequently angered party officials. Nor has the party any sanctions at its disposal in its dealings with the state legislators. The party has virtually no state patronage to dispense, and party campaign help is not so great that the legislators cannot get along without it. And since the county organizations are in effect campaign committees and do not operate effectively throughout the year, the party cannot expect them to maintain any contact with their legislators.

In the five years it has controlled the Democratic party, the DPW has failed to achieve state-wide victory.²² The voluntary organization has remained the same homogeneous group that founded it, and is able, therefore, to enunciate a relatively clear and unequivocal program. It has likewise often been able to reach an informal agreement on candidates, despite its rejection of formal pre-primary endorsements. Such informal endorsements involve the support of individuals and leaders within the party, rather than the endorsement of the party itself. The DPW has, in short, remained an ideologically oriented party, more reluctant than the RPW to begin the pragmatic compromising for victory, so long a part of the American political tradition.

²² In 1948, however, a Democrat was elected attorney general.

Thus far, Wisconsin experience with party responsibility is thoroughly within the pattern described throughout the literature on political parties. The parties seem unable to state a consistent party creed and enact a consistent program of legislation, and the classic reasons for party weakness—the need for compromise and decentralization—offer the explanation. And in Wisconsin the problem of party discipline is compounded by the lingering LaFollette tradition of suspicion of strong parties and strong party leadership. Pre-primary endorsements and party discipline in the legislature evoke for many the hated symbol of smoke-filled rooms and “bossism” triumphant.

Rising above all of the decentralizing forces in both voluntary committees is a great unifier—the common ideology. Party leaders in both parties share a common ideological allegiance that makes of them a homogeneous leadership group within each party. And it is this unity that the voluntary committees provide so much better than the statutory organization could. Motivated by a loyalty to principles, the party leaders are commonly serving without anticipation of personal gain from patronage or election to office. The common ideology, therefore, provides a common goal, binds the various levels of the party together, and makes for a certain degree of centralization. To the extent that this unified party outlook fosters like-thinking party candidates, the ideology works toward a party responsibility. And the loyalty that springs from this affinity of principle needs no constant prompting or cultivation for its effectiveness.

Wisconsin experience, therefore, indicates that strong ideological orientation has its place within the pragmatic American parties. By serving as an internal, intra-party cohesive force, binding and integrating the various levels and representatives of the party, it offsets the factors at work dividing the parties. It succeeds in giving them an internal discipline and unity they might not otherwise have, and which the parties would find difficult to cultivate in the statutory organization. Two further observations must, however, be made. Since the ideologies to which party workers are loyal are defined largely in terms of national politics, the ideological bond has a paramount disadvantage in distracting the attention of the Wisconsin parties from state issues and government. One cannot escape the conclusion that many leaders of both parties look on the Wisconsin parties primarily as instruments for winning national elections. Secondly, such an internal ideological bond may be easier to achieve in the small area of a single state than in the entire country.

To be sure, the aims of such a homogeneous, ideological party leadership conflict (especially within the RPW) with the pragmatic needs of the party to build majority support through compromise. But many of these men have learned that compromise is vital to victory, and that as far as victory is concerned, half a loaf is better than none. Many Republicans oppose a sales tax, for instance, not for its economic effect, which they might welcome ideologically, but for its political effect, which might cost the party political power. So, within the framework of their ideology, these men have learned to be political realists. They are uneasy pragmatists, and their dogmatism occasionally flashes to the surface, but their political success attests to their political skill.

V. CONCLUSION

The statutory party apparatus created and controlled by Wisconsin laws is at best an awkward, inflexible vehicle for party operation. It resists change in party leadership and orientation; it is an ineffective organization for political campaigning and expenditures; and it is ill-suited to the development of a unified and responsible party nucleus. In their struggle to operate successfully, the Wisconsin parties have thrown this statutory organization aside and perfected a voluntary organization that better fills their needs. Through the voluntary committees they have fostered an internal homogeneity and consensus which has contributed to a greater degree of party responsibility and has avoided the regulations and rigidities of the statutory machinery.

In their attempts to regulate the organization and activities of political parties, the states have grossly underestimated the parties' capacity for adjustment to new conditions. Their legislation has been based on the false view of parties as formal, pyramided organizations, with clear lines of authority and responsibility. But with an almost chameleon-like ability, parties adapt themselves to new external regulation or internal pressure. The real, working organization—rarely coincidental with the formal one—builds up in response to and approximates the power structure of the moment. Unofficial "bosses" and leaders, private organizations, and truncated lines of authority all bespeak this adaptability of American parties. It is through this flexibility that the parties elude so much of the regulation imposed upon them.

It is interesting to note that in their response to these problems the Wisconsin parties have effected an organization very similar to that which existed in the state before the primary law. It was an organization that grew out of caucuses and conventions, in which the party could choose its own personnel and nominees, and in which the party was subject to the minimum of control. The parties often indulged in undesirable practices then, but they did operate freely, effectively, and with considerable strength. Under the primary law and the statutory party structure growing out of it, the parties have developed the voluntary committees to recapture this type of party organization. The parties in Wisconsin cannot operate satisfactorily within the statutory apparatus, the primary law, and the expenditures limitations as they exist today. Necessity dictates that much. And yet they cannot make the statutes more hospitable or abolish the statutory organization. Political mythology rules out these alternatives. In response to this dilemma, the Wisconsin parties have maintained a dual structure to satisfy the conflicting aims of party strength and party control. The statutory organization honors tradition, and the voluntary organization serves necessity.

THE POLITICS OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING: THE POSTWAR RECORD IN STEEL

FREDERICK H. HARBISON

University of Chicago

AND

ROBERT C. SPENCER

St. Michaels College

The postwar record of collective bargaining in the steel industry is both important and unique. It is important because steel is a traditional "pattern-setter" for large segments of American industry. The key bargains which are negotiated in this industry establish the benchmarks for the negotiations among thousands of employers and their unions, and the relationships between "Big Steel" and the United Steelworkers of America have a profound influence on the whole industrial relations climate of America. Everyone is concerned with the outcome of steel's bargains—unions, employees, companies, the public, and particularly the government.

The record is unique by virtue of the extent of government involvement in collective bargaining matters in this industry. Since the end of the war, there have been three nation-wide steel strikes. The first, in 1946, lasted about three weeks; the second, in 1949, went on for over a month; and the third, in 1952, kept the industry at a standstill for fifty-five days. In all three cases the government was a principal party in the dispute. In other industries bargaining is normally a bipartite process of accommodation between unions and employers; in steel, in critical periods there has been a tripartite process of negotiation among the Steelworkers' Union, the big steel corporations, and the government.

What then are the forces which have shaped this peculiar kind of collective relations in the steel industry? Is the tripartite kind of negotiation inevitable in steel or can it be looked upon simply as a temporary stage in the development of the relationships in that industry? These are the questions which we shall attempt to answer in this article.

The main collective bargaining issues in steel were in general the same as those in other mass production industries: wages, pensions and insurances, production standards, job evaluation and incentives, and related matters. Moreover, the disposition of most of these issues has been roughly the same in steel as in other industries. In this respect there is nothing unusual about steel's postwar bargaining history. In our judgment, the explanation for the strikes in 1946, 1949, and 1952 lies in the role of the government rather than in any "abnormal" characteristics of the leaders of the companies and the Union or in any particularly thorny collective bargaining issues. Our central thesis rests on the following generalizations:

First, in all three cases the government took the position that an industry-wide strike would immediately endanger the national health, safety, or interest. In each case the White House intervened to prevent a shutdown, and in each case it delayed a strike, but failed to prevent it.

Second, in all three controversies, the Union for practical purposes became dependent upon some sort of support from the White House to achieve its bargaining objectives. During this period, the Union was aligned politically with the Democratic Administration. The steel corporations throughout this period were aligned with those forces that vigorously opposed the economic and labor policies of the White House.

Third, as a consequence, the critical questions in all three controversies were more related to matters of public policy on key issues than to immediate issues of wages and conditions of employment of steel workers.

We shall proceed to support these generalizations by a brief examination of the record of bargaining in steel from 1945 through 1952.

I. THE STEEL CRISIS OF 1945-46

The first round of bargaining in late 1945 and early 1946 was carried on within the context of postwar wage and price controls. At this time the Administration was attempting to follow a policy of "flexible" wage controls while holding the line on prices. Specifically, the policy was to permit wage increases if they could be granted without necessitating increases in ceiling product prices.¹ In October, 1945 the Union asked the companies for a 25 cent per hour general wage increase. This the companies rejected on the grounds that the government's ceiling prices on steel products did not enable the industry to grant such an increase. The Union then proceeded with plans to call a strike. The companies maintained that collective bargaining was futile unless "substantial price increases," approximately $7 per ton for carbon steel, were allowed. The President delayed the strike by appointing a public fact-finding board on December 31 which reported shortly that the issues had been narrowed to a 15 cent offer by the company and a 19½ cent floor by the unions. In an effort to break the deadlock, the President recommended an 18½ cent wage increase. The companies rejected the recommendation, and the industry-wide strike commenced on January 21. On February 15, the companies agreed to the 18½ cent wage increase following an executive order by the President granting the industry a $5 per ton increase in carbon steel prices.

¹ The new policy on wage and price controls was set forth in the President's statement of August 16, 1945 and in Executive Order No. 9599, dated August 16, 1945. The President's statement read in part as follows: "The stabilization act is effective until June 30, 1946. During its continuance wage adjustments which might affect prices must continue to be subject to stabilization controls. With the ending of war production, however, there is no longer any threat of an inflationary bidding up of wage rates by competition in a short labor market. I am therefore authorizing the War Labor Board to release proposed voluntary wage increases from the necessity of approval upon condition that they will not be used in whole or in part as the basis for seeking an increase in price ceilings. Proposed wage increases requiring price relief must continue to be passed upon by the Board." Executive Order No. 9599 specified the guiding principles to be followed by the stabilization agencies in administering this policy. See Report of the National Wage Stabilization Board (Washington, D.C., 1947), p. 25.

The really critical question here was the government's wage absorption policy in price control. Throughout the war, the Administration had been fairly successful in maintaining this position as far as steel was concerned. In 1941, after the Union had negotiated a 10 cent per hour raise, the government promptly froze steel prices to prevent the companies from passing on the raise in price increases.² Although the industry did not protest at first, it soon established a committee to press for price increases in some areas, and the pressure for price relief steadily increased throughout the war, reaching a climax in 1945.

In the so-called "little steel case" of 1942, the government allowed a 5½ cent general wage increase without granting any price increases. Again in 1944 fringe benefits were allowed without any change in prices, despite mounting pressure from the industry. In January and again in May of 1945 some increases in steel prices were permitted which were looked upon by the industry as "too little and too late." The Chairman of the Board of U. S. Steel stated that "the price increases authorized by the OPA in May represented an overall increase in the average price of carbon steel products of $1.50 per ton . . . while costs have increased at least $3.00 per ton since the price was frozen some months before the war."³

Thus, after V-J Day, the industry was determined to have the lid taken off steel prices. The Union was equally determined to get a wage raise to offset the expected drop in steelworkers' earnings which would result from cut-backs in working hours and overtime. The Administration stood for wage increases with no retreat from established price ceilings. In the face of the Union's demands, the OPA announced in November, 1945 that there was no cause for a general increase in steel prices at that time.⁴

Obviously, it was impossible for the Union and the companies to bargain among themselves in this kind of situation. In order to achieve its wage objectives, the Union needed both an authorization and a recommendation from the government. In effect, it bargained successfully with the White House for an acceptable recommendation, but when this was rejected by the industry, it

² "In these circumstances, Leon Henderson, then director of the Office of Price Stabilization, came to the firm conclusion that the 1941 wage increases, as a matter of public policy, should not be passed along into higher steel prices. Furthermore, he concluded that the best way to avert the danger and to insure some stability of steel prices in the immediate future was to issue an order which would provide a clean-cut freeze on steel prices on the then existing level." Addison T. Cutler, "Price Control in Steel," in Studies in Industrial Price Control, Historical Reports on War Administration, General Publication No. 6 (Washington, D.C., 1947).

³ New York Times, August 1, 1945.

⁴ "The [OPA] Administrator remained firm in his conviction that this was not the time to raise steel prices. It had, however, become necessary to take a public position on the matter. Accordingly, a short, but significant press release was issued on November 23, quoting Price Administrator Bowles to the effect that OPA finds 'no cause at this time for a general increase in steel prices' but promising that the situation would be reviewed promptly and carefully when the next financial returns of the steel companies were submitted after January 1, 1946." Cutler, op. cit., p. 65.

had no other recourse than to proceed with the strike. The White House was then faced with a difficult choice: it could ask the Union to take less than its own recommendation, attempt to force the industry to accept the 18½ cent package, or repudiate its wage absorption policy in price stabilization. As the pressure mounted, this last procedure proved to be the only expedient means of resolving the crisis.

In retrospect, the forces leading to the 1946 crisis seem quite clear. The Union, after nearly five years of wage regulation during the war, was pressing for substantial wage increases with the moral support of the White House.⁵ The companies were seeking price relief through either the elimination or relaxation of controls but faced opposition from the Administration. The issue was forced by an industry-wide steel strike which was presumed to impair seriously the national health, safety, and welfare. In order to settle the strike, which it had diligently but unsuccessfully sought to prevent, the Administration found it necessary to repudiate its postwar stabilization policy. This marked the beginning of the end of wage and price controls.⁶

The steel dispute of 1946 served the political function of shifting the Administration's wage-price policy. What in this case was not accomplished through the normal administrative or political decision-making processes, was brought about by pressure generated both by the Union and the industry and directed at the White House itself. What neither Congress nor the Administration was able to decide without these pressures, the picket line and the threat of a steel shortage did—and the nation's postwar stabilization policies were thereby punctured.

II. THE STEEL STRIKE OF 1949

In 1947 the Union negotiated a new agreement with the steel corporations which included a 15 cent "wage package," continuance of the maintenance-of-membership clause, and other rather important contract terms. By this time all wage and price controls had been officially terminated. Prices and the cost of living were rising. According to their well-established custom, the steel companies raised product prices immediately following the wage settlement. This action brought forth criticism and investigations from Administration spokesmen and even from some Republicans, but, of course, the Administration could do nothing about it since there were no legal grounds for intervention.

⁵ Actually, there was more than moral support of the White House, since the Administration's wage policy clearly favored wage gains. In a statement on October 30, 1945, the President said: "While the position of different industries varies greatly, there is room in the existing price structure for business as a whole to grant increase in wage rates. . . . Wage increases are . . . imperative—to cushion the shock to our workers, to sustain adequate purchasing power and to raise the national income." Report of the National Wage Stabilization Board, 1947, p. 27.

⁶ The breakdown in the Administration's postwar wage-price policy came in three stages. The first was the February 14 intervention in the steel case, which was followed by parallel wage and price adjustments throughout manufacturing industries. The second was the temporary suspension of controls in July, following the failure of Congress to renew controls at the expiration of the old Price Control Act on June 30. When the new controls act became effective July 26, 1946 it was weaker than its predecessor, but meanwhile the period of rapid open inflation had started. The third stage was the President's announcement of the suspension of price ceilings on nearly all commodities November 9, 1946. At the same time, wage and salary controls were formally terminated. This third step was somewhat like locking the barn after the horse got out, since meat controls had been suspended a month earlier, resulting in widespread price increases, and the congressional elections of the week preceding November 9 had elected a Republican majority in the 80th Congress—bent on redressing the balance of labor's influence over the nation's economy.

In 1948 the steel contracts were re-openable on wages, but under the terms of the agreement the Union could not strike in the event of failure of the parties to agree. Being sensitive to the political criticism resulting from price increases, U. S. Steel proposed a policy of no wage increase to the Union, and made some minor price reductions as a gesture to stop the inflation resulting from the wage-price spiral. Although the Union was furious at this gesture, it had no choice but to accede to it. Later in the year when other major mass production industries negotiated wage increases with their unions, the steel companies voluntarily negotiated a 13 cent increase. Four days later, U. S. Steel raised its prices an average of 9.6 per cent, and again the Administration along with Democratic members of Congress voiced vehement criticism.⁷ In both 1947 and 1948, therefore, the Administration, though highly critical of the policies of the steel companies, was able to stay out of the negotiations. In these two years there was free and direct bargaining between the Union and the steel companies.

In the fourth round of 1949, however, the White House was again a major participant in the bargaining. The negotiations between the Union and the companies started during what proved to be a temporary slump in the demand for steel. The Union requested wage increases, company-financed pensions, and other social insurances. The companies rejected both the wage and pension demands and made a token offer on social insurances. The Union then planned to strike the major companies. In order to avert a major steel shutdown, the White House intervened. It got agreement from the Union to postpone the strike pending investigation by a Presidential Fact-Finding Board which would have power to recommend a fair and equitable solution of the dispute. Pressure was then put upon the corporations to agree to this procedure. The Presidential Fact-Finding Board held extensive public hearings in which each side hired experts not only to present its particular side of the controversy, but also to make its case appear to be in accord with the public interest. The Board, which was primarily concerned with averting a strike, recommended that the companies agree to company-financed pensions and insurance programs. These recommendations were satisfactory to the Union, but the companies refused to accept them. A nationwide steel strike of 30-40 days followed. The deadlock was finally broken by the Bethlehem Steel Company, which agreed to a settlement similar to, though not identical with, the proposals of the Presidential Fact-Finding Board. The other steel companies fell into line one by one over a period of two weeks.

⁷ See letters of Senator O'Mahoney in New York Times, July 30, 1948, p. 16, and August 14, 1948, p. 12; statement of Senator McGrath, New York Times, July 29, 1948, p. 13; Representative Spruce, New York Times, August 3, p. 1; and President Truman's remarks on steel prices, New York Times, January 28, 1949, p. 25.

Again in the strike of 1949 the really critical issues were political, just as they had been in 1946, but the nature of these political issues was quite different. In 1947 the Taft-Hartley Law had been passed by Congress, over the veto of the President. Among other things, Taft-Hartley established a procedure for government intervention in peacetime emergency disputes. It empowered the President to determine the existence of an emergency, to appoint a fact-finding board without power to make recommendations, and to get an injunction against a strike for 80 days. Industry, including Steel, had been aligned with anti-administration congressmen and senators in support of legislation of this kind.⁸ Organized labor, including the officers of the United Steelworkers, were naturally aligned with the White House, the Administration, and Democratic forces in Congress in vehement opposition to it. In 1948, organized labor in general, and the officers of the Steelworkers Union in particular, strongly supported Truman and the Democrats in the national presidential election. Obviously, the White House would be reluctant to use the Taft-Hartley Law in a dispute against labor, particularly if vital interests of the Steelworkers were involved.

Yet the White House viewed with alarm the prospect of a nation-wide steel strike in the early summer of 1949. Quite logically, therefore, it cast about for a procedure of intervening to prevent a steel crisis which would make it unnecessary to use this law that unions had labelled a slave labor law. Its attempt to revise the Taft-Hartley Act had failed.⁹ The development of an "administrative alternative" to use of the Taft-Hartley emergency disputes procedure thus became a central objective of the Administration's labor policy.

The "administrative alternative" in 1949 was the ad hoc Presidential Steel Board with powers to investigate the dispute and to make recommendations. This procedure was obviously acceptable to the Steelworkers Union. In the spring of 1949 the Steelworkers were not anxious to strike in view of the apparent recession in production and employment in the industry. In negotiations, the companies had offered the Union virtually nothing. An ad hoc board charged with finding a formula to prevent a strike could be expected to come up with a recommendation somewhere between the rather substantial demands of the Union and the very meager offer of the companies. At best the companies would accept the board's recommendations, and thus the Union would win substantial concessions without a strike. At worst, the companies would reject the recommendations, but then the bargaining power of the Union and its position before the bar of public opinion would be greatly enhanced.

⁸ "Charges were even made that the Taft-Hartley Law had been written before the termination of committee hearings in the House, where it was introduced in April, 1947. It was also charged that the House version of the bill was 'written with the help of' prominent employer and industry spokesmen. Such allegations were made from the first days of the debate and continued even after the final conference measure was passed over the President's veto. . . . It was said also that, no matter what one could say about who wrote it, comparison of the bill with the 1946 legislative proposals of the NAM showed amazing similarities." Harry A. Millis and Emily Clark Brown, From the Wagner Act to Taft-Hartley: A Study of National Labor Policy and Labor Relations (Chicago, 1950), p. 370.

⁹ Ironically, on June 28, seventeen days before the date of the threatened strike, the Administration's bill to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act was defeated in the Senate, on an amendment dealing with the President's powers to cope with emergency disputes. The Administration's bill (S.249, 81st Cong., 2nd sess.) provided a procedure much like that of the Railway Labor Act, with a fact-finding board with power to make recommendations, and no injunction on the union. An assault of amendments to this bill finally left it with only its first paragraphs, the Taft-Hartley Act having been amended into it completely. It was never brought to vote because of the certainty of a presidential veto. Congressional Record, Vol. 95, June 28, 1949.

The reasons why the steel companies went along with this procedure are much harder to divine. Our contact with some steel executives at the time indicated that they were surely aware of the pitfalls for them in this procedure. Two factors, however, may offer a partial explanation. First, they had been under criticism for some time for their price raises following wage increases, and they were fully aware that the White House would attempt to mobilize public opinion against them if they refused to submit their case to review by a public board. Second, what appeared to be a united front against the procedure by the larger steel corporations was apparently frustrated by some of the smaller and financially weaker companies who, with a particularly strong desire to avoid a strike, indicated that they would accept the White House offer. At any rate, the steel companies accepted, and in forthcoming weeks were chided by the National Association of Manufacturers, and in fact even indulged in public self-denunciation for ever having submitted to this kind of governmental intervention.¹⁰

Whereas the Union accepted the Board's recommendations, the companies were indignant and refused to accept these "government dictated" terms. Indeed, some of the companies hoped that the White House would now be forced to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act during the ensuing steel strike, and that this might strike a blow at the Union's political alignment with the Administration. The President, however, made it clear that he was in no hurry to declare that an emergency existed which would require this action.¹¹ Finally, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, without consultation with the other companies, negotiated a settlement with the Union which, to the Steelworkers, was just about as satisfactory as the original recommendations of the Board.¹² The other companies soon gave up the fight and negotiated roughly similar agreements within another two weeks.

¹⁰ The New York Times reported a letter made public by Earl Bunting, NAM Managing Director, sent to 15,000 NAM members, saying that he and other "officers and staff" of the NAM "regretted that steel management had agreed to take part in the panel hearings." Several of the steel executives appearing before the Presidential Fact-Finding Board in New York City attacked the Board as politically inspired, or flatly challenged the legality of the Board on the ground that the Taft-Hartley Act was designed by Congress for handling emergency disputes. See statement of Clarence Randall, President of Inland Steel Company, New York Times, August 12, 1949, and statement of Arthur B. Homer, President of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, New York Times, August 17, 1949.

¹¹ At a press conference on October 27, 1949, after the steel strike had been in progress for over three weeks, Mr. Truman was reported to have said: "A national emergency in coal and steel is a long way off." The New York Times reported that "he was firm and emphatic in his views in his news conference that he would not use the Taft-Hartley Law's emergency dispute provisions unless and until there was an emergency." New York Times, October 28, 1949.

It is obvious that political factors were crucial in this controversy. At the same time, the Administration felt it had received a mandate from the American worker in the 1948 elections to rid the country of the Taft-Hartley law, and laid the blame for the postwar inflation on the machinations of "big business." In the spring of 1949, prior to the intervention of the White House, the Union was in a weak bargaining position. The companies, fully aware that it would be difficult to raise prices at a time when the demand for steel was falling off sharply, were prepared to take a strike. Furthermore, in the mass production industries the Steelworkers Union was attempting to initiate company-financed pensions and was not merely trying to match the gains of their sister unions in the automotive and electrical manufacturing field. There can be no doubt that the recommendations of the Board increased the bargaining power of the Union substantially, and in our judgment the gains for the steelworkers would have been much less if the White House had decided not to intervene when the strike was first threatened. The 1949 strike in steel dealt with two policy questions. First, it settled for all practical purposes the question of the bargainability of pensions in the steel industry. Second, it deflected the drive for the exclusive use of the Taft-Hartley Act in nationwide emergency strikes, establishing a precedent for the alternative procedure incorporated into the powers of the Wage Stabilization Board of 1951. Both factors contributed to the Union's victory in 1949. This the steel corporations knew full well, and they did not forget the circumstances surrounding the 1949 controversy when they came to grips with the next and greatest crisis of 1952.

III. THE STEEL CRISIS OF 1952

The steel contracts were openable on wages only a year hence when it was time for the fifth-round negotiations at the end of 1950. The Union negotiated a 16 cents per hour wage settlement, following which the industry promptly announced the customary increase in prices, this time averaging about 5½ per cent. Though there were again voices of protest raised by the Administration and Democratic members of Congress,¹³ both the Steelworkers and the companies were anxious to get wages and prices up before controls were again inaugurated. Under these conditions, free and direct union-management bargaining was quite expedient. The 1950 wage settlement ran until the end of 1951.

¹² The President's Fact-Finding Board had recommended a non-contributory pension plan costing about 6¢ per hour, and a non-contributory social insurance plan costing about 4¢ per hour. The Bethlehem Steel Corporation settled with the union on a pension plan, non-contributory, costing about 7¢ per hour, and a social insurance plan costing about 5¢ per hour, shared equally by employer and employees.

¹³ Senator Joseph O'Mahoney was most outspoken in stating that the steel price rise was excessive. But in response to an inquiry by the New York Times, other Administration spokesmen were less critical. "The steel industry was reportedly given assurance in Washington that it would not be subject to criticism at this time for its price increase if it showed good faith in absorbing a large percentage of its higher costs and by holding its price rise in moderation." New York Times, December 3, 1950.

It soon became apparent, however, that in the sixth round the government would play the decisive role in negotiations. Government wage and price controls were instituted early in the winter of 1951. The Wage Stabilization Board, as re-established by executive order in April, had broad powers to investigate both economic and non-economic issues in disputes which might threaten an interruption of work affecting the national defense. This Board was also empowered to make recommendations to the parties on all issues involved. Thus, the White House had its "administrative alternative" to the Taft-Hartley Act long before the steel crisis developed.¹⁴

The steel contracts expired on December 31, 1951, so that all issues, economic as well as non-economic, were open. The principal requests of the Union, among the more than twenty demands, were wage and fringe concessions total-

¹⁴ Congressional response to the re-establishment of the Wage Stabilization Board by Executive Order 10233, April 22, 1951, was one of suspicion. In both Houses, committees summoned members of the new Board for an accounting of their powers to handle emergency disputes. Congressmen were concerned with the non-statutory basis of the new Board, and its possible "short-circuiting" of the Taft-Hartley law with its emergency disputes procedure for defense industries. In the House, the latter concern was expressed by Representative Lucas during the examination of George W. Taylor, Chairman of the new WSB, before the House Committee on Education and Labor:

"... And we know the President's attitude toward it [the Taft-Hartley Act] too; and is this going to be a means, and the great question is all over the country, is this going to be a means by which the Taft Hartley Act will be evaded?" Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, House of Representatives, 82nd Cong., 1st sess., pursuant to H.R. 73: Disputes Functions of the Wage Stabilization Board, p. 105.

Representative Gwinn concluded similarly:

"... Now what more perfect historical basis could we find for the fact that when you take over a labor dispute in a Wage Stabilization Board that you intend to by-pass the Act?" Ibid., p. 121.

In the Senate, Senator Taft admitted the need for a more flexible procedure to handle emergency disputes during the defense effort, but wanted it to be established by Congress, not by executive order:

"It [the WSB procedure] is not covered by law at all, and now we are considering the Defense Production Act renewal, and if we want to set up this kind of system, Congress ought to set it up and it should not be done by Executive Order. . . . Now I do not say the Taft-Hartley Law is inadequate. It does not make any difference to me whether or not you violate the Taft-Hartley Law; I do not think you do anyway." Hearings before the Subcommittee on Labor and Labor-Management Relations of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, United States Senate, 82nd Cong., 1st sess., on Wage Stabilization and Disputes Program, p. 19.

Senator Douglas stated the Administration's position clearly:

"... Well, I do not care at all for the Taft-Hartley procedure, so if this is an alternative, I welcome it." Ibid., p. 34.

Those who favored limiting the authority of the Wage Stabilization Board to economic issues introduced in the House the Lucas Amendment to the Defense Production Act of 1951, which would have removed from the WSB its powers to make recommendations in labor disputes. This proposal and its companion, the Kersten Amendment, were defeated.

ling over 30 cents per hour and the union shop. The companies flatly rejected the union shop demand and refused to make a wage offer. It was obvious to both parties that the ultimate resolution of the negotiations would be dependent upon the recommendations of the Wage Stabilization Board and the OPS. Apparently on the theory that the Board would find some way of splitting the difference between the Union's demands and the industry's offer, the companies thought they would serve their interests best by offering nothing in advance of the negotiations with the Board. It was informally admitted on all sides that the existence of the wage and price controls prevented any realistic collective bargaining between the Union and the companies.

The Union planned to call a strike on the date the contracts were to expire. The President put pressure on both parties to submit the dispute to the Wage Stabilization Board, which was directed to investigate the issues and to make "recommendations to the parties as to fair and equitable terms of settlement." The hearings on the dispute were conducted with the usual fanfare of hired experts and voluminous briefs. The public members of the Board, finding that the parties were far apart on nearly all issues in dispute, had the choice of making recommendations acceptable to the Union, acceptable to the companies, or acceptable to neither. They decided to make a recommendation on the economic issues which would be acceptable to the Union and which presumably would also be consistent with the very elastic criteria of wage stabilization. But they wanted to throw the union security issue back to the parties for direct negotiations. It was soon evident that the Steelworkers would accept nothing less than a union shop recommendation. Administration spokesmen made it clear at the time that in their opinion a nation-wide strike in steel would have disastrous consequences on the national defense production program and that it was imperative that a shut-down be avoided. The public members were reluctant, therefore, to propose something which would certainly be rejected by the Union and thus immediately precipitate a strike. Yet, had they reviewed carefully the political issues generated by the 1949 steel crisis, they would have known that the companies would stand firm against any attempt by the Administration to force such recommendations upon the industry. On March 20, however, they recommended a two-year contract providing for a package of general wage increases and fringe benefits which was the most liberal ever offered to or even negotiated by a C.I.O. union.¹⁵ They also recommended that the parties negotiate a union shop clause. The Board, with the industry members dissenting, justified its recommendations mainly on the grounds that the Steelworkers should be permitted to "catch up" with unions in other industries which already had agreed to some kind of union shop and which were ahead of steel in wages and fringe benefits.

The Union immediately accepted the Board's recommendations. The companies at once denounced them and also the government's refusal to allow the price increases which they said were necessary to offset the proposed wage increases. The President gave blanket endorsement to the recommendations of the Board as well as to the initial decision of the stabilization authorities to refuse the price relief demanded by the industry.¹⁶

¹⁵ This package consisted of a total wage increase of 17½ cents per hour; reduction of North-South wage differential by five cents; increase in shift differential pay by 2 and 3 cents per hour for second and third shifts; double-time pay for six holidays, and time and a quarter pay for all Sundays worked; and other fringe benefits.

Attempts by the government to get the parties to settle the dispute by direct bargaining were unsuccessful. The industry offered to meet part of the wage and fringe concessions recommended by the Board, and there were indications that the government would allow the necessary price increases if the industry would go the whole way. But the steel companies were adamant in their opposition to the union shop. The Union, having the unqualified endorsement of President Truman and the Administration, naturally would not agree to settle for anything less than the Board's full recommendations. Since the deadlock could not be broken, a strike was ordered by the Union. On April 9, after the walk-out had already started, the President seized the steel mills and the Union ordered its members to go back to work.

From that point on, the controversy flared up into an open political and legal battle between the White House and the steel industry. President Truman sided squarely with the Steelworkers and verbally blasted the steel industry for trying to get "something special, something nobody else can get." The industry retorted with the charge that the White House decision to seize the mills instead of invoking the Taft-Hartley Act was the result of an "unholy political deal" between the C.I.O. and the Administration.

The strategy of the companies now was to fight the seizure in the courts, to dramatize the President's action as a step toward nationalization of industries by a socialist-minded Administration, to sloganize and surround the union shop issue with symbols of individual freedom, and to force President Truman to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act. The strategy of the Union was to keep the workers on the job and to get the Administration to put the recommendations of the Wage Stabilization Board into effect while the government had control of the mills.

On this political and legal war front, the steel companies won a major battle. The courts ruled that the seizure of the mills was illegal, and in the process prevented the government from giving wage increases to the Steelworkers during the seizure period. The Congress, as well as large segments of the press and public opinion, aligned itself against the Administration's policies in the handling of the steel crisis. After two more months of fruitless waiting, the Union had no alternative but to plunge itself into a nation-wide steel strike as soon as the Supreme Court ordered the mills returned to their owners.

¹⁶ Charles E. Wilson, as Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, was considered to have been the negotiator for the steel industry for price relief. With his resignation on March 27, 1952, hopes for a steel price increase at that time were defeated. The industry's original estimate of the cost increase necessary to recoup the cost of the Board's recommendations was $12 per ton. However, the New York Times reported that the industry had brought down its ceiling to $7.50 a ton early in April in negotiations with officials of the Office of Price Stabilization. The final decision on price was $5.20 a ton, awarded by OPS the day after the settlement, July 25, 1952.

The Union still insisted on getting everything the Board had recommended, and the companies took the position that they would fight the union shop to the bitter end. They were also hopeful that they could force the White House to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act. The President, however, staunchly refused to take this action.¹⁷

In the struggle that followed, the union shop issue was critical. Indeed, not long after the strike started, the industry had been assured that it would be granted the price relief necessary to compensate it for increases in labor and other costs.¹⁸ Anyone who remembered the position that the White House had taken on steel prices in 1946, 1948, 1949, and 1950 and who understood the political pressures at work in 1952 could have predicted that the Administration would be forced to back down on any attempt to keep the lid on the price of steel. The big steel companies, on the other hand, had a long tradition of unqualified opposition to the union shop. Even after General Motors, long an opponent of "compulsory unionism," negotiated a modified union shop with Walter Reuther in 1950, the steel companies were still determined to resist. Moreover, they were particularly outraged by the attempt of a government board to jam the union shop down their throats. Thus, in our judgment, the resistance of the steel corporations to the union shop was really more than mere opposition to the principle of compulsory union membership. The companies were even more determined to fight the Union—White House political alignment which was attempting to force this on them through government pressure.

Fortunately within the industry and the Union there were men of good will who recognized that the paralyzing steel shutdown would have to be resolved

¹⁷ On June 10, President Truman addressed Congress, requesting powers to seize the steel industry until the industry and the union reached a settlement. At this time he stated: "I do not recommend that the Congress adopt the Taft-Hartley approach. I think it would be unwise, unfair, and quite possibly ineffective. The nation has already had the benefit of whatever could be gained by action under the Taft-Hartley Act. . . . In the steel case the union already, even before April 9, had voluntarily postponed the strike action for ninety-nine days. Insofar as fact-finding and delay are concerned, therefore, the practical effects of the Taft-Hartley Act were achieved in this case some time ago." New York Times, June 11, 1945.

¹⁸ John Stephens, Vice President of U.S. Steel Corporation, testifying in 1953 on the proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, stated: ". . . but I also said that no matter what had happened on prices that the question of compulsory unionism constituted a very substantial barrier to settlement, and, in fact, continued for something like 6 weeks after the economic terms had been completely satisfied by conferences in the White House and in the old State Department Building. . . .

" . . . So, if the Government had decided come December 31 (1951) that the steel prices could have been increased X dollars a ton, there still would not have been any agreement." Hearings, before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, United States Senate 83rd Cong., 1st sess., on Proposed Revisions of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, p. 855.

sooner or later by direct negotiations and compromise. After the strike had been in progress for about a month, the Union reached a tentative accord with Bethlehem Steel on a modified union shop arrangement which was somewhat weaker than the General Motors clause. This time, however, the six major steel companies had formed a united front in negotiations. The other five companies refused to accept the Bethlehem version, and, as a consequence, the strike continued for several more weeks while the argument centered about procedural questions which, though perhaps important in principle, were of little consequence in practice. Finally, under pressure from the White House, this time directed against the Union as well as the steel companies, agreement was reached on a provision quite similar to the original Bethlehem formula. It provided for a union shop in practice but not in principle. The union was able to say that this settlement provided "a new foundation for recognition and security," while the companies could argue that in theory it protected the right of every employee to decide for himself whether or not he wished to become or remain a member of the union. The agreement required all new employees to sign application cards for union membership to take effect within thirty days unless revoked by such employees during the last 15 days of the 30-day period following their employment.¹⁹

In practice, very few employees have since taken advantage of the technical escape provisions of this formula. In arguing against this proposal before they finally accepted it, some of the steel managements quite correctly pointed out that the companies would become, in effect, recruiting agents for the Union and that the element of free choice on the part of the worker would be more theoretical than real. The net effect of this provision has been to guarantee the Union nearly 100 per cent membership in every steel plant.

This union security settlement along with the industry's acceptance of most, though not all, of the economic concessions recommended by the Wage Stabilization Board ended the 55-day steel strike. The companies promptly raised steel prices in accordance with previous understandings with Administration officials. This, of course, rendered meaningless any further serious effort on the part of the Administration to hold the line on either wages or prices.

In November, 1952 the Republicans won the national elections. In the same month, Philip Murray, the able and much loved and revered leader of the Steelworkers, passed away. This marked the end of an era of collective relations in steel—an era during which the Union and its great leader had been able to count on the sympathetic and friendly support of the Democratic Administration and the men in the White House. From this time on, the White House could be expected to be aligned with the companies rather than with the Union. This called for a radically new concept and strategy of bargaining in steel.

It is significant to note that there was bi-partite bargaining in 1953 and again in 1954 when all provisions of the contract were open for negotiation. The 1953

¹⁹ Provision is also made for an escape period at the end of the agreement, giving all union members the right to drop membership during the last 15 days of the contract.

- settlement was a direct $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hour wage increase. In 1954 the contract provided a package increase of 9 to 10 cents per hour, comprised of a 5 cent direct wage increase and improvements in pension and welfare benefits costing another 4 to 5 cents per hour. In both years, the United Steelworkers of America reached agreement with the United States Steel Corporation without governmental intervention. The pass-through on prices of \$4 a ton in 1953, and an estimated \$4 a ton in 1954, likewise provoked no murmurs from Congress or the Administration.

IV. CONCLUSION

The analysis of collective bargaining presented above leads us to question many widely held beliefs underlying the appropriate role of the government in the area of labor disputes. Indeed, if the experience in the steel industry is any guide, many of the assumptions underlying our past national labor policy are myths which ought to be exploded. What, then, can the history of steel's bargaining from 1945 to 1952 teach us?

First, it should by now be abundantly clear that an industry-wide steel strike does not immediately create a threat to the national health, safety, or welfare. The 1946 strike resulted in considerable hardship for workers and employees throughout basic steel as well as throughout the steel processing and fabricating industries, but its overall impact on the nation's economy did not appear to be very great. The 1949 strike had little effect on other industries because inventories of steel were quite high and requirements relatively low. In 1952, the country somehow weathered a 55-day strike during a defense emergency when it was thought that every ton of steel was urgently needed to satisfy military and essential civilian requirements. Without minimizing the actual or possible adverse effects of these strikes on the economy, it is fair to say that their repercussions on the national health, safety, and welfare were in each case much less drastic than the government's ominous predictions.

Second, the record in steel shows that the government may be unable to prevent a strike in peacetime even when it does intervene. In 1946, 1949, and again in 1952 the government, although it succeeded in postponing the shutdowns, failed on all three occasions to prevent strikes. On each occasion, the industry emphatically demonstrated that it would not accept the recommendations of a government board which it felt was either "unfair" or "politically inspired." Thus, the experience in steel does not support the contention that government boards with power to make recommendations are effective instruments for resolving nation-wide steel controversies. In fact, one could argue that the existence of such boards, at least in 1949 and 1952, may have been an important cause of the strikes.

Third, the record in steel demonstrates that the government cannot and should not encourage free collective bargaining and at the same time attempt to enforce wage and price controls. If it becomes necessary to have wage and price controls, then there should be government "seizure" of collective bargaining, as was the case during World War II. In the World War II emergency, unions promised to abide by the decisions of the government by giving a no-strike pledge, and industry likewise temporarily forfeited its right to upset the government's decisions in the area of price controls. But in the partial emergencies right after World War II and during the Korean crisis, the Administration tried to hold the line on prices and at the same time permitted bargaining on wages and economic issues. Since the Administration had the final word on both wages and prices, the parties obviously were forced to bargain, not among themselves, but with the government. In 1946 and 1952 the result was that the main criterion for wage and price ceilings in steel became the wage and price levels which would end a steel strike rather than the levels which would be best from the standpoint of overall economic stabilization. In both cases, the government was forced to repudiate its wage and price stabilization policies. This had the unfortunate consequence not only of destroying the faith of the people in the government's stabilization policy but of undermining their belief in collective bargaining as well.

Fourth, government intervention in a nation-wide steel strike is bound to be critically influenced by broad political considerations. Indeed, collective bargaining in a nationwide basic industry such as steel is bound to take place in an environment both economic and political. As we have shown in the case of the three steel strikes, the bargaining strategy of the Union and the pattern of resistance offered by the companies were clearly molded by the Union's political alignment with the White House and the industry's political alignment with opponents of the Democratic Administration. If a Republican had been in the White House, these political alignments would probably have been different, and the intervention of the White House might have been more favorable to the industry than to the Union. It is unrealistic to expect, however, that the intervention of the government in any future crisis in the steel industry can somehow or other be "impartial."

Fifth, if, as we contend, intervention by the White House in an industry-wide steel dispute really cannot be "impartial," then the side which is likely to have the closest political alignment with the Administration may seek to increase its bargaining power by creating conditions which may call for the intervention of the government. At this point collective bargaining ceases to be a direct process of negotiation between unions and companies; it becomes a tripartite process of negotiation over public policy. In the steel strike of 1949, for example, the appointment by President Truman of a fact-finding board clearly improved the bargaining position of the Union. In a future steel controversy, a decision by another President to invoke the emergency dispute procedures of the Taft-Hartley Act might greatly strengthen the position of the companies. Our argument here is that if the parties know that the government will intervene to prevent an industry-wide strike, the side which has the closest alignment with the White House may favor such a strike.²⁰

²⁰ Despite the political effect of almost any type of White House intervention, particularly in the early stages of an "emergency," it is likewise possible that a "laissez-faire"

Finally, our analysis suggests that in the future the government should not attempt either to postpone or to prevent a threatened industry-wide steel strike except in time of war or comparable national emergency. The policy of the White House should be to make it clear to the parties that it has no intention of immediately intervening in the dispute and that it will refrain from putting pressure on either side to make a settlement. Such a course of action would force the parties to bargain among themselves by removing the chance for either side to improve its position by bringing in the government. It is true that the government might eventually have to intervene if a strike in steel continued for several months. The rationale and method for such intervention lie beyond the scope of this paper. But we contend that if the White House would abandon any attempt to prevent steel strikes through early intervention, very few strikes would actually occur. Indeed, a predetermined hands-off policy on industry-wide steel strikes might conceivably lead the companies to favor a "one-at-a-time" rather than an "all-at-once" procedure of bargaining with the Union. If this were not feasible, the Union might at least follow a policy of pressing one company at a time rather than striking simultaneously all of the major steel producers.²¹ In either case, nation-wide steel strikes which might ultimately endanger the national safety, health, and welfare could be avoided. Thus, the new era of labor-management relations in steel may well be characterized by a return to genuine bipartite collective bargaining which will be better for all concerned than the politicized tripartite collective relations of the past. The direct settlements which were made in the 1953 and 1954 negotiations in steel substantiate this view.

position of the White House could have a considerable impact upon the negotiations, depending, of course, upon the position of the industry, the strength of the union, and the strategy of each at a given time. Such a hands-off policy could itself represent a political position of the Administration.

²¹ That this might become the strategy of the Union in the 1954 negotiations in the absence of a sympathetic Administration is indicated by A. H. Raskin, New York Times labor reporter. Such one-at-a-time bargaining "would reduce the general hardship caused by the shutdown and would focus intense competitive pressure upon the strike-bound corporation." New York Times, June 23, 1954, p. 14. He further observed that "the attitude of ranking labor officials in Washington was that the threat of a steel strike next week did not call for White House intervention of the type that was customary under Democratic Administrations." New York Times, June 24, 1954, p. 18.

STATE COOPERATION IN ENFORCEMENT OF THE FEDERAL WAGE-HOUR LAW

VIRGINIA G. COOK

Ohio State University

Our history affords numerous examples of efforts to secure state cooperation in the enforcement of federal laws, especially those marking abrupt changes in national policy. In practice, state cooperation has been most readily forthcoming in the administration of benefactory legislation. Most notably, federal grants-in-aid have been effective in helping to lift the standards of state services in such functional areas as highways, airports, public health, and agricultural technology. In another area, Selective Service has successfully employed local boards to enforce national policy. On the other hand, the Fugitive Slave law, the Civil Rights laws, National Prohibition, and the Emergency Price Control acts are reminders of the difficulties federal authorities have encountered in trying to enlist state aid in enforcement of national regulatory policies uncongenial to local sentiment.¹ This article examines the experience under a permissive provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act, section 11(b), which authorizes the national government to reimburse state agencies aiding in enforcement.² To the author's knowledge, this is the sole example of reimbursement for state aid in enforcing a federal regulatory statute. A companion provision of the act was designed to give local agencies a share in the task of securing compliance. Section 4(b) empowers the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division, the agency responsible for enforcement, to "establish and utilize such voluntary, regional, local or other agencies, and . . . services, as may from time to time be needed." The sponsors of the Fair Labor Standards Act hoped, and competent academic observers predicted,³ that federal reimbursement of state outlays for enforcement would take the curse off federal policy and turn state administrators into ready partners. At least some of the advocates of sections 11(b) and 4(b) were aware that if this experimental innovation in the technique of "cooperative federalism" proved successful, there were many other fields of national regulatory policy to which it might be applied.

¹ The Eighteenth Amendment and the National Prohibition Act gave concurrent enforcement powers to the states and the national government. Enforcement had already broken down when President Coolidge on May 8, 1926 issued Executive Order No. 4439 directing that "any state, county, or municipal officer may be appointed at a nominal rate of compensation, as prohibition officer of the Treasury Department to enforce the provisions of the National Prohibition Act." The Congress objected strenuously to the President's order and it is a controversial point whether any state, county, or municipal officers were appointed or paid with federal funds. Laurence F. Schmeckebier, The Bureau of Prohibition (Washington, 1929), pp. 18 ff.

² 52 U.S. Stat. 1060, Public 718, 75th Cong., 3d sess. (1938). Section 11(b) provided: "With the consent and cooperation of State agencies charged with the administration of State labor laws, the Administrator and the Chief of the Children's Bureau may, for the purpose of carrying out their respective functions under this Act, utilize the services of State and local agencies and their employees and, notwithstanding any other provision of law, may reimburse such State and local agencies and their employees for services rendered for such purpose."

³ Arthur W. Macmahon and John D. Millett, Federal Administrators: A Biographical Approach to the Problem of Departmental Management (New York, 1939), p. 417.

This is not the place to argue the value-laden questions whether federal-state cooperation is an intrinsically good end, and so worth paying an extra price for, or whether it is merely a sometimes convenient means; and, if it is a good in itself, whether its worth is to be measured chiefly in terms of rationality or consent. Neither does the experience reviewed here furnish sufficient grounds for hazarding a guess on the related question of the ultimate effects of state cooperation, if it can be obtained, on the substance of federal policy. Policy-makers must weigh the advantages of having more shoulders on which to rest the burden against the prospect that those who help shoulder the burden may also come to determine the direction in which it is carried.⁴ The present inquiry is limited to the question why the reimbursement and cooperative provisions did not in fact suffice to produce wider cooperative arrangements.

Three methods are used to enforce the wage-hour law: persuasion, inspection, and litigation. In the main, cooperative efforts were limited to the first two enforcement methods. The child labor provisions of the FLSA evoked the most extensive cooperation. But until 1946 they were administered by a unique agency, the Children's Bureau, and it may be doubted whether that experience is any guide to what may be expected of efforts to carry out the other goals of the statute. This article is accordingly concerned only with cooperation in enforcing minimum and subminimum wages and overtime standards. It will consider (1) the original intent of the advocates of cooperation; (2) the formal impediments to cooperation, such as diversity of federal and state standards and lack of state funds and staff; (3) voluntary cooperation of state labor departments; (4) preparatory federal steps; (5) informal cooperation under section 4(b); (6) cooperation in administering subminimum wages; and (7) formal reimbursable agreements under section 11(b).

I. THE ORIGINAL INTENT OF THE ADVOCATES OF COOPERATION

The diverse motivations of federal and state officials and pressure group spokesmen supporting sections 11(b) and 4(b) probably were responsible in part for later developments—or more accurately, the lack of later developments. The Roosevelt Administration, anxious to accomplish piecemeal the social goals of the National Industrial Recovery Act, as originally introduced, but sensitive to the accusations of administrative inefficiency under the Blue Eagle, supported state cooperation under the FLSA in the belief that decentralization of the inspection process to the states would avoid conflict and breakdown of enforcement.⁵ Congressmen urged the adoption of these sections so as to avoid the waste, confusion, and conflicts of duplicate inspections.

⁴ This is the concept of "cooptation" developed by Philip Selznick in his TVA and the Grass Roots (Berkeley, 1949). As defined and analyzed by Selznick, the concept is not entirely relevant to cooperative enforcement under the FLSA.

⁵ Frances Perkins, The Roosevelt I Knew (New York, 1946), pp. 246-67.

To the Secretary of Labor, these sections were the culmination of efforts she began in 1934, when she created in the Department of Labor a new unit, the Division of Labor Standards,⁶ to aid the states in improving their labor legislation. The years from then until 1938 had seen a renaissance in the development of state labor legislation. Secretary Perkins intended sections 11(b) and 4(b) to encourage and give direction to this movement by building in the states, with federal aid, stronger staffs of officials who would be influential with their own legislatures.

On the other hand, the Children's Bureau espoused section 11(b) because the experience with the federal child labor law of 1916 suggested that the general acceptance of state-issued employment certificates, as evidence of compliance with some FLSA requirements, would be an effective enforcement technique. Furthermore, section 11(b) authorized expenditure of federal funds to assist backward states to improve certification standards and procedures, thus widening the area for potential cooperation. Following this lead, half a dozen national organizations supported cooperative enforcement for similar reasons.

Several state labor commissioners supported section 11(b) because they thought that the states had not been adequately paid for their assistance in enforcing the provisions of the NRA codes. They wanted to avoid a repetition of that experience under the FLSA. With this splintering of interest among those most concerned, it is perhaps not surprising that after the sections were adopted there was no united pressure on either the Congress or the Wage and Hour Division in behalf of a common plan to put them to work.

II. FORMAL IMPEDIMENTS TO COOPERATION

Everyone involved took it for granted that correspondence between federal and state labor standards was a prerequisite for cooperative enforcement. Yet in 1938 there was still marked diversity in standards. For instance, in spite of substantial progress after 1933, twenty-three states, many of them predominantly agricultural, as yet had no minimum wage laws for women. In the South and Southwest, racial and historical influences impeded the adoption of wage legislation. In these states unions were relatively weak and public interest in labor standards was negligible. Not a single state applied minimum wage legislation to men. None of the state maximum hour laws for either men or women required time and one-half the regular rate for hours beyond the weekly standard. Of the seventeen states with homework laws in 1938, only nine regulated wages. The advocates of cooperative enforcement must have been aware of such discrepancies. Great expectations for future cooperation apparently rested upon the belief that the very considerable rate of progress and standardization in state labor laws achieved after 1933 would continue undiminished.

The fact is, however, that since 1941 not a single state has adopted a minimum wage law. Five states—Connecticut, New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island—have by various provisions significantly broadened the coverage of their laws. Three states—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Connecticut—have amended their laws to provide for a statutory rate while retaining provision for wage boards. By 1952 five states had issued sixteen orders establishing minimum wages equaling the federal minimum of seventy-five cents an hour. However, a review of state wage orders since 1938 shows that: (1) no new states have extended minimum wage laws to manufacturing; (2) no minimum wage laws have been extended to additional branches of manufacturing; (3) in all but two of the industries classified as nonmanufacturing the number of states with minimum wage orders has increased; and (4) the principal extensions of wage orders have been in four nonmanufacturing industries: amusement and recreation, transportation (intrastate), hospitals (excluding nurses), and agriculture.

⁶ In 1948 the Division of Labor Standards was elevated to Bureau status.

Instead of concluding from this record that the diversity between state and federal standards has blocked cooperative enforcement, it may be nearer the mark to question the original assumption, universally accepted in 1938, that correspondence of standards was a necessary prerequisite to cooperation. The evidence thus far is inconclusive, but it does not rule out alternative hypotheses. The Constitution compels a difference in the coverage of state and federal labor laws; but diversity in the standards for those covered has no effect on the number of firms subject to federal jurisdiction which a cooperating state must inspect. Neither does it affect the numerous and complex interpretative questions which arise when the FLSA is applied to roughly twenty-one million employees working in approximately 715,000 establishments. Finally, correspondence in standards does not make it any easier to train state inspectors to apply the FLSA exemptions for the area of production and retail and service establishments, both alien to their experience. Indeed, a state without a minimum wage law might well find it easier to cooperate in enforcing the federal law because there would be no duplicate coverage problems and no possibility that state inspectors would confuse state and federal standards or interpretations. The problems created by the broad coverage of the federal law are probably more perplexing to state administrators and inspectors than are diversities in standards. Judgment on this hypothesis, however, will be reserved until the experience in cooperating states has been reviewed.

Other factors also affected the ability of the states to cooperate. Fiscal support of state departments of labor was frequently sporadic and inadequate. In 1939 the entire nation had not more than one thousand state factory inspectors, and one-fourth of these were employed in a single state.⁷ In the same year only ten states used competitive civil service tests in appointing factory inspectors. "Too frequently, even when not political in the ordinary sense, the state departments of labor . . . [were] used as a means for the polite pensioning of innocuous labor leaders."⁸ State minimum wage laws, once enacted, were frequently held unconstitutional or given restrictive interpretations in the state courts. Enforcement was hampered by inadequate fines and the suspension of fines. The broad coverage of the federal law complicated the interpretative process and the attainment of consistency in enforcement. The FLSA provisions governing coverage and exemptions, working time, overtime, and regular rate of pay, when applied to thousands of establishments with different management practices and accounting procedures, gave rise to complex and "close" questions unfamiliar to state labor inspectors. Another difficulty of which Congress and the executive branch were fully cognizant was the extremely precarious political context in which the FLSA was to be enforced. Daily contacts between inspectors and employers meant frequent opportunities for friction or misunderstanding. Two-thirds of the Division's annual appropriation is spent on inspections; the direct relationship between the size of the appropriation and the number of investigations which can be scheduled has made administrative officials very sensitive to congressional opinion. This summary of administrative difficulties suggests that a great deal of energy, patience, and conviction together with favorable circumstances would be required to achieve positive results from a cooperative enforcement venture.

⁷ Verne A. Zimmer, "The Interest of the Federal Government in Conserving the Sight of Industrial Workers," Bull. No. 37, U.S. Department of Labor, Division of Labor Standards (Washington, G.P.O., 1940), p. 18.

⁸ Macmahon and Millett, Federal Administrators, p. 417.

III. INITIAL VOLUNTARY COOPERATION OF STATE LABOR DEPARTMENTS

Without any formal agreements under sections 11(b) or 4(b), state labor departments aided the Wage and Hour Division during its first few months by performing information and statistical functions. The Division faced a steadily increasing volume of complaints; it had an inadequate budget, a handful of partially trained inspectors, and meager materials to guide inspectors. State labor officials agreed to (1) report apparent FLSA violations; (2) provide lists of low-wage industries and establishments; (3) distribute copies of the Division's regulations to employers and workers; and (4) refer complaints and requests for interpretations of the act. As far as they went, these activities were helpful and pointed to a larger future role for the states.

IV. FEDERAL PREPARATORY STEPS

With considerable tact and ingenuity, the Department of Labor undertook a broadly conceived educational program to prepare the states for cooperation. The Division of Labor Standards compiled annual digests of state labor legislation, made comparative studies of state labor laws, and responded to state requests for help in drafting new statutes. It issued a factory inspection manual, conducted training courses for state labor inspectors, and helped organize regional and national conferences on labor legislation. The Secretary of Labor appointed a committee of state labor commissioners and AFL and CIO representatives to draft a model labor standards bill, which was approved by the Fifth National Conference on Labor Legislation in November, 1938.⁹ Forty-four state legislatures met during 1939, and a concerted effort was made in behalf of the bill. Nevertheless, it was defeated in each of the thirty-six legislatures in which it was introduced. Somewhat better success attended another model bill circulated to state labor commissioners, giving them a positive authorization to cooperate. This was designed to remedy difficulties encountered in several states in which state fiscal laws or constitutions forbade the advance of state funds for cooperative work in expectation of federal reimbursement under section 11(b). The model bill prompted eight states and a territory to adopt enabling legislation.¹⁰

⁹ Louise Stitt, "State Labor Standards Legislation," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 6, pp. 454-63, at p. 459 (Summer, 1939).

The Department recognized the annual National Conference on Labor Legislation, composed of state labor officials and representatives of interested civic organizations, as a source of strategically located support or opposition to cooperation. Especially during the early years, the opinions of this group were canvassed and its aid was solicited. The International Association of Governmental Labor Officials was another group whose cooperation was invited.

World War II intervened to curtail these promotional activities of the Department of Labor before substantial benefits could be realized. State labor standards, too, were generally relaxed or suspended during the war. Conditions after 1940 were not propitious for launching any ambitious new administrative program in a low priority field.

V. INFORMAL FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATION UNDER SECTION 4(B)

Notwithstanding the general failure to extend state legislation, limited experiments in state cooperation were made in several phases of the regulatory program. A review of these may illuminate the general problem posed at the outset of this article.

Federal cooperation with the state of New York in the regulation of homework in the gloves and mittens industry was undertaken in an atmosphere of cordial personal relationships between officials convinced that both parties would benefit from the arrangement. The New York law¹¹ requires homework employers and employees to be licensed and the homes to be annually inspected; each homemaker is issued a handbook in which the employer enters employment records. The terms of the FLSA order, for those subject to the federal jurisdiction, are virtually identical. During the fiscal year 1951, the New York State Department of Labor had 11,304 homework certificates outstanding and inspected 10,587 residences for compliance with its regulation;¹² the state spends more to enforce its law than the Wage and Hour Division has available to administer its homework regulations over the entire country.

¹⁰ They were California, Montana, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, and Hawaii; see Irving Paster, "National Minimum Wage Regulation in the United States," unpub. diss. (University of Michigan, 1948), p. 239.

¹¹ New York was the first state to regulate homework, which was of special concern both on health and welfare grounds and because the New York market attracted goods, especially items of apparel, made in neighboring states. Its first law was passed in 1874; in 1913 it enacted the first prohibitory law on the subject to be held valid.

¹² Figures supplied by Mr. J. D. Wolf, Supervisor, Homework Bureau, Division of Industrial Relations, Women in Industry and Minimum Wage, New York State Department of Labor, in a letter to the author.

The cooperative agreement between the two authorities provides that in this industry the Wage and Hour Division will forego inspections in New York and will accept state-issued certificates as evidence of compliance with the FLSA.¹³ It does not provide for federal reimbursement of state expenditures. The spirit of separateness, often noticeable when federal and state officials carry out similar duties, has been largely overcome. Nevertheless, the Wage and Hour Division in April, 1950 rejected the state's proposal of a further simplification, the exclusive use of the state's homework handbook, on the ground that the federal order, like the state law, requires that completed books be filed with the agency as records, and this in spite of the fact that the Division does not use them for enforcement purposes. And although the agreement has been in effect for over a decade, no attempt has been made to extend it either to other industries in New York or to other states. Quite clearly, in this instance the bases of cooperation lie in the combination of three factors: continuing mutual confidence among the officials directly involved, the correspondence of state and federal standards, and especially the outstanding performance of the state in a field where it is heavily committed while the federal agency is handicapped for want of funds and staff. The prospect of a federal grant did not enter the calculation.

The Massachusetts plan for separate inspection and informal cooperation under section 4(b) was intended to meet almost any contingency which might arise when two agencies at different governmental levels are enforcing laws which are similar but not identical. The plan provided detailed procedures for (1) avoiding duplicate simultaneous inspections, (2) informing employers and employees of their responsibilities and rights under each law, (3) exchange of reports on alleged violations and contemplated enforcement action, (4) exchange of data relating to homework certificates, (5) conducting joint inspections, and (6) establishing and maintaining channels of communication between state and federal officials.¹⁴ By 1944 similar informal arrangements had been made with Arkansas, California, Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.¹⁵

These commitments are all procedural and such as the comity of good neighbors requires; neither party surrenders any claim to jurisdiction, appropriations, or ultimate freedom of action. Massachusetts was a logical place to start the plan. It had statutory wage standards probably as high as those of any other state. It had tradition and experience as the first state to enact a minimum wage law in 1912. By 1942 it had twenty-five wage orders in effect, seventeen of them in manufacturing industries. The overlapping inter- and intrastate coverage of orders applicable to manufacturing employment made it especially important in enforcing them to avoid the hazards of conflicts between federal and state inspectors, simultaneous inspection of firms by both authorities, and resulting confusion and resentment among employers and workers.

¹³ The number of certificates so issued and accepted ranges between 1,500 and 2,500 annually.

¹⁴ A copy of the written agreement between the Wage and Hour Division and the Massachusetts State Department of Labor is on file at the national office of the Division in Washington.

¹⁵ U. S. Congress, House, Hearings Before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the Department of Labor-Federal Security Agency Appropriation Bill for 1944, 78th Cong., 1st sess. (Washington, G.P.O., 1943), p. 50.

No single explanation will account for the participation of the other eighteen states—or for the non-participation of the remaining twenty-nine. Eleven of the eighteen had minimum wage laws specifying rates and overtime pay standards usually well below the federal requirements. Seven of these permitted employees to recover back wages, costs, and attorney's fees; eight provided for wage boards; and nine made violation a misdemeanor with criminal penalties.¹⁶ Eleven of the eighteen also had industrial homework laws, nine of them requiring licenses of both employers and employees, and six regulating wages.¹⁷ The attempt at federal control of industrial homework under the NRA had failed, and federal and state officials alike were skeptical of its prospects when the FLSA was adopted; nevertheless the statute did not exempt homeworkers from either the wage or hour requirements.¹⁸ The inherent difficulties of enforcing homework regulations, the meager resources of funds and staff at the Division's disposal for the purpose, and the disrupting effects of interstate shipments of homework, all operated as incentives to official cooperation in this field.

This evidence is not enough to support a conclusion that correspondence of state and federal standards is a decisive element, and the remaining clues are speculative in nature and sporadic in operation. The eighteen states include eight of the twelve with some branches of manufacturing under wage orders in 1942; in these the likelihood of overlapping coverage and consequent conflict was presumably a factor. It is also noteworthy that the important industrial states and those with the most advanced statutory labor standards were included. Among the Southern states only Texas, which regulated homework, and Arkansas and Virginia, which did not, participated. But some Midwestern agricultural states with relatively low standards—Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—also participated. Perhaps geographical proximity was significant, for every participating state except California shared a common border with at least one other in the group. This suggests the importance of field office leadership—a regional director who has made several state agreements may be ambitious to round out his assigned area. It reinforces, too, the hypothesis that the Division was readiest to unload, by the cooperative formula, the burdens of regulating homework, since it was common knowledge that homework was shipped among several of the participating states. But more definite evidence would be needed to warrant positive conclusions.

¹⁶ Florence P. Smith, State Minimum Wage Laws and Orders 1942, An Analysis, U.S. Department of Labor, Bull. No. 191, Women's Bureau (Washington, G.P.O., 1942).

¹⁷ Industrial Home-Work Legislation and Its Administration, U.S. Department of Labor, Bull. No. 26, Division of Labor Standards (Washington, G.P.O., 1939). By 1945 Colorado, Utah, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia had adopted homework legislation.

¹⁸ In seven wage orders under the FLSA the Administrator prohibited industrial homework except by those who were physically or mentally handicapped or unable to leave home because they were responsible for the care of an invalid. Licenses were required of both employers and employees and detailed records were to be maintained.

The degree of actual cooperation achieved under the Massachusetts plan varies greatly from state to state; this is the unanimous testimony in discussions with national, regional, and field officials of the Division and at several state labor departments. Within a single state, moreover, the amount and kind of cooperation given may be altered radically within a short time, especially if political control of the state government changes hands.¹⁹ Within a particular region or state, a single program, or even one aspect of it, may generate extensive cooperative activity while the others languish. A civic group may be the moving force, as in Ohio in recent years where the Executive Secretary of the National Consumers League promoted joint efforts of state labor officials and regional Wage and Hour Division personnel with respect to child labor. In some areas the National Child Labor Committee has stimulated state interest in cooperation with the federal government. The adoption of new laws at either the federal or state level frequently inspires renewed efforts at cooperation for a short time. The exposure of abuses or of negligence in enforcing the laws sometimes results in temporary cooperative efforts to correct these conditions.

Effective cooperative enforcement of the federal wage-hour law on an informal basis requires mutual confidence as well as detailed plans and supervision. Plans are easier to draw up than to carry out. Most supervisors interviewed acknowledged that they did not know whether or not inspectors were following the notification and reporting procedures required in the Massachusetts plan. Consistent and conscientious observance of these procedures would require a good deal of time and tact.²⁰

VI. COOPERATION WITH THE STATES IN ADMINISTRATION OF SUBMINIMUM WAGES

The Wage and Hour Division early developed informal cooperative enforcement procedures with states which exempted learners from their minimum wage laws. To simplify the tasks, steps were taken to bring federal and state standards into closer correspondence. State labor officials were notified of the Division's learner regulations so that they would not promulgate learner wage rates lower than the federal rates in industries covered by the FLSA. When the wage-hour law was adopted, three states were issuing learner certificates in industries in interstate commerce. By 1940 twelve states had learner rates lower than the FLSA; four had higher rates. In Minnesota and Massachusetts the federal learner rate was raised to meet the higher state minimum. In the postwar years, since the seventy-five cent FLSA minimum became effective on January 25, 1950, federal learner rates have usually been higher than state rates, but the going wages under a high level of employment have minimized enforcement problems in this field.

¹⁹ This was true also of prohibition enforcement. Compare the Wickersham Commission's observation in 1931: "Conditions are not wholly the same from year to year anywhere. Upheavals in local politics, changes of administration, varying policies in policing, the activities of strong or inactivities of weak personalities in executive positions, contribute to make the course of state enforcement, at least in the average urban locality, fluctuating, vacillating, or even spasmodic." National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, Report on the Enforcement of the Prohibition Laws of the United States (Washington, G.P.O., 1931), p. 40.

²⁰ Personality factors are obviously important. Compare again the Wickersham Commission report: "... the federal authorities can often secure cooperation through their own tact and conciliatory attitude ... in Maryland the United States attorney reports, that although there is no state prohibition act and the governor and the state government are hostile to the Eighteenth Amendment, the detective bureau constantly helps to locate offenders and detains them until the federal authorities can take them, and information of the violations of law is given constantly by policemen to the United States attorney." Ibid., p. 43.

Cooperative enforcement before the war may be illustrated in New Jersey. There, because a state wage order prohibited the payment of subminimum rates to women and minors in more than half a dozen industries, no federal learner certificates were issued in the apparel industry, most of the workers there being women or minors. And although such certificates were issued in the hosiery industry, the employer was informed that they did not apply to women and children covered by the state wage order. In California federal learner certificates were issued in the apparel industry, but employers were informed that a state wage order required a higher rate for the last four months of the learning period.

Finally, it should be noted that the Wage and Hour Division accepts as evidence of compliance with the FLSA requirements the apprentice contracts made under the auspices of and approved by a state or local apprenticeship council recognized by the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship if the contracts conform to the Committee's standards.²¹

In summary, we may conclude that the several types of cooperation reviewed thus far, which rest on section 4(b) and involve no federal reimbursement, are of only marginal importance and do not go beyond what common sense might dictate in the absence of that section. Does the prospect of reimbursement make a critical difference?

VII. FORMAL STATE COOPERATION IN ENFORCEMENT UNDER SECTION 11(B)

The FLSA had been in effect almost a year before the Wage and Hour Division and the Children's Bureau issued a joint regulation for utilizing the enforcement services of state agencies. It incorporated the standards approved by the Fifth National Conference on Labor Legislation. It required a "qualified"²² state agency to submit an inspection plan to the Division and to the Bureau.

²¹ Administration of subminimum rates for the handicapped has not been decentralized to the regions, so that there has been little opportunity for state cooperation on this phase of FLSA enforcement.

²² To qualify an agency had to have as its primary responsibility the administration of labor laws, had to employ a full time director and an adequate inspection staff, and had to engage in inspection work comparable to that under the federal law.

If they found the plan reasonably adequate and if the state agency accepted the joint regulation, a contract was offered under which the state performed specified services and was reimbursed for the cost.

The first such cooperative agreement was made with North Carolina to take effect November 1, 1939. Several favorable considerations prompted the selection of North Carolina. The Assistant Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division in charge of the Cooperation and Enforcement Branch, the unit responsible for implementing section 11(b), was the former state labor commissioner and a close friend of his successor in that elective office. The Roosevelt Administration welcomed a chance to recognize the Southern state which more than any other had made substantial progress in the adoption of progressive labor legislation. The North Carolina State Department of Labor had a reputation for friendly relations with employers and employer associations without deleterious effects on enforcement. Moreover, North Carolina industries were sufficiently diversified so that most of the problems likely to arise under any state agreement would probably emerge, and the state was close enough to Washington to permit ready supervision. North Carolina was selected in spite of the fact that it did not then and still does not have minimum wage or home-work legislation.

Under the joint regulation annual agreements are made by the Wage and Hour Division, the Secretary of Labor, and the North Carolina State Department of Labor. A typical agreement includes a statement of: (1) citations to statutory authority, (2) definitions, (3) approval of the joint plan, (4) termination procedures, (5) fiscal responsibilities and procedures, (6) the functions of the federal unit, (7) the manner in which investigations under the FLSA and the Public Contracts Act are to be coordinated with inspections under the state safety, health, child labor, and maximum hour laws, (8) the division of inspectors' time between state and federal work, (9) the lines of supervision and the location of offices, (10) litigation policy, (11) job descriptions, and (12) regulations governing the appointment, training, promotion, and tenure of personnel, and the compensation of injured employees.

Under the terms of the first annual agreement with North Carolina the state department was responsible for three-fifths of its annual expenditures and the federal government for the remainder. In the agreement operative in June, 1952, the annual budget was divided on a two to one basis with the state paying the larger portion. Under the original agreement the state department of labor functioned as a branch of the Division's regional office at Raleigh for the purposes of the cooperative program; since 1941 it has reported directly to the Administrator in Washington. A technical adviser from the Division's national office is assigned to the state labor department to assure consistency in inspection policies.²³ The Division's regional office is responsible for the initial training of inspectors. The state provides space for the federal unit in Raleigh, and the Division furnishes equipment and supplies for the state staff employed on the federal work.

²³ The duties of the federal representative require him to maintain a measure of independence of the views of state labor officials. In Minnesota the federal representative in St. Paul can have frequent contacts with regional employees of the Division in Minneapolis; thus his position is not as isolated as that of the federal representative in Raleigh.

Labor inspectors in North Carolina are divided into three functional categories: (1) wage-hour inspectors who conduct payroll investigations under the FLSA, the PCA, the child labor provisions of the FLSA, the state child labor laws, and the state maximum hour and day-of-rest laws for men and women—these inspectors limit their investigations almost entirely to interstate business; (2) safety inspectors who spend an estimated twenty per cent of their time in spot checking payrolls of both interstate and intrastate firms for general compliance with the FLSA and PCA—these inspectors are paid by the state and their payroll inspections represent a contribution to the federal program for which the state is not paid; (3) maximum hour inspectors who enforce the state forty-eight hour week for women and fifty-five hour week for men, and day-of-rest laws for men and women—these inspectors limit their investigations almost entirely to intrastate business.

Judgments on the results obtained from the North Carolina experiment naturally differ, depending on the observer's vantage point. The Bureau of Labor Standards in Washington is on the whole pleased, and so are the state labor officials; the Wage and Hour Division is less happy. During the early years particularly, conflicts between national and state officials and programs were not uncommon. Sometimes the national office had two or more branches simultaneously making studies of state operations; this put undue demands on the time of state staff. Occasional national office staff failures to observe channels confused state personnel. Perhaps there have been times when both sets of officials regretted the cooperative undertaking. At one time some Washington office officials thought that the North Carolina program cost too much. One difficulty, unanticipated on either side, concerns reporting. The Division requires a written narrative report for each inspection case file. The state requires no such report, partly because it has no minimum wage law, and the federal agency has had trouble in getting the inspectors to write satisfactory reports. This item apart, the North Carolina officials believe that their state labor department gains prestige from its participation in the federal program and favor continuing it. They have been helped in increasing the salaries of inspectors because of their role in enforcing the FLSA.

The Minnesota agreement resembles the North Carolina model. The state law comes closer to matching FLSA standards—for instance, Minnesota has minimum wage legislation, applicable only to women and children, and a number of wage orders outstanding at rates considerably below seventy-five cents—but on the whole Minnesota's reputation is for good enforcement of relatively weak labor laws. This suggests that when the quality of state enforcement is good enough, a disparity in the two sets of statutory standards is no serious obstacle to cooperation under the FLSA. Indeed, the difference in the incidence of the state and federal laws here is such as to make it unlikely that the disparity in standards has any substantial effect on the administrative performance of the state department.

Both the organizational arrangements and the division of responsibility in Minnesota differ from those in North Carolina. For the purposes of the agreement, the Minnesota State Department of Labor and Industry operates under the Chicago regional office of the Wage and Hour Division. The state is divided into two parts, one of which is inspected by the state department with headquarters in St. Paul and the other by the Minneapolis field office of the Division. The assignment of counties to each part changes from year to year. At the changeover date pending cases are transferred from state to federal inspectors, and vice versa, resulting in some confusion and lost motion. The national office has pressed the state department to agree to less frequent changes in the assignment of counties, but state officials insist on the annual shift. No doubt their adamance stems less from any want of confidence in their inspectors—such as sometimes leads police chiefs to rotate policemen's beats—than from the political necessity of treating with bipolar impartiality the traditional rivalry of the twin cities that adorn the state. As in North Carolina, a liaison representative of the Division's national office is maintained in the office of the state department. He is responsible for obtaining observance of national policies and procedures, and for coordinating the FLSA work of the two agencies in the field. Attorneys from the Chicago regional office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor²⁴ are available for consultation with state labor department officials. The agreement in force during the fiscal year 1950 provided that the federal government would pay the salaries and travel expenses of five investigators and that not less than seven inspectors were to be authorized to inspect for compliance with the federal statute and state laws. Reports on federal cases are reviewed by the Chief of the Division of Women and Children in the state department, the federal representative, and a field operations officer from the national office.²⁵ Investigators are required to record daily the time spent enforcing the state labor laws and the FLSA.

As between these two patterns, officials of the Bureau of Labor Standards in Washington prefer the North Carolina organizational arrangements. The Wage and Hour Division has not asked Minnesota to take over FLSA enforcement in both parts of the state. The state department opposes such a change on the ground that enforcement of the state law would suffer. Implicit in this view is a judgment either that Minnesota's good enforcement record, albeit with feeble legislation, has not been significantly aided by federal cooperation, or that increased responsibilities would not be matched by a corresponding increase in federal assistance.

In 1941 the Wage and Hour Division made a formal cooperative enforcement agreement under section 11(b) with the Connecticut State Department of Labor. After a year or two the agreement was terminated because the labor commissioner insisted upon assigning the federal program to the agency responsible for administering the state wage collection law. Since then no further cooperative agreements have been made beyond the renewal of the North Carolina and Minnesota contracts. Considering the expectations that prevailed only two or three years earlier, this seems an extraordinary outcome. The causes are to be found partly in the situation in Washington and in the states, and partly in the war.

²⁴ The original law gave the Wage and Hour Division its own General Counsel and regional attorneys. In 1941 Secretary Perkins abolished the Office of General Counsel and assigned the functions to the Solicitor of the Department of Labor, but she did not disturb the regional attorneys. When the House Appropriations Committee learned of this, it insisted that regional attorneys too be made responsible to the Office of the Solicitor.

²⁵ In June, 1952, the Wage and Hour Division had four field operations officers attached to the national office who were responsible for securing consistency in inspection policies. Most of their time is spent in the field.

First of all, frequent changes in the leadership of the Wage and Hour Division, and of topside estimates of priorities among the Division's goals, contributed to an irresolute policy. Elmer F. Andrews, the Division's first Administrator, had been, while Industrial Commissioner of New York, a strong advocate of state cooperation. Some of his initial enthusiasm may have diminished after he assumed the federal office. In his first report to the Congress in 1938 he stated:

The Division intends to conclude affiliation agreements for the performance of this work with State departments of labor as rapidly as these State departments are in a position to undertake the functions. However, it is recognized that the building up of a trained inspection staff cannot be undertaken overnight in many States, and meanwhile the Wage and Hour Division has the responsibility for seeing that the statute is enforced until such time as States may be in a position gradually to take over these functions.²⁶

But a year later he reported new obstacles to early decentralization:

It is essential that uniform policies and procedures be maintained in order to give equal protection to employers and employees affected. . . . it was impossible at once to utilize fully state inspection staffs since there were no funds to reimburse State labor departments. . . . It was also deemed essential to maintain central control over all work connected with administration of the act during the period immediately after it became effective, so that policies and procedures would not vary from State to State.²⁷

Other objectives were claiming his attention, too. One of the factors in his selection was his prior experience with wage commissions in New York. He was anxious to move along rapidly with the establishment of industry committees under the FLSA, a step which had strong union support. It seems likely that the industry committee program was given precedence over cooperation with the states as to funds, policy formulation, and staff. Nevertheless, most Washington observers believe that had Andrews not resigned in October, 1939, more state agreements would have been made.

He was succeeded briefly by Colonel Philip B. Fleming of the Corps of Engineers, who had served as WPA Administrator in New York City. Among his qualifications for the Wage and Hour Division post were his reputed talents for administration and his high standing in the confidence of congressional committees. Administrator Fleming announced that he "intended to hold back to see how these agreements develop before we go ahead with other States, although some other States have asked for agreements. . . ." ²⁸

²⁶ Interim Report of the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division for the Period August 15 to December 31, 1938, U.S. Department of Labor (Washington: No G.P.O. imprint, 1939), Part II, p. 20.

²⁷ First Annual Report of the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division for the Calendar Year 1939 (Washington: G.P.O., 1940), p. 69.

In less than two years he in turn was succeeded by L. Metcalfe Walling, Administrator of the Public Contracts Division, who held the office until the end of the war. Before going to Washington in 1937, Mr. Walling had earned a brilliant reputation as labor commissioner of Rhode Island. Immediately after assuming office Walling was involved in a futile struggle to win for the Division a major role in defense (later in war) labor administration. Nevertheless, he succeeded in obtaining from the temporary war agencies a wide range of special investigation assignments. At the same time that the Division was assuming these new projects, there was a rapid expansion in the scope of investigative work under the Public Contracts Act. Both of these developments deflected interest from state cooperation. When the Division moved to New York in 1942, it lost investigative personnel to war agencies and private industry and there was no reservoir from which to draw replacements. Even had Administrator Walling supported an expansion of state cooperation, there would not have been adequate supervisory staff to execute such a program during the war. In the postwar period with a new Administrator, Wm. R. McComb, in charge, the Wage and Hour Division concentrated on raising the statutory minimum and was not interested in developing more state agreements. Recently, the Eisenhower Administration has conducted preliminary negotiations for cooperation with one state but no agreement has yet been reached.

At the state level, too, the emphasis during the war shifted from minimum wage enforcement to wage stabilization, labor supply, and better utilization and training of workers. Like the Wage and Hour Division, the state labor departments were hard pressed to retain inspectors. Since the end of the war, states like New York and Wisconsin, once eager to cooperate, are reported no longer to be interested. The complex problems arising under the overtime requirements of the FLSA are responsibilities not to be assumed lightly. The bureaucratic interest displayed in North Carolina, where participation in the federal program lent prestige and helped raise salaries for the state department, seems not to be a sufficient moving force by itself. And the prospect of federal reimbursement has not been an incentive powerful enough to counter tides that have turned strongly in the opposite direction. On the one hand, the same forces that brought about the Taft-Hartley Act secured the passage of "right-to-work" and other anti-labor manifestations from a number of state legislatures, and put the administration of state labor laws into hands guided by no innovating spirit. On the other hand, a high level of employment was worth a battalion of inspectors.

VIII. CONCLUSIONS

In retrospect, what conclusions can be drawn about the striking discrepancy between expectation and achievement under sections 11(b) and 4(b)? Seldom has an experiment been launched with more general approval. As a matter of fact, had these sections been controversial and the lines firmly drawn at the time the bill was considered by the Congress, perhaps there might have been more external agitation for cooperation during the first year or two. In this sense the policy reversal was non-political. But political considerations did enter in another way. As originally adopted, the act placed the Division in a semi-autonomous position in the Department of Labor. In less than two years the Secretary of Labor succeeded in subordinating the Division to a position comparable to that of the other Bureaus and won control of both its budget and its personnel. Thus the appropriations committees of both Houses considered the Division's estimates in the context of their long dislike for the Secretary of Labor. Only in 1942 were the Division's appropriations adequate for the task the Congress had assigned, and then it was too late; thus the Division's claim that it did not have funds for cooperative enforcement was substantially correct. For the most part congressional committees have been indifferent to cooperative enforcement.

²⁸ U.S. Congress, House, Hearings before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the Department of Labor-Federal Security Agency Appropriation Bill for 1942, 77th Cong., 1st sess. (Washington, G.P.O., 1941), Part 1, p. 339.

Another factor in the result was bureaucratic. The national office of the Wage and Hour Division was confronted with a rapid and unmanageable accumulation of uninvestigated complaint cases at a time when major enforcement policies were still in the making and labor unions were clamoring for the early establishment of industry committees. Under the most favorable circumstances, the process of negotiating cooperative agreements with the states was slow and tedious, sometimes requiring amendments to state constitutions and the adoption of enabling legislation, and in any event the recruitment and training of additional state staff. During the first year and a half the Wage and Hour Division saw no immediate solution for the complaint case backlog in rapid and wholesale extension of state cooperative arrangements. Meanwhile, political and administrative pressure to dispose of the accumulated cases led the Division to expand its own regional and field staff. Once brought into being, the field staff constituted a vested interest against transfer of investigative work to state officials.

Still another typically bureaucratic factor is the attitude of the top staff at the national office that when the state assumes part of the task the Division loses a large measure of control but remains responsible for results. Whatever the merits of this attitude, it is widely held and certain conditions lend it credence. Although the arrangements for state cooperation involved systematic and thorough review by both state and national officials, there is no denying that the field staff, whether federal or state, has a range of discretion in the selection of particular firms in the general categories to be investigated and in the scheduling of inspections. There appears to be some uneasiness about the competency of state staff. In a few states labor commissioners are elected; in some others the governor regards the position as a political plum useful in paying a campaign debt to organized labor or employer associations. The general level of salaries for state investigators being substantially below that of the federal government, the prospects of securing an equally competent staff seem dim.

Earlier in this article the question was raised whether correspondence between state and federal standards was a prerequisite for effective cooperation. On the evidence reviewed it can be concluded that except for such specialized programs as the regulation of homework and child labor in agriculture, correspondence is a negligible factor. Differences between state and federal laws unquestionably add complications for state enforcement personnel. However, even when the two statutes correspond in the main, there remain a large body of technical questions and areas of investigation (by reasons of differences in coverage and exemptions) as to which state personnel need further training. Taken together, the North Carolina and Minnesota experiments suggest that caliber, morale, and training of state staff is a far more important factor in judging suitability for the task of enforcing the federal law than correspondence of that law to state legislation.

Finally, the conclusion is inescapable that the mere availability of federal funds whether in terms of an authorizing statute or even in terms of available appropriations²⁹ is not by itself, in the political and economic climate which has prevailed since 1940, a sufficient inducement to bring federal and state authorities eagerly and promptly into cooperative arrangements. This is not to say that another generation may not see other steps taken under sections 11(b) and 4(b). But it does suggest that federal reimbursement is no general panacea for assuring ready state help in enforcing federal law. Had the states had going staffs at the effective date of the FLSA, the experience under sections 11(b) and 4(b) might have been different. Since 1938 the total dimensions of the enforcement problem have shrunk despite increases in the number of establishments subject to the act.³⁰ A sharp change in economic conditions might promote renewed interest in this now moribund experiment.

²⁹ Although the 1942 budget was regarded as adequate, it did not, as a matter of fact, include substantial appropriations for reimbursement under section 11(b).

³⁰ The number of employees estimated to be subject to the FLSA increased from approximately 12,600,000 in 1939 to 20,900,000 in 1951. Coverage was reduced by the 1949 amendments.

The Wage and Hour Division has refused to accept the views urged by the House Appropriations Committee that as employers become acquainted with the provisions of the law the Division can inspect a decreasingly smaller percentage of covered establishments without deleterious effects on compliance. The Division has consistently maintained that violations occur because: (1) the employer is ignorant of the requirements, (2) the violations are technical and unintentional and will be corrected when discovered, (3) the violations are willful, and (4) the employer contests the Administrator's interpretation of the act. Although most employers comply, the Division contends that there will always be a small percentage, but numerically a rather substantial number, who can be brought into compliance only by inspection. The large number of new firms since the end of World War II complicates enforcement. Violation rates remain surprisingly stable despite improved economic circumstances, partly as a result of the Division's improved techniques for concentrating inspections in areas and industries where compliance is the poorest, and partly because overtime violations increase as wages increase. In 1942 the Division inspected 74,676 establishments compared to 26,189 in 1950.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR PAKISTAN

JAMES W. SPAIN

Columbia University

On November 1, 1953 the Karachi correspondent of the New York Times filed a dispatch reporting that discussions of a military alliance between Pakistan and the United States were about to begin. On February 25, 1954 President Eisenhower announced that the United States had decided to give military assistance to Pakistan for the purpose of "strengthening the defensive capabilities of the Middle East." With the President's statement a new and powerful force entered the international politics of South Asia and another landmark of American foreign policy was set up. In the four months which intervened between the newspaper report and the official announcement, most of the important trends and issues in contemporary world politics had touched on or been touched by the U. S.-Pakistan proposal. Internal and external affairs of a dozen countries were affected. Most of the instruments of diplomacy and propaganda were employed to support or oppose agreement. Of primary importance to the United States was the clear and specific implementation of our established policy of supporting regional alliances of free nations to "contain" Soviet aggression and to prevent further expansion. Because of the novelty of the area into which the policy was extended, the speed with which it was implemented, and the precision of the reactions of all parties, American military assistance for Pakistan constitutes an almost ideal case study of international relations in a world in which the movement of events has been greatly accelerated.

Though unique in many respects, the U.S.-Pakistan agreement was quite ordinary in one. It took place in an atmosphere of public clamor and official silence. This was especially true of the American role. It is not always possible, therefore, to catalog events with absolute certainty or to determine with complete accuracy each step in development of the proposal. Press coverage was wide and full, however, and much of it was obviously the result of deliberate "leaks" by official sources. Even from this it is possible to extract a significant pattern. This pattern can best be seen by consideration of the events which shaped it under four general categories: (1) official reaction; (2) pressure of press and public; (3) implementation of the aid program and the changes it underwent in development; and (4) factors which underlie the U.S. decision to arm Pakistan, and their meaning.

I

The first public report that the United States was considering a military alliance with Pakistan appeared in the New York Times of November 2, 1953. The correspondent stated that discussions would take place when Pakistan's Governor General Ghulam Mohammed visited President Eisenhower in Washington on November 12. He quoted "a high Government official . . . cabinet ministers and high-ranking military men," and stated that Pakistan "was willing to consider an exchange of air bases for military equipment." On November 11, the Associated Press reported from London that "British and Pakistani informants" had confirmed that "the United States was negotiating with Pakistan for permission to establish military bases there in exchange for defense aid."¹

It was at this point that official notice was first taken. On the same day the State Department admitted that there had been "general conversations" on the subject, but insisted that no "negotiations" had been undertaken. The next day Governor General Ghulam Mohammed called on President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles. Later, a State Department press officer said that there had been "continuous conversations and considerations" of Middle East defense, but insisted that it was "beside the fact" to look upon the Governor General's visit "as part of an integrated specific program" or as anything which involved "concrete suggestions."² With the Governor General in Washington were Foreign Minister Zafrullah Khan and Army Commander-in-Chief General Ayub Khan.

Prime Minister Nehru of India first commented on developments in his press conference of November 15 in New Delhi. He described reports of a U.S.-Pakistan military alliance as "a matter of the most intense concern to us," and added that he was "watching these developments with the greatest care." He said his views had been conveyed informally to the United States. In Washington the next day, Indian Ambassador G. L. Mehta, after a visit with Secretary Dulles, told newsmen that the subject of the conversation had been military assistance for Pakistan. In his news conference of November 17, Secretary Dulles in answer to a reporter's question declared flatly that no negotiations were underway at the time that would provide Pakistan with military assistance or that would lead to the establishment of American bases there. The following day President Eisenhower told his press conference that the United States would be most cautious about doing anything for Pakistan that might create unrest or hysteria in India.³

Pakistan now got in a few verbal blows. Governor General Ghulam Mohammed, in London on his way home, expressed surprise that Mr. Nehru had commented on the reports of a military alliance "without first thinking it necessary to verify their veracity." Pakistan's High Commissioner in New Delhi lodged an official protest over Prime Minister Nehru's "outburst."⁴ Prime Minister Mohammed Ali in Karachi told the United Press that it was "absurd and ridiculous to think Pakistan with seventy-six million people would attack India with three hundred and forty million." He denounced Mr. Nehru's objections as "a manoeuvre to set up a position for India as the potential balance

¹ New York Times, November 12, 1953. For the sake of simplicity, references are to the New York Times except in cases where the event concerned was not reported in the Times or the kind of coverage given in the cited publication is significant in itself.

² NYT, Nov. 12, 13, 1953.

³ NYT, Nov. 16, 17, 18, 19, 1953.

⁴ NYT, Nov. 22, 1953.

of power in Asia between the Eastern and Western blocs." In London, Foreign Minister Zafrullah Khan denied that the proposals under consideration included American bases in Pakistan and belittled Indian fears.⁵

Meanwhile Prime Minister Nehru increased his public opposition to the proposal. He warned that it would "bring the cold war to India's borders," and that it would have "far-reaching consequences on the whole structure of things in South Asia."⁶

During his visit to Pakistan in early December, Vice President Nixon denied all knowledge of plans for military assistance for Pakistan. He stated: "It was not discussed in the National Security Council before I left Washington nor was it included in the State Department briefings given to me." Immediately upon his return, however, it was generally accepted that the Vice President was recommending military aid for Pakistan in his report to the President and the National Security Council.⁷

Next the protests shifted to the formal diplomatic level. On December 11, Communist China joined the USSR and India in a formal protest to Pakistan concerning the proposal to accept military assistance. Ten days later Sardar Najibullah, then Afghan Ambassador in India (who frequently issued foreign policy statements for the Government of Afghanistan), announced that his government was opposed to aid, which would turn Pakistan into a "colonial power." On December 19, Pakistan replied to the Russian protest, stating that it is "the duty of the Pakistan Government to take every step to safeguard the security of Pakistan and in the discharge of this paramount duty and all other duties that fall upon the Government, to adopt and take such measures as may appear appropriate and adequate." The note also called the attention of the Soviet government to statements by the Governor General and Prime Minister that there had "never been any question of granting military bases in Pakistan to the United States of America."⁸

India now sought new channels through which pressure might be applied to block the agreement. On December 16 Prime Minister Nehru ordered his Congress party to organize demonstrations throughout India against a Pakistan-U.S. alliance. On December 23 Sir John Kotelawala, Ceylon's Prime Minister, announced that he had proposed a meeting of Asian prime ministers to discuss the question of world peace. Mr. Nehru revealed at once that he intended to bring up "the dangerous step" the United States and Pakistan were taking at the meeting. During the last week in December India circulated a memorandum to friendly governments in the Middle East and the Commonwealth setting forth its objections to American military assistance for Pakistan. There is reason to believe that at the same time Indian diplomats throughout the world were instructed to exert their influence against aid for Pakistan. An attempt to persuade Canada to intercede with the United States was reported.

⁵ Pakistan News Digest (Karachi), Dec. 15, 1953.

⁶ NYT, Nov. 16, 1953.

⁷ NYT, Dec. 10, 14, 19, 1953; Newsweek, Jan. 4, 1954.

⁸ NYT, Dec. 14, 20, 23, 1953.

The sudden development of a neutralist attitude in Cairo was attributed to the great personal influence exercised by Indian Ambassador S. K. M. Pannikar on General Naguib. Indian officials in the United States and the United Nations began to put out urgent private warnings to their friends that military support to Pakistan would cause permanent loss of India's friendship and push her into the Soviet bloc.⁹

Substance seemed to be given to the warnings by a series of Indian moves during December and January. A five-year bilateral trade agreement between India and the USSR was signed in New Delhi December 2. It included provisions for Russian heavy machinery and Soviet technical assistance. The sending of a team of government engineers to Red China to study flood control was announced December 14. The same day the Associated Press reported from New Delhi that diplomatic sources in the Indian capital had revealed that Soviet Ambassador Mikhail A. Menshikov had made an informal bid to discuss the sale of military equipment to India if the United States supplied arms to Pakistan. Long-stalled negotiations with Red China on the Tibet border were reopened at a conference in Peiking at the end of the month. Thirty Soviet artists arrived in New Delhi early in January as part of a cultural mission invited and paid for by the Indian government. On January 15 India denounced its seven-year-old Commercial Air agreement with the United States, and the right of American airlines to do business in India became subject to renegotiation.¹⁰ Reports of a secret defense pact between India, China, and Russia were widely publicized in England and grew so strong that on December 31 the Indian Foreign Office was compelled to issue a detailed denial.¹¹

Indian decision on many of these items, especially the trade pact and Tibet negotiations, obviously pre-dated the military aid argument. All were perfectly in accord with the established policy of working with both sides in the "cold war." The manner in which the new ties with the Communist nations were finalized and made public, however, suggests that the Indian Government was deliberately taking the opportunity to demonstrate that it could not be pressured into cooperation with the West by the prospect of American military support for its unfriendly neighbor, Pakistan.

As the controversy went on, Indian pressure was applied directly to Pakistan at her most vulnerable spot. At a meeting in August, 1953, Prime Ministers Mohammed Ali and Nehru had agreed to the appointment of a plebiscite administrator for Kashmir before April 30, 1954. Representatives of both governments began meetings in New Delhi December 21 to prepare the way for settlement of outstanding disputes and selection of an administrator. Considering the long and thorny background of the Kashmir dispute, the meetings went remarkably well, and at the end of the month it was reported unofficially that measures of agreement had been reached on everything except the identity of the plebiscite administrator and the disposition of troops during the plebiscite. At the end of the Delhi session, the meetings were shifted to Karachi. Shortly after the talks began, however, Prime Minister Nehru warned in a speech in the lower house of the Indian Parliament that "the whole context" of the August agreement on Kashmir "will change if military aid comes to Pakistan." On February 6 the Kashmir Constituent Assembly formally ratified the state's accession to India. After vigorous protests from Pakistan and criticism in the world press, an Indian official issued a statement that ratification "does not add anything to the previous position" and that "the Government of India were bound to the commitments made by it and stood by the offer of a plebiscite under suitable conditions." A week later, however, President Rajendra Prasad told a joint session of the Indian Parliament that American military assistance to Pakistan had "unfortunately come in the way of" pending negotiations on Kashmir.¹²

⁹ NYT, Dec. 17, 24, 25, 26, 1953; Jan. 2, 4, 1954. The Asian Prime Ministers' Conference was eventually held in Colombo April 27-May 1, 1954. The subject of American military assistance to Pakistan was not officially discussed, the other participants having refused to consider it a concern of the Conference.

¹⁰ NYT, Dec. 3, 15, 1953; Jan. 5, 16, 1954.

¹¹ London Times, Dec. 31, 1953. The Sino-Indian Treaty on Tibet, which was subsequently signed on April 29, 1954, unconditionally turned over all Indian property in Tibet to China and granted the latter rights in the border area never before recognized.

In the past Kashmir has been the touchstone by which the Pakistani public judges almost all important policy issues. The coupling of negotiations with India on Kashmir with those with the United States on military aid posed a serious problem to Prime Minister Mohammed Ali. Pakistan began a series of carefully considered conciliatory gestures. On December 26, Mohammed Ali wrote the Indian Prime Minister describing the proposed arrangement with the United States as one which would increase India's security as well as that of Pakistan and saying that he could not understand why India was "bothered" about the proposals. On January 7, 1954 Foreign Minister Zafrullah Khan said that Pakistan would have no objections to the United States' giving India military assistance. "Why should we have any objections if India is in need of any equipment and can obtain it from a friendly state like the United States?" he asked in a Karachi interview. On February 5 Mohammed Ali revealed that he had written to Mr. Nehru suggesting a meeting to discuss the question of American military aid to Pakistan. He added: "I shall strive to convince Mr. Nehru that Pakistan's acceptance of military aid does not mean she has aggressive designs against India."¹³

While all this was going on, the United States officially said not a word. On January 2 Senator William F. Knowland, Republican Majority Leader, attacked "neutralist" Indian opposition to the military assistance proposal and called Pakistan "one of the key, important countries in the entire world in relation to the defense against Communism." On January 5 the situation took a new turn when it was authoritatively reported that a defense alliance among

¹² London Times, Dec. 30, 1953; NYT, Dec. 22, 24, 29, 30, 1953; Feb. 7, 15, 16, 1954.

¹³ NYT, Dec. 27, 1953; Jan. 8, Feb. 6, 1954. No such meeting between the two Prime Ministers ever took place.

Pakistan, Turkey, and Iraq was being encouraged by the United States.¹⁴ On January 12 Secretary Dulles made his strong speech before the Council on Foreign Relations stating that American security policies were now based on the concept that the United States must confront any aggressor with "a great capacity to retaliate, instantly, by means and at places of our own choosing."

As the United States moved toward a decision, the lines of difference in South Asia became more obvious. Prime Minister Nehru reiterated his earlier refusal to accept military aid from anyone and proposed a series of non-aggression pacts among Asia's neutrals to keep them "free of some of the terrible trouble that is overtaking the world." He said that if Pakistan accepted American military aid, "she becomes progressively a war area and progressively her policies are controlled by others. To deny this has little meaning. Freedom recedes in Asia and the currents of history are reversed." Mohammed Ali's reply was: "We will refuse, refuse, refuse to be dictated to by anyone, including India."¹⁵

On February 7 it was reported unofficially that the National Security Council had approved military assistance for Pakistan. On February 19 came an official announcement from Karachi and Ankara that Pakistan and Turkey were working on a pact for the purpose of "strengthening peace and security in their interest." On February 22 Pakistan submitted a formal request for military assistance to the United States. Three days later President Eisenhower issued a statement approving the request and announcing negotiation of a Mutual Defense Assistance Program agreement with Pakistan. Included in the statement was the text of a letter from the President to Prime Minister Nehru reaffirming American friendship for India and offering a similar program of military assistance to that country.¹⁶ Thus ended the story which had begun less than four months earlier.

II

Though the sovereign states still object strongly to any direct contact by the United Nations with the peoples of the earth, the technique is considered quite acceptable when practiced by the states themselves. Throughout their dispute over military assistance, both India and Pakistan were careful to frame their official words and actions with an eye to the effect they would have not only on the governments concerned but on public opinion within their own and each others' countries and in the United States.

Prime Minister Nehru continually emphasized his contention that the arming of Pakistan would bring the world closer to war. His suggestion that India might feel compelled to break off negotiations on Kashmir if Pakistan accepted American military aid was aimed at the man in the street in Pakistan, who has come to cherish success in Kashmir above all things. Indian statements carried a note of sadness and disillusion with a formerly friendly United States. Regret at the withering of old ties of affection and respect was aimed at liberals in the

¹⁴ NYT, Jan. 3, 6, 1954.

¹⁵ NYT, Jan. 24, 25, 1954.

¹⁶ NYT, Feb. 8, 20, 23, 26, 1954.

United States, who had long supported a free India and admired Nehru's idealistic policy. While the Prime Minister himself remained silent on the subject of the Soviet Union, lesser officials and influential Indians did not hesitate to point out that if the United States embraced Pakistan, India would have to turn to the Communist bloc.

The more critical of the United States India became, the closer Pakistan sidled up. Prime Minister Mohammed Ali, drawing on the liberal education in practical politics he had received while serving as Pakistan's Ambassador in Washington, went out of his way to be flattering. He publicly disassociated Pakistan from the Asian neutralist group, and rejected Chinese and Russian protests in language stronger than was deemed necessary by some of his Cabinet. He vigorously defended American activities in Asia, saying: "The United States desires only peace and its efforts should be appreciated; it is activated by a great good." He drew a parallel between the "power vacuum" which now exists in South Asia and the absence of military strength in South Korea which invited aggression there in 1950. He annoyed Scotland Yard and his own CID by requesting assistance from the FBI in clearing up the mystery which still surrounds the assassination of Prime Minister Liaquat Ali Kahn in 1951.¹⁷

These are not the things—or at least the repetition and multiplication of them are not—which influence governments directly. They do have an effect, however. India has always had more appeal in the United States than has Pakistan, and under the urging of a group of influential Americans, a ground swell of public opposition to a pact with Pakistan began to develop. In the early stages of discussion, Pakistani officials at home and in the United States had been quietly confident that their case was impregnable. Top American officials were obviously favorable and the Pentagon was actually enthusiastic. Planning was proceeding quickly and smoothly. As Indian pressure built up, however, official Washington remained silent except for conciliatory statements toward India. Pakistanis began to worry and cast about for a way of countering the trend in public opinion. Lacking an organized pro-Pakistan group in the United States, they were forced simply to remain silent and hope for the best.

From the very beginning, the role of the press was of primary importance. The first information that an American-Pakistani agreement was in the offing came in the New York Times dispatch already referred to. It was startling and unexpected news to students of international politics in South Asia and had all the earmarks of a deliberate "leak." Of the American papers which took a definite stand, the Times was the most important. It supported the aid program and gave heavy coverage to developments. During the four months from November, 1953 through February, 1954, the Times ran no less than nine editorials and eleven detailed analyses by its New York and Washington staff. Scarcely a day passed without a news story from Karachi or Delhi.

Naturally the press in India and Pakistan echoed the policy of the respective governments. Significantly, the violence of Prime Minister Nehru's opposition forced even the Pakistan Times of Lahore, a Communist-line paper whose editor is still in jail for his part in the "Rawalpindi Conspiracy" to overthrow the government in 1951, to defend Pakistan's freedom to accept aid from whomever she chose.¹⁸

¹⁷ NYT, Dec. 18, 20, 1953; Jan. 2, 1954.

The British press gave heavy coverage to events in India and Pakistan but paralleled the government in calling attention to Britain's interests in the area, weighing the pros and cons of the American effort, and avoiding a definite commitment until the American decision to go ahead became obvious.¹⁹

The deliberate "leak" was widely employed. The first news of the pact, "leaked" to the New York Times correspondent in Karachi November 1, was confirmed ten days later by "British informants" in London. The eventual announcement that the British government favored the pact was anticipated in a news story. That a Pakistan-Turkey alliance was in the making first came out in a reporter's despatch from Ankara. Though no announcement was ever made by the National Security Council, the New York Times was able to report flatly on February 8 that the proposal had been approved by the Council a few days before.²⁰ Exactly two weeks before President Eisenhower's announcement, the Karachi Dawn described with complete accuracy the agreement which had been reached and the way it would be made public.²¹

It is clear that in Pakistan and India public opinion was in almost complete agreement with government policy. American prestige in Pakistan was at its peak last spring and summer as a result of the gift of 700,000 tons of wheat, some of which was being delivered at the very time discussions on military assistance were taking place. Vice President Nixon, Secretary Dulles, and Senator Knowland were given overwhelming welcomes during their visits to Pakistan. Even H. S. Suhrawardy, bitter critic of practically everything the present government of Pakistan has done and leader of the subsequently successful United Front opposition to the Muslim League government in the East Bengal elections, gave public support to American military assistance.²²

American objection to Indian support of Red China, bickering over the Korean POW's, United States leadership in the defeat of Madame Pandit's attempt to call a special session of the United Nations General Assembly to deal with the Korean peace conference, and departure from India of the popular Chester Bowles put a strain on American-Indian relations. Public anger rose under the hands of skilled Congress agitators. In ordering Congress into the fight, Prime Minister Nehru himself had been careful to insist: "There should be no condemnation of Pakistan in this matter, nor should there be any condemnation of the United States either as a country or as a Government, but the policy [of arming Pakistan] should be condemned as dangerous to world peace and to India." The unsophisticated masses tended to overlook such subtle distinctions. The leftist Bakshi government in Kashmir encouraged anti-American propaganda. Three thousand government ordnance workers at Cawnpore adopted a resolution calling for a boycott of American imports and the expulsion

¹⁸ Pakistan Times (Lahore), Dec. 22, 1953; Jan. 25, 1954 (editorials).

¹⁹ e.g., London Times, Jan. 12, 1954 (editorial).

²⁰ NYT, Jan. 26, 29, 1954; New York Herald-Tribune, Jan. 24, 1954 (Alsops).

²¹ Dawn (Karachi), Feb. 13, 1954.

²² Statesman (Calcutta), Feb. 27, 1954.

from India of all American technical personnel. Ten thousand people gathered in Gandhi Park in New Delhi to participate in a rally reminiscent of the great Congress demonstrations which shook British power. It included marching children, women, and caste groups. The marchers carried banners warning "Hands off Asia!" and listened to fiery party orators denounce the proposed agreement between Pakistan and the United States. Though Congress leaders declared that it had been necessary for them to initiate the agitation to prevent the Communists from seizing the issue and running away with it, the extreme right also threatened to take control. Master Tara Singh, Sikh leader, urged negotiation of defense pacts with China and Russia as an answer to American aid to Pakistan.²³ The possibility of defeat in provincial elections in the East Punjab and in Travencore-Cochin (a possibility that became a fact in the latter case) spurred the Congress to heightened appeal to public emotion. Criticism of this form of opposition was widespread in the outside world, however, and after the initial demonstrations Congress allowed it to taper off.²⁴ The resolution finally adopted in the Congress National Convention put forward objection to a military alliance between Pakistan and the United States but also described the latter as "a champion of freedom and democracy."²⁵

Strangely, it was only in the United States that government action does not seem to have been in accord with such public opinion as was expressed. A large majority of letters to the New York Times by experts on Asian affairs opposed military assistance for Pakistan.²⁶ In an article in The New Leader former Ambassador Chester Bowles gave weight to Indian warnings by questioning the wisdom of supporting 76 million people only to alienate 340 million. Speaking of the strategic implications of the pact, he said: "Instead of adding to the stability of the subcontinent, this will create new tensions and suspicions, and thus further contribute to its insecurity."²⁷ Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt stated her opposition to arms aid for Pakistan at a meeting of the Citizens Conference on International Economic Union, and a letter signed by seventeen of the Union's leaders objecting to the assistance program was made public at the same meeting. Representative Emanuel Celler of New York objected strongly to the alliance in public appearances. Dr. E. Stanley Jones, well-known American missionary to India, was vocal in his opposition. Senator Knowland was the only public figure to give vigorous support to aid for Pakistan, though Senator H. Alexander Smith of New Jersey characterized India as "unduly apprehensive" about the arrangement.²⁸

In spite of this opposition Washington carried through the aid pact. Public opinion apparently had little effect. The decision was made by State Department and Pentagon "professionals." With the negligible exception of Repre-

²³ NYT, Nov. 26, Dec. 17, 18, 21, 27, 1953.

²⁴ e.g., NYT, Dec. 18, 22, 1953 (editorials).

²⁵ NYT, Jan. 24, 1954.

²⁶ Among them were Professor W. Norman Brown and three colleagues at the University of Pennsylvania, Dr. E. Stanley Jones, Norman Thomas, Zenas L. Potter, and J. J. Singh. Dr. F. S. C. Northrop and George Fielding Elliot registered approval of the pact.

²⁷ New Leader, Feb. 22, 1954.

²⁸ NYT, Dec. 16, 31, 1953; Jan. 3, Feb. 27, 1954; Bulletin of the Foreign Policy Association, Feb. 15, 1954.

sentative Celler, public opposition found no champion in government. It must be remembered that the decision was perfectly in accord with established U. S. policy on regional alliances. A general lack of knowledge about Pakistan in the United States, the speed with which events progressed, and the need to come to a decision before the heavy pressures built up by Pakistan and India for and against the alliance got out of hand, all made for the desirability of an "expert" decision rather than the "great debate" usually accorded to broader foreign policy proposals. Even so, the State Department's refusal to comment while the matter was under consideration drew criticism from highly diverse sources.²⁹

Of passing interest is the fact that no one, not even India, attempted to introduce discussion of the issue into the United Nations. This may be accepted as a pretty fair indication of the extent to which Articles 51 and 52 of the Charter, the "escape clauses" for regional alliances outside the world organization and action based on "the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense," have been accepted.

III

As has already been seen, the decision to support Pakistan was worked out almost entirely during the period November 1, 1953 to February 25, 1954. It was implemented with speed and precision during an immediately subsequent period of equal duration. In mid-March a military survey team under Brigadier General Henry F. Myers arrived in Pakistan to study arms requirements. General Myers had served in the American Embassy in Karachi a few years previously and was well acquainted with Pakistani military leaders. On April 2 Pakistan and Turkey signed their contemplated Treaty of Friendly Collaboration in Karachi. The government of Iraq announced on April 25 that the United States had approved its request for military assistance. In May General Myers and his team also did an evaluation of Iraqi arms needs. A Mutual Defence Assistance agreement between the United States and Pakistan was signed in Karachi May 19, at which time American Ambassador Horace Hildreth was already in Washington discussing the amount of aid to be given to Pakistan. During a three-day visit to Ankara in mid-June, Pakistani Prime Minister Mohammed Ali was present at ratification of the Turkish-Pakistani agreement of April 2. The next day it was made known that he had reached accord with Turkish officials on measures to implement the treaty. Within a few days, representatives of the General Staffs of the two countries met to develop a mechanism for military cooperation.³⁰

The amount and kind of aid to Pakistan had not been made public at the date of writing, but it is to come out of $75 million left over from last year's assistance program. The initial grant is expected to be no more than $25 million for equipment and supplies. Pakistan has agreed that the arms will not be used aggressively and has committed itself to cooperation with the United States in control of trade with "nations which threaten world peace." Promises to participate in United Nations efforts for collective security and to supply to the

²⁹ NYT, Feb. 28, 1954 (editorial); Statesman, Jan. 2, 1954.

³⁰ NYT, Mar. 10, Apr. 3, 26, May 20, 24, June 15, 1954. For texts of the two agreements, see Middle East Journal, Vol. 8, Pp. 337-38 (Summer, 1954).

United States strategic raw materials available in Pakistan are also included. There is no provision for American bases in Pakistan.

Since all discussions took place in secret, there is no way of knowing for certain the stages through which the program evolved. There are, however, indications of a trend toward moderation as negotiations went on, and the actual composition of the program as it finally emerges may well have been influenced by the vigor of India's protests. Original news stories described negotiation of a "military alliance" involving "exchange of air bases for military equipment." The cost of bringing Pakistan's fighting forces up to full potential was estimated at $250-500 million.³¹ According to Indian sources in December, the assistance was to include two or three flotillas of destroyers, 3,000 aircraft, equipment for an armored division, and thousands of American pilots and technicians. Later it was reported that bases would not be granted outright but "facilities to be operated only in case of war" would be constructed.³² The word "alliance" was soon replaced by "assistance" in discussion of the pact.³³

President Eisenhower's statement approving military assistance for Pakistan began with a reference to the Pakistani-Turkish treaty as "a constructive step toward better ensuring the security of the whole area of the Middle East."³⁴ Subsequent approval of arms aid for Iraq and efforts to broaden the Pakistani-Turkish pact to include other nations indicate a shifting from emphasis on "plugging the South Asian hole" to "stabilizing Middle East defense." The latter is an older and more cherished aim of American foreign policy than the former, and will certainly influence the kind of military expansion to be undertaken by the new ally.³⁵

IV

Thus, as far as this sphere of American strategic planning is concerned, India may become to a certain extent an extraneous element. From the time of Partition, the United States has looked toward cooperation with a mutually friendly India and Pakistan. In the early years American policy was directed primarily at solution of difficulties outstanding between the two nations. Many Americans continued to think of the whole subcontinent as a unit in the game of world politics. In the course of five years, two facts became evident: (1) India and Pakistan had emerged as distinct and separate states, each determined to go its own way, with little likelihood of early settlement of their conflicts, especially that over Kashmir; and (2) India's policy was becoming one of strict neutrality and she aimed at the spread of this policy over as much of Asia as possible. The choice forced on the United States was obvious, and even before the outbreak of fighting in Korea we had begun to move toward a new approach to the problem of South Asia. India's attitude during and at the conclusion of the Korean fighting and her growing neutralism, coupled with recognition and ³¹ NYT, Nov. 17, Dec. 20, 1953.

³² London Times, Dec. 31, 1953.

³³ e.g., NYT, Dec. 24, 1953 (Arthur Krock).

³⁴ NYT, Feb. 26, 1954.

³⁵ For a discussion of the implications for the Middle East of the new agreements, see James W. Spain, "Middle East Defense: A New Approach," Middle East Journal, Vol. 8, Pp. 251-66 (Summer, 1954).

support of Red China, gave impetus to the American search for a different solution. Ambassador Bowles' close contact with Indian officials and his assurances of admiration and friendship temporarily checked the widening gap between Indian and American policies and smoothed the difference over in the public eye. With the advent of a Republican administration, a sterner, although still friendly, approach to India appeared, and Prime Minister Nehru's objections to all "cold war" maneuvering were not allowed to influence American foreign policy. The government and people of India, insufficiently aware of the undercurrents of the preceding years, were taken by surprise with the Pakistani-American overtures of late 1953. A feeling of outrage and betrayal was immediately evident. The very violence of Indian opposition put the United States in a corner as far as international prestige was concerned. Prime Minister Nehru's unqualified denunciation, while quite consistent with his own ideology, left the United States no "out." It had to bow to Indian pressure and drop all consideration of military aid to Pakistan or force it through in spite of Indian objections. As was quickly pointed out, rejection of Pakistani overtures would mean a death blow to American hopes for other Asian countries to join in defense measures with the West.³⁶

From the American viewpoint, the "tying-in" of Pakistan with the worldwide defense scheme is perfectly consistent with established policy. President Eisenhower pointed out when he announced approval of it: "I have said repeatedly that regional groupings to ensure security against aggression constitute the most effective means to assure survival and progress." This echoes the foreign policy views of the previous Democratic administration. The American record to date has shown an eagerness, at times almost unbecoming, to welcome any nation desiring "to stand up and be counted." Tito's Yugoslavia and Franco's Spain have been brought in. American planners pushing for greater defense efforts in Europe, Southeast Asia, and the Pacific must have been acutely aware of the effect on world opinion of a refusal to accept Pakistan, which came with a clean record. Such a move would inevitably be interpreted as signifying a change in United States policy. The most likely explanation would be that American fear of Soviet aggression had lessened and that it was no longer deemed necessary to continue defense planning at such a high intensity. If the fear of further alienation of already neutralist India was greater than the fear of Communist attack against a weak point in the defense ring, must not the "cold war" be tapering off?

The assumption from this is that the United States in the future will promote the development of leaders in the Middle East and support regional efforts at indigenous groupings around them rather than attempt to make separate bilateral arrangements with each country concerned. The need for defense preparations, particularly in the eastern part of the area, is made all the more acute by the almost certain existence of a growing source of hostile strength beyond the mountains to the north.³⁷ The effectiveness of the current steps can be judged from the series of sharp notes of warning sent by the USSR to Turkey, Pakistan, Egypt, and the Arab states in the third week of March, 1954. A

³⁶ NYT, Dec. 10, 1953.

³⁷ NYT, Dec. 28, 1953; New York Herald-Tribune, Jan. 24, 1954.

Western-sponsored Middle East military pact, said Moscow, would be considered "an unfriendly and even hostile act" against her.³⁸

American access to bases in time of war under formal treaty commitments presently stops in Saudi Arabia on the west and Korea and the Philippines on the east. No such commitment is included in the 1952 MDAP pact with Iran and the current one with Pakistan, nor is one likely to figure in any agreement signed with Iraq. Military planners tend to assume, however (and there is little reason to believe that they are not justified in doing so), that such facilities as might be available in Pakistan would be offered in case of a major war. This jumps the world-girdling circle another two thousand miles ahead in each direction to East and West Pakistan. When the range of modern military aircraft is considered, it is probably not rash to say that the circle has actually been closed.³⁹ Whatever may be the broader implications of Secretary Dulles' "instant retaliation" statement, it is likely that such action is now at least possible anywhere in the world.

It is seldom that a single action solves an entire problem in international relations, and there are still some question marks in this one. Burma and Ceylon, while being careful not to associate themselves with India's violent opposition to Pakistan, have shown no signs of rallying to the Moslem state as the focus of a new alignment in South Asia committed to the West. The lasting effect on Indian-American relations of the alliance with Pakistan cannot yet be calculated. The only immediate reaction was Prime Minister Nehru's call for withdrawal of American members of the United Nations Commission on Kashmir and his statement that in the future India would rely less on foreign aid.⁴⁰

Of incidental interest is a case of the "unintended effect" in international relations. President Eisenhower's letter to Prime Minister Nehru after aid had been approved for Pakistan was meant to be conciliatory. It offered a similar program of military assistance to India. Prime Minister Nehru had frequently stated his opposition in principle to the idea of military aid and received the letter in another light. Said he: "In making this suggestion, the President has done less than justice to us or to himself. If we object to military aid being given to Pakistan, we would be hypocrites and unprincipled opportunists to accept such aid ourselves." This echoed Indian reaction to President Eisenhower's earlier assurance that the United States would be most cautious about doing anything for Pakistan that might create "unrest or hysteria" in India. "We are not a hysterical people," responded an Indian Foreign Office official.⁴¹

The gears clashed again when it was revealed a few days after approval of military aid for Pakistan that a small team of American military technicians were already actually in India training Indian Air Force men in the operation of the U. S. C-119 "Flying Boxcar," twenty-six of which are being purchased by India, necessarily with the help of the United States government.⁴²

³⁸ NYT, Mar. 20, 24, 1954.

³⁹ NYT, Jan. 24, 1954 (see map).

⁴⁰ NYT, Mar. 2, 7, 15, 16, 1954.

⁴¹ NYT, Mar. 2, 1954.

⁴² NYT, Mar. 5, 1954.

British support for the Pakistan-United States-Turkey arrangement was late in coming and half-hearted at best. The extension of direct American influence into an area long an exclusive British responsibility and the shifting of the center of interest from Suez, where the British needed support against Egyptian demands for evacuation, to Turkey and Pakistan, where British interests are no longer strong, are apt to be sources of irritation to Anglo-American relations in the area. Formally, however, all was well. Anthony Eden in the House of Commons welcomed "reinforcement of the ties of friendship" between an ally, Turkey, and a member of the Commonwealth, Pakistan. A few days later when the U.S.-Pakistan agreement was announced, a Foreign Office spokesman expressed approval of "anything enabling a fellow member of the Commonwealth to make an increased contribution to the defence of the free world."⁴³

One other lesson may be drawn from the events of November, 1953-February, 1954: seldom does anything in international relations move in a straight line. In the midst of recriminations, India and the United States signed a $20 million project agreement under the $89 million American aid program for the current year in India. While their two prime ministers were exchanging charges, India and Pakistan reached agreement on long-outstanding disputes over refugee bank deposits and division of railway equipment. Resumption of the Lahore-Amritsar rail connection, the tracks of which had been torn up after Partition, was also agreed upon. Although negotiations eventually ended without success, the committee working out the terms of the August, 1953 agreement for a Kashmir plebiscite at one point reached greater accord than ever before.

It seems fair to conclude that the series of events discussed has contributed to the sharpening of certain important trends in international relations. Chief among these are: (1) the American effort to counter the threat of Soviet aggression by development of defensive strength on a worldwide basis continues and is increasing rather than decreasing in vigor; (2) for the achievement of this aim, the regional alliance rather than the United Nations is the main instrument; (3) the United States is acting strongly in opposition to the development of a neutral "third block" in world politics; (4) with less historical reason than its European allies, the United States has assumed responsibility for the organization of defense efforts in the Middle East (and indeed in all of Asia); (5) the focus of interest in that area is shifting from the Arab-dominated west to the Turco-Pakistani-dominated east; and (6) India has been further isolated from the West, and a severe blow has been dealt to her policy of neutralism for Asia and her aspirations for leadership of that continent.

⁴³ e.g., London Times, Jan. 12, 1954 (editorial); Manchester Guardian cartoon by Low reprinted in NYT, Mar. 14, 1954; Hansard's House of Commons Debates, Feb. 22, 1954, p. 14; Dawn, Feb. 26, 1954. After Anglo-Egyptian agreement had been reached on the Suez base, however, the London Times in an editorial of August 4, 1954 found itself able to refer to "the Karachi-Ankara axis, with its realistic attitude toward the power-vacuum in the Middle East, so attractive even to countries which [hitherto] hesitated to join it out of respect for Egyptian opinion."

MASS ORGANIZATIONS IN MAINLAND CHINA*

CHAO KUO-CHÜN

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

One of the major causes of the success of the Chinese Communist party is its effective organization and indoctrination of the masses at the grass roots, primarily through a myriad of mass organizations. A study of these organizations in mainland China is significant for a number of reasons. First, in a country like Communist China where the degree of bureaucratization and centralization is high and where mass organizations serve in many respects as a principal medium between government and party policies and the people, the basic programs and policy shifts formulated by the leading organs of these organizations often indicate the direction of the political wind. Second, while details of decisions and deliberations made at meetings of government and party organs are painstakingly guarded, information regarding the programs, activities, and leadership of the mass organizations is more available. Third, by an examination of these mass organizations, we may, to some extent, evaluate the attitudes and reactions of different social classes and groups in present-day China and at the same time observe the techniques employed by the CCP in social communication and political indoctrination.

There are more than a score of mass organizations set up on a national basis (for information on some of these see Table I). The more important ones are the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU), the New Democratic Youth League (NDYL), the All-China Federation of Democratic Women (ACFDW), the All-China Federation of Literature and Art, the All-China Federation of Democratic Youth, the All-China Students' Federation, the All-China Association of Industry and Commerce, the Sino-Soviet Friendship Association, and the peasant organizations. Due to their relative importance and the availability of information concerning them, the labor, youth, and women's organizations will receive primary attention in this discussion.¹

I. ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE OF THE MASS ORGANIZATIONS

The overall organizational principle governing almost all the mass organizations takes the form of what the Communists have labeled "democratic centralism." This Leninist concept of organization may be illustrated by the article on organization in the current Constitution of the ACFTU, which stipulates:

* This is a revised version of a paper presented at the 6th Annual Convention of the Far Eastern Association at New York on April 15, 1954. The author is grateful for the suggestions made by scholars on China at that time and subsequently.

¹ For a previous article in English on mass organizations in mainland China, see A. Doak Barnett, "Mass Political Organizations in Communist China," The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 277, pp. 76-88 (Sept., 1951).

TABLE I. INFORMATION ON TEN PRINCIPAL MASS ORGANIZATIONS IN MAINLAND CHINA*

Name	Head	Founded	Membership† (in millions)
All-China Federation of Trade Unions	Lai Jo-yü (CCP)	May 1, 1922	11
New Democratic Youth League	Hu Yao-pang (CCP)	April 11, 1949	12
All-China Federation of Democratic Women	Ts'ai Ch'ang (CC, CCP)	March 24, 1949	76 (1953)
All-China Federation of Democratic Youth	Liao Ch'eng-chih (CC, CCP)	May 4, 1949	21‡
All-China Federation of Cooperative Workers	Ch'eng Tzu-hua (CC, CCP)	July, 1950	120
All-China Federation of Literature and Art	Kuo Mo-jo (Leftest Writer)	July 19, 1949
All-China Students Federation	T'ien Te-min (CCP)	March 6, 1949	3.3 (1953)
Children's Pioneer Corps of China		October, 1949	8
Sino-Soviet Friendship Association	Liu Shao-ch'i (Politburo, CCP)	October 5, 1949	68 (1953)
All-China Assoc. of Industry and Commerce	Ch'en Shu t'ung (Shanghai Industrialist)	October 30, 1953

* A full list of the mass organizations in mainland China would need to include the All-China Federation of Natural Science Societies, Association for the Popularization of Science, Society of Political Science and Law of China, Society of Philosophy of China, Historical Society of China, New Economic Society of China, People's Association of Foreign Affairs, Association on Finance, Committee for the Promotion of International Trade, The Red Cross of China, The China Welfare Association, The China Relief Association, Committee on the Protection of Children, All-China Athletic Committee, Chinese People's Committee for World Peace, Buddhist Association of China, Islam Association of China, Association on Moslem Culture, Sino-Indian Friendship Association, and the Sino-Burmese Friendship Association.

† Estimated summer, 1954, except where otherwise indicated.

‡ Including 12 million Youth Leaguers

(1) the leadership organs of trade unions at all levels shall be produced by democratic election from below and make periodic reports to members on the work performed; (2) trade union organizations at all levels must carry out their work in accordance with the Constitution and resolutions of trade unions; (3) all decisions of trade union organizations must be passed by majority vote of members present; and (4) trade union organizations at the lower level shall obey those of the higher level.

These provisions ensure that the leaders of the hierarchy have an effective control and veto power over the program and personnel at all levels under them. The individual members have some voice in the basic branches, such as a women's association in a village or a trade union in a factory. But at national, provincial, municipal, county, and district levels, authority is centered in the executive committee, or, in effect, in the chairman or secretary-general.

Legally, the highest authority in the mass organizations is vested in the national congress. The congress is scheduled to meet every three or four years but is generally convened at longer intervals. The duties and rights of the congress are usually (1) to examine and approve the reports of the central committee; (2) to examine and revise the constitution of the organization in question; (3) to discuss and define policy and current tasks of the organization; and (4) to elect the central committee. During the recess of the congress, authority is vested in the central committee or, as it is called in some mass organizations, the executive committee. However, since the central committee meets only about twice a year, the real loci of power are the standing committee (called presidium in some organizations) and the central secretariat.

The division of labor in the leading organ and the nature of its major activities may be seen in the organizational structure of the Standing Committee of the ACFDW, though there are, of course, certain modifications in the case of other mass organizations. The women's federation has departments for urban work, rural work, propaganda and education, women and child welfare, international liaison, and publication, in addition to secretarial and personnel bureaus and an administrative office. The Central Secretariat is defined as an organ to "take care of routine business under the direction of the Standing Committee." However, an examination of the membership of the secretariat of many leading mass organizations reveals that this organ invariably includes the most powerful figures in the organization, most if not all of them party members. Thus a standing committee may take in some non-party members in a display of "united front," but the actual planning and direction of major policies will be done in the more exclusive and compact central secretariat.

Aside from membership in the central secretariat and, of course, the chairmanship and vice-chairmanships, other key posts in a mass organization are the head of the organization department and the chiefs of the planning bureau and the personnel department in the standing committee. These vital positions are, as a rule, occupied by party members.

A general trend in the structural aspect of these leadership organs, noticeable during the national congresses of the major mass organizations in the summer of 1953, is the expansion in size of both the central and the standing committees. For example, membership of the Central Committee of the ACFTU increased from 51 in 1949 to 98 in 1953; that of the NDYL, from 45 to 143; and that of the ACFDW, from 55 to 125. The number of members of the Standing Committee or Presidium in the labor federation increased from 14 to 24; in the Youth League, from nine to 21; and in the women's federation, from 17 to 25. This phenomenon is probably a reflection of both the rapid increase in membership and the party's technique of absorbing new and younger cadres into the hierarchy.

The organizational features of these mass organizations at the regional and local levels follow the general pattern of the national organs. The supreme authority is theoretically vested in the congresses at the regional, provincial, municipal, county, district, and village or street levels, but the actual power is wielded by the executive committee, or rather its chairman and secretary. On the other hand, this does not necessarily mean that these few leaders are the only ones working for the organization. On the contrary, maximum participation in the activities of the organization is constantly urged on the members, who are offered both material and psychological incentives to carry out the programs. The regimented and crowded programs must be exhausting to many members, but they also serve as new channels for releasing the latent energy of numerous persons who, in traditional China, had little or no opportunity to participate in group activities.

Numerically, the mass organizations in Communist China have shown swift development since the formation of the Central People's Government on October 1, 1949. The total membership in the leading organizations, as last reported in the summer of 1954, is as follows: 11 million in the trade unions; 21 million in the federation of youth, including 12 million youth leaguers;² 76 million in the women's federations; three and a half million in the students federation; and 88 million in the peasants' associations. Even children between seven and 15 have been organized into a Pioneer Children's Corps, which has a membership of eight million. The total number of people controlled and influenced by the major organizations, allowing for duplications, would probably exceed half of the adult population in China. Qualitatively, however, such galloping expansion in organization cannot but have an adverse effect. This was admitted by Hu Yao-Pang, new chairman of the Youth League, when he made the statement in July, 1953 that:

In some places, numerical strength is overemphasized in the expansion of the League; thus the requirement [for membership] is lowered. As a result, some members do not possess the necessary qualifications and a few undesirable elements have infiltrated into the organization. . . .³

Many problems appear to have derived not merely from the lowered standards of membership, but from the intrinsic character of Communist organization, although this may not be recognized by the party leaders. For example, Li Ch'ang, fourth ranking member of the Youth League, complained at the Congress last year that:

The phenomenon of deciding important problems by a secretary alone or a few committee members without discussion at League committee meetings must be rectified. . . . League discipline will absolutely oppose and resolutely correct the acts of a few cadres who show an indifferent attitude to, or even suppress, criticisms by retaliating against the critics.⁴

Li and other party leaders may fail to realize the fact that as long as the concept

² See Hu Yao-pang, "Call to China's Youth to Build Socialism," NCNA, Peking, May 4, 1954.

³ Hu Yao-pang, "Rally the Nation's Youth and March Courageously toward National Construction," Report to the 2nd Congress of the NDYL, Jen-min jih-pao [People's Daily, JMJP], July 6, 1953, p. 3.

⁴ Li Ch'ang, "Report on the Revision of the Constitution of the NDYL of China," JMJP, July 7, 1953, p. 3.

and practice of Leninist elitism prevail, there is little institutionalized check to prevent arbitrary decisions by the leaders. So long as the power of decision is concentrated in the hands of a few, ordinary members will often be reluctant to assume initiative and offer suggestions, although theoretically they are encouraged to do so.

II. LEADERSHIP IN THE MASS ORGANIZATIONS

The roster of leading personalities⁵ in the mass organizations of mainland China is available in a number of English sources, such as the Current Background materials issued by the American Consulate General in Hong Kong and S. B. Thomas's Government and Administration in Communist China, published by the Institute of Pacific Relations in November, 1953. This article will merely present some comments on a few significant points in the leadership of these mass organizations.

The Dominant Position of Party Members and the Question of Intra-Party Struggle. The first and most obvious aspect is the dominant position occupied by CCP members in the leadership of the major mass organizations. Although party cadres in every mass organization are in the numerical minority, they hold most of the key positions and are able to exercise a decisive influence. For example, the chairman of the women's federation is Ts'ai Ch'ang, regular member of the CC, CCP. The All-China Federation of Democratic Youth is headed by another CC member, Liao Ch'eng-chih. The chairman of the Sino-Soviet Friendship, which has a reported membership of 68 million, is Liu Shao-ch'i, heir apparent to Mao Tse-tung. Lai Jo-yü, who replaced Ch'en Yün (a member of the Politburo) and Li Li-san as the boss of the labor organization, and Hu Yao-pang, who replaced Feng Wen-pin as head of the Youth League, are both veteran party men, although they are not well known to people outside of Communist China.

In the light of the personal background of Ch'en Yün and Li Li-san, this abrupt change of leadership naturally raises the following questions: (1) Is it a part of a general party purge? (2) Does it represent a split in the top command of the CCP, since Ch'en Yün is a ranking member of the Politburo? (3) Could it be an indication of an open friction between Peking and Moscow? (4) Does it symbolize a struggle for power among CCP leaders?

So far as available data show, the answer to the first three questions at this moment is in the negative. From the 1953 Jen-min shou-ts'e [People's Handbook of 1953], published in Tientsin in July, 1953, and the 1954 Shih-chieh chih-shih shou-ts'e [Handbook on World Affairs, 1954], published in Shanghai in March, 1954, we find that both Ch'en and Li retain important party and government posts. Ch'en Yün is still holding all his major positions. Li Li-san is serving in half a dozen jobs which, unlike those held by Ch'en, are important but not vital. These jobs include: (1) member (one of 62), Central People's Government Council; (2) member (one of 55), Financial and Economic Committee, CPG;

⁵ For names of the heads of 10 major mass organizations, see Table I.

(3) vice-chairman (one of 5), Committee on Employment, CPG (of which Lai Jo-yü, new Chairman of the ACFTU, is a member); and (4) member, Executive Committee, Sino-Soviet Friendship Association. Recent news bulletins from China also show that Ch'en is politically active in 1954,⁶ although Li seems to fade away more and more. The above facts seem to negate the supposition that the sudden shift of top leadership of the ACFTU in May, 1953 represented a general party purge or a break among some members of the party hierarchy. Moreover, the prestige of Mao Tse-tung is so great and personal relations of the politburo members so close, that it is hard to envisage any serious rupture now in the top command of the CCP. The continuously close economic and political relationship between the USSR and China does not seem to suggest any open disunity between Peking and Moscow at this moment.

Interlocking Directorship in the Leading Organs of the Mass Organizations. The second salient characteristic of the leadership of the mass organizations is its interlocking nature in the leading organs. A dozen or two familiar names crop up often in a number of organizations. For example, Liao Ch'eng-chih (CC, CCP) is found to occupy the following posts concurrently: Chairman, Federation of Democratic Youth; Vice-Chairman, Youth League; Vice-Chairman, National Committee for the Protection of Children; member, Standing Committee, Committee on World Peace; and member, Executive Committee, Sino-Soviet Friendship Association. Hu Yao-pang, chairman of the Youth League, is also on the Executive Committee of the trade union federation and several other organizations. This is the case not only with top leaders like Liu Shao-ch'i, Kuo Mo-jo, Soong Ching-ling, and Li Te-ch'üan, but also with some middle-echelon cadres. Ho Chien-hsiu, the famous model textile worker, for example, was elected to the executive committees of youth, labor, and women federations. Since 1953, especially after the anti-five-too-many movement (i.e., against too many tasks, too many meetings, too many documents and forms, too many organizations, and too many concurrent posts for the cadres) launched in July, 1953, the cases of duplicated directorship in the mass organizations in the lower echelons have manifestly been reduced. Lists of current members of the leading organs of the major mass organizations already show considerably less duplication in names, compared with those elected at the first congresses in 1949. There also seems to be a tendency to put party cadres with administrative experience in charge of the leadership of the mass organizations. Both Lai Jo-yü and Hu Yao-pang, for example, served as regional administrators before becoming the heads of the ACFTU and NDYL, respectively.

The Process of Recruiting and Training Cadres in the Mass Organizations. Top

⁶ In a speech commemorating the anniversary of Stalin's death on March 5, 1954, Ch'en Yün stated that socialism could install itself in one country at a time, and that this policy would require Communist parties in other countries to make a temporary but necessary retreat when one socialist country (such as the USSR between 1921 and 1941) built up her strength peacefully. Chinese text in JMJP, March 6, 1954, p. 1; see also Christian Science Monitor, March 9, 25, 1954.

attention is being paid by the mass organizations to recruiting and training the activists among the members as future leaders of the organizations. Special schools for training and indoctrination were set up by the leading mass organizations. For example, some 50,000 persons graduated in 1953 from 60 cadre schools of the trade unions, and 15,000 persons were sent by the basic trade union branches to the party, government organs, Youth League, and trade unions at higher levels to serve as cadres.⁷ In the case of the Youth League, up to June, 1953, 550,000 cadres completed their training in 31 League Schools. The major indoctrination center is the Central League School, established in 1949 at Peking. Between April, 1949 and June, 1953, more than a million leaguers became party and government cadres; among these 40,000 served in posts above the ch'ü (district) level.⁸

A concrete example of recruiting and training local cadres can be seen in the case of T'an Ch'un-hua, a much publicized cadre of the women's federation. T'an is a young peasant woman of Kiangsi province. She led the women of her village to join in dike repair work in May, 1949, thus saving the district from flood. Since then she has taken an active part in all agrarian programs sponsored by the Peking government, such as elimination of insect pests, anti-drought work and redistribution of land. She was repeatedly given material rewards, as well as public recognition. In 1950, she was put in charge of the women's work in her village and in June, 1952, she became the chairman of the federation branch in the entire district. She was sent to a short-term training course in the county seat in August, 1952, and was admitted to the CCP in September. At the end of 1952, when the Sixth People's Representatives' Conference of the county where she resides was convened, she was elected a deputy magistrate. In July, 1953, a story about her appeared in the Hsin-Chung-kuo fu-nü [Women of New China], organ of the Federation of Democratic Women; another biography may be found in People's China.⁹ Thus the mass organizations are instrumental in absorbing the more active elements among the people as their cadres, eventually enrolling them in the service of the government and party.

The Non-Party Leadership in Professional and Scientific Organizations. As an exception to the rule, many scientific and cultural societies are headed by professional, non-Communist scholars. For example, the All-China Federation of Natural Science Societies is headed by Dr. Li Szu-kuang, British-educated geologist. The chairman of the People's Association of Foreign Affairs is Professor Chang Hsi-jo, who received his Ph.D. at Columbia University in the twenties. These facts suggest (1) a shortage of top-flight specialists among party members at this moment; (2) a continuation of the party's policy of utilizing the talent and prestige of non-party experts; and (3) support of or acquiescence in the programs of the party by many leading Chinese intellectuals.

⁷ Reported in Ta-kung pao, Tientsin, May 1, 1954, p. 2.

⁸ Hu Yao-pang, op. cit. p. 3.

⁹ Hsia Han, "Peasant Women T'an Ch'un-hua Became a Magistrate," Hsin-Chung-kuo fu-nü [Women of New China], No. 7, 1953, July 9, 1953, pp. 18-19; and People's China, May 16, 1953, p. 30.

III. PROGRAMS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE MASS ORGANIZATIONS

Mass Organizations as Instruments for Propagating and Implementing Governmental and Party Policies. As mentioned previously, programs of the mass organizations not only reflect the policies of the government and party, but also serve as vehicles for their propagation and implementation. Mass organizations played a key role in such major movements as the agrarian reform, the campaign to increase production and practice economy, the three-anti and five-anti movements, among others. At this moment (Summer, 1954), the activities of the mass organizations indicate that five major programs are currently receiving top attention by the government and party: (1) the first five-year plan and production-increase movement in industry and agriculture;¹⁰ (2) the election of people's congresses to form eventually the All-China People's Congress and to promulgate the national constitution in the autumn of 1954 (see below); (3) the popularization of education, especially the training of technicians and the elimination of illiteracy;¹¹ (4) the recruitment of youth with secondary or college education for the military academies; and (5) the acceleration of the socialization of the economy, as evidenced by the publishing of the "new general line of the state."

The first four programs are well known and some of them have been discussed in other publications. The fifth program, the "new general line of the state," is worth discussing here, not only because it is getting top billing in all the mass organizations in mainland China, but also because it has tremendous political significance. The editorial of the Chung-kuo ch'ing-nien pao [Journal of Chinese Youth] of New Year's Day, 1954, states that "the general line of the state during the transitional stage, and the basic tasks of the first five-year plan which implement concretely this general line, are the direction and goal of our action." Similar statements can be found in the publications of other mass organizations.¹² Some observers interpret the new line as a bugle call for the liquidation of private industry and commerce and an all-out effort for collectivization of farms. To evaluate such a conclusion, we must first ascertain what this "general line" is.

The first official proclamation of the general line is found in an editorial of

¹⁰ Particular emphasis is assigned by all mass organizations to the promotion of technical innovations in industry, to organized farming, and to emulation contests. For detailed examples, see Youth League's Directive of May 4th, JMJP, April 10, 1954, p. 1; editorial in Chung-kuo ch'ing-nien pao [Journal of Chinese Youth], April 15, 1954; and editorial in Hsin-Chung-kuo fu-nü [Women of New China], Feb. 28, 1954.

¹¹ The Committee to Eliminate Illiteracy, set up on November 20, 1952, plans to remove illiteracy among employees in government organs before 1956, among industrial workers before 1957, among young peasants and workers before 1960, and among all the populace within 10 years. Literacy is defined by the Committee as the learning of 2,000 Chinese characters, knowledge of phonetic symbols, and the ability to write short essays of 300 to 500 words.

¹² For some examples, see Tung Pien, "Educating the Young Rural Women to Serve Contentedly in the Socialist Reform Work in Agriculture," Hsin-Chung-kuo fu-nü [Women of New China], No. 52, Feb. 28, 1954, pp. 8-9; and editorial, "Educating the Rural Youth on the General Line [of the State]," Chung-kuo ch'ing-nien, Vol. 131, Feb. 16, 1954, p. 1.

the Jen-min jih-pao [People's Daily] of October 1, 1953, which, in answer to the question "what is this general line of the state during the transitional stage?," writes that:

The answer to this question is given in one of the slogans commemorating the 4th Anniversary of the Founding of the People's Rep. of China promulgated by the National Committee of the CPPCC (on the eve of October 1, 1953). It (the slogan) says that "we must, over a considerably long period of time, gradually carry out socialization and industrialization of the nation, gradually realize the socialist reform of agriculture, handicrafts industry and private enterprise." This great and glorious historical task is laid down in principle in the Common Program (of September 1949). But after the development in the actual livelihood of the people in the past four years, the task has now become more concrete. . . .

Another significant passage, in an article by Teng To, states that "the new democratic society is the transitional form within the framework of which takes place the gradual transition to Socialism."¹³

These official interpretations of the "general line" seem to indicate that it signifies a stepping up of the tempo of socializing industry and agriculture through greater governmental control of major enterprises and more extensive organization of agricultural producers' cooperatives. However, it is doubtful whether one may go so far as to say that this new line announces the termination of the New Democratic stage in China and the beginning of the socialist era. The party obviously still considers the present period a transitional one. Although the practical effect depends a great deal on the degree of intensification of the socializing measures, this theoretical difference is a basic one and has important application in practical programs. Liu Shao-ch'i, discussing the same problem in his report to the 4th Plenum of the CC in February, 1954 stated:

The propagation of this general line by the Party has resulted in its enthusiastic support by the overwhelming majority of the people, in the absolute superiority of the socialist thought in the nation, and in a severe criticism of the bourgeois ideology.

This clearly indicates the psychological functions assigned to this general line. By emphasizing the theme that China is advancing toward socialism in a transitional stage, the party aims to convince the population, especially the private entrepreneurs, individual peasants, and cadres, that their individual interests must be subordinated to this overall goal and that any resistance to organized farming or state control of economy is against the tide of the time.

An example of this policy is seen in Article 10 of the Draft Constitution, which states that "the state protects the ownership of means of production and other property by capitalists according to law. The policy of the state toward capitalist industry and commerce is: to use, restrict and transform."¹⁴ In agriculture, the right of peasants to own land and other property is also safeguarded in the 1954 Draft Constitution.¹⁵

¹³ "China's General Line of Transition to Socialism" People's China, January 1, 1954, pp. 5-9.

¹⁴ New York Times, June 18, 1954, p. 3. Chinese text in China Daily News, New York, June 22, 1954.

¹⁵ Article 8. See Christian Science Monitor, June 18, 1954, p. 17.

Welfare and Cultural Programs of the Mass Organizations. In addition to the above general programs, each mass organization maintains a series of welfare and cultural activities. One example is the labor insurance program managed by the trade unions. It provides various benefits such as sick leave with pay, 56-day maternity leave with pay, free medical treatment, and pensions. According to Communist data, the Peking government spent more than 63 million US dollars for labor insurance in 1952 and 4.2 million workers came under such protection at the end of 1953. On the other hand, there are reports that labor insurance funds were improperly used in some cities and that a few unions accumulated great amounts of insurance funds without doing much for their members. Other reports maintain that more than 1,344 sanatoria, 1,566 nurseries, and 4,072 workers' clubs were established by trade unions at the end of 1953 (figures do not include those in Central-South China).¹⁶ In 1952, about 115 million US dollars were spent in building living quarters to accommodate a million workers. According to the reports of the women's federation, women in China are enjoying opportunities to join literacy classes and to go on to advanced studies, as they never could before. In 1952, women reportedly constituted about half of the 50 million students in winter schools in villages and 24 million pupils in spare-time schools for peasants. In the Spring of 1953, there were some 30,000 maternity hospitals and stations, and 269,000 mid-wives received modern training. At the end of 1952, there were 2,738 nurseries in the government organs, 4,346 street nurseries in the cities, and 148,000 "baby-sitting" groups in the rural areas. The last group took care of a reported 850,000 children, and about 21,000 nursery attendants had been trained by the summer of 1953.

The welfare program of the mass organizations is implemented by cultural and recreational activities which are simultaneously utilized as instruments for political propaganda and indoctrination. According to a report of the federation of trade unions in 1953, their Workers' Publishing House published, from September, 1949 to March, 1953, 339 different kinds of books and periodicals, totaling more than 35.5 million volumes. Under the joint sponsorship of the trade unions and the government, 16,277 spare-time schools were set up with a total enrollment of 3,087,000 workers, and 535,000 illiterate workers learned to read and write. More than 6,000 libraries were set up by the trade unions by the end of 1953.

The progress reports of these mass organizations do not necessarily, of course, depict the actual situation. Due to lack of neutral observation and studies, the statistical data cannot be checked. It is true that the various mass organizations are likely to try to win greater popular support by sponsoring programs that are needed and welcomed by the masses. However, there can be a gap, and sometimes quite a wide gap, between the plans and the actual results, or between the intentions and the achievements, of any organization.

Other Major Functions of the Mass Organizations. The leading mass organizations carry out a number of other major functions. (1) They provide multitudes of non-Communists, particularly members of a dozen or so "third parties," with channels to release their energy and ambition. This involves little political risk to the Communist party because the key positions in the mass organizations are generally in the hands of party members and their programs follow closely those mapped out by the CCP. The United Front Department in the CC, CCP, headed by Li Wei-han, often plays a major role in deciding what part third party personnel should play in the mass organizations. (2) They perform a key function in the security system of Communist China. Members of the labor, youth, and women's organizations are active in the village militia system, committees on public security, and the "movement to suppress counter-revolutionary activities." (3) A number of mass organizations maintain close liaison with their respective Communist-dominated international bodies and often carry out programs coordinated by these world organizations. For example, the Preamble of the Constitution of the ACFTU concludes with this paragraph:

¹⁶ Ta-Kung pao, Tientsin, May 1, 1954, p. 2.

The trade unions of China must constantly educate the workers in internationalism and actively take part in the international working-class movement.

There is constant exchange of emissaries between the Chinese labor, youth, and women's organizations and their world-wide counterparts like the World Federation of Trade Unions, the World Federation of Democratic Youth, and the World Federation of Democratic Women. (4) Mass organizations also help to create a climate of opinion in China which facilitates the implementation of party or government platforms. A passage in the Directive on the Celebration of the Youth Festival, issued by the Youth League on April 8, 1954, illustrates this point. The League's Central Committee instructed that:

The League branches in various localities must utilize all forms of propaganda media like newspapers, League tabloids, radio, etc., to publicize the advanced work methods and experience of young model workers and League members. Through such propaganda, the youth will be encouraged to work harder and learn more, and the League's work will be understood and helped by different strata of the society.¹⁷

IV. CONCLUDING COMMENTS

This last section attempts to depict some of the salient characteristics, trends, and problems of the mass organizations. Many supporting data must be omitted because of space limitations.

The Predominantly Political Character of the Mass Organizations. It has been shown previously how the mass organizations serve as means of propagating governmental and party policies. In fact, many organizations seem to be set up primarily to fulfill political functions. This is clearly manifested in the article on the duties of members in the Constitution of the ACFTU, which includes the obligation "to observe state laws and regulations, to preserve labor discipline, to protect public properties, and to make good efforts at political, technical and cultural studies to raise [the workers'] class consciousness and working ability." This makes all workers, including those employed by private enterprises, virtually government employees. Some of the larger mass organizations are in effect quasi-governmental establishments. They often receive government assistance, both tangible and intangible, in the form of a building for headquarters, favorable rates in telecommunication messages, and a voice in the local administration. In the management of many key government tasks, the leading mass organizations share an important role with the government, such as the current election of delegates to the people's representatives' congresses at various levels. In fact, the Election Law promulgated on March 1, 1953 explicitly states that:

¹⁷ JMJP, April 10, 1954, p. 1.

The Communist Party of China, the various democratic parties, the various people's organizations and electors or representatives who are not affiliated with the above-mentioned parties or organizations, may all nominate candidates for election as deputies either jointly or separately according to electoral districts or electoral units. (Art. 47).

The results in the elections of the hsiang (village) and ch'u (district) people's congresses completed in mainland China thus far show that activists in the labor, youth, and women's organizations occupy a high percentage of representation in the local congresses.¹⁸ Another report indicates that delegates from youth organizations constituted about seven per cent in the municipal people's representatives' conferences in the 12 leading cities of China in 1953.¹⁹ It goes without saying that an organization that does not have the approval of the government cannot legally exist.

Emphasis on Propaganda and Indoctrination. Closely integrated with the effort to promote government programs by the mass organizations is the top attention paid to propaganda and indoctrination work. Here we may quote a report of Lai Jo-yü to the 7th Congress of the Trade Unions last summer:

The trade unions in the past few years have consistently educated broad masses of workers in the spirit of patriotism and internationalism. Particularly during the last year (1952) many trade union organizations have, in a comparatively systematic way, carried out Communist education among the workers and have repeatedly explained the identity of individual and state interests, thus establishing among them a correct attitude to labor and a strengthened labor discipline based on their consciousness and understanding that they are masters of the state.

The first duty for members listed in the Constitution of the Youth League is "to study Marxism-Leninism and Party policies and propagate them among the masses of youth."

The effectiveness and results of these propaganda and indoctrination programs, which vary with the specific issues and localities, and with the skill of the propagandists and the nature of the audience, are difficult to establish. One report revealed that there were about three million propagandists organized in mainland China in 1953. Some of the factors deemed essential to effective propaganda are listed in a booklet entitled "How to Set up Propaganda Work," issued by the Federation of Trade Unions. They include the following points: (1) the contents of the propaganda must be tied in with actual conditions and problems of the workers; (2) close contact must be maintained between the propagandists and their audience in order to locate the latter's needs and interests; (3) fresh and lively materials should be supplied to the propagandists by the party and the management; (4) propagandists should be given proper training and status; (5) the media and style used to convey propaganda must be familiar to the audience; and (6) leading cadres should give personal attention to propaganda work.

¹⁸ See Hsiao Feng, "Election in the Countryside," China Reconstructs, March-April, 1954, p. 16; "Successful Conclusion of Basic Elections in the Various Regions," JMJP, April 28, 1954, p. 3; and "Reports on Basic Election in Rural Districts," JMJP, Feb. 20, 1954, p. 3.

¹⁹ Liao Ch'eng-chih, "Struggle for the Safeguarding and Construction of Our Fatherland," Report to the 2nd Congress of the All-China Federation of Democratic Youth, June 10, 1953.

Another example of the indoctrination technique at the basic level is seen in an article entitled "How Can a League Branch Secretary Establish Good Relations with the Masses."²⁰ It points out, among other things, that a branch secretary should win the confidence of the members of his cell by discovering the concrete problems that are bothering them, by learning from the merits of each member, and by making frank self-criticism to both Leaguers and non-Leaguers of his locality. The importance of having the propagandists give concrete illustrations, solve the pressing problems of the audience, and perform exemplary deeds is emphasized in many directives of the mass organizations.²¹

Technique of Organization and Social Communication. Another characteristic of the activities of the mass organizations is the practical and realistic approach to tackling issues and solving problems. These techniques of organization and social communication constitute a major factor for the success of many organizations and the party. For example, a directive issued by the Youth League on organizational method states that:

The work style and group life within the League must not rely on abstract political talk, nor the preaching of dry dogma. The League should use Marxism-Leninism to analyze correctly and solve the problems that are closely related to the interests of the youth such as the following: the problems of wages, health, job, sports and recreations, learning scientific knowledge, raising the cultural standard, tuition fees, student loans, examination system, love and social activities, family affairs, methodology in learning, books and texts, and the suitable distribution of time for work and for study. . . . All the meetings convened by the League for youth must be lively and concrete. . . .

Another report on "Experiences in the Mobilization of Women during the ²⁰ Chung-kuo ch'ing-nien pao [Journal of Chinese Youth,] April 3, 1954, p. 2.

²¹ For concrete examples on basic-level indoctrination and propaganda techniques, contents, and problems, see Tsen-yang chieh-li hsüan-ch'uan-wang [How to Set Up a Propaganda Network] (Peking, May, 1951); Tsen-yang ts'o hsüan-ch'uan-yüan [How to be a Propagandist] (Peking, May, 1951); Kung-ch'ang chung ti hsüan-ch'uan ku-tung kung-t's o [Propaganda and Agitation Work in the Factories], Shanghai Labor Federation, Oct., 1950; and Fu-nu kung-t's o shou-ts'e [Handbook on Women's Work], ACFDW (Shanghai, May, 1951).

"Agrarian Reform," issued by the women's federation, contains the following statement:

In the mobilization of rural women, work should be carried on simultaneously among the young, the middle-aged, and the old, in order that the merits of each age group may be fully utilized. For instance, the young women are easier to mobilize and can serve as spearhead in the movement; the mature women are steadier and possess good ideas, and once they are convinced, they are more firm and tenacious; the old have suffered more and are more experienced. They often become the leaders in the "speak bitterness" movement.

Directives of the mass organizations frequently quote cases to show their members how some model cadres successfully accomplish their mission by using practical approaches to programs and by consulting the local people.²² Numerous psychological techniques are used in propagating the programs of the mass organizations. Many cherished values such as security, national honor, prosperity, peace, and personal prestige are utilized to persuade the members as well as the audience. Those who succeed in carrying out the assignments of the organization for some difficult mission are given material rewards and public recognition. Various media, both traditional and improvised, are used to disseminate propaganda and stimulate enthusiasm among the masses. The tremendous psychological impact made by these media, though hard to measure, cannot be exaggerated.

In conclusion, it must be pointed out that the activities and impact of the mass organizations should be viewed and analyzed not in isolation, but as an integrated whole. The programs of all the mass organizations are, of course, closely coordinated and their specific problems often represent different facets of broader issues. With regard to the effect and influence of these organizations, it will be noted that the whole is often more than the sum of its parts. The all-encompassing impact of mobilizing a quarter of a billion people of various social classes simultaneously is incalculably greater than that of activating the same number one million at a time or social group by social group. It is also important to appreciate the psychological effect of the mass movement on the individual person. Although it is desirable to organize and evaluate data as cool-headedly as possible, it is imperative for one to keep in mind the human aspirations and frustrations that are generated or manipulated by these mass organizations, even if they are not shared or fully understood. One simply cannot afford to minimize the revolutionary impact and long-range significance of movements which embody the emotions and reactions of millions of human beings.

²² For details and examples of organizational methods at the grass-roots level, see Ch'eng-shih fu-nü chi-chi feng-tzu ch'iao-ts'ai [Text-book for Activists in the Urban Women's Movement], ACFDW (Peking, 1954), and Hsüeh-hsi wu-san kung-ch'ang kung-hui kung-tso ching-yen [Learn the Working Experience of the Trade Union in the Wu-san Factory] (Hankow, 1953).

REVISIONIST OPINION IN POST-TREATY JAPAN*

DOUGLAS H. MENDEL, JR.

University of California, Los Angeles

Over two years have passed since the Japanese peace treaty came into effect and Japan once again embarked on a relatively independent course. In view of the unprecedented scope and method of the Allied Occupation, many divergent postaudits can be expected to emerge in the near future dealing with the relative success or failure of Occupation reforms and with post-treaty revisions made by the Japanese government.¹ Such studies can be valuable for the understanding both of Japanese domestic politics and of American policy toward Japan.

It is the purpose of this paper to analyze some results of a two-pronged voter and leadership survey of post-treaty Japanese political opinion made by the author between the fall of 1952 and the late summer of 1953. Few scholars would be bold enough to draw final conclusions on the Occupation from a one-year study of Japanese opinion, but history's verdict on the subject will be determined largely by native opinion rather than by the theorizing of foreign observers. And, in the first year after the treaty, certain patterns of Japanese opinion crystallized sufficiently to permit us to make tentative conclusions about Japanese revisionist attitudes.

Every attitude survey being limited by its methodology, a brief description of the methods employed in this survey will help the reader understand the discussion to follow. Due to financial and other problems of individual research operations, no attempt was made to carry out a nation-wide survey. Instead, two principal sample points were chosen on the basis of extreme variation in characteristics associated with political behavior.² A third point, approaching the national average on these characteristics, was used for pretest purposes. The two principal points were the city of Osaka, an industrial-commercial metropolis, and the Izumo area of Shimane Prefecture, an agricultural plain on the Sea of Japan. Okayama City was the third point included.

A probability sample of 500 voters was drawn from the registration lists in both Osaka and Izumo, while a sample of 328 voters was used in Okayama. About 88 per cent of these voters were interviewed, a standardized questionnaire being used, which was developed on the basis of the pretest experience. While the three samples, totalling 1178, are large enough for most analysis on a point-by-point basis, the sampling error for sub-group data limits our confidence in a few of the very smallest sub-groups. At the time of the voter interviews, the author also held personal interviews with a random 1:3 selection of the elected officials in each of the three sample areas,³ using a variant of the voter questionnaire. Approximately forty local, prefectural, and Diet representatives in each of the three areas provided much insightful data on their own and their constituents' political opinions. All interviews were in Japanese.

* The survey on which this paper is based was financed by grants from the Social Science Research Council and the Center for Japanese Studies of the University of Michigan. Numerous Japanese officials, scholars, and university students cooperated in the field operations. Naturally, only the author is responsible for the conclusions stated herein. Much of the data in this paper was presented originally to the annual meeting of the Far Eastern Association held in New York on April 13, 1954.

¹ By far the best of these to date is Harry Emerson Wildes, Typhoon in Tokyo (New York, 1954).

² Since the overall focus of the survey was on political behavior, voting rates were considered as a prime factor in the choice of extreme sample areas. Osaka's voting rates averaged 55%, Izumo's 90%, and Okayama's 77% in postwar Diet elections. These were close to the national low, high, and median.

Numerous checks of the survey data were made against Japanese survey material, interview data in other prefectures, and the more traditional data from observation and media analysis. These checks served to confirm rather than contradict the survey results presented herein. Both voter and leadership data are included in this paper, and a few leader quotations are given to illustrate points of view, but the full survey results are not immediately available.

To establish a framework of reference, let us begin with the leadership replies to the following question: "It may be too early to judge the overall effect of the Occupation on Japan during the past seven years but, considering both its good and its bad points, what is your general opinion of it?" This question was dropped from the voter questionnaire after the pretest proved it to be too general for voters. The responses of the leaders are summarized in Table I.

TABLE I. LEADERSHIP EVALUATION OF THE OCCUPATION BY SAMPLE AREA AND POLITICAL ORIENTATION

Occupation Evaluation	Sample Area			Political Orientation*
	Osaka	Shimane	Okayama	Right	Left
Strong Approval	20%	18%	12%	19%	10%
Weak Approval	35	38	32	38	26
Neutral	11	12	21	12	20
Weak Disapproval	10	9	29	11	29
Strong Disapproval	18	16	3	15	9
Don't Know	6	7	3	5	6
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
Number of Cases	41	46	34	90	31

* "Right" includes respondents affiliated with, or leaning toward, the Liberal, Progressive, and Green Wind Society parties; "Left" includes those affiliated with or leaning toward the Right and Left Socialist, Farm-Labor, and Communist parties.

The only difference among the three sample areas on this question is the smaller percentage of "strong disapproval" in Okayama. The greater degree of disapproval shown by left party affiliates is due to their opposition to the post-1948 switch in Occupation policy from reform to recovery. A detailed study of the reasons given by leaders for their evaluation also shows that right party affiliates approved the Occupation more for material than for ideological reasons. No single reform measure was cited as good or bad by more than 13 per cent of either right-wing or left-wing leaders, but the rightists mentioned "material aid," "personal leniency," and similar virtues whereas the leftists mentioned "democratization," "renunciation of war," and other policy-oriented features of the Occupation. One hardy old Diet member from Okayama echoed the conservative view when he said: "Right after the war they went too far in opposing militarism and pushing democracy, but we are very grateful for all the material assistance." Another Liberal party leader complained that "Many American ideas were forced on Japan where conditions are very different. It was all a New Deal experiment which Japan as a nation cannot sustain." The leftist position, a reflection of the current anti-American sentiment of the Japanese left, was best summed up in this comment by the sole Communist member of the House of Representatives: "Democratization was carried out in the early period but this was all destroyed later and we no longer feel any gratitude for the early benefits."

³ All mayors, governors, and Diet members and one-third of all local and prefectural legislators.

This ambivalence on the part of both rightists and leftists in Japan today is greatly clarified when we proceed to specific Occupation reforms. For these questions we have both leader and voter data. The question of Japanese rearmament—revision of the spirit and/or letter of the demilitarization article of the Occupation-dictated Constitution of 1947—has been the most controversial domestic issue in post-treaty politics. Both voter and leader samples agreed that it was the most important issue in the October, 1952 and April, 1953 general elections and recent clarifications of his public position by Prime Minister Yoshida merely confirmed the wide chasm of right-left disagreement that had existed previously on the question. We asked our voter and leader respondents to categorize their overall opinion on the rearmament problem, permitting them to qualify their answers in sub-questions explained below. Table II shows the overall division on rearmament by the political party orientation of voters and leaders.

The leadership data, which for reasons of sample size cannot be reported by area and party simultaneously, shows a much sharper party division on rearmament than is revealed by the voter data. Conservative leaders gave almost unanimous approval to rearmament, usually defined as a "self-defense force," and two-thirds of the leftist leaders opposed rearmament, usually with greater force than their rightist associates favor it. In both Osaka and Shimane, there is a clear division of voter opinion along expected party lines. Even so, one-third of the conservative voters opposed rearmament, compared with about 60 per cent of the leftist voters. The non-voter category in urban Osaka leans close to the radical view on this question, whereas Shimane non-voters tend toward the conservative view if they express any opinion at all. This is consistent with the other characteristics of non-voters in the two areas. Those leftist leaders and voters who gave weak approval to rearmament are mostly from the Right Socialist party, which has taken a somewhat equivocal stand on this and other issues.

Rightist and leftist leaders were quite bitter about the reversal of the Ameri-

TABLE II. RELATION OF PARTY ORIENTATION TO ATTITUDES TOWARD REARMAMENT*

Self-Rated Attitude on Rearmament	Leaders		Osaka Voters			Shimane Voters
	Right	Left	Right	Left	Non- Voter	Right	Left	Non- Voter
Strong Approval	23%	—%	11%	3%	8%	5%	4%	5%
Weak Approval	72	32	53	36	30	52	34	36
Weak Opposition	2	9	13	13	18	11	2	11
Strong Opposition	—	56	23	45	37	29	56	22
Don't Know or Not Ascertained	3	3	—	3	7	3	4	26
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
Number of Cases	90	31	173	118	118	343	55	67

* The party orientation of the voter sample is based on reported party vote in the October, 1952 general election. "Right" and "Left" carry the same meanings as applied to those terms in the leader data, explained in the note to Table I. "Non-voter" includes 1952 non-voters and a few uncertain voters. Nine Osaka and three Shimane independent voters are omitted from this and subsequent tables as are all Okayama voter respondents.

can position vis-à-vis Japanese rearmament, for different reasons. One top Liberal answered: "You all forced us to disarm and now Dulles reviles us for not rearming faster! You've changed your position in the postwar world but you shouldn't have pushed us in such opposite directions." Sixty-five per cent of the right-wing leaders also approved revision of the Constitution to permit formal rearmament. Leftist leaders vigorously defended General MacArthur's original policy of a disarmed Japan and spoke only in praise of the "Peerless Peace Constitution."

It is clear, from further analysis not detailed here, that women voters oppose rearmament regardless of their party vote; that voters of low information levels are stronger opponents within each classification; and that younger voters of each party tend to be opposed. Sub-questions, dealing with the favored degree of rearmament, constitutional revision, and alternatives to rearmament, reveal that the "weak opposers" in the voter sample actually favor a self-defense force at about the present low level. Very few of those voters who expressed approval of rearmament wanted a full-blown Japanese army and navy; only 8 per cent of the Shimane voters who disapproved rearmament, and 17 per cent of that group in Osaka, favored the policy of "independent neutrality" advocated by the Left Socialist party.

The second issue that aroused wide public controversy during the year after the treaty was the government's proposal of an anti-strike law to limit strikes in public utility fields. Since the Occupation had done much to strengthen Japanese labor unions and the rights of labor generally, the left-wing parties which depend heavily on labor support in elections, opposed the anti-strike bill violently. Conversely, right-wing parties, which draw much support from the rural countryside as well as business circles, acted in response to widespread public complaints against utility strikes in such industries as coal and electric power, where union leadership was outspokenly anti-government and pro-leftist. The controversial bill became law when it passed both houses of the Diet in late summer, 1953, the Diet vote following the same right-left division we use in this paper. Table III shows leader and voter response to the query on the respondent's attitude toward the strike-limitation proposal.

TABLE III. RELATION OF PARTY ORIENTATION TO ATTITUDES TOWARD THE 1953 STRIKE CONTROL BILL

Attitude Toward Strike Bill	Leaders*		Osaka Voters			Shimane Voters
	Right	Left	Right	Left	Non- Voter	Right	Left	Non- Voter
Approval	98%	9%	83%	50%	81%	83%	58%	66%
Pro-Con	—	—	3	6	3	2	5	—
Disapproval	2	91	12	40	10	7	30	5
Don't Know or Not Ascertained	—	—	2	4	6	8	7	29
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
Number of cases	73	23	173	118	118	343	55	67

* Local leaders from Okayama were not asked this or subsequent issue questions.

On the issue of the anti-strike bill, as on rearmament, we find the leaders of right and left taking a more clear-cut position than their constituents. Conservative party voters in both areas, however, follow their leaders far more closely than leftist party voters. This can be explained by reference to responses to another labor question: "Do you think Japanese unions have too much power in Japan today, not enough power, or just about enough?" To this question only 36 per cent of Osaka's left-wing voters and 22 per cent of Shimane's left-wing voters gave the party-line answer, "not enough." Males and those of high information level, regardless of party, gave more pro-labor responses on the strike bill question than did females and those of low information. It will be noted that these sub-groups showed opposite tendencies on the rearmament question.

Almost half of the conservative leaders interviewed favored even more drastic curbs on labor, including revision of the Labor Standards Act.⁴ They argued in the following terms: "Japan is so weak economically that we can't keep raising our export prices by pampering labor at home;" "The Occupation gave unions so many rights they no longer think of their duties to the public;" "Farmers don't like labor's misuse of a strike right which farmers cannot enjoy." Leftist leaders insisted that "Management should be more sympathetic toward workers. . . . Not all their strikes are instigated by Communists." Given the temper of public opinion, the conservative coalition of Liberals and Progressives in the Diet is likely to proceed swiftly along this line of revisionism, however, as seen in the recent law designed to curb the political activity of teachers in public schools.

⁴ Law No. 49 of April 1, 1947. For this and other Occupation reforms, see the two-volume Report of Government Section, SCAP, Political Reorientation of Japan (Washington, G.P.O., 1949).

The two revisionist issues so far discussed were ones on which public opinion and leadership opinion were both well-crystallized. There were other issues, however, on which only leadership opinion had reached that stage. As examples, we may look briefly at leader and voter opinion on two of the most favorably publicized reforms of the Occupation: land reform and educational reform. On neither of these reforms had voter pressure for revisionism reached major proportions, but a majority of our leadership sample criticized both reforms. Tables IV and V illustrate the contrasting nature of leader-voter opinion on

TABLE IV. RELATION OF PARTY ORIENTATION TO ATTITUDES TOWARD LAND REFORM

Attitude toward Land Reform	Leaders		Osaka Voters			Shimane Voters
	Right	Left	Right	Left	Non- Voter	Right	Left	Non- Voter
Approval	25 %	79 %	25 %	39 %	17 %	60 %	60 %	55 %
Pro-Con	3	9	10	7	9	5	3	6
Disapproval	68	8	10	7	6	15	14	7
Don't Know or Not Ascertained	4	4	55	47	68	20	23	32
Total	100 %	100 %	100 %	100 %	100 %	100 %	100 %	100 %
Number of Cases	73	23	173	118	118	343	55	67

these two reform measures. The tables are based on data from open-end questions on the respondent's personal impression of the operation of the two reforms in his locality.

Clearly, our leader sample shows a sharp right-left division on the question of land reform, but not on the educational reform. Voters, on the other hand, displayed more hostility toward the latter than the former, but no voter group voiced over 32 per cent disapproval on either question. These are two areas of revisionism where the leaders have much spade work ahead to convince their constituents of the need for sweeping changes in Occupation handiwork. It may well be, however, that more specific questions on ex-landlord compensation, revision in the time period for compulsory schooling, or abolition of local school boards would have produced more pro-revisionist sentiment. The tables above do not show the wide variety of replies under each category, but interviewer probing did not elicit many reasoned replies of an expected nature. Voters seemed disinterested in these reforms and, in the case of Osaka voters on land reform, were largely ignorant of the reform's impact.

Leaders, however, were explicit in their praise or condemnation of both these reforms. Conservatives in Osaka, particularly, denounced the harshness and unsuitability of the land reform; the confiscatory prices paid to landlords, many of whom were impoverished by the reform; the arbitrary action of local land committees; and the inability of new owner-cultivators to make good. Leaders in rural Shimane divided evenly on this question, reflecting the majority opin-

TABLE V. RELATION OF PARTY ORIENTATION TO ATTITUDES TOWARD EDUCATIONAL REFORM

Attitude toward Education Reform	Leaders		Osaka Voters			Shimane Voters
	Right	Left	Right	Left	Non- Voter	Right	Left	Non- Voter
Approval	40%	52%	44%	42%	36%	51%	55%	57%
Pro-Con	—	—	9	12	9	7	9	5
Disapproval	55	48	32	29	21	26	29	10
Don't Know or Not Ascertained	5	—	15	17	34	15	7	28
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
Number of Cases	73	23	173	118	118	343	55	67

ion among their constituents. Left-wing leaders tended to deplore signs of landlord revival and regret the failure to include forest land in the reform. Both rightist and leftist leaders divided quite evenly on the educational reform, but rightists were less enthusiastic in their praise and much harsher in their criticism of the time extension, P.T.A., elective school boards, and the Teachers' Union. Both conservative and radical leaders who criticized the new school system gave its cost as their major reason. It has been the financial burden of decentralized school and police systems that has given new impetus to the trend toward consolidation of local units of government (the so-called gappei movement). In fact, 90 per cent of the right-wing leaders and 45 per cent of the leftists voiced disapproval of the entire postwar system of local autonomy. Leftist leaders were inclined to base their objections on the need to extend the system, whereas rightist leaders tended to favor more grants-in-aid, if not actual control, by the central government of functions the Occupation assigned to prefectures and municipalities.

Finally, in Table VI, we can see the overall score on revisionism for each of the six groups included in the survey. The replies to the five questions discussed above (on rearmament, the strike bill, labor union power, land reform, and educational reform) were combined into a single scale score for each respondent on a 1, 2, 3 point basis corresponding to a pro-revisionist, neutral, or anti-revisionist reply on each of the five questions. The highest revisionist score was 5 points; the extreme anti-revisionist score 15 points. Despite the lack of party correlation on the last two items, the scale clearly differentiates between conservative, radical, and non-voter subgroups.

The table demonstrates the anticipated degree of correlation between party affiliation and revisionist opinion, with the non-voters highest in the "medium" or neutral category. The pattern is similar in both urban and rural sample areas, except that the rural Shimane conservatives' approval of land reform gives them a lower overall score.

* * *

What conclusions can we draw from this brief analysis of political revisionism

TABLE VI. RELATION OF PARTY ORIENTATION TO SCALE OF REVISIONIST OPINION

Scale of Revisionist Opinion	Osaka Voters			Shimane Voters
	Right	Left	Non- Voter	Right	Left	Non- Voter
High*	35%	12%	18%	25%	14%	6%
Medium	44	26	58	40	25	58
Low	21	62	24	35	61	36
Total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
Number of Cases	173	118	118	343	55	67

* "High" indicates strong pro-revisionist opinion; "Low" indicates strong anti-revisionist opinion.

in post-treaty Japan? The section of the survey dealing with this topic was highly selective in its choice of issues. Many other Occupation policies might have been included but some, like the crusade against the zaibatsu and the broader purge, were already dead letters in 1952. Others would have been even more difficult to test in a voter survey than the land and educational reforms included here. Given this limitation, it appears that at least three of the five questions on the voter survey, and four on the leadership survey, produced significant data on the extent of revisionist attitudes and on the relation of right-left party orientation to such attitudes.

On the question of the extent of revisionist opinion, a majority of all leaders sampled favored revisionist policies toward all Occupation reforms included in the survey. A majority of all voters sampled favored revisionist policies toward disarmament and the right to strike in public utilities, and opposed any extension of union powers. The voters, however, gave plurality approval to land reform and educational reform. Both leaders and voters gave stronger approval to labor policy revisionism than to rearmament, but leaders expressed more extreme views on all issues.

On the question of partisan differences on revisionism, leaders split along right-left lines on every issue with the exception of educational reform, and even in that case an examination of the responses reveals party-line differences on the reasons given. (This is perhaps more noteworthy since a quarter of the leader sample were nominal Independents and a majority were local politicians to whom party ties are supposed to mean little.) Voters in both the urban and rural sample also divided along right-left partisan lines on the three questions of rearmament, the anti-strike bill, and labor union powers. Political partisanship in Japan, as in the United States,⁵ shows a clear correlation with the respondent's attitude on meaningful issues. Non-voters in the sample showed the expected tendency to be unconcerned with political issues, but only in the rural area was this very marked. Other data from the survey confirm this relationship between partisanship and political attitudes.

⁵ For somewhat comparable American data, see Warren E. Miller, "Party Preference and Attitudes on Political Issues: 1948-1951," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 45-60 (March, 1953), and Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston, Ill., 1954).

No significant differences between the urban Osaka sample and the rural Shimane sample are evident either on the extent of revisionist opinion or on partisan differences on issues, with the possible exception of land reform.

The survey data do not in themselves warrant more general conclusions on the nature and future of Japanese revisionism. However, based on his overall study of Japanese politics, including this survey material, the author hazards a few final observations.

Revisionist legislation has already been passed by the Diet in the areas of civil liberties, labor, economic concentration, and administrative reform. Will the conservative coalition proceed to revise all other substantive reforms of the Occupation out of existence? The extent and nature of leadership opinion suggest that the trend in that direction will increase in the near future. Revisionism is not an ephemeral post-treaty phenomenon but a complex, deeply-rooted amalgam of Japanese nationalism and justified criticism of Occupation excesses.

The fact that voters were less enthusiastic about some revisionist aims than were their leaders suggests that the priority of targets will be chosen carefully and that public opinion will be prepared more adequately for later targets. Left-wing opposition parties, committed to the defense of Occupation reforms which both coincide with their ideological beliefs and buttress their electoral strength, will force the conservatives into increasingly sharp battles both inside and outside of the Diet building. Cooperation among the three conservative parties and among the four left-wing parties will grow stronger as revisionism and foreign policy cleavages become more pronounced. To the extent that revisionism aids the domestic right and harms the domestic left, the leadership of the Liberal-Progressive majority has added incentive for carrying out its revisionist program.

Whether foreign observers should view Japanese revisionism with alarm or approbation is likely to provoke wide disagreement, since there are muted overtones in any review of American postwar policy toward Japan which are reminiscent of the acrimonious debate over our postwar policy in China. Those who favored the original Occupation policies of 1945-1947, regretted the transition from "reform" to "recovery," and still look hopefully toward the non-Communist left in Japan, are apt to be alarmed by revisionist actions and attitudes. Those who may have approved the early reform policies in naïve ignorance of their effect on Japan, but now realize the impracticality or undesirability of reforms that undermine a viable Japanese economy and polity, are apt to approve revisionism. The latter may hope that, if revisionism can strengthen the moderate right against the present danger of a quasi-Communist left and the possible danger of an anti-foreign right, it will prove to be a healthy as well as a natural development in post-treaty Japanese politics.

CAPITAL AND CARBUNCLES: THE "GREAT BOOKS" REAPPRAISED

ANDREW HACKER

Princeton University

Professor David Easton's widely discussed essay in academic psychoanalysis is indicative of the methodological trauma through which political science is now passing. Of particular interest is his chapter on political theory, which, according to his diagnosis, has suffered from a malady known as "decline into historicism."¹ His specific point of criticism is that the commentaries of Dunning, McIlwain, and Sabine have led students away from serious study of value theory. This kind of attack, however, does not get to the nub of the problem which surrounds political theory. For while political scientists seem to feel that political theory should be made the "heart" of their discipline,² they will also have to acknowledge that the "heart" of political theory itself has been reading the "Great Books." A far greater indictment than Easton's, then, is that it is an unquestioning reliance on the "Great Books" which has served to thwart any significant expansion of the scope and function of political theory—in terms of value theory or any other kind. Students are told to read the books with great care. But why they have to read them at all is a question which has seldom been squarely confronted. Hence both undergraduates and graduate students come away, perhaps somewhat pleased that they can now quote a few choice axioms from Burke, but nonethemore edified as to how the learned authors of yesteryear can aid them in understanding the science of politics.

The reason for this, as Easton has suggested and as I will make plain, is that the "Great Books" are primarily taught as history—more particularly, as history of ideas and historical biography—with often a smattering of logic added. The student of politics, when he comes to study theory, is immediately given an historian's pair of shoes. Virtually all the methods which he learned as a political scientist are painstakingly ignored. It is not being deprecatory of the study of history to point out that it is something quite different from the study of politics. It would be a grave error to fail to see that a knowledge of history is vital for the political scientist. He cannot understand the American Senate of 1954 without knowing something of the War between the States; he cannot claim to know today's House of Commons without appreciating its Elizabethan counterpart. But history, when used by the student of politics, must, like Harold Laski's expert, be on tap and not on top. For this reason, then, the political scientist must always have before him the question, in paraphrase of Professor Lynd, "History for What?" For history is no more than a technique for the political scientist: it should be a handmaiden, as mathematics is to the physical sciences. A political scientist should be able to draw on historical evidence with as great facility as he utilizes public opinion polls and the files of the Congressional Record.

¹ David Easton, The Political System (New York, 1953), Ch. 10.

² Cf. Committee for the Advancement of Teaching, American Political Science Association, Goals for Political Science (New York, 1951), pp. 116–33. Citing "opinions from the men and women who teach political science in the leading institutions of higher education in the country," the Committee found that while in terms of actual curricula political theory is not "the core of political science," at the same time there was a "widespread feeling . . . that it should be made the heart of the subject" (p. 126).

My contention here is that political science is a bona-fide member of the social science family. And, for this reason, it is contemporary. Economic and sociological theory deal solely with today's world. (Or they deal with generalizations which encompass all times and all places. But such theorizing must necessarily include the here and now of today's world.) It is only political theory which has failed to note its contemporaneity. Saddled, to a far greater extent than economics or sociology, with a shelf-full of "Great Books," the political theorist of today is content to discuss such topics as: "George Plekhanov and the 'Iskra' Period;" "Significance and Impact of Heinrich Treitschke;" "The Political Thought of L. T. Hobhouse;" and "Thomas Hobbes' Concept of Religion and the State's Relation to It." (These are four of the first six projects listed under Political Philosophy in the list of doctoral dissertations published, in the September, 1953, issue of the AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW.) As we are quite aware, Plekhanov, Treitschke, Hobhouse, and Hobbes are very much dead and buried. Yet political scientists continue to read them—and prescribe the reading of them to their students—in our own day. My concern, however, is not so much with the fact that Plekhanov, Treitschke, and writers like them form the corpus of political theory. Personally I desire to save the "Great Books" rather than bury them. And it is for that reason that I wish to examine the ways in which these books are approached, and evaluate the relevance that these approaches have for political science.

It may be well to admit here that I can do little more than assume that the function of political theory is to deal with the contemporary world (or, more grandiosely, with all periods in history, including the present). And I fear that this can be no more than an assumption about the character of political theory, which one either accepts or rejects prima facie. Theory has the dual task of explaining behavior (causal theory) and adumbrating principles on how people ought to behave (ethical theory). Hence, the burden must be shifted to the non-contemporaries. They must show how the study of history, or of the history of ideas, or of historical biography—in and of themselves—have a meaning for political science. The burden of justification, it seems to me, lies with those who would immerse themselves in history. They must show why political theory, unlike theory in the other social sciences, should be anything other than contemporary with regard to the problems that it sets for itself.

I have divided the prevalent ways of reading the "Great Books" into ten arbitrary (and occasionally overlapping) categories, designated as follows: (1) Capital and Carbuncles; (2) The Hero-Worshippers; (3) Intellectual Plagiarism; (4) Who-Said-It-First?; (5) The Mind-Readers; (6) The Camera-Eye; (7) Influencing the Intelligentsia; (8) Influencing the Masses; (9) The Logic-

Book;³ and (10) Timeless. No brief rubric can tell the whole story and I have therefore attempted to capture the spirit of each approach. It is (10), and only (10), I will maintain, which is the appropriate way for students of political theory to approach the "Great Books."

1. Capital and Carbuncles. This first approach is primarily biographical. Here we are concerned to know how a particular book came to be written in a particular way. Thus the fact that Marx had carbuncles made him vent all the more vitriol on the bourgeoisie in his Capital. Or we are told that Rousseau's constricted bladder made him all the less coherent at the time he wrote the Social Contract. But there is more than this. If, we hear, there were vitiating circumstances surrounding the writing of a particular book, then a reading of other, and less well-known, books by the same author will show us his "real" outlook—and meaning. For example, Guglielmo Ferrero tells us that if we are to know the "real" Machiavelli, we must read his Discourses. In fact, Ferrero tells us, even in The Prince there are only a few of the notorious "Machiavellian" strictures and these are not connected with each other nor with the rest of the argument, which could be either suppressed entirely without mutilating the work or rendered quite inoffensive by disguising their thought in less frank terminology. Anyone acquainted with the life and character of Machiavelli knows that these fragments of his thought, on which a whole theory of conduct has been erected, are nothing but bad-tempered explosions.⁴

Hence we must add to Marx's carbuncles and Rousseau's bladder, Machiavelli's bad temper. Once we know, and make allowance for, this character-trait we can fully understand Machiavelli the Author. But if we follow this approach then we will concern ourselves not with the "whole theory of conduct" which grew out of Machiavelli's bad temper, but rather with the biography of a single man and perhaps the historical conditions which surrounded the writing of one of his books. The verdict here, then, must be that such a study is biography and history; but it is not politics.

2. The Hero-Worshippers. "A hitherto undiscovered cache of the Harrington papers has been uncovered beneath the floor-boards of a remote Devonshire inn, and Professor Smith, a leading Harrington-scholar, has reported that he intends to spend the next five years studying and cataloging them." This quotation is wholly of my own making, but paraphrases of it are not hard to discover. The "Harrington-scholar" is concerned, and concerned only, with the life and works of Harrington the man. In (1) we saw how some people "interpreted" Capital in light of Marx's carbuncles. But the Hero-Worshippers are not only concerned with the significant books by a particular author; every single jotting that the man set down on paper is of crucial importance. Thus, for example, Mr. Pelczynski of Oxford, in the Cambridge Journal, elucidated Hegel's thoughts on the English Constitution: "In October 1831 Die Preussische Staatszeitung published an article entitled 'Ueber die englische Reformbill' by the Professor of Philosophy at the Royal University of Berlin, G. W. F. Hegel."⁵ Mr. Pelczynski, however, is forced to confess that "On the whole. . . Hegel's account of the formal or legal side of the Constitution. . . contains nothing that can be called original or profound."⁶ And he concludes: "And so he must join the large group of distinguished and learned foreigners who, while they said much about the English Constitution that was true and interesting, always managed in the end to misjudge it in some fundamental respect."⁷ Now Mr. Pelczynski is a Hegel scholar. The rest of us remember Hegel because of such books as his Philosophy of Right or his Philosophy of History. But, for Mr. Pelczynski, Hegel's article on the English Constitution is also of importance. However, most all of his remarks are either misunderstandings or common-places; there are at least a dozen better commentaries on the subject. Does the fact that Hegel made them make them any the less undistinguished? But the Hero-Worshiper must give the front rank to everything that his Hero wrote. By this token, if a Calhoun-scholar discovered a (thoroughly bad) picture by Calhoun, would he try to persuade the South Carolina Art Gallery to hang it?

³ The Logic-Book approach is not a victim of the historical bias to which I have been alluding. However, it is still non-political. Hence, even though logical analysis may be exonerated from the historical taint, it must nevertheless come under the axe because of its failure to pass the political test.

⁴ Quoted in the bibliography of William Ebenstein's Great Political Thinkers (New York, 1951), p. 845. It should be said that Professor Ebenstein's short introductions in this book of readings are noteworthy examples of an attempt to show the relevance of the ideas contained in the "Great Books" to the problems of the contemporary world.

We can see, then, that this approach must very definitely be classed as biography. It certainly is not politics.

3. Intellectual Plagiarism. Every author of a "Great Book," this approach postulates, is wittingly or unwittingly echoing the words of one of his predecessors. Marx's ideas are to be found in Babeuf, Ricardo, and Hodgskin. T. H. Green and Bosanquet (not so unwittingly) are based on Hegel. Even if an author does not give credit to his mentors, his plagiarisms can still be traced. One hears of the scholar who spent his life trying to reconstruct the exact contents of Rousseau's library, bibliography, and reading lists in order to discover which books might have influenced him. Along this line, the late Professor Laski once wrote:

A careful comparison with Bodin has revealed to me that Montcretien, usually acclaimed as the founder of political economy, has, in fact, taken 300 pages wholesale from Bodin, merely inverting the order of Bodin's remarks. And in the books this unblushing plagiarism is exhibited as supreme originality.⁸

Now one need not go so far as to accuse M. Montcretien of "unblushing" plagiarism. It may well be that he had just read so much of Bodin that he could not help but have his ideas in the forefront of his mind. When Mr. Plamenatz devotes a book to showing the dependence of the Utilitarians on Hobbes, he ⁵ Zbyszek Pelczynski, "Hegel on the English Constitution," Cambridge Journal, Vol. 5, pp. 519-30, at p. 519 (June, 1952).

⁶ Ibid., at p. 521.

⁷ Ibid., at p. 530.

⁸ The Holmes-Laski Letters, ed. Mark Howe, 2 vols. (London, 1953), Vol. 2, p. 1098.

does not mean to say that Bentham consciously plagiarized Hobbes.⁹ It is sufficient to note that the ideas of one man influenced another's writing. This approach seeks to find out the impact of writer on writer. It can depend on direct evidence, as a diary entry which might read, "Today read Locke and was much impressed;" or it can rest on mere deduction from similarity of words and phrases in the works of two men. But no matter whether we are charitable or otherwise, this method of study is concerned with either the history of ideas or the biographies of individual authors. It is not, however, concerned with politics.

4. Who-Said-It-First? The previous approach was interested in the direct or indirect influence of one author upon another. Quite different are the searchers after the man who crossed the finish line first. Professor Friedrich writes of modern theorists:

A review of their contributions to date to political theory reveals that most of what they have had to say has been a repetition of existing knowledge, developed in the course of the history of political thought.¹⁰

They usually frame such questions as: Who was the "father" of sociology? Who first spoke of sovereignty? or Who originated the notion of natural rights? The accepted procedure here is, for example, to take Comte, who is the "recognized" father of sociology, and show that Montesquieu emphasized sociological factors long before Comte was alive. Once Montesquieu begins to gain ground, then Hobbes or Machiavelli will be rushed in to take over the paternity. The difficulty with this approach is that the classicists are always ready at hand with Plato and Aristotle to show that they anticipated anything and everything that has since been said in political theory. For example, Professor Kecskemeti tells us:

The idea of "policy science" is not a new one. . . . Its first, incomparable formulation is found in Plato's Republic: policy, the Platonic Socrates says, can be reasonable and sound only if it is based upon the fullness of scientific insight and knowledge.¹¹

And they, by reason of seniority, crossed the finish-line long before anyone else. One effect here, of course, is to steal the thunder from modern theorists. If one postulates that there has been "nothing new" since Hobbes (i.e., all the finish lines have already been crossed), then one need not bother to keep up to date on developments in the recent history of political thought. But no matter what the cause or consequences of such a study of the "Great Books," it is essentially subject-matter for the history of ideas and is not politics.

⁹ John Plamenatz, Mill's Utilitarianism, Reprinted with a Study of the English Utilitarians (Oxford, 1949), pp. 16, 21, 116. For a splendid criticism of this Who-Influenced-Whom approach, see Arthur Child's review of Plamenatz's book in Ethics, Vol. 60, pp. 223-24, at p. 223 (April, 1950).

¹⁰ This statement was taken from notes for a paper which was delivered before the American Political Science Association in September, 1953, entitled "The Historical Approach to Political Thought: A Re-Evaluation." Professor Friedrich's argument is an authoritative counterweight to the viewpoint which I am suggesting in this article.

¹¹ "The Policy Sciences," World Politics, Vol. 4, pp. 520-35, at p. 520 (July, 1952).

5. The Mind-Readers. Most of us, it seems, do not know what the authors of the "Great Books" really meant. This is probably because we have not read those tomes closely enough or with enough care. Or it may be because we do not know a sufficient amount about the life of the author and about the historical surroundings. While the usual reason is that close attention has not been granted to the text, it is also occasionally said that we must know the contemporaneous definitions of words in order to understand the author's real intentions. Mr. C. H. Wilson gives us the sad tale of Bodin:

By the majority perhaps of those in the succeeding centuries who were influenced by Bodin, his statement was read and received as a statement of absolute, unlimited sovereignty freeing the ruler, whether a person or a body of persons, from every restraint except that of his own sovereign will. Nothing was further from the author's real meaning. . . .¹²

Hence we see that not only modern students, but also "the majority . . . of those . . . who were influenced by Bodin" failed to capture his "real meaning." This is probably because, unlike Mr. Wilson, they read Bodin hastily and without appreciating the qualifications and nuances with which he surrounded his statements. What does not seem to trouble Mr. Wilson is that Bodin was influential simply because he was misunderstood. If people had known his "real meaning," as Mr. Wilson claims to, then they probably would not have paid any attention to him. In fact, the only reason that Mr. Wilson has even heard of Bodin—the only reason why his reputation has survived—is because people considered him as the author of a "statement of absolute, unlimited sovereignty." Without such an interpretation, however unjust to Bodin it may be, Bodin is historically meaningless. Perhaps, then, Mr. Wilson ought to join "the majority" and misread Bodin as well! But in any event the Mind-Reader approach is philosophical (insofar as it pays attention to the logic of a man's sentences), and historical and biographical. But it is not political.

6. The Camera-Eye. The "Great Books" give us a good idea of what some thoughtful people had on their minds during a certain historical period. This is certainly true. One cannot deny that, at the time Rousseau's Social Contract appeared, a goodly number of people were thinking about social contracts. In this sense, then, we can see reflections of what was on men's minds. And we can read Burke on the French Revolution and Paine on the Rights of Man and see that different groups were thinking different things in the 1790's. Of course there were a lot of people who weren't thinking at all; or people who might have been thinking, but who couldn't read books. But the Camera-Eye can only focus on the literati. Hence while Locke's Second Treatise is useful for telling us what the American Founding Fathers had on their minds when they were thinking about politics, there is no book that will tell us what the illiterate Kikuyu in Kenya are thinking about today. In addition, "anticipatory" books, those which give vent to ideas prior to the time when they have become generally accepted, have a value insofar as they are the first to cross the finish-line. But they do not reflect the thought of the time in which they were written. Vico, for instance, was resurrected by Michelet long after he had passed away. The people of Vico's time had never heard of Vico; and he didn't give a Camera-Eye of his contemporaries' thinking anyway. But this is interesting to us only if we are concerned with the history of ideas. It is not any help with politics.

¹² "Sovereign and Sovereignty," Chambers Encyclopedia, new edition (New York, 1951), Vol. 12, p. 775.

From another angle we can say that Tocqueville gives us a good historical picture of pre-Revolutionary France; or that Aristotle informs us of the constitutions of Ancient Greece. This, however, is cheating. If we want to know about France or Greece we ought to go about it the way historians do: through a careful study of manuscripts, records, eye-witness accounts, etc. The "Great Books" tell us little in the way of actual history. Burke's French Revolution is not an historical description of that event; it is a polemic telling us it ought never to have happened. There are not two histories: one for the political theorist, to be gained through the "Great Books", and another for the historian, to be gained through the traditional sources. There is only one history, and that is the historian's history. History via the "Great Books" is inaccurate, incomplete, and has such a strong bias as to be worthless. And anyhow this Camera-Eye value (or lack of value) in the "Great Books" is history and not politics.

7. Influencing the Intelligentsia. This approach is similar to (3). But (3) went down the historical scale; the fact that Monteretien "plagiarized" Bodin was of interest there. Here, however, we are interested in books because they influenced particular intellectuals in a later period. Theory, then, becomes the History of Political Books. Bosanquet, for example, captures our attention because we can see the influence of Hegel and T. H. Green on him. Of course Bosanquet didn't influence anyone himself. He wrote in Oxford and it is likely that no more than a small circle of dons read him at the time (and read him still). And Bosanquet seems in different ways, to have influenced Collingwood and A. D. Lindsay.¹³ In this sort of study we are far removed from political events. We are not, as in (6), concerned to see what whole countries were thinking. It is merely that we set up a chain of book-writers and then do not have the heart to break it. Hence we can begin with Rousseau and move on up to Hegel (so far so good). If we say that Hegel influenced Marx, and Marx Lenin, then we are on the track of important political events. But if we say that Hegel influenced Green, and Green Bosanquet, and Bosanquet Lindsay, we are lost in the cloisters of Oxford's intelligentsia and far from anything in the world of political behavior. Hence we must conclude that this is the history of ideas that we are studying and not politics at all. And it can become the history of interesting, or logical, or worthwhile ideas—but they can well be ideas wholly divorced from any streams of action. Insofar as these ideas are worthwhile, the fact that they ever "influenced" any other writers is unimportant for our purposes. Hence, as we will see in (10), such books can be very useful in studying political theory. But this need not entail studying their historical pedigrees.

¹³ For a careful study of the intellectual currents which influenced A. D. Lindsay, see Adam Ulam's The Philosophical Foundations of English Socialism (Cambridge, Mass., 1951), esp. Chs. 2, 5. But just who or what was influenced by Lindsay is something that Ulam never makes clear. Few will deny that Lindsay wrote intelligent and interesting books on democratic theory. But to say this is quite different from saying that he had a significant impact on English Socialism.

8. Influencing the Masses. The title of this section is not wholly an accurate one. For here we are concerned to see how books influenced political events. A "Great Book" does not, however, have to be read by the masses in order to influence political movements. Hence we may speak, first, of books which had an impact on "thinking" people. In this vein we can see that Locke's Second Treatise and Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws influenced Hamilton and Madison. Thus we may say that Locke and Montesquieu had an impact, respectively, on the American Revolution and the American Constitution. But these authors were known only to the Founding Fathers; the rough farmers of the backwoods of Pennsylvania cannot be said to have been influenced directly by the "Great Books." On the other hand, books such as the Communist Manifesto and Rousseau's Social Contract were read by, and did influence, the masses directly. In this case the "Great Books" were really pamphlets and were read as polemical broadsides of their time. There is, of course, a middle ground between a book which influences a single influential man (as Pareto was said to have stirred Mussolini) and a book which sways millions (as the Communist Manifesto has). In fact most of the "Great Books" are in this in-between area. But it is important to know how much of a "best-seller" each one was.

Knowing who read a certain "Great Book" is vital because it ought to determine how we read it. There is no doubt that Madison read Locke very carefully; hence we ought to read him carefully as well. But the chances are that the pamphlet-type "Great Books" were read hastily and without too much attention to details. It would, therefore, be advisable for the student to read the Communist Manifesto on a crowded and noisy bus; that is probably the atmosphere in which most of the masses of mankind read it. But often we have to read a book in both ways. The Federalist Papers, for example, originally appeared as articles in New York newspapers. They were doubtless read by the electors of that State with the summary attention that we give to the Alsop brothers. On the other hand, the Federalist is important because Chief Justice Marshall relied heavily on it to form his judicial opinions. And it is certain that Marshall read the Papers with great care and close attention. So, depending on which particular group was influenced by it, we must be prepared to change our attitudes when we pick up a particular "Great Book." But no matter how a book influenced historical action, no matter whether it influenced the masses, the cultured few, or a single man, if we are concerned with its influence we are using it to study history. And history is not politics.

9. The Logic-Book. Here we are bidden to take up a "Great Book" in one hand and an elementary logic-book in the other. We then search for (and are bound to find) tautologies, excluded middles, inconsistencies, and non-sequiturs galore. It matters not if the book was written as a tuppenny pamphlet (as were many of Paine's or Marx's works), if it was a magazine article for a middle-class audience (as was Mill's On Liberty), or if it was the studied product of Oxford professors (as were Green's and Bosanquet's books). Thus Mr. Toulmin tells us: "What makes the writings of Bentham, Hobbes, Hegel and Marx 'philosophical' in our sense is the logical characteristics of their statements, not the special purposes for which they make them."¹⁴ Out of this conception of "political philosophy" can come a book by Mr. Weldon which shows us that Marxist foundations are "worthless," "metaphysical and empty."¹⁵ Yet out of this "worthlessness" and "emptiness" came the Russian Revolution. If Czar Nicholas had distributed logic-books to the peasants would the revolution have been averted? But one wonders why Messrs. Toulmin and Weldon pick out Marx for their study. Why do they not tell us about the "logical characteristics" of the New York Telephone Directory? The answer is simple. Marx has a relation to practical political movements, and the Telephone Directory has not. But practical movements are not moved by logic. And if that is all that the logic-book people are telling us they are not telling us much. The quixotic element here is that historical events have made Bentham, Hobbes, Hegel, and Marx of interest to us. All four, in their own times and to this day, have influenced people. Indeed, as we saw in (5), that is why they have come to our notice. And "the logical characteristics" of the statements in these "Great Books" (or their lack of logic) were unimportant to the people who read them and were influenced by them. But if it is simply "logical characteristics" that are wanted, then Babeuf will do as well as Marx; Hooker as Locke; and the Voting Register of San Francisco as Bentham. In a word, these are logic-book exercises, or (in some people's eyes) philosophy, but it is not a study of politics.

10. Timeless. The "Great Books" are timeless for both causal and ethical theory. First, they can go far toward explaining the political behavior of today. They do this because of their universal application. Aristotle's comments on the role of the middle class, or the causes of revolution, can tell us much about those phenomena in our own society. St. Augustine's "original sin" is, many would maintain, still among us now and is the "cause" of the disruptions and maladjustments in politics. Rousseau's "general will" may have been a metaphor, but it alludes to a factor in social behavior which has still to be satisfactorily explained by modern verbiage. And certainly Machiavelli's strictures on what rulers actually do do are relevant at this moment. Second, various of the "Great Books" prescribe norms which are as worthy of attention—depending on your particular moral outlook—now as they ever were. Thus Tom Paine's "natural rights" of man can still ring a bell for many in 1954. John Stuart Mill on liberty may be listened to by some; and Burke on prescription is heeded by others. The Federalist Papers warn us (or those of us who care to be warned) of the undesirability of unchecked power; and Rousseau points up the virtues of equality if we care to listen. Many of these books, as I pointed out earlier, were pamphlets. But no small number of them can polemicize us today as well as they stirred their original readers. (We may recall that in the thirties the business organizations distributed a new edition of Herbert Spencer's The Man v. The State.)

But even here we must be wary of historical pitfalls. It should be borne in mind that if our political theory is to be contemporary, then only those books or parts of books which are relevant to the world today should be studied. Hence we can well ignore, on the descriptive side, Hegel on the absolute monarchy and Montesquieu on climatic forces in politics. The former deals with an institution which is no longer significant and the latter is too sketchy to have any descriptive value for us. On the ethical side it is hard to rule any "Great Book" out of court. For values are long-lived and are often applicable after the institutional arrangements which sired them have perished. Nevertheless one can doubt if there is much point in considering the desirability of St. Simon's kind of utopia. Utopias are excellent theory; but if they were designed as outgrowths of past societies, then it tends to be difficult to see them as catering to our present aspirations.

¹⁴ An Examination of the Place of Reason in Ethics (Cambridge, Eng., 1950), p. 199.

¹⁵ The Vocabulary of Politics (London, 1953), Ch. 4.

Nevertheless the "timelessness" of the "Great Books" must overcome still other hurdles before they can be accepted as sources for political theory. On the one hand, most of them are not as systematic or detailed as the treatises which appear today on the same general subjects (e.g., Montesquieu on geographical factors). On the other hand, and this is really a truism, they do not contain applications which fit the theoretical problems of our own day. Hence one might suggest that if we are interested in conservatism we ought to read Mr. Russell Kirk's recent book, The Conservative Mind,¹⁶ rather than Burke. For Kirk speaks, in his opening and closing chapters, of that political creed in 1953, and, as political theorists and moralists, that is what concerns us. Similarly Harold Laski's Democracy in Crisis (1932) might make Marxism more meaningful to us than the Master himself. And the same can be said for substituting R. H. Tawney for Tom Paine and James Burnham for Machiavelli. On the purely descriptive side it is possible that V. O. Key's or Earl Latham's detailed studies of parties and groups might be of more use than the vague references to "factions" in earlier works. In the same vein, "social class" has been explored more deeply and widely by modern sociologists than Aristotle ever managed to do. And to say that Plato first thought of "policy science" does not mean that we can get as much out of Socrates' mouth as we can out of Lerner and Lasswell's The Policy Sciences.

But despite the existence of these contemporary works in political theory it cannot be denied (and, indeed, this is the raison d'être of all I am saying) that the "Great Books" faced up to many important problems in ways which have never been bettered. I cannot think of any of Hume's successors who have discussed the notion of "consent" more adequately. Rousseau on "will" has been echoed but never expanded. And the "sin" expounded by the Church Fathers has never been explained away by modern psychologists. It is in these metaphorical or poetic moments that the "timelessness" of the "Great Books" comes to the fore. Both on descriptive and on moral grounds, especially the latter, they perform a function which cannot easily be belittled.

¹⁶ (Chicago, 1953). My sole criticism of this excellent analysis is that Kirk deals only with book-writing conservatives. This is well-and-good for the age when statesmen, e.g., Burke, Adams, Calhoun, took time off to write theoretical tomes. But the more recent "conservative mind" is not to be discovered in the works of Babbitt, More, and Santayana. One must study the Supreme Court opinions of Justice Field, the speeches of Senator Taft, the pamphlets of the Liberty League, and the editorials of Fortune magazine. (Indeed, the reviews of Kirk's book in Time and Fortune are as revealing of the make-up of the contemporary "conservative mind" as is the book itself.)

A further point must be made if we are to use the "Great Books" in our study of theory. This caveat may steal much of the ground from under those who explicate the "Great Books." But the dredging operation must be performed. This is that we should cease and desist from proving the "Great Books" wrong. It is well known that the cherished game of teachers is to debunk and disprove the ancient authors. Yet if we are to allow the "Great Books" admittance because they can explain political behavior in a valid way, then we should do it with a good grace. If particular books are not valid, then we should leave them outside the classroom and not give them entrance merely to castigate them for their "errors." I realize that it gives us a great feeling of exhilaration to show where "we know better" than Hobbes or Bentham or Lenin. But considering that the "Great Books" have been "great" just because many people have thought their arguments to be legitimate, it little behooves us—in our different surroundings—to spend our time parading the sins of our forefathers. I do not deny that, for example, we can better show Hume's "correct" idea of consent by contrasting it with Locke's "incorrect" idea (for, after all, Hume wrote as a critic of Locke). But it will be well to carry this constructive purpose in the front of our minds. My concern, then, is not with deifying the great authors; it is with the study of political theory. To devote a lecture to "Where Marx Went Wrong" is not much help unless it is by way of contrast to where someone else went right. Our concern should be not with Marx as an author, but with the things Marx was trying to theorize about. Our interest, as political theorists, is, for example, with the question of "social change" per se; it is not with Marx-on-social-change. And since theory is the search for "correct" answers, it should spend time disproving the "incorrect" answers in the "Great Books" only if it has a positive purpose in view.

The popularity of the historical-biographical-logical approach is not difficult to explain. If it is employed, then the political theorist need do no more than set his five-foot shelf of tomes by his armchair. That is his "data." All he need do is to read and re-read those few books. By way of "research," he can confine himself to libraries; his tasks will be such endeavors as discovering Machiavelli's bad temper, Hegel's views on the English Constitution, and Marx's debts to Hodgskin. If he is a logician he can sit in the fastness of his study and seek out tautologies in Mill or a seventh definition of "property" in Locke's Second Treatise. Or he can discover what Bodin "really meant" by unearthing some letters of his to a Swedish countess. And he can search for an obscure Swiss writer who anticipated Hobbes on sovereignty. But the great thing about all of this kind of study is that it hardly involves decamping from the texts themselves. The whole of theory, by these lights, is to be found in one place: all the "Great Books" can fit on one shelf. The overriding danger, of course, is that the venerable volumes become ends in themselves. One becomes concerned not with revolutions or liberty or parties, but merely with what Aristotle or Mill or Madison happened to say on those subjects. No doubt they said much of value. But the job of the political theorist is to explain ideas, not to limit himself to knowing what a few historical writers said about those ideas. In addition, the librarian's acquisition-policy for the five-foot shelf is often very indiscriminate. We find, alongside of the earth-shaking pamphlets of Marx and Rousseau, insignificant works by Vico and Bosanquet. Insignificant, that is, in the sense that if they had not been co-opted by the academics no one would ever have heard of them. I object to none of these co-options, however, if they explain political behavior adequately. But most of them do not. They are merely on the shelf because they are hoary-headed and no one has had the heart to evict them. Certainly a living author does not like to have his earlier books, if he has since found them inadequate, remaining in general use. Dead writers, I am sure, feel the same way.

My purpose here, as I said at the beginning, is to preserve the "Great Books" and not to demolish them. Many of them contain explanations and prescriptions which have great value for us now. And, if they are handled in the way that I suggest, they can still be used as the central theme of introductory study—and advanced research—in political theory. I have indicated that there are many "timeless" questions and answers which are better posed in the "Great Books" than in anything which has succeeded them. But the other social sciences, particularly social psychology and anthropology, are moving in on the province that should be political theory's. Professor Almond has pointed this out succinctly:

The political scientist today has only one foot in the door of a house which he formerly occupied in secure tenure. Anthropology and social psychology . . . have moved rapidly on to a broad front attempting to provide answers to questions which the political scientist, operating with primitive theoretical and methodological tools, has given up asking.¹⁷

And it should be said that most of these "primitive theoretical tools" are what is found in the "Great Books." However, the difficulties that the political theorist encounters stem not from the fact that he is wedded to the "Great Books." It is because he is not willing to try to derive lessons for explaining the contemporary world out of those volumes. I have no doubt that the men who are engaged, for instance, in elucidating "misunderstood" adjectives on majority-rule in Locke are fully competent to discuss the problem of majority-rule per se. It is majority-rule and not John Locke that needs theoretical discussion. That is what political theorists should be doing.

Political theory must catch up with the rest of the social sciences. And this will only be done if much of the excess historical, biographical, and logical baggage which surrounds the "Great Books" is ruthlessly thrown overboard.

¹⁷ "Anthropology, Political Behavior and International Relations," World Politics, Vol. 2, pp. 277-84, at p. 282 (Jan., 1950).

A METHOD FOR EVALUATING THE DISTRIBUTION OF POWER IN A COMMITTEE SYSTEM

L. S. SHAPLEY AND MARTIN SHUBIK

Princeton University

In the following paper we offer a method for the a priori evaluation of the division of power among the various bodies and members of a legislature or committee system. The method is based on a technique of the mathematical theory of games, applied to what are known there as "simple games" and "weighted majority games."¹ We apply it here to a number of illustrative cases, including the United States Congress, and discuss some of its formal properties.

The designing of the size and type of a legislative body is a process that may continue for many years, with frequent revisions and modifications aimed at reflecting changes in the social structure of the country; we may cite the role of the House of Lords in England as an example. The effect of a revision usually cannot be gauged in advance except in the roughest terms; it can easily happen that the mathematical structure of a voting system conceals a bias in power distribution unsuspected and unintended by the authors of the revision. How, for example, is one to predict the degree of protection which a proposed system affords to minority interests? Can a consistent criterion for "fair representation" be found?² It is difficult even to describe the net effect of a double representation system such as is found in the U. S. Congress (i.e., by states and by population), without attempting to deduce it a priori. The method of measuring "power" which we present in this paper is intended as a first step in the attack on these problems.

Our definition of the power of an individual member depends on the chance he has of being critical to the success of a winning coalition. It is easy to see, for example, that the chairman of a board consisting of an even number of members (including himself) has no power if he is allowed to vote only to break ties. Of course he may have prestige and moral influence and will even probably get to vote when someone is not present. However, in the narrow and abstract model of the board he is without power. If the board consists of an odd number of members, then he has exactly as much power as any ordinary member because his vote is "pivotal"—i.e., turns a possible defeat into a success—as often as the vote of any other member. Admittedly he may not cast his vote as often as the others, but much of the voting done by them is not necessary to ensure victory (though perhaps useful for publicity or other purposes). If a coalition has a majority, then extra votes do not change the outcome. For any vote, only a minimal winning coalition is necessary.

Put in crude economic terms, the above implies that if votes of senators

¹ See J. von Neumann and O. Morgenstern, Theory of Games and Economic Behavior (Princeton, 1944, 1947, 1953), pp. 420 ff.

² See K. J. Arrow, Social Choice and Individual Values (New York, 1951), p. 7.

were for sale, it might be worthwhile buying forty-nine of them, but the market value of the fiftieth (to the same customer) would be zero. It is possible to buy votes in most corporations by purchasing common stock. If their policies are entirely controlled by simple majority votes, then there is no more power to be gained after one share more than 50% has been acquired.³

Let us consider the following scheme: There is a group of individuals all willing to vote for some bill. They vote in order. As soon as a majority⁴ has voted for it, it is declared passed, and the member who voted last is given credit for having passed it. Let us choose the voting order of the members randomly. Then we may compute the frequency with which an individual belongs to the group whose votes are used and, of more importance, we may compute how often he is pivotal. This latter number serves to give us our index. It measures the number of times that the action of the individual actually changes the state of affairs. A simple consequence of this formal scheme is that where all voters have the same number of votes, they will each be credited with $1/n$ th of the power, there being n participants. If they have different numbers of votes (as in the case of stockholders of a corporation), the result is more complicated; more votes mean more power, as measured by our index, but not in direct proportion (see below).

Of course, the actual balloting procedure used will in all probability be quite different from the above. The "voting" of the formal scheme might better be thought of as declarations of support for the bill, and the randomly chosen order of voting as an indication of the relative degrees of support by the different members, with the most enthusiastic members "voting" first, etc. The pivot is then the last member whose support is needed in order for passage of the bill to be assured.

Analyzing a committee chairman's tie-breaking function in this light, we see that in an odd committee he is pivotal as often as an ordinary member, but in an even committee he is never pivotal. However, when the number of members is large, it may sometimes be better to modify the strict interpretation of the formal system, and say that the number of members in attendance is about as likely to be even as odd. The chairman's index would then be just half that of an ordinary member. Thus, in the U.S. Senate the power index of the presiding officer is—strictly—equal to $1/97$. Under the modified scheme it is $1/193$. (But it is zero under either interpretation when we are considering decisions requiring a two-thirds majority, since ties cannot occur on such votes.) Recent history shows that the "strict" model may sometimes be the more realistic: in the present Senate (1953-54) the tie-breaking power of the Vice President, stemming from the fact that 96 is an even number, has been a very significant factor. However, in the passage of ordinary legislation, where perfect attendance is unlikely even for important issues, the modified scheme is probably more appropriate.

³ For a brief discussion of some of the factors in stock voting see H. G. Gothman and H. E. Dougall, Corporate Financial Policy (New York, 1948), pp. 56-61.

⁴ More generally, a minimal winning coalition.

For Congress as a whole we have to consider three separate bodies which influence the fate of legislation. It takes majorities of Senate and House, with the President, or two-thirds majorities of Senate and House without the President, to enact a bill. We take all the members of the three bodies and consider them voting⁵ for the bill in every possible order. In each order we observe the relative positions of the straight-majority pivotal men in the House and Senate, the President, and also the 2/3-majority pivotal men in House and Senate. One of these five individuals will be the pivot for the whole vote, depending on the order in which they appear. For example, if the President comes after the two straight-majority pivots, but before one or both of the 2/3-majority pivots, then he gets the credit for the passage of the bill. The frequency of this case, if we consider all possible orders (of the 533 individuals involved), turns out to be very nearly 1/6. This is the President's power index. (The calculation of this value and the following is quite complicated, and we shall not give it here.) The values for the House as a whole and for the Senate as a whole are both equal to 5/12, approximately. The individual members of each chamber share these amounts equally, with the exception of the presiding officers. Under our "modified" scheme they each get about 30% of the power of an ordinary member; under the "strict" scheme, about 60%. In brief, then, the power indices for the three bodies are in the proportion 5:5:2. The indices for a single congressman, a single senator, and the President are in the proportion 2:9:350.

In a multicameral system such as we have just investigated, it is obviously easier to defeat a measure than to pass it.⁶ A coalition of senators, sufficiently numerous, can block passage of any bill. But they cannot push through a bill of their own without help from the other chamber. This suggests that our analysis so far has been incomplete—that we need an index of "blocking power" to supplement the index already defined. To this end, we could set up a formal scheme similar to the previous one, namely: arrange the individuals in all possible orders and imagine them casting negative votes. In each arrangement, determine the person whose vote finally defeats the measure and give him credit for the block. Then the "blocking power" index for each person would be the relative number of times that he was the "blocker."

Now it is a remarkable fact that the new index is exactly equal to the index of our original definition. We can even make a stronger assertion: any scheme for imputing power among the members of a committee system either yields the power index defined above or leads to a logical inconsistency. A proof, or even a precise formulation, of this assertion would involve us too deeply in mathematical symbolism for the purposes of the present paper.⁷ But we can conclude

⁵ In the formal sense described above.

⁶ This statement can be put into numerical form without difficulty, to give a quantitative description of the "efficiency" of a legislature.

⁷ The mathematical formulation and proof are given in L. S. Shapley, "A Value for N-Person Games," Annals of Mathematics Study No. 28 (Princeton, 1953), pp. 307-17. Briefly stated, any alternative imputation scheme would conflict with either symmetry that the scheme we have been using (arranging the individuals in all possible orders, etc.) is just a convenient conceptual device; the indices which emerge are not peculiar to that device but represent a basic element of the committee system itself.

We now summarize some of the general properties of the power index. In pure bicameral systems using simple majority votes, each chamber gets 50% of the power (as it turns out), regardless of the relative sizes. With more than two chambers, power varies inversely with size: the smallest body is most powerful, etc. But no chamber is completely powerless, and no chamber holds more than 50% of the power. To illustrate, take Congress without the provision for overriding the President's veto by means of two-thirds majorities. This is now a pure tricameral system with chamber sizes of 1, 97, and 435. The values come out to be slightly under 50% for the President, and approximately 25% each for the Senate and House, with the House slightly less than the Senate. The exact calculation of this case is quite difficult because of the large numbers involved. An easier example is obtained by taking the chamber sizes as 1, 3, and 5. Then the division of power is in the proportions 32:27:25. The calculation is reproduced at the end of this paper.

The power division in a multicameral system also depends on the type of majority required to pass a bill. Raising the majority in one chamber (say from one-half to two-thirds) increases the relative power of that chamber.⁸ Raising the required majority in all chambers simultaneously weakens the smaller house or houses at the expense of the larger. In the extreme case, where unanimity is required in every house, each individual in the whole legislature has what amounts to a veto, and is just as powerful as any other individual. The power index of each chamber is therefore directly proportional to its size.

We may examine this effect further by considering a system consisting of a governor and a council. Both the governor and some specified fraction of the council have to approve a bill before it can pass. Suppose first that council approval has to be unanimous. Then (as we saw above) the governor has no more power than the typical councilman. The bicameral power division is in the ratio 1:N, if we take N to be the number of councilmen. If a simple majority rule is adopted, then the ratio becomes 1:1 between governor and council. That is, the governor has N times the power of a councilman. Now suppose that the approval of only one member of the council is required. This means that an individual councilman has very little chance of being pivotal. In fact the power division turns out to be N:1 in favor of the governor.⁹ If (equal power indices for members in equal positions under the rules) or additivity (power distribution in a committee system composed of two strictly independent parts the same as the power distributions obtained by evaluating the parts separately).

⁸ As a general rule, if one component of a committee system (in which approval of all components is required) is made less "efficient"—i.e., more susceptible to blocking maneuvers—then its share of the total power will increase.

⁹ In the general case the proportion is $N - M + 1 : M$, where M stands for the number of councilmen required for passage.

votes were for sale, we might now expect the governor's price to be N^2 times as high as the average councilman's.

Several other examples of power distribution may be given. The indices reveal the decisive nature of the veto power in the United Nations Security Council. The Council consists of eleven members, five of whom have vetoes. For a substantive resolution to pass, there must be seven affirmative votes and no vetoes. Our power evaluation gives 76/77 or 98.7% to the "Big Five" and 1/77 or 1.3% to the remaining six members. Individually, the members of the "Big Five" enjoy a better than 90 to 1 advantage over the others.

It is well known that usually only a small fraction of the stock is required to keep control of a corporation. The group in power is usually able to muster enough proxies to maintain its position. Even if this were not so, the power of stockholders is not directly proportional to their holding, but is usually biased in favor of a large interest. Consider one man holding 40% of a stock while the remaining 60% is scattered among 600 small shareholders, with 0.1% each. The power index of the large holder is 66.6%, whereas for the small holders it is less than 0.06% apiece. The 400:1 ratio in holdings produces a power advantage of better than 1000:1.¹⁰

The preceding was an example of a "weighted majority game." Another example is provided by a board with five members, one of whom casts two extra votes. If a simple majority (four out of seven votes) carries the day, then power is distributed 60% to the multivote member, 10% to each of the others. To see this, observe that there are five possible positions for the strong man, if we arrange the members in order at random. In three of these positions he is pivotal. Hence his index is equal to 3/5. (Similarly, in the preceding example, we may compute that the strong man is pivotal 400 times out of 601.)

* * *

The values in the examples given above do not take into account any of the sociological or political superstructure that almost invariably exists in a legislature or policy board. They were not intended to be a representation of present day "reality." It would be foolish to expect to be able to catch all the subtle shades and nuances of custom and procedure that are to be found in most real decision-making bodies. Nevertheless, the power index computations may be useful in the setting up of norms or standards, the departure from which will serve as a measure of, for example, political solidarity, or regional or sociological factionalism, in an assembly. To do this we need an empirical power index, to compare with the theoretical. One possibility is as follows: The voting record of an individual is taken. He is given no credit for being on the losing side of a vote. If he is on the winning side, when n others voted with him, then he is awarded the probability of his having been the pivot (or blocker, in the case of a defeated motion), which is $1/n+1$. His probabilities are then averaged over all votes. It can be shown that this measure gives more weight than the norm does to uncommitted members who hold the "balance of power" between extreme factions. For example, in a nine-man committee which contains two four-man factions which always oppose each other, the lone uncommitted member will always be on the winning side, and will have an observed index of $1/5$, compared to the theoretical value of $1/9$.

¹⁰ If there are two or more large interests, the power distribution depends in a fairly complicated way on the sizes of the large interests. Generally speaking, however, the small holders are better off than in the previous case. If there are two big interests, equal in size, then the small holders actually have an advantage over the large holders, on a power per share basis. This suggests that such a situation is highly unstable.

A difficulty in the application of the above measure is the problem of finding the correct weights to attach to the different issues. Obviously it would not be proper to take a uniform average over all votes, since there is bound to be a wide disparity in the importance of issues brought to a vote. Again, in a multicameral legislature (or in any more complicated system), many important issues may be decided without every member having had an opportunity to go on record with his stand. There are many other practical difficulties in the way of direct applications of the type mentioned. Yet the power index appears to offer useful information concerning the basic design of legislative assemblies and policy-making boards.

* * *

APPENDIX

The evaluation of the power distribution for a tricameral legislature with houses of 1, 3, and 5 members is given below:

There are 504 arrangements of five X's, three O's, and one ϕ , all equally likely if the nine items are ordered at random. In the following tabulation, the numbers indicate the number of permutations of predecessors () and successors [] of the final pivot, marked with an asterisk. The dots indicate the pivots of the three separate houses.

$\left. \begin{array}{l} O \dot{O} O X X \dot{\phi} \dot{X} X X \\ (60) \quad \quad \quad [1] \\ O \dot{O} X X \dot{\phi} \dot{X} O X X \\ (30) \quad \quad \quad [3] \end{array} \right\} 150 \text{ pivots for } X$	$\left. \begin{array}{l} O \dot{O} O X X \dot{X} X X \dot{\phi} \\ (56) \quad \quad \quad [1] \\ O \dot{O} O X X \dot{X} X \dot{\phi} X \\ (35) \quad \quad \quad [1] \\ O \dot{O} O X X \dot{X} \dot{\phi} X X \\ (20) \quad \quad \quad [1] \end{array} \right\} 192 \text{ pivots for } \phi$
$\left. \begin{array}{l} O X X \dot{X} X X \dot{\phi} \dot{O} O \\ (42) \quad \quad \quad [1] \\ O X X \dot{X} X \dot{\phi} \dot{O} O X \\ (30) \quad \quad \quad [2] \\ O X X \dot{X} \dot{\phi} \dot{O} O X X \\ (20) \quad \quad \quad [3] \end{array} \right\} 162 \text{ pivots for } O$	$\left. \begin{array}{l} O \dot{O} X X \dot{X} X X \dot{\phi} O \\ (21) \quad \quad \quad [1] \\ O \dot{O} X X \dot{X} X \dot{\phi} O X \\ (15) \quad \quad \quad [2] \\ O \dot{O} X X \dot{X} \dot{\phi} O X X \\ (12) \quad \quad \quad [3] \end{array} \right\}$

Power indices for the houses are $192/504$, $162/504$, and $150/504$, and hence are in the proportion 32:27:25, with the smallest house the strongest. Powers of the individual members are as 32:9:9:9:5:5:5:5:5:5.

DOCTORAL DISSERTATIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

IN AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES*

COMPILED BY FRANCIS E. ROURKE

The Johns Hopkins University

I. DISSERTATIONS IN PREPARATION

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY

Fred Ablin, George Plekhanov and the "Iskra" Period. Columbia.

Minoo Adenwalla, Political Philosophy of the Indian National Movement. Northwestern.

Justin Atkinson, The Political Thought of L.
T. Hobhouse. California (Berkeley).

Robert D. Barendsen, The Chinese Communist
Germ Warfare Propaganda, 1952-1953.
Yale.

Stanislaus Belch, Thomas Hobbes' Concept of Religion and the State's Relation to It.
Notre Dame.

Laurence Berns, The Political Philosophy of Francis Bacon with Special Attention to the Principles of Foreign Policy. Chicago.

Samuel B. Bloom, Housing Policy in the United States, 1933-1954. California (Berkeley).

* Similar lists have been printed in the REVIEW as follows: V, 456 (1911); VI, 464 (1912); VII, 689 (1913); VIII, 488 (1914); XIV, 155 (1920); XVI, 497 (1922); XIX, 171 (1925); XX, 660 (1926); XXI, 645 (1927); XXII, 736 (1928); XXIII, 795 (1929); XXIV, 799 (1930); XXV, 798 (1931); XXVI, 769 (1932); XXVII, 680 (1933); XXVIII, 766 (1934); XXIX, 713 (1935); XXX, 811 (1936); XXXI, 772 (1937); XXXII, 796 (1938); XXXIII, 732 (1939); XXXIV, 767 (1940); XXXV, 752 (1941); XXXVI, 734 (1942); XXXVII, 706 (1943); XXXVIII, 766 (1944); XXXIX, 779 (1945); XL, 775 (1946); XLI, 754 (1947); XLII, 759 (1948); XLIII, 787 (1949); XLIV, 689 (1950); XLV, 779 (1951); XLVI, 819 (1952); XLVII, 811 (1953).

Items which appeared in the September, 1953 list are in general classified under the same headings in the present list, and new items have been assimilated to the 1953 classification as far as possible. In cases where classification of an item has been suggested by the institution concerned, the suggestion has been followed. Each item is listed under one classification only.

The lists printed in the REVIEW are based on information from departments giving graduate instruction in political science. Often dissertations are in progress in departments of economics, history, sociology, etc., which overlap or supplement dissertations in preparation in political science. Attention is called especially to the following lists: "Current Research Projects in Public Administration" (reported to Public Administration Service), the most recent edition of which appeared in 1951; "Doctoral Dissertations in Political Economy in Progress in American Colleges and Universities," in the American Economic Review; "List of Doctoral Dissertations in History Now in Progress," published annually by the Division of Historical Research of the Carnegie Institution through 1938, and since then by the American Historical Association, as supplements to the American Historical Review (1940 and 1941), as Vol. III of its Annual Report (1941), and as separate publications (1947 and 1949); and "Doctoral Dissertations in Sociology," in the American Journal of Sociology. Consult also the "External Research List," published by the Office of Intelligence Research, Department of State. These are in addition to the "List of American Doctoral Dissertations Printed in 1938," the most recent of an annual series published by the Library of Congress; and Arnold H. Trotter and Marian Harman, "Doctoral Dissertations Accepted by American Universities, 1952-53," the twentieth of a series beginning in 1933-34, compiled for the Association of Research Libraries. Consult, for other lists, T. R. Palfrey and H. E. Coleman, Jr., "Guide to Bibliographies of Theses, United States and Canada" (Chicago, American Library Association, 2nd ed., 1940).

Abstracts of some of the theses listed as completed may be found in "Dissertation Abstracts," published bi-monthly by University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

- William T. Bluhm*, The Theory and Practice of Social Catholicism. Chicago.
- Robert L. Bock*, The Political Philosophy of Subhas Chandra Bose. American.
- Wilmer L. Bohlmann*, The Legal and Political Theories of Leon Duguit. Washington (Seattle).
- Robert P. Boynton*, The Socio-Political Philosophy of George Santayana with Special Reference to His Recent Thought. Michigan.
- Donald W. Brandon*, A Thomistic Conception of the Welfare State. California (Berkeley).
- George F. Brasington, Jr.*, Representative Government in Jacksonian Political Philosophy. Illinois.
- William R. Brown*, Deviations in American Communism: The Influence of American Politics and Economics on Communist Theory. Washington (St. Louis).
- Francis P. Canavan, S.J.*, The Role of Reason in Politics: Burke and 18th Century Rationalism. Duke.
- Francis M. Carney*, Recent Development of the Concept of Representation in the United States. California (Los Angeles).
- Karl H. Cerny*, Catholic Social Thought in the United States. Yale.
- Samuel Cook*, Ethical Foundations of Democracy. Ohio State.
- David Cooperman*, Power, Force and Violence as Distinguished by Ideas of Limits to Action. Minnesota.
- Richard H. Cox*, John Locke's Principles of Foreign Relations. Chicago.
- George Demetriou*, The Relationship of Political and Ethical Thought in Current American Theory. Minnesota.
- J. Raymond Derrig, S.J.*, Political Thought in American Catholic Newspapers. St. Louis.
- Susan H. Devine*, The Political and Social Philosophy of Herbert Hoover. Pennsylvania.
- David M. Earl*, Political Thinking in Maiji Japan. Columbia.
- James Eayrs*, The English Agrarians: A Study of the Political and Social Thought of Spence, Ogilvie and Paine. Columbia.
- Esther Edelman*, Political Theory of Ernest Jones. Columbia.
- Harris I. Effross*, The Political Philosophy of Herbert Croly. Rutgers.
- Emily H. Ehle*, The Identification of Local Leadership within an American City (Philadelphia). Pennsylvania.
- Frank Evans, Jr.*, The Political Theory of Richelieu. Georgetown.
- Edward Fishman*, The Political and Social Philosophy of Owen J. Roberts. Pennsylvania.
- Martin Fleisher*, Political Theory of James Harrington. Columbia.
- Theodore B. Fleming, Jr.*, John Stuart Mill's Essay On Liberty. and Its Critics. Yale.
- Thomas A. Flinn*, Croce, Collingwood and Cassirer, Their Concept of Method in the Study of Man and Application to Politics. Minnesota.
- Richard D. Forster*, The British Political Image of the United States. Yale.
- Garland Fothergill*, Some Elements in the Political Thought of John Dewey. Minnesota.
- Julian Franklin*, The Theory of Caesarism. Columbia.
- Leonard Freedman*, Group Opposition to Governmental Welfare Activities in the United States. California (Los Angeles).
- Stanley T. Gabis*, Secrecy in Politics: A Study in Attitudes. Chicago.
- Robert L. Gaudino*, Academic Freedom: An Inquiry into the Relations of University and State. Chicago.
- Alexander L. George*, The Intelligence Value of Content Analysis. Chicago.
- R. Gordon Gilbert*, Description and Prescription in Seventeenth Century Science. California (Berkeley).
- Robert Goldwin*, Property, Money and Justice: A Study of John Locke's Political Teachings. Chicago.
- Robert C. Good*, The Contribution of Reinhold Niebuhr to International Relations. Yale.
- Gordon B. Greb*, The Political Philosophy of the American Press. Stanford.
- Adele Haddad*, The Concept of the State in Islamic Thought. Michigan.
- Edward Handler*, The Political Theory of John Adams: A Study of the Emergence of a Conservative Tradition in American Political Thought. Harvard.
- Heber R. Harper II*, The Political Views of Certain Contemporary Religious Fundamentalists. Michigan.
- Beresford Hayward*, An Evaluation of the Program of American Labor for a Full Employment Economy as an Efficient Expression of Its Contemporary Political Philosophy. Chicago.
- Henry J. Hodder*, The Political and Social Thought of Thorstein Veblen. Harvard.
- David Holland*, The Problematic Situation as a Context for Valuation in the Writings of John Dewey. Harvard.
- Richard L. Hough*, Base Theorists of Elitist

- Doctrine: Their Impact on Democratic Theory. California (Los Angeles).
- Terry Hoy, Theories of the Exercise of Suffrage in the United States: A Critical Analysis. California (Berkeley).
- D. Joy Humes, Oswald Garrison Villard. Syracuse.
- James K. Hunter, Jr., The Influence of George Bernard Shaw on Political Theory. Ohio State.
- David Kettler, The State and the Historical Process: Toward a Reexamination of "Historicism." Columbia.
- John K. Knaus, The Political Philosophy of John Stuart Mill. Stanford.
- Irma Lang, Swiss Federalism: Theory and Structure. Harvard.
- Murray B. Levin, Political Theory of Thomas Hodgskin. Columbia.
- Guenther Lewy, The Political Philosophy of Juan de Mariana. Columbia.
- Allen McConnell, Alexander Herzen and the Revolutions of 1848. Brown.
- Brian A. McGrath, S.J., The Basic Political Philosophy of Woodrow Wilson. Harvard.
- Donald K. McKee, The Intellectual and Historical Influences Shaping the Political Theory of Daniel de Leon. Columbia.
- Maan Madina, Ijma, Public Consensus in Islam According to Al-Ghazali. Chicago.
- Thomas F. Maher, Population and Politics: The Political Aspects of Birth Control. Notre Dame.
- Serif A. Mardin, The Influence of Positivism on the Development of Turkish Political Thought in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Stanford.
- Lucian C. Marquis, The Political Thought of Protestant Churches and Sects in the United States, 1928-1953. California (Los Angeles).
- Nick A. Masters, An Analytical Study of the Political and Social Ideas of Father Charles E. Coughlin and the National Union of Social Justice. Wisconsin.
- Joseph O. Matthews, Benjamin Disraeli, Theorist of Toryism. Yale.
- Edward N. Megay, Treitschke as a Political Philosopher. Georgetown.
- James K. Melville, Brigham Young and American Political Ideas. Utah.
- David W. Minar, The Role of Public Opinion in Political Theories. California (Berkeley).
- Dorothy L. Noble, Francis Nicholson. Columbia.
- Holtan P. Odegard, Approaches to a Theory of Administrative Democracy. Wisconsin.
- Erma H. Olson, Democratic Theory and the Idea of the Managerial Revolution. Minnesota.
- F. Oladipo Onipede, The Ideology of British Imperialism and Its Significance for Constitutional Development in Nigeria: A Study in Political and Legal Theory, 1850-1953. Columbia.
- Ivan W. Parkins, John Dewey on Liberty. Chicago.
- Abelardo Patino, The Political Ideas of the Liberal and Conservative Parties in Colombia during the 1946-1952 Crisis. American.
- Truman A. Potter, Some Recent American Criticisms of Liberalism. Minnesota.
- Fred Raniels, Theories of Conscientious Objectors toward War in the 16th and 17th Centuries. Minnesota.
- David Rapoport, Theories of Change. California (Berkeley).
- William O. Reichert, Recent American Conservatism. Minnesota.
- Norman M. Rosenberg, The Grande Chartreuse: Studies in the Literature of Marxist Disenchantment. Columbia.
- Gene W. Setzer, Contemporary American Ideas of Human Equality. Columbia.
- Theodore L. Shay, The Myth of Progress with Special Reference to Its Political Implications. Northwestern.
- Judith N. Shklar, Political Fatalism: A Study in Contemporary Political Theory. Harvard.
- Herbert P. Shyer, The Political Philosophy of David Hume. Harvard.
- Donald E. Smith, The Political Philosophy of Jawaharlal Nehru. Pennsylvania.
- Robert F. Stephens, Political Theories Inherent in Selected Psychological Theories. Michigan.
- Richard W. Sterling, Ego and Ethic in International Politics: Friedrich Meinecke and the Idea of Raison d'Etat. Yale.
- William A. Stewart, The Political Ideas of L. T. Hobhouse. Minnesota.
- Nathan M. Talbott, The Political Thought of T'an Su T'ung. Washington (Seattle).
- Stanley Thames, Philosophical Aspects of the Activities of UNESCO. Duke.
- James Tierney, Political Theory of Bolingbroke and Halifax: A Comparative Study. Brown.
- James E. Titus, Left of Center: A Study of American Liberalism in the 1930's. Wisconsin.
- Kenneth W. Treacy, The Legacy of the Bismarck Period in German Political Thought. Utah.
- William F. Troutman, Theories of the Rela- tionship between Church and State in America in the Period 1786-1791. Duke.

- Charles W. Van Cleve*, The Doctrine of State and Church in Roman Catholic Thought in the Twentieth Century. Texas.
- David B. Walker*, The Political Ideas of Rufus Choate. Brown.
- John Wallerstedt*, The Political Thought of Henry Jones Ford. Georgetown.
- Kenneth Waltz*, The Problem of War in Western Political Thought. Columbia.
- George Weber*, Church and State in France: A Study in the Manipulation of Liens upon Political Obedience. Virginia.
- Lloyd M. Wells*, The Theoretical Defense of Big Business, 1933-1953: A Study in Contemporary American Political Thought. Princeton.
- Ruth L. Wishneff*, Charles Péguy and the Crisis of the Third Republic. Cornell.
- Robert Yee*, American Liberalism, 1919-1929. Washington (Seattle).
- Noel I. Zinman*, Fascist Thought in America. New York University.
- GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF
THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES
- Myer Alpert*, Public Policy and the Pulp and Paper Industry. Harvard.
- Cleveland Ansell*, Federal Aid for Highways. Harvard.
- David W. Barkley*, Problems of the Aging Population and the Role of Government. Harvard.
- Robert L. Berg*, Presidential Power and the Royal Prerogative. Minnesota.
- Edward M. Bershtein*, The Bricker Movement to Amend the Constitution. Chicago.
- Ray W. Bronez*, Interest Groups and Public Housing. Chicago.
- Edmund B. Brownell*, A Study of the Interaction between the Department of the Treasury and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. Michigan.
- William Buchanan*, Public Opinion and Political Parties in the United States: A Statistical Analysis. Princeton.
- Edward M. Caine*, The Regulation of Commercial Aviation under the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. New York University.
- Mark W. Cannon*, Political Biography of George Q. Cannon, Political and Religious Leader in Utah from 1872-1901. Harvard.
- King Carr*, Collective Bargaining as a Public Campaign: Steel Industry, 1945-1949. Chicago.
- Harold W. Chase*, Controlling Subversive Activities: A Case Study of the Efforts of the National Government to Control Indigenous Communists, 1932-1952. Princeton.
- Charles L. Clapp*, The Presidential Primary in 1952. California (Berkeley).
- Omar A. Coleman*, Inter-State Trade Barriers. Washington (Seattle).
- Paul B. Crooks*, Farm Planning in Indiana. Harvard.
- Allen Davis*, Conflicts in Land Policy between Federal and State Government. California (Berkeley).
- James W. Davis*, The Use and Effect of the Presidential Primary System. Minnesota.
- John T. Dempsey*, Control by Congress over the Seating and Disciplining of Its Members. Michigan.
- Daniel F. DeNauw*, O.S.B., A Study of Proposals for Home Rule for the District of Columbia. Catholic University.
- William Dial*, Instruments of Party Control in the United States Senate. New York University.
- Martin Diamond*, The Decline of the Socialist Party, U.S.A., Chicago.
- Aurie N. Dunlap*, The Political Career of Arthur H. Vandenberg. Columbia.
- Nancy A. Edwards*, Congress and Administrative Reorganization. Columbia.
- William C. Ellet, Jr.*, Federal and State Control of Atomic Cities. Michigan.
- Thomas P. Emerich*, The United States' Shipbuilding Industry and National Policy. Georgetown.
- Richard F. Fenno, Jr.*, The American Cabinet: An Analysis from Wilson to Truman. Harvard.
- Jenniellen Ferguson*, Voting Behavior for President in 600+ Counties in the United States, 1900-1950: A Statistical Study. California (Los Angeles).
- Jason L. Finkle*, Congress and the Atomic Energy Program: A Study in Congressional Direction and Control. Michigan.
- James J. Flannery*, Water Pollution Control; Development of Public Policy and Federal-State Relations. Wisconsin.
- George Foufas*, American Party Platforms: 1940, 1944, 1948. Harvard.
- Paul C. Fowler*, Public Policy and Regulation of Radio and Television Broadcasting by the Federal Communications Commission. Indiana.
- Lawrence H. Fuchs*, Ethnic Voting Behavior in Boston. Harvard.

- Gabriel Gabrielian*, Voting Behavior in the United States. Princeton.
- Franklin J. Gayles*, Treason and "Cold War Treason." New York University.
- William G. Gibbons*, Congress and the International Information Program since the End of World War II: A Case Study in the Intellectual Role of Congress in Foreign Policy Decision-Making. Princeton.
- Charles E. Gilbert*, Representation in Congress: A Case Study. Northwestern.
- Betty Goetz*, The Foreign Affairs Program of the League of Women Voters: Formulation, Mobilization of Public Opinion, Methods of Influencing Government Action, Evaluation of Results. Minnesota.
- Delphis C. Goldberg*, Public Assistance Grants. Harvard.
- Antonio J. Gonzalez*, Constitutional Development in Puerto Rico since 1900. Harvard.
- Lyman J. Gould*, The Government of Puerto Rico: From Territory to Commonwealth. Michigan.
- Gerald J. Grady*, The St. Lawrence Waterway Controversies: A Study in Policy Formation. Chicago.
- Charles J. Graham*, Recent Republican Foreign Policy. Illinois.
- Alice Greene*, The Not So Supreme Court (The Supreme Court Fight of 1937). Harvard.
- William D. Hatley*, The Dixiecrat Movement. Missouri.
- David W. Hazel*, The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People: A Study in the Congressional Legislative Process. Michigan.
- Marston Headley*, The Role of the States in the Administration of a National System of Public Employment Offices. Harvard.
- Richard B. Henderson*, The Republican Party and the States' Rights Doctrine. Maryland.
- Jack M. Hertzog*, The Administration of Soldier Voting in the United States Army. American.
- Edward Heubel*, The Organization and Conduct of Congressional Investigations since 1946. Minnesota.
- Renze L. Hoeksema*, United States Postwar Aid to the Philippines. Harvard.
- Walter Hohenstein*, Federal Control over Local and State Officers. Minnesota.
- Frank Holloway*, The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act before Congress: A Study in the Legislative Process. Texas.
- A. Freeman Holmer*, An American Labor Party? An Analysis of the Causes of Labor's Political Failures, with Emphasis on the Period 1920-1948. Columbia.
- Jack E. Holmes*, Politics of National Farmers Union. Chicago.
- Irving Howards*, The Influence of Southern Senators on American Foreign Policy from 1940 to 1950. Wisconsin.
- James Howe*, The Budget and Foreign Affairs. Harvard.
- Robert M. Hunsaker*, The Politics of Public Utilities. Minnesota.
- John E. Hutchinson*, Labor and Health in America. California (Los Angeles).
- Slater K. Isenberg*, The Social Characteristics of Selected Areas of Non-Voting Concentration. American.
- Fridolph Johnson*, Limitations on the Scope of Presidential Power to Conclude International Agreements. Michigan.
- Stanley Kelley*, The Public Relations Counsel as Campaign Manager. Johns Hopkins.
- Robert C. Kennedy*, The Development of Labor Legislation in the Eightieth Congress (First Session). American.
- Alan E. Kent*, Wisconsin and Foreign Policy; Wisconsin's Senators and Representatives since World War I. Wisconsin.
- Clifford Ketzel*, Exchange of Persons and Foreign Policy: The Foreign Leader Program of the Department of State. California (Berkeley).
- Charles F. Kiefer*, The Secretary of Agriculture. Harvard.
- Kenneth Kofmehl*, Congressional Staffing, with Emphasis on the Professional Staff. Columbia.
- Richard P. Kosaki*, Political Beliefs in the Territory of Hawaii as Reflected in Legislative Sessions, with Special Reference to Racial and Cultural Influences. Minnesota.
- Allen D. Krumm*, The Indian and Participation in Politics. Utah.
- Richard E. Lambert*, INCODEL, an Instrument of Interstate Governmental Cooperation. Rutgers.
- David D. Levine*, Legislation by Executive Order in the Federal Government. American.
- James R. Lewis*, The Impact of Television on Political Conventions and Campaigns. American.
- S. D. Lovell*, The Presidential Campaign of 1916. Ohio State.
- John C. Lowe*, New Deal Democracy: Its Impact on American Democratic Processes. Iowa.
- Joseph D. Lubin*, The Item Veto and the Presidency. California (Berkeley).

- Howard R. Ludden*, Informational Activities of the Department of State: Historical Development and Present Organization and Operations. Princeton.
- Thornton McClanahan*, Organization of the Presidency for Fiscal Policy. Harvard.
- David W. McCormick*, Partisan Politics in a Middle-Sized Midwestern City: A Case Study of Rockford, Illinois. Chicago.
- Charles B. Macklin*, Land Grant Colleges and Public Policy. Chicago.
- William B. Macomber, Jr.*, The Congressional Republicans and Organized Labor; 1926-1948. Chicago.
- James M. Mahoney*, The Irish Americans and Their Attitudes on Foreign Affairs. Clark.
- Lewis Mainzer*, Research Policy Formation under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946. Chicago.
- Elizabeth Marvick*, The Study of Voting Behavior in Its Relation to the Theory of Political Democracy. Columbia.
- David R. Matthis*, The National Committee in American Organization. Texas.
- Norman Meller*, Centralization and Integration in Hawaii. Chicago.
- Frank S. Mellor*, Employment of Civilians by the Department of the Army: Factors in Determining Whether Military or Civilian Personnel Should Be Assigned to Particular Activities or Jobs. Harvard.
- Karl E. Meyer*, "Americanism" in Wisconsin Politics 1917-1952. Princeton.
- Leno C. Michelson*, Post-War Conceptions of Managerial Responsibility in Labor Relations. Chicago.
- John H. Michener*, The United States Cabinet: A Study of Proposed Modifications, with Especial Reference to Cabinet-Congressional Relations. California (Berkeley).
- Clifford Miller*, Institutional Considerations in the Formulation of Federal Fiscal Policy. American.
- Don Muchmore*, Political Use of the Presidential Appointive Power, 1900-1950. California (Los Angeles).
- Henry Nash*, The Selection of the United States Ambassadors to the Soviet Union. New York University.
- Edward R. Padgett*, The Minority Party in Bi-Partisan Foreign Policy Formulation in the United States. Maryland.
- A. Edward Patmos*, Some Recent Attempts of Non-Political Organizations to Influence Federal Legislation. New York University.
- Arthur Peterson*, McCarthyism: Its Foundation and Ideology. Minnesota.
- Walfrid Peterson*, The Foreign Policy of American Third Parties. Minnesota.
- Denis Philipps*, Americans and Compulsory Military Service: A Study of Changing Public Policy with Particular Reference to the Period 1940-1951. New York University.
- Robert J. Pitchell*, The Pattern of Voting Behavior in California, 1922-1952. California (Berkeley).
- Ira Polley*, The Administration of the Wage Stabilization Program in Region Eight. Minnesota.
- Theodore Powell*, The American Cabinet: A Study of Its Role in the Presidential System. Columbia.
- John R. Probert*, The National Security Act of 1947. Pennsylvania.
- Edward W. Proxmire*, The Limitations and Possibilities of Increasing Public Understanding of National Politics through the Daily Newspaper. Harvard.
- Louis A. Radelet*, The Presidency and the Crisis; Powers of the Office from Pearl Harbor to V-J Day. Notre Dame.
- Norman F. Reber*, Main Factors That Determine the Editorial Content of Farm Magazines As It Relates to Influence on Public Opinion. Pennsylvania.
- Merton L. Reichler*, Disintegration and Insurgency in the Democratic Party in New York County. Columbia.
- Ross R. Rice*, The Politics of Missouri Valley Development. Chicago.
- Donald H. Riddle*, The Truman Committee: A Study in Congressional Control of the Military. Princeton.
- James W. Riddlesperger*, Alexander Hamilton and the Modern American Constitution. Texas.
- Charles L. Robertson*, The Role of the Secretary of State in Foreign Policy Making. Princeton.
- George Robinson*, The Development of the Senate Committee System. New York University.
- John H. Romani*, The Philippine Presidency: An Evaluation in Terms of American Practice and Procedure. Michigan.
- James N. Rosenau*, The Senate and Dean Acheson, 1949-52. Princeton.
- Harold I. Roth*, Collective Bargaining Patterns in the Motion Picture Industry. Chicago.
- Lloyd I. Rudolph*, American Politics 1787-1800: A Study in the Origin of Party. Harvard.
- Martha L. Saenger*, The 1944 Presidential Campaign: An Analysis of the Forces be- hind the Pro-Roosevelt CIO Political Action Committee. Ohio State.

- Warren D. St. James, The NAACP: Its Organization and Methods. St. Louis University.
- Carl Santoro, A New Approach to the Problem of Non-Voting. Pennsylvania.
- O. Glenn Saxon, Jr., The Policies and Attitudes of the American Federation of Musicians on Technological Advance. Columbia.
- Peter P. Schauffler, The History and Potentialities of the Legislative Veto Device in the Federal Government. Harvard.
- Seymour Scher, The Bifurcation of the National Relations Board. Chicago.
- Harry M. Scoble, Jr., Yankeetown: A Study of Community Decision-Making Processes. Yale.
- Kenneth E. Scott, Marshall Plan and Executive Decision Making. Princeton.
- Jackson W. Selman, The Problem of Amending the Constitutional Provisions for Electing the President, 1787-1950. North Carolina.
- Edgar L. Shor, The Political Role of the Secretary of Labor: The Secretary and Labor Policy since 1933. Chicago.
- Gordon Shull, The Methodist Church in American Politics: A Study in Contemporary Church-State Relations. Illinois.
- Morris Simon, Woodrow Wilson and the Legislative Process. Cornell.
- Rhoten A. Smith, Jr., Majority Rule in American Theory and Practice. California (Berkeley).
- Robert C. Spencer, The Steel Dispute of 1952: A Case Study in the Politics of Collective Bargaining. Chicago.
- Leonard Stein, Labor and Politics: An Inventory of Research. Chicago.
- Robert C. Stender, The Defense Budgetary Process. Harvard.
- Oscar Stradinger, The Bureau of Reclamation: A Study in Administrative Organization and Techniques as These Influence and Are Influenced by Policy Positions. Chicago.
- Virgil C. Stroud, Congressional Investigations of the Conduct of War. New York University.
- Anthony Y. S. Su-tu, Legal Status of Chinese in the United States. New York University.
- Harris E. Thurber, The Vermont Judiciary: A Study in Cultural Adaptation. Princeton.
- Henry Tomasek, The Great Plains Agricultural Council. Chicago.
- Daniel W. Tuttle, Intergovernmental Relations in Wyoming Land Policy and Administration. Minnesota.
- Robert W. Van de Velde, The Role of U.S. Propaganda in Italy's Return to Political Democracy, 1943-1948. Princeton.
- Edwin R. Walker, Changing Tools and Techniques of American Statecraft. Princeton.
- Herbert Waltzer, A History and Analysis of Federal Corrupt Practices Legislation. New York University.
- Andrew J. Wann, Franklin D. Roosevelt: A Study of Leadership. Missouri.
- Leo Weinstein, The Place of Lobbying in the Legislative Process. Chicago.
- Warren Weston, A Comparison of Filling Vacancies in Congress by Appointment and by Special Election. Minnesota.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

- Roscoe C. Adkins, Justice Brandeis and Administrative Law. Texas.
- Barton Bean, The American Civil Liberties Union: History and Analysis. Cornell.
- Alfons J. Beitzinger, Chief Justice Ryan of the Wisconsin Supreme Court. Wisconsin.
- George R. Blackburn, Freedom of Association: The Group Versus the Individual before the Courts. Harvard.
- Gordon B. Cleveland, The Role of the Rule of Law in the Administrative State, with Special Emphasis on Civil Liberties. North Carolina.
- Fredryc R. Darby, The Constitutionality of Anti-Miscegenation Laws under the 14th Amendment. California (Berkeley).
- Emily Dawson, The Supreme Court's Conception of Religious Liberty in the Jehovah's Witnesses' Cases. Minnesota.
- Christopher Dyer-Bennet, Justice Harlan and the Federal System. California (Berkeley).
- Moshe Eliash, A Government of Men: An Analysis of the Delegation of "Judicial" and "Legislative" Power. Cornell.
- Charles W. Engelland, The Bricker Amendment. Iowa.
- Dorothy Fields, Mr. Justice Murphy. Columbia.
- Howard I. Forman, Government Ownership of Patents and Patent Rights. Pennsylvania.
- Royal C. Gilkey, Mr. Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties. Minnesota.
- Milton Greenberg, The Loyalty Oath in the American Experience. Wisconsin.
- Ernest R. Griffin, The Full Faith and Credit Clause As Applied to Divorce Decrees. Duke.
- Luther Hagard, The Equality of the States in the United States: Theory, Constitutional Law and Practice. Minnesota.

- Heinz R. Hink*, Some Aspects of Public Liability for Torts of Officers in Anglo-American and Continental Law. Washington (Seattle).
- Charles A. Hollister*, A Judicial Analysis of the Right to Acquire, Possess and Protect Property in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- John W. Hopkirk*, William O. Douglas, Individualist. Princeton.
- James A. Killough*, Federal Regulation of Economic Aspects of Air Carriers: A Study of Civil Aeronautics Board Policies Enforcing the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, As Amended, Emphasizing Certificates of Public Convenience, Permits to Foreign Carriers and Rate-making Practices. Pennsylvania.
- John T. Kitos*, Coordination of Public Health and Hospital Administration in New York State. Syracuse.
- James R. Klonoski*, The Role of the Attorney General As Advisor to the President on Constitutional Questions. Michigan.
- Jacob Kossman*, Constitutional Rights of a Defendant in Federal Criminal Proceedings. Pennsylvania.
- Oscar Kraines*, Ernst Freund's Contribution to American Legal Thought. New York University.
- Sam Krislov*, The Supreme Court since 1937: Nine Judges in Search of a Role. Princeton.
- Roseana Kronick*, The Power of the President to Remove Officials with Emphasis upon Officials Exercising Quasi-Judicial and Quasi-Legislative Functions. California (Berkeley).
- J. T. Law*, The Constitutional Ideas of Mr. Justice Horace Gray. Wisconsin.
- Harold J. Leu*, Some Constitutional Aspects of the Extra-Continental Jurisdiction of the United States. Michigan.
- Eleanor T. Linenthal*, Free Speech and the Power of the Courts and Congress to Punish for Contempt. Cornell.
- Theodore V. Liss*, The Genesis and Development of the Concept of the Free Flow of Commerce. Michigan.
- Lewis I. Maddocks*, The Dissenting Opinions of Justice Harlan. Ohio State.
- Harry S. Manley*, The Import of Grants-in-Aid in Education upon the Federal Structure of the United States and Canada. Duke.
- John M. Martin, Jr.*, Robert H. Jackson, Associate Justice of the United States. Johns Hopkins.
- Eugene A. Mawhinney*, The Development of the Concept of Liberty in the Fourteenth Amendment. Illinois.
- Ernest E. Means*, Free Speech v. Fair Trial. Wisconsin.
- Lyndon R. Musolf*, Some Aspects of Federal-State Water Problems and the Courts. California (Los Angeles).
- Lawrence Noble*, The Formation and Execution of National Policy on Disloyalty. Duke.
- Harding C. Noblitt*, The Supreme Court and the Progressive Era, 1902-1921. Chicago.
- Gilbert L. Oddo*, Mr. Justice Douglas and the Supreme Court. Georgetown.
- Palmer C. Pilcher*, Liability of Hospitals and Hospital Administrators. Syracuse.
- Eugene S. Powell*, Limits on the King's Prerogative: The Colonial Background to Substantive Due Process of Law. California (Berkeley).
- Earl A. Radley*, Mr. Justice Frankfurter's Conception of the Role of the Supreme Court in the American Federal System. Harvard.
- Charles M. Rehms*, Executive Powers in National Emergency Labor Disputes. Stanford.
- Yosal Rogat*, Political Theory and Judicial Review: A Study of the Thought of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. California (Berkeley).
- Eva R. Rubin*, The Supreme Court at Mid-Century: A Study of Judicial Self-Limitation. Johns Hopkins.
- Robert Runo*, Law Making by the Roosevelt Court: A Study in Methods of Statutory Interpretation. Chicago.
- Robert H. Salisbury, Jr.*, The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit: A Study in Policy Formation. Illinois.
- Alan Silverman*, Mr. Justice Douglas and Civil Liberties. Columbia.
- L. Dean Sprague*, Civil Rights during War. Syracuse.
- Robert J. Steamer*, The Constitutional Doctrines of Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson. Cornell.
- Robert P. Sturm*, The Legal Theory of Associate Justice Josiah Brewer. Utah.
- Paul D. Tillett*, Lawyers and Social Policy, 1937-1953. Princeton.
- John H. Vanderzell*, Administrative Patterns Established by State Legislation to Regulate Residential Building and Housing. Syracuse.
- William Welsh*, The Local Regulation of Minimum Housing Standards in Selected Cities throughout the United States. Syracuse.
- Warren C. White*, The Constitutional Privilege against Self-Incrimination. Maryland.

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Frank C. Abbott, State Organization and Administration of Tax-Supported Higher Education. Harvard.
- Sylvester S. Aichele, Pressure Groups and the Legislative Process in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Dee Akers, Procedures of Regulatory Administration in the Commonwealth of Kentucky. Kentucky.
- Eva Aronfreed, City of Philadelphia Public Relations Department. Pennsylvania.
- Thester W. Bain, The Readjustment of City and County Boundaries in Virginia. Virginia.
- Richard N. Baisden, Los Angeles Labor and the Los Angeles City Government. Chicago.
- John T. Ballard, Integration of County Offices in Iowa. Iowa.
- Twiley W. Barker, Jr., The State Liquor Dispensary: A Study in Public Enterprise. Illinois.
- Kenneth E. Beasley, Municipal Debt Limitation and Control in Kansas. Kansas.
- George Bell, An Evaluation of the Organization, Policies and Services of the Michigan Municipal League. Michigan.
- Jewel Bellush, Herbert H. Lehman, Lt. Governor and Governor: A Study in State Leadership, 1928-1942. Columbia.
- Wallace H. Best, Referendum Politics in California. Southern California.
- William E. Biggs, The Handling of Workmen's Compensation Claims by the Ohio Industrial Commission: 1940-1955. Ohio State.
- Joe H. Bindley, Voting Behavior in Ohio, 1924-1950: An Analytical Study. California (Los Angeles).
- Lemuel F. Blitz, The Involvement of Local Governments in Metropolitan Problems in the Norfolk, Virginia Area. North Carolina.
- William J. Block, The Separation of the Farm Bureau and the Extension Service: A Study of Group Activities. Illinois.
- John A. Bond, Legislative Reapportionment in Minnesota. Minnesota.
- Morton Broffman, Executive Office of the Mayor of New York City. Harvard.
- Claude J. Burtenshaw, The State Regulation of Insurance. Utah.
- Wen-Pin Chen, State Supervision and Control over Local Law Enforcement in the United States. Illinois.
- Warren I. Cikens, Case Study of Alabama Power Company and TVA in Power Resource Development. Harvard.
- Robert L. Clark, State Administrative Supervision over Local Government, West Virginia. Illinois.
- James T. Crown, The Development of Democratic Government in New York State through the Growth of the Power of the Governor since 1920. New York University.
- Charles C. Curran, The Health Function on the Local Level: Kansas City, Missouri—An Administrative Case Study. Harvard.
- Thomas J. Davy, State Administered In-Service Training Programs for Municipal Officials under the George-Deen Act, with Special Reference to Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- David R. Derge, The Power Position of the Chicago Legislative Delegation in the Illinois General Assembly. Northwestern.
- Carl E. DeVane, Administrative Problems in the Public Budgetary Process, with Special Reference to the City of Philadelphia. Pennsylvania.
- Stanley E. Dewey, The Portsmouth Area of the AEC: Its Impact on Local Government (with Special Reference to Intergovernmental Relations). Ohio State.
- Manuel Dobrusin, Proportional Representation in Massachusetts. The Success of Seven Massachusetts Municipalities with the Proportional Representation Method of Voting. Boston University.
- Douglas J. Doubleday, Legislative Review of the Budget in California. California (Berkeley).
- Paul M. Douglas, Administrative Reorganization in New Jersey. Princeton.
- Gerald E. Dunn, State Courts and the Administration of Federal Law. Johns Hopkins.
- George Elcaness, A History of the Consolidation of the City of New York. New York University.
- Floyd O. Flom, The Legislative Process in Minnesota, with Emphasis on the Role of the Individual Legislator. Minnesota.
- Fenton Gage, Local Housing Authorities of Upstate New York. Harvard.
- Herbert Garfinkel, F.E.P.C. Legislation in Illinois. Chicago.
- Louise B. Gerrard, Newspapers and Politics: Proportional Representation in New York City. Columbia.
- Gibson Gray, A Political Education for the New Reformers: A Study of the Evolution of the Movement for Fair Employment Legislation

- in Pennsylvania from 1945 to 1951. Columbia.
- Stewart L. Grow, The Development of National Parties in Utah. Utah.
- G. Phillips Hanna, New Hampshire Politics: A Case Study of the Recruitment of Political Leaders. Princeton.
- Marvin A. Harder, The Democratic Party in Kansas: A Case Study of the Role of a Minority Party in a One-Party State. Columbia.
- Leroy C. Hardy, Reapportionment in California, 1951: A Political Analysis. California (Los Angeles).
- Louise Harned, Participation in Political Parties: A Study of Party Committeemen. Yale.
- Frederick H. Harris, Jr., A Study of Political Activity in Two North Carolina Counties. North Carolina.
- Donald B. Hayman, Social Security and State and Local Retirement in North Carolina. North Carolina.
- Allan Healey, An Analytical History of the Power of Political Parties in Illinois, 1928-1948. Chicago.
- Clarence J. Hein, The Operation of the Direct Primary in Minnesota. Minnesota.
- A. Freeman Holmer, The Executive Budget in Oregon. Columbia.
- McCown E. Hunt, The Planning of Public Works in the Salt Lake City Area. Utah.
- Page L. Ingraham, Politics of Agriculture in Minnesota, 1930-1950. Chicago.
- William P. Irwin, Political Behavior Trends in Colorado. California (Berkeley).
- Evan A. Iverson, The Two Party System in Utah. Utah.
- James A. Jarvis, Intergovernmental Relationships of Louisville, Kentucky, with Special Reference to Public Housing. Illinois.
- Eugene W. Jones, The Employment Security Commission in North Carolina. North Carolina.
- Donald J. Kreitzer, Urban Redevelopment in Columbus, Ohio. Ohio State.
- Gertrude Lamb, Administration of State Grants-In-Aid. Boston University.
- John A. Larson, Jr., Community Participation in Tennessee's Postwar Industrial Development. Northwestern.
- Hugh LeBlanc, The Political Process in the District of Columbia. Chicago.
- Eugene Lee, Non-Partisan Local Government in California. California (Berkeley).
- Virginia E. Lewis, Fifty Years of Politics in Memphis. New York University.
- Ellis E. McCune, Jury Selection in California: A Study in Judicial Administration. California (Los Angeles).
- Thomas R. Masterson, The Chicago Regional Port District. Chicago.
- Lois B. Merk, Massachusetts in the Woman Suffrage Movement. Harvard.
- Warner Mills, Jr., Ross Sterling, Governor of Texas. Johns Hopkins.
- Lee Moore, Annexation and the Administration of Metropolitan Areas in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania State.
- John C. Murray, The Development of the Executive Branch of Government in Rhode Island. Brown.
- Earl A. Nehring, Local Politics in Los Angeles. California (Los Angeles).
- Isham G. Newton, A Survey of the Minor Judiciary of North Carolina, with Special Emphasis on the Justice of the Peace. Pennsylvania.
- Walter H. Niehoff, Democratic Trends in the Constitutions of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania State.
- James Nietmann, The Administration of Government in the City of St. Louis, Missouri, 1875-1950. Harvard.
- Benjamin Nispel, The Office of the Lieutenant Governor in the United States. Pennsylvania.
- Garfield S. Pancoast, The Second Class Township in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Daisy Parker, The Executive Department of the State of Florida. Virginia.
- Dorothy S. Pealy, An Evaluation of the Work of the Ann Arbor Home Rule Charter Commission. Michigan.
- Philip C. Pendleton, A Critical Analysis of the Effectiveness of the Municipal Leagues of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Frank Peters, The Colonial Governor of Delaware. Duke.
- Dwynal B. Pettengill, Financing Political Parties in Maryland. Johns Hopkins.
- Theodore P. Pidus, Municipal Administration in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Harold L. Rakov, The Changing Focus of Administration and Control of Public and Private Education in New York State. Syracuse.
- Martin R. Ream, Alcohol Beverage Revenues and Control: A Comparative Study of the Financial and Social Aspects of the State Monopoly and the State Liquor Licensing System, with Special Emphasis in Their Application to the Commonwealth of Pennsyl- vania and the State of New York. Pennsylvania.

- Adolph Reed, The Decline of the American Labor Party in New York City. American.
- Joseph W. Reid, Jr., Intergovernmental Relations in Alabama. North Carolina.
- Samuel J. Resnick, The City Planning Commission and the Department of City Planning of the City of New York. New York University.
- Joseph Robertson, The Regulation of Public Utilities in Alabama. Minnesota.
- Leonard C. Rowe, The Problem of Money in Elections in California. California (Berkeley).
- Wesley A. St. John, The Issuance, Suspension and Revocation of Occupational and Professional Licenses—A Study of California Administrative Procedure. California (Berkeley).
- Robert L. Sawyer, Jr., The Regulation and Control of Subversive Activities in Michigan. Michigan.
- Walter F. Scheffer, Truck Transportation, a Major Factor in the Highway Problem of Wisconsin. Wisconsin.
- Joseph A. Schlesinger, Methods of Ascendancy to the Office of Governor in the United States. Yale.
- Edgar L. Sherbenou, The Structure and Method of Political Power in a Small Town. Kansas.
- Gerard H. Silverburgh, Fusion Reform in New York City, 1933-1934. Columbia.
- Israel Stiefel, Reorganization of the Pennsylvania State Administrative Structure. Pennsylvania.
- John O. Stitely, The Rhode Island General Assembly. Harvard.
- Raymond P. Stone, Separate but Equal: A Study in the Formulation and Modification of a Constitutional Doctrine. Princeton.
- Marvin Tableman, City-State Fiscal Relations in Michigan, 1937-1947. Michigan.
- James D. Thomas, Jr., County Government and Administration in Alabama. Ohio State.
- A. E. Van Eaton, The Initiative and Referendum in Missouri. Missouri.
- J. Roffe Wike, II, The Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association: A Study of a Political Interest Group. Pennsylvania.
- William C. Wimberly, The Illinois Primary. Illinois.
- Arthur B. Winter, Special Governmental Districts in Tennessee. Duke.
- Frederick M. Wirt, State Motion Picture Censorship: A Study in Freedom and Power. Ohio State.
- Lloyd Woodruff, County Boards in Wisconsin. Minnesota.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN THE UNITED STATES

- Sidney Baldwin, The Farm Security Administration: A Study in Politics and Administration. Syracuse.
- Richard Ball, The Significance of the Autonomous Governmental Corporation for Public Administration Theory. Notre Dame.
- William J. Bell, A Reexamination of Bureaucracy. Indiana.
- Eugenie K. Bigelow, Role of Advisory Bodies in the Foreign Service. Pennsylvania.
- Calvin G. Brooks, Administration of an Extended Social Security System in the United States. American.
- Milon L. Brown, Personnel Policies and Practices in Federal Administration: A Critique of Personnel Management in Selected Federal Agencies. Pennsylvania.
- Andrew S. Bullis, Jr., Fiscal Administration in Selected Pennsylvania Cities. Syracuse.
- Frederick O. Bundy, The Administration of Rule Making and Licensing Processes under Selected Statutes of the Department of Agriculture. Syracuse.
- Charles E. Campbell, Current Executive Development Programs in the United States Army and Air Force with an Appraisal of Selected American Industrial Training Procedures. American.
- John M. Capozzola, The New York Regional Office of the N.L.R.B.: Organization, Policies and Procedures. Pennsylvania State.
- Daniel T. Carroll, The Development of the Appeals System in the Federal Civil Service. Chicago.
- Edwin L. Cling, Unionization of the City Government of Milwaukee, with Particular Reference to Unions with Membership Primarily in Private Industry. Northwestern.
- Robert J. Courtney, The Manager Plan in Pennsylvania Local Government. Pennsylvania.
- Vernon W. Darter, Two Different Approaches to Extension Program Development and Their Influence on Program Content. Harvard.
- Russell E. Dybdahl, The Administration of Professional Licenses in Iowa. Iowa.
- Laurel A. Engsborg, The Administration of Non-Tax Supported Liberal Arts Colleges in the Middle West. Wisconsin.

- Harold E. Finnegan*, Quantitative Measures of Manpower Management and an Interpretation of Their Application in a Large Federal Mental Hospital. American.
- Thomas S. Francis*, An Analysis of the Organization and Operation of Privately Sponsored Commissions of Inquiry. Columbia.
- Emanuel R. Fuchs*, Federal-State Relations in River Basin Development: A Case Study of the Missouri Valley. Harvard.
- David R. Gardner*, The Coordination of Federal, Regional, State and Local Agencies in the Preparation of Detailed Soil Survey Reports. Harvard.
- Reverdy T. Gliddon*, Regulation of the Air Route Pattern by the Civil Aeronautics Board. Texas.
- George Goodwin*, Group Formulation of Railroad Policy. Harvard.
- Paul Gordon*, Evaluation of Top Management and Organization in Hospitals. Syracuse.
- Clifford R. Gross*, The Budgetary Administration of the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance. Syracuse.
- John M. Hale*, Development of the Atomic Energy Commission Personnel System As Compared to Regular Departmental Personnel Systems. Michigan.
- Edward L. Henry*, A Political-Administrative Appraisal of Government Organization for Monetary Policy. Chicago.
- Robert S. Herman*, Revenue Estimating in New York State Government. New York University.
- Lawrence J. Herson*, State Administrative Reorganization: The Precedent of Illinois. Yale.
- Donald S. Hiller*, The Commission Plan of City Government in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Victor C. Hobday*, Tennessee Municipalities and TVA Electric Power. Syracuse.
- Walter W. Hodgson*, State Administrative Supervision of Local Government, with Special Reference to the Area of Health in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Barrett Hollister*, Natural Resources Administration in Ohio. Syracuse.
- Erin Hubbert*, William Ashby Jump, Public Administrator. Syracuse.
- Clyde W. Humphrey*, Organizing and Administering Vocational Business Training in Public Educational Agencies. American.
- Albert P. Ingraham*, Situational Factors in Federal Government Executive Positions and Their Relation to Executive Selection and Development. American.
- Penrose Jackson*, Personnel of Selected Federal Regulatory Commissions. Texas.
- Judith N. Jamison*, Administrative Reforms of the Hiram Johnson Era in California. California (Los Angeles).
- Holman W. Jenkins*, The American Philosophy of War: An Inquiry into the Principles Which Have Governed the Official Military Policy of the Armed Forces of the United States in Determining the Objectives of War, the Methods of Preparation for War, and the Conduct of War. Pennsylvania.
- Milton G. Johnson*, The Development of Public Medical Care for Children in Oklahoma through Services to the Crippled: A Case Study of Administrative Federalism. Harvard.
- Garth N. Jones*, Administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. Utah.
- Francis X. Kane*, Empirical Method of Determining Material Shortages in the Event of Total Mobilization. Georgetown.
- Leon J. Katz*, The Public Relations Concept in Public Administration; the Theory and Practice of Public Relations in Democratic Public Administration, with Special Reference to the Federal Security Agency. Columbia.
- Alan Keith-Lucas*, Decisions About People in Need: A Study of the Theory and Process of Decision-Making in Public Welfare Agencies. Duke.
- Robert V. Kirch*, Regulatory Administration in a Public Utility: A Case Study. Indiana.
- Robert L. Kline*, The Administration of Federal Migratory Waterfowl Legislation. Iowa.
- Anna Knoll*, The Problem of Training Career Administrators. American.
- Donal W. Krimel*, Government Public Relations as an Administrative Tool. Wisconsin.
- Gerhard J. Kruger*, Position Classification and Employment Policies in the Department of Agriculture from 1914 to the Present Time. American.
- Walter Kurylo*, A Study of the Federal-Aid Highway Program with Special Emphasis on Its Budgetary and Planning Aspects. American.
- Ezra Lander*, Performance Budgeting and Accounting Policy in the Department of the Army. American.
- William Larsen*, The Field Service of the United States Bureau of the Budget. California (Berkeley).
- George R. Long*, The Administration of Virginia State Highways. Virginia.

- William H. Ludlow*, Government Control of Urban Population Densities. Chicago.
- Conrad L. McBride*, State Policy and Administration of Conservation of Natural Resources. California (Los Angeles).
- John P. McCarthy*, Legislative-Executive Relations: Federal Organization. Chicago.
- Donald E. J. MacNamara*, The Administrative Organization and Operation of Provost Marshal General Activities in World War II. Columbia.
- Byron S. Martin*, Planning for Total Mobilization for War in the United States: 1920-1940. Chicago.
- Charles Miller, II*, The Administrative Feasibility of Including Domestic Servants under the Federal Old Age and Survivors Insurance Program. Pennsylvania.
- William B. Monat*, A Critical Analysis of the Merit System in Minnesota. Minnesota.
- Chester Morrill, Jr.*, Organizational Principles: Applied to the Lower Echelons of the United States Army. American.
- Maurice J. Mountain*, Domestic Operations of the Office of War Information. Harvard.
- Mildred E. Negus*, A Study of the Unit Cost of a Tax Supported Public Health Nursing Service, with Special Reference to the District of Columbia. American.
- James E. Nix*, The Admission of Negroes to State Universities in the South. Syracuse.
- William C. Nolan*, Organization for the Regulation of Trade—The Federal Trade Commission from Humphrey to the Basing Point Decisions. New York University.
- Maurice E. O'Donnell*, The Growth of Independent Agencies in Foreign Economic Administration, 1940-1953. Wisconsin.
- Benjamin L. Olsen*, Administrative Aspects of Water Resource Development in California. Stanford.
- Arthur S. Patrick*, An Analysis of the Duties and Responsibilities of the First-Line Office Supervisor in Government. American.
- W. Scott Payne*, Public Policy in the Field of Air Transportation. Harvard.
- Robert H. Pealey*, A Comparative Study of Property Tax Administration in Illinois and Michigan. Michigan.
- Ben Posner*, Accounting Data as Related to Performance Budgeting in the Federal Government. American.
- Robert W. Powers*, Interagency Cooperation in Foreign Technical Assistance Programs. Minnesota.
- Jewel L. Prestage*, The Status of the First Hoover Commission Report: An Analysis of the Roles of the President and Congress. Iowa.
- Nathaniel S. Preston*, The Use and Control of Public Authorities in the United States: A Study of the Public Corporation on the State, Local and Regional Levels. Princeton.
- William M. Ransom*, The Reorganization of Public Health Administration in the State of Iowa. Iowa.
- Mary R. Rapp*, 4-H Club Awards Study. Harvard.
- Lee B. Reifel*, Limitations and Potentialities of Democratic Administration in Colleges and Universities in the United States. American.
- Vorley Rexroad*, The Administration of the Los Alamos Atomic Energy Project. New York University.
- Leo Richards*, Budgeting in the National Housing Agency. American.
- Herbert Rosenberg*, Office of Defense Mobilization: A Study of Civil-Military Relations during the Korean Mobilization. Chicago.
- Arthur H. Rosien*, The Administrative Relationship between the Army and the Territory of Alaska. Syracuse.
- Harold H. Roth*, The Executive Office of the President: Its Development as an Administrative Instrument. American.
- Liberata B. Ruscigno*, Organization for Personnel Management in California. Stanford.
- Lloyd W. Schram*, The Columbia River Basin and the Columbia Basin Joint Investigations with Special Reference to Problem 12. Washington (Seattle).
- Harry Seymour*, Organization and Administration of the Bureau of Naval Personnel. Syracuse.
- Bernard E. Shultz*, The Federal Occupational Classification Structure under the Classification Act of 1949. American.
- William J. Siffin*, Government and the Cotton Problem. Harvard.
- Palmer R. Sime*, Farm Planning in the Soil Conservation Service. Harvard.
- David W. Smith*, The Board of Examiners in Montana State Administration. Utah.
- Elizabeth B. Smith*, Intergovernmental Relations in Public Health Administration: A Study of the Adaptation and Execution of Public Policy. Virginia.
- William D. Spear*, A Plan of Integration of Labor Functions within a State Department of Labor in Iowa. Iowa.
- Sidney Spector*, Public Administration among Primitive Societies. Chicago.
- Russell P. Strange*, The Theory and Practice

- of Personnel Administration in the Department of Defense. Maryland.
- David L. Stratmon, The United States Public Health Mission to Liberia, 1944-1952: An Appraisal. Michigan.
- Thomas H. Strong, Some Aspects of Land Use Planning in Australia. Harvard.
- Richard Stuart, Financing Capital Improvements in Maine. Pennsylvania.
- Frank W. Suggitt, Area Analysis—The Educational Function in Program Adaptation. Harvard.
- Nelson E. Taylor, Jr., The Association of American Railroads—Its Role as a Pressure Group. Harvard.
- William Thorkelson, Planning and Programming in the Armed Forces. Syracuse.
- David M. Thorpe, Program Development and Coordination of Agricultural Agencies. Harvard.
- Maurice K. Townsend, The Personnel Function: A Study in Staff-Line Relations. Chicago.
- James D. Tschirgi, Administration of the Federal Mining Laws. Chicago.
- Simon Tucker, The Development of the Employment Activities of the United States Civil Service Commission. American.
- A. Donald Urquhart, The Conduct of Administrative Hearings in Metropolitan Los Angeles. California (Los Angeles).
- Marshall O. Watkins, The Role of the Extension Specialist and His Relation to the Extension Program. Harvard.
- Troy Westmeyer, Administration of Municipal Income and Payroll Taxes. New York University.
- J. Lee Westrate, The Administrative Theories and Practices of Herbert Hoover. Chicago.
- Donald Wilhelm, Jr., Burmese Industrial Development. Harvard.
- Russell W. Willey, The Spending Tax—A Fiscal Aid in Controlling Inflation. Pennsylvania.
- Walter Wilmot, Administration of Air Pollution Control. Harvard.
- Jesse D. Winzenreid, The State of Wyoming: A History and Evaluation of Financial Administration. New York University.
- John L. Withers, The Administrative Theory and Practice of William Howard Taft. Chicago.
- Arthur Wolfe, American Civil Service Examinations. Chicago.
- James R. Woodworth, Administration of the Pure Food, Drugs and Cosmetics Act since 1938. Harvard.
- Laurence N. Woodworth, United States Taxation of Income Earned Abroad. New York University.
- John D. Young, Regional Administration in the Federal Security Agency. American.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Bruce Adkinson, British Commonwealth in Southeast Asia. Princeton.
- Hans H. Baerwald, Problems of Developing Democratic Leadership in Japan. California (Berkeley).
- Robert W. Barrie, The Council of Europe. Minnesota.
- Paul Barringer, Soviet Policy toward Scientific Research: A Case Study. Harvard.
- Richard Barron, The Political Parties and the Fourth French Republic. Virginia.
- Harry J. Benda, Indonesian Islam under the Japanese Occupation, 1942-1945. Cornell.
- Richard Bender, Structure and Organization of the Associated States of Vietnam. Cornell.
- William Berry, Problems in the Economic Development of British African Territories. Harvard.
- Brij Bhushan, The Fundamental Rights in India: Indian Philosophic and Anglo-American Legal Concepts. American.
- John A. Billings, The British Administration of the Mandate of Transjordan, 1923-1939. Princeton.
- Byron E. Blankinship, Spain and World War I: A Study of Foreign Policy, 1910-1920. Columbia.
- Louis C. Bochever, Jr., The Development of the Soviet Coal Industry. Harvard.
- Frank R. Brandenburg, The Philosophy of the Mexican Revolutionary Party. Pennsylvania.
- Conrad Brant, The Chinese Communist Party and the Comintern, 1924-1930. Harvard.
- Cecil C. Brett, Local Autonomy in Okayama Prefecture, Japan: A Study of National-Local Relations. Michigan.
- Lyle C. Brown, The Cardinas Administration in Mexico, 1934-1940. Texas.
- Ben G. Burnett, The Colombian Party System: A Contemporary Analysis. California (Los Angeles).
- Leo D. Cagan, Civil Service Unions: A Comparative Study of American and British Commonwealth Experience. Chicago.
- Charles Carroll, Australia and Argentina: A Study of the Bases of Federal Government. Harvard.

- Jay H. Cerf*, A Study of Attitude Controls in the Membership State: The Sanction-Appealing Process of the Freie Deutsche Jugend in the School and University System of the German Democratic Republic. Yale.
- Romeo A. Cherot*, Kazakh Customary Law under the Russian Empire, 1824-1917. Columbia.
- Tse-Tsung Chow*, The May Fourth Movement and Its Influence upon China's Political and Social Development. Michigan.
- James B. Christoph*, Theories, Laws and Practices Concerning the Political and Civil Rights of State Workers in Great Britain. Minnesota.
- Cathie L. Clark*, The Development of Government and Administration in Brazil since 1889. American.
- Alessandro L. Corradini*, The Conduct of Foreign Affairs in Great Britain. Wisconsin.
- George R. Crossman*, The Program of "Economic Democracy" in West Germany from 1945 through 1954. Columbia.
- Chauncey R. Crutcher*, The Federal District of the United Mexican States. North Carolina.
- Robert Curtis*, Origins and Development of the Movement Republican Populaire. Georgetown.
- Jose M. de Gamboa*, Philippine Political Parties as Instruments of Reform. Cornell.
- Kurt DeWitt*, The Relation between Civil and Military Power in a Totalitarian Dictatorship: The Wehrmacht and the Nazi Party, 1933-1945. George Washington.
- Alfred Diamant*, The Course of Political Catholicism in Austria. Yale.
- Roger Di-Gioja*, The Problem of the Executive in France, and the Fear of Bonapartism. Notre Dame.
- P. Allan Dionisopoulos*, The Conduct of Foreign Policy under Shigeru Yoshida. California (Los Angeles).
- Jack D. Dowell*, The Parliament of West Germany. Stanford.
- Eugene Dvorin*, The Political Development of the Central African Federation (No. Rhodesia, So. Rhodesia and Nyasaland). California (Los Angeles).
- Marie A. Edwards*, Labor Legislation in Occupied Japan, 1945-1950. Northwestern.
- Harold T. Ellis*, The Development of the Constitution of Ireland, 1911-1923. Stanford.
- John G. Eriksen*, Church and State Relations in Germany, 1930-1945. Minnesota.
- Bernard Fall*, The Situation in Vietnam. Syracuse.
- Josephine Fishel*, The Fabian Society and the British Labour Party. Duke.
- Cary O. Fisher*, Revolution by Coup d'Etat: A Study of Modern Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics. Stanford.
- William Fleming*, The Jurisdiction of German Courts to Decide Controversies Arising under the Weimar Constitution. Columbia.
- Harold A. Fletcher, Jr.*, The Nationalization of Industry in France: A Study of the Political and Administrative Aspects of the Problem. Harvard.
- Charles R. Foster*, A Study of the German Social Democratic Party. Ohio State.
- Lloyd Freese*, The United States and the Birth of the States. Chicago.
- Julian R. Friedman*, The Impact of Democracy on Imperialism: A Study of the British Colonial Administrative Service. California (Berkeley).
- I. Paul Giardina*, The Economic Effects of the Disposition of the Italian Colonies upon the Economy of Italy. New York University.
- John L. Groom*, The Function of Soviet Law. Southern California.
- Werner Grunbaum*, Civil Liberties and the Cold War in Great Britain. Chicago.
- William B. Gwyn*, Democracy and Political Expenses in Nineteenth Century England. Virginia.
- Susan Han*, The Chinese Elite. Chicago.
- Norman B. Hannah*, The Government of Thailand. Minnesota.
- William S. Hardenbergh*, British Government in British Columbia. Illinois.
- Louis K. Harris*, Democracy in Latin America. California (Los Angeles).
- Dan F. Henderson*, The Pattern and Persistence of Traditional Procedures in Japanese Law. California (Berkeley).
- Bernard C. Hennessy*, British Trade Unions and International Affairs, 1945-1953. Wisconsin.
- Laurin L. Henry*, International Technical Assistance in Public Administration. Chicago.
- Paul H. Heppie*, The Ideology of the Canadian Liberal Party, 1921-1951. Wisconsin.
- Alfred Hero*, Individualism and the French Political Elite: A Study of National Character. George Washington.
- James K. Herold*, The Role of the Trade Unions in Nationalized Industries: A Case Study of the National Union of Mineworkers. Harvard.
- H. Grants Hicks*, Chinese Nationalist Administration and Reform in Formosa. Columbia.

- Karl A. Hochschwender, The Politics of Civil Service Reform in Western Germany. Yale.
- H. M. Holland, Japanese Political Parties in the 1920's and 1930's. George Washington.
- Ernest V. Hollis, Jr., The Soviet Police System, 1917-1946. Columbia.
- Ursula Holtermann, Democracy Resurrected: A Study of German Political Parties, 1945-1950. Chicago.
- Leonard J. Horwitz, United States-Argentine Relations, 1943-1947, with Special Reference to the Braden-Peron Affair. Pennsylvania.
- George Howatt, An Evaluation of Australian Experience with Preferential Voting and Proportional Representation. Pennsylvania.
- Kyaw Htun, Problems of Industrial Development in Post-War Burma. Chicago.
- W. Carter Ide, The Politics of French Labor. Harvard.
- Eric G. James, Administrative Planning in the British Caribbean, with Special Reference to Jamaica. New York University.
- T. M. Joshi, Economics of Public Finance in Bombay. Pennsylvania.
- Roy E. Jumper, The Recruitment and Training of Overseas Administrators: A Case Study in French Bureaucracy. Duke.
- Misha N. Kadick, Soviet Use of Manpower. Princeton.
- Eli Kaminsky, The French Government and the Communists since 1947. Harvard.
- Hossein Kazemzadeh, Iran and the United Nations: A Study in the Political Behavior of a Small Power. Princeton.
- James Kitchen, Local Government in Guatemala. California (Los Angeles).
- Stephen P. Koff, Pacifism and the British Labour Party. Columbia.
- Edward B. Kovar, France above the Parties: Gaullism and the Movement for Constitutional Revision in the Fourth Republic. Columbia.
- William B. Kyes, A Comparison of the Air Defense Systems of Germany and the United Kingdom during World War II. Georgetown.
- Harry Lazer, Balfourian Conservatism: A Study in Political Ideas and Political Leadership. Columbia.
- Jerzy Lerski, Polish Exiles in the United States, 1834-1865. Georgetown.
- Frank M. Lewis, The Multi-Party System in the Presidential Form of Government in Chile. Texas.
- J. Gus Liebenow, Jr., Comparative Studies of Indirect Rule in British East Africa. Northwestern.
- Gerhard Loewenberg, Effects of Governing upon the British Labour Party, 1945-1951. Cornell.
- Jerry K. Loveland, Cohesive Elements in the Commonwealth. California (Los Angeles).
- Ruth H. Lutz, The Political Parties of Mexico. Pittsburgh.
- Charlie Lyons, Jr., The Effect of the Point Four Program on Indian Public Opinion. Ohio State.
- Thomas H. McLeod, Dominion-Provincial Conferences as a Technique in Intergovernmental Coordination. Harvard.
- Sidney Mailick, The Emergence of a System of Administration in Israel. Chicago.
- Ram C. Malhotra, Administrative Reorganization of the Government of Nepal. American.
- Joseph F. Marsh, British Departmental Decentralization: A Study of National Departmental Organization in the Southern (#6) Standard Region for the Administration of Public Health and Welfare Services. Harvard.
- Albert A. Mavrinac, The Antecedents of the M.R.P. Harvard.
- Gordon P. Means, The Evolution of Self-Government in Malaya. Washington (Seattle).
- Douglas H. Mendel, Jr., A Study of Political Participation in Rural Japan. Michigan.
- Frank A. Mesplé, The Native Political Parties of French North Africa. Stanford.
- Edmund C. Mester, The Road to Political Democracy in Turkey. Maryland.
- Edward W. Mill, The Conduct of Philippine Foreign Relations. Princeton.
- Frank O. Miller, Minobe Tatsukichi, Exponent of Liberal Constitutionalism under the Meiji Constitution. California (Berkeley).
- Kenneth Miller, British Socialism and the Continuity of Foreign Policy, 1931-1950. Johns Hopkins.
- Ante Mlikotin, The Structure of Contemporary Yugoslav Government. Indiana.
- George R. Monsen, De Gaulle and the R.P.F.: Man, Movement and Mystique. Stanford.
- Steven Muller, The Prime Ministership in Canada. Cornell.
- Fred W. Neal, The Reforms in Yugoslavia: Titoism in Action. Michigan.
- Joe W. Neal, The State Governments of Northeastern Mexico: Coahuila, Nuevo Leon and Tamaulipas. Texas.
- Mark Neuwend, The Central Organization of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union; the Structure, Leadership and Dynamics of Development. Harvard.

- Hazem Zaki Nuseibeh*, The Ideas of Arab Nationalism. Princeton.
- Eze A. Ogueri*, The Indirect Rule System; Its Theory and Practice, and the Idea of Self-Government (Independence) in the British Colonial and Protectorate Policy in Nigeria, 1890-1950. Harvard.
- Eric Oppenheimer*, Deutsche Demokratische Partei, 1918-1930. Emory.
- Leon V. Padgett*, Popular Participation in the Mexican One-Party System. Northwestern.
- Stelios Papadakis*, An Introduction to the Constitutional History of Modern Greece. Pennsylvania.
- H. Carroll Parish*, Development of Democratic Institutions in Southeast Asia. California (Los Angeles).
- Don Peretz*, Israel and the Arab Refugees. Columbia.
- Lawrence L. Petersen*, The Swedish Cooperatives and Politics. Notre Dame.
- Arich L. Plotkin*, An Analytical Study of Israel's Role in the United Nations. Princeton.
- Ivan M. Ponedel*, The Development of English Labor Law: The Legal Position of the Laborer from 1349 to the Present. California (Berkeley).
- Jesse Proctor*, Federation of the British West Indies. Harvard.
- Robert W. Quick*, French Political Attitudes toward European Integration, 1950-1954. California (Los Angeles).
- Herbert F. Quinn*, The Nationalist Movement in Quebec since 1930: The Impact of Industrialization on Party Politics. Columbia.
- Enuga S. Reddy*, Village Government in South India. Columbia.
- James Riedel*, The British Debate on Foreign Policy, 1945-1950. Chicago.
- Linford D. Riley, Jr.*, The Associated States System in Indo-China. California (Los Angeles).
- Owen W. Roberts*, The Colonial Policy of the French Socialist Party, 1946-1951. Columbia.
- Leslie G. Rofoe*, The French Economic Council. Columbia.
- William L. Rofes*, A Study of the Prime Minister in Great Britain. Columbia.
- Leo E. Rose*, The Effect of Occupation Policy upon the Labor Movement in Japan. California (Berkeley).
- Susanne H. Rudolph*, Leadership and Organization of the Indian Congress Party since 1947. Harvard.
- Thomas A. Rusch*, The Role of Socialist Ideology in the Congress Party of India, 1931-1951. Chicago.
- Hassan H. Saab*, The Impact of Communism on Islamic Society. Georgetown.
- I. Milton Sacks*, Communism and Nationalism in Vietnam. Yale.
- Bidyut K. Sarkar*, A Comparative Analysis of the Indian and U.S. Press Treatment of the Neutral Nations' Repatriation Commission Operations in Korea, 1953-54. Pennsylvania.
- Will J. Selzer*, The Trusteeship Council and Self-Government with Particular Reference to British Administration in Africa. Pennsylvania.
- F. Burke Sheeran*, Intergovernmental Relations in Canada, Australia and the United States: A Comparative Study of Federal Government. Southern California.
- Kurt L. Shell*, Austrian Socialist Party, 1945-1952. Columbia.
- Charles E. Shumaker*, The Malayan Chinese Association. Ohio State.
- Donald V. Smiley*, Nature of Party Cohesion: A Comparative Study—England, Canada and the United States. Northwestern.
- Elmer W. Smith*, British Political Parties: The Role of the Annual Party Conference. Harvard.
- Olga C. Sonder*, Political Processes and Electoral Procedures under the Indian Republican Constitution Put into Effect on January 26, 1950. Stanford.
- Herbert G. Sonthoff*, Robert von Mohl and the Problem of German Federalism. Harvard.
- Frances L. Starnes*, The Philippine Agrarian Problem and Its Political Implications. California (Berkeley).
- Charles I. Stastny*, The Hungarian Communist Party: A Study of Ideology and Operational Development. Harvard.
- Kurt Steiner*, Local Government in Japan. Stanford.
- Herbert Storing*, Consultation of Interests in the Formulation of Administrative Rules in the United Kingdom. Chicago.
- Melvis P. Straus*, The Control of Subversive Activities in Canada. Illinois.
- Robert S. Sullivant*, The Ukraine and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: A Study in Soviet Policy and Ukrainian Nationalism. Chicago.
- Zoltan M. Szaz*, The Principal Foreign Policy Problems of the Federal Republic of Germany, 1949-1953. Catholic University.
- Harold M. Thewlis*, Authoritarian Tendencies in the French Right, 1924-1940. Columbia.

- Jack E. Thomas*, Evaluation of Soviet Air Power. California (Berkeley).
- Robert F. Thompson*, The Retention and Rejection of Occupation Reforms in Japan after the Signing of the Peace Treaty. Minnesota.
- Hugh G. Thorburn*, The Politics of New Brunswick: A Study of the Growing Importance of the Acadian Population in the Political Life of the Province. Columbia.
- Thomas W. Thorsen*, The Administration of Medical and Public Health Services in Scandinavia. Utah.
- Roy Tollefson*, Political Thought in the Norwegian Labor Party (1917-1928). Chicago.
- Lois E. Torrence*, The Canadian Party System. American.
- Frank Untermeyer*, The Problem of Federation in the British Central African Colonies. Chicago.
- Margaret D. Urist*, Nationalism in Guatemala. Southern California.
- Paul Van der Veur*, Introduction to a Socio-Political Study of the Eurasians in Indonesia. Cornell.
- George Vlasak*, The Czech Political Tradition: A Study in the Formative Period. New York University.
- Eric Waldman*, The Spartacus Uprising in 1918: Study of the Relation between Theory and Practice in the German Social Democratic Party. George Washington.
- Harold Webb*, The Liberal Party in England: Theory and Practice. Brown.
- Carlo F. Weiss*, Catholic Corporatism in Italy. Yale.
- Victor Y. Wen*, The Kuomintang and Nationalist China (1912-1950). Indiana.
- Ernest F. Winter*, Austrian Agrarian Policy, 1945-1953. Columbia.
- Ernest Wohlgenuth*, The Politics of Labor in West Germany. Chicago.
- George E. Wolff*, Executive-Legislative Relations in the Third French Republic, 1920-1940. North Carolina.
- Laurence Wyatt*, Some Freedoms in England Today. Minnesota.
- Willard R. Yates*, An Examination of the Leading Constitutional and Social Ideas of the Mouvement Republicain Populaire, 1945-1947. Yale.
- Manoog S. Young*, Russia and the Armenian Question since 1917. Clark.
- Phoebe Yu*, A Comparison of the British and American Personnel Systems. Chicago.
- Janusz K. Zawodny*, Self-Assertion in the Soviet Factory: A Study of Worker Grievances and Their Adjustment. Stanford.
- Paul Zinner*, Communist Strategy and Tactics in Czechoslovakia, 1945-1950. Harvard.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION, POLITICS AND LAW

- Robert L. Abbey*, The World Health Organization: A Case Study in the Functional Approach toward International Organization. Harvard.
- Kenneth P. Adler*, The Value of Mass Media in Political Communication across National Boundaries. Chicago.
- Nazeer Ahmed*, Development of Administrative Practices in the United Nations Secretariate. Kansas.
- Charles E. Allen*, The Development and Significance of International Health Collaboration, 1792-1950. Stanford.
- Luther A. Allen*, The French Left and Soviet Russia, 1933-1940. Chicago.
- Eliece A. Altroggen*, Power Politics Concerning Sinkiang, 1860-1946. Chicago.
- Abdul-Malik S. Al-Zaibag*, Iraq Oil Politics in the Inter-War Period. Columbia.
- Charles D. Ameringer*, Never Abandon Panama! The Story of Philippe Bunau-Varilla and the Panama Canal. Fletcher School.
- Nan Louise G. Amstutz*, The Economics of Socialism. Fletcher School.
- Hager W. Bach*, The Position of the United States in the United Nations in Regard to Political Developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Chicago.
- Clarence W. Baier*, Jonathan Russell and the Development of the Foreign Relations of the United States, 1810-1920. Brown.
- William Baier*, Concepts of the National Interest in the 1840's. Brown.
- Bettie J. Baker*, Toward an Understanding of International Regionalism. Michigan.
- Arthur C. Banks, Jr.*, International Law and the Second World War. Johns Hopkins.
- Irving Barnett*, UNRRA's Experience in China. Columbia.
- Sidney N. Barnett*, Judicial Interpretations of the United Nations Charter in International and National Courts. Columbia.
- George Basich*, The Effect of Russian Expansion on British Political Opinion, 1763-1856. Chicago.
- Frederick O. Beattie, III*, The Utility of Theories of Aggression to the Understanding of International Relations. Chicago.
- Anne B. Beeler*, The International Labour Organization; Important Developments in - Its Structure, Function and Constitution since 1935. Cornell.

- John A. Bekker, The Soviet Union and World Organization. Chicago.
- Aaron Bell, The United States' Doctrine of the Just War. Chicago.
- Leonard Berkowe, The Fund and GATT as Instruments for the Prevention of Economic Conflict in the Postwar World. Columbia.
- Helen A. Blackway, Ideas and Opinion Determinants in Foreign Policy Issues. Pennsylvania.
- S. Cole Blasier, Soviet Policy toward Cuba and Chile, 1945-1948. Columbia.
- John D. Blumgart, The Political Consequences of the American Aid in Greece. Columbia.
- William G. Bowdler, The Quest for Collective Security in the Americas. Fletcher School.
- Robert J. Bower, The Russians in North America to 1824. Chicago.
- James E. Boyce, The United States and the Integrity of China, 1898-1908. Fletcher School.
- Chester P. Bradley, New Trends in British Colonial Policy. Columbia.
- Ralph Brown, Concepts of Air Superiority. Georgetown.
- Weldon J. Brown, The Political Aspects of Commercial Trade Controls in Central and South America. American.
- Bue Brun, International Maritime Policy. Fletcher School.
- Jean E. Buckens, A Comparative Study of the Laws and Regulations Applied to the Indigenous Populations in Independent Countries. Fletcher School.
- Edwin C. Buell, The Institute of Inter-American Affairs: A Study of Inter-Governmental Cooperation. North Carolina.
- Barbara B. Burn, International Law and the Administration of Colonies. Fletcher School.
- Robert O. Byrd, Quaker Alternatives to Official Policy in the Field of International Relations. Chicago.
- William S. Caldwell, The Organization and Operation of American Informational and Propaganda Activities in Postwar Italy. Minnesota.
- Florencio Campomanes, The Problem of Integration of the Organization of American States into the United Nations. Georgetown.
- Russell B. Capelle, The M.R.P. and French Foreign Policy. Boston University.
- George A. Carroll, American Policy Concerning Control of Atomic Energy. Fletcher School.
- Webster C. Cash, A Comparative Study of the Specialized Agencies in the United Nations: The Relation of Their Functions to Their Organizational Forms. Chicago.
- Alphonso Castagno, Regional Influences in Italian Foreign Policy. Columbia.
- Nancy G. Cattell, Soviet Policy and the German Revolution of 1918-19. Columbia.
- Matthew Cazan, Diplomatic Relations; Roumania—United States, 1940-1950. Georgetown.
- J. Leo Cefkin, The National Commission of UNESCO with Special Emphasis on the United States National Commission for UNESCO. Columbia.
- Yu Nan Chang, A Study of U.S. Security Problems in the Far East, 1950-1952. Washington (Seattle).
- Ping-Lang Chao, Finality of International Arbitral Awards. New York University.
- Chu Pei Chen, The Diplomatic Services of Major Powers. New York University.
- Kwen Chen, Legal Status, Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Its Related Organizations and Their Personnel. Michigan.
- Shin-chai Chen, Study of the Agenda of the Security Council. New York University.
- Yu-Ching Chen, American Policy and the Collapse of the Nationalist China. New York University.
- Chieh Yue Chiang, The Concept and Development of International Responsibility for Colonial Administration. Washington (Seattle).
- Charles K. Chu, Philander Knox's Far Eastern Policy, 1909-1913. Chicago.
- Isaac Ciechanowicz, Soviet Views on International Law as Reflected in the United Nations. New York University.
- Martin Clancy, Rules of Warfare Observed by American Military Forces in the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812. Georgetown.
- Ira S. Cohen, Congressional Attitudes toward the Soviet Union from 1917-1945. Chicago.
- Sidney Coleman, A Study of the Administration of the United Nations International Childrens Emergency Fund. Washington (Seattle).
- George C. Constantinides, The United States and Greece, 1940-47: A Study in Foreign Policy. Harvard.
- Ralph E. Cook, The United States and the Armenian Question, 1895-1925. Fletcher School.
- William G. Cornelius, The Latin American Bloc in the United Nations. Columbia.
- Brownlee S. Corrin, The United Nations, the - United States and the U.S.S.R. from Dumbarton Oaks to Korea: A Study in Controversy and Cooperation. Stanford.

- Morton H. Cowden, Soviet and Comintern Policy toward the British Labor Movement, 1917-26. Columbia.
- Richard F. Crabbs, Administrative Aspects of Technical Assistance. Stanford.
- Martin G. Cramer, TCA Program in India. Fletcher School.
- Frank J. Curtis, Jr., The Role of Argentina in the United Nations. Pennsylvania.
- William B. Dale, Full Employment and American Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- William M. David, Jr., U. S. Policy toward the Baltic States, 1917-1922. Columbia.
- Margaret M. Davies, The Role of the American Trade Union Representatives in the Aid-to-Greece Program. Washington (Seattle).
- Grant R. Davy, Canadian Policies in the United Nations. Fletcher School.
- Anton DePorte, The European Policy of France, 1944-1947. Chicago.
- Francois M. Dickman, The Economic Foreign Policy of the United States in Western Europe from 1945 to 1948. Fletcher School.
- Anatole Dinbergs, The Pattern of Annexation by the Soviet Union. Georgetown.
- Dorothy Dodge, The Recognition of Communist China: Legal and Political Aspects. Minnesota.
- Joseph F. Dolecki, Polish Foreign Policy, 1932-1945. New York University.
- Marion E. Doro, The Problem of Statelessness before the UN. Cornell.
- Herbert W. Dowd, The Native Land and Labor Policies of the South African Administration of South West Africa. Fletcher School.
- Arthur E. Dowell, Appeasement and Conciliation in Global Crises, 1938-1948. Chicago.
- Margaret W. Dower, The International Thinking of George Bernard Shaw. Boston University.
- Edward Drake, The Soviet Alliance System. New York University.
- Wilbert B. Dubin, The Rise of Post-War Political Stratifications in Southeast Asia. Georgetown.
- William B. Dunn, Franco-British Relations in Southeast Asia, 1863-1904. Chicago.
- Stanley W. Dziuban, United States-Canadian Military Cooperation. Columbia.
- Charles P. Edwards, The Western Powers and the Italo-Abyssinian Affair. Fletcher School.
- Harold E. Engle, The Place of International Administration in the Structure of International Politics: A Critical Study of "Functionalism." Columbia.
- Phoebe Everett, International Administration: A Comparative Study of the Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions. Syracuse.
- Bernard Fall, The Post-War Problem of Indo-China. Syracuse.
- Milton Feder, Great Power Relations in the Origin and Development of the Kingdom of Libya. Michigan.
- Mark C. Iselin Feer, India's Policy toward China since 1949. Fletcher School.
- Edmund S. Finegold, The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. Harvard.
- Lawrence S. Finkelstein, Indonesia and the United States. Columbia.
- Arthur Frank, The Wool-Growers and Their Struggle for Political and Economic Security. Utah.
- Robert W. Frase, Proposals for the International Control of Atomic Energy. Harvard.
- C. Dale Fuller, The Soviet Union's Concept of the League of Nations as an Instrumentality for the Maintenance of Peace, 1934-1939. Columbia.
- Arthur Funston, The United Nations and Human Rights. Indiana.
- Richard F. Gardner, The Relations of the United States and Spain from 1898 to 1948. Fletcher School.
- Geraldine S. Garlick, Communist Interpretations of the Causes of War. Iowa.
- Tesfay Gebre-egziabhier, The Attainment of Self-Government under Chapter XI of the U.N. Charter, Cessation of Information Pursuant to Article 73 (e) of the U.N. Charter. Fletcher School.
- Richard A. Geisler, Military Collaboration in the Western Hemisphere. New York University.
- Charles Gendreau, Agricultural Settlement and Colonization in Latin American National Development Programs. Minnesota.
- John S. Gibson, The Impact of Regional and Limited Security Arrangements upon the United Nations as an International Peace and Security Organization. Columbia.
- Eggert W. Giere, The Peace Treaty with Germany: A Study in American Foreign Policy, 1942-1952. Washington (Seattle).
- John S. Gillespie, The Role of the Director-General in the Development of the International Labor Office. Columbia.
- Meredith Gilpatrick, Strategy of the Western Front, 1871-1914. Chicago.
- Alvin B. Glaser, The Development of Re-

- gionalism within the United Nations. New York University.
- Edward Glick, The Policy of the Latin American Governments toward Israel in the United Nations. Florida.
- Robert Goerder, Impact of Air Power in Korea on Chinese and Korean Troops as Evident in Prisoner of War Interrogation Reports. Georgetown.
- Mehmet Gonlubol, Turkish Participation in the United Nations. New York University.
- Elliott R. Goodman, The Bolshevik Concept of a World State. Columbia.
- Marjorie H. Gordon, The New Japanese Constitution. Indiana.
- Robert C. Gordon, The North Atlantic Treaty Organization: A Study in Comparative International Organization. California (Berkeley).
- Stephen Gorove, Power Politics around the Iron Curtain: The Case of the Danube River. Yale.
- James W. Gould, United States Interest in Sumatra, 1785 to 1873. Fletcher School.
- Budda Varadarajulie Govindaraj, The Role of India in the Settlement of Disputes within the United Nations. Michigan.
- Angelina Grammatico, The United Nations and the Development of Human Rights. New York University.
- Morris A. Greene, The Transfer of a Functioning International Organization from One Site to Another. American.
- Frances A. Gulick, Agrarian Problems in Indonesia. Fletcher School.
- Merle Gulick, The Foreign Policy of Senator Connally. Georgetown.
- Eric J. Haas, The Modern Problem of Intervention. New York University.
- Ahmad Haffar, The Middle East as an Area of International Conflict. Utah.
- Lorna H. Hahn, India in the American Press, 1949-1953: A Quantitative and Qualitative Study. Pennsylvania.
- Joseph Hajda, Major Problems in the Making of East-Central European Federations. Indiana.
- William C. Hamilton, Making Foreign Policy in Pressure Groups. Yale.
- Pyo-Wook Han, Post-War Developments in Korean Government. Michigan.
- Thomas H. Handy, Russia and Postwar Anglo-American Relations. Texas.
- John Hanessian, Jr., The Question of Western European Integration. Syracuse.
- Milan E. Hapala, The Russian Question and the Evolution of Czechoslovak Political Parties. Duke.
- Maurice Harari, Boundaries in the Near and Middle East: A Political Analysis. Columbia.
- Bruce B. Harlow, Determinants in International Relations: An Inquiry into Fundamentals. Columbia.
- Don Harris, International Economic Cooperation in Europe, 1814-1950. California (Berkeley).
- Bartlett Harvey, Foreign Policy and Public Opinion; The Shift in Policy toward the German Economy, 1945-48. Harvard.
- Gene S. Haugse, Treaties of Alliance. Nebraska.
- Joseph A. Hearst, American Policy in Occupied Italy. Columbia.
- William A. Helseth, United States Embassy in Berlin, 1921-1933. Fletcher School.
- William Henderson, Eleven Days to Pearl Harbor: A Study of Crisis Government in America. Columbia.
- Frederick Herman, The Victors and the Vanquished: The Quest for Security as Illustrated by Three Allied Occupations of Territory of Defeated Powers: France, 1815-1818; Germany, 1918-1929; and Germany, 1945-. Fletcher School.
- Robert Herrera, Latin American Territorial Disputes in International Law. Columbia.
- Wilhelm G. Hertz, The Swiss Conception of International Law. Columbia.
- James E. Hewes, Jr., William E. Borah's Mirror of the World. Yale.
- Raul Hilberg, The Destruction of the European Jews. Columbia.
- Wilbur W. Hitchcock, Defense of National Honor as Justification for Military Measures. Pennsylvania.
- Conrad P. Homberger, A Theory of International Relations. Columbia.
- Robert D. Hopkirk, Toward More Effective Co-ordination of United Nations Economic and Social Activity. New York University.
- Robert J. Horgan, American Thought on the Soviet Union, 1933-1939. Notre Dame.
- Thomas Hovet, Jr., The General Assembly of the United Nations: An Analysis of the Establishment and Development of Its Organization and Procedures. New York University.
- Allen Hovey, Jr., Politics of Unity: The European Movement and the Council of Europe. Columbia.
- Albert J. Hoyt, The Role of Regionalism in Contemporary World Politics. Southern California.
- Robert P. Huff, Diplomatic Relations between

- Spain and the United States, 1945-1953. Stanford.
- Dunning Idle, IV*, Indonesian Neutralism and the Cold War. Yale.
- Thomas A. Israel*, The Implications of the Social Contract Theory for International Organization and International Law. Illinois.
- Harold K. Jacobson*, The Impact of the Soviet Union on the Economic and Social Activities of the United Nations. Yale.
- Richard Jaffe*, Japanese Aggression in Southeast Asia, 1938-1941. Chicago.
- Louis C. James*, Relations of the North American Railroads: A Study in International Cooperation of the Railroads of Canada, Mexico and the United States. Columbia.
- Ernest John*, Some Aspects of General Staff Liaison in Coalition Warfare. Georgetown.
- Raymond Van Kirk Johnson*, Development and Administration of the International Broadcasting Program of the United States. Stanford.
- Doris W. Jones*, The First Moroccan Crisis and the Foreign Policy of Theodore Roosevelt. Fletcher School.
- Catherine S. Kadragic*, Role of the League of Nations in the Pacific Settlement of Political Disputes in the Balkans. Columbia.
- Charles Katsanos*, Russia's Pan-Slavism: A Theory and Practice in the Light of Russia's Balkan Expansion up to 1912. Georgetown.
- Pierre Keller*, The American Official Attitude on the Role of Europe in the Defense of the West, 1947-51. Yale.
- George H. Kelly*, The Union Française and French Colonial Policy. Stanford.
- Jesse C. Kennedy*, American Foreign Policy in China, 1937-1950: An Analysis of Why It Failed. Chicago.
- Lu Yu Kiang*, A Critical Study of the Operation of the United Nations Trusteeship System, with Special Reference to the Methods of Supervision over the Administering Authorities. New York University.
- E. Darrell Killen*, Pacific Security Alternatives As Seen Through Australian Eyes. Chicago.
- Chonghan Kim*, Prince Konoye and Japanese Foreign Policy, with Special Reference to the Period 1937-1941. Indiana.
- Chase Kimball*, A Commentary on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Fletcher School.
- Alvin Knepper*, John Gilbert Winant and International Social Justice. New York University.
- Ross Y. Koen*, The China Lobby and the Formulation of American Foreign Policy, 1945-1951. Florida.
- Maximilian Koessler*, The Dachau Trials: A Study of the War Crime Trials. Columbia.
- Leon Koruciewicz*, Polish-German Diplomatic Relations, 1934-1939. California (Berkeley).
- Irving Kramer*, Problems of the Japanese Peace Treaty. Columbia.
- Lawrence Lazar*, International Law and Diplomatic Asylum. Fletcher School.
- Bruce LeMessurier*, The United States Senate and America's Latin American Policy, 1938-50. Chicago.
- Sigrid Leube*, The Position of Non-Member States with Regard to International Organizations: The League of Nations and the United Nations. New York University.
- Hua-Wei Li*, The Development of Economic and Social Rights by the United Nations. New York University.
- Paul Ta-Kuang Lin*, Problems in the Policy of the British Commonwealth toward the Japanese Empire, 1921-1941. Harvard.
- Arthur W. Lindsley*, The Problem of Control over Current Methods at Conflict between Nations. New York University.
- Seward Ling*, The Administrative Tribunal at the United Nations. New York University.
- Pichon Pei-Yung Loh*, China: Its Westernization and Nationalism, 1919-1926. Chicago.
- Stephen Low*, Colonial Policy and Population Growth in the Philippines. Fletcher School.
- William S. McCrea*, A Comparative Study of the Mexican Oil Expropriation of 1938 and the Iranian Oil Nationalization of 1951. Georgetown.
- Stuart H. McIntyre*, Legal Effect of War on Treaties. Columbia.
- Raymond D. Mack*, The Development of the Inter-American Regional System: The Contribution of the Jurists. Indiana.
- Joseph C. McKenna, S.J.*, Diplomatic Protest as an Instrument of United States Foreign Policy. Yale.
- Norman Mackie, Jr.*, From Dismemberment toward Integration, 1944-1950. Columbia.
- Charles B. McLane*, Soviet Policy towards the Chinese Communists, 1935-1949. Columbia.
- Charles H. McLaughlin*, Principles of Treaty Interpretation. Columbia.
- P. D. Madhani*, Expropriation of Property under International Law. Columbia.
- Alfredo Manat*, The Relations of the United States and the Philippines since the Coming into Effect of the Commonwealth Act, 1935-1950. Chicago.

- Yunan Mao*, The Principle of Sovereign Equality in the United Nations. Chicago.
- Melvin M. Marcus*, Voting Procedure in the Practice of the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations. Michigan.
- John L. Martin*, Legal and Diplomatic Control of International Propaganda. Minnesota.
- Laurence Martin*, Anglo-American Liberalism and the Allied Peace Program of 1918. Yale.
- Gerald Maryanov*, Domestic Jurisdiction in the United Nations. Indiana.
- Irene W. Meister*, Soviet Union's Policy in the Near East since the End of World War II. Fletcher School.
- Everett K. Melby*, The Refugees in Western Germany. Chicago.
- Earl T. Millen*, The Impact of Tensions upon International Relations and Organization. Washington (Seattle).
- Frances Mond*, The United Nations Commission on Human Rights. Columbia.
- Carol C. Moor*, New Guinea: A Study of International Colonialism. New York University.
- Glenn G. Morgan*, An Evaluation of the Role of the Specialized Organizations of the Organization of American States. Virginia.
- Andrew J. Morse*, An Analysis of British Opinion in Reaction to the American Initiative during the Postwar Years. Chicago.
- Norman W. Mosher*, State Trading and Great Britain: A Case Study of State Trading, Methods of Its Implementation, the Effects on the National Economy and Its Relation to Multilateral Trade. Fletcher School.
- Daniel P. Moynihan*, United States and the International Labor Organization. Fletcher School.
- Marjorie Murphy*, The Sterling Area and the European Payments Union, 1950-1953. Fletcher School.
- Shikah Mirza Musaffar*, Islamic Culture and Values in Relation to the Problem of Human Fertility in the Muslim World. New York University.
- Robert J. Myers*, The Political Philosophy of Japan's Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. Chicago.
- Harold I. Nelson*, The Making of the German Territorial Settlement, 1919. Columbia.
- Inez Nelson*, The Security of Small States. Chicago.
- Norman W. Nelson*, Subsidies to Producers as a Substitute for Tariffs. Fletcher School.
- Randall H. Nelson*, United States Practice in the Negotiation and Conclusion of International Agreements since 1940. Michigan.
- Bernard Norwood*, United States Government Procurement Abroad. Fletcher School.
- Leon Novar*, Great Power Conflicts in Iran, 1920-21 and 1943-47: A Comparison. Chicago.
- Grady H. Nunn*, International Administration in the Western Hemisphere. New York University.
- Alfred G. Obern*, International Regional Organizations: A Study in International Administration. American.
- James F. O'Brien*, The London Economic Conference of 1933. Georgetown.
- William O'Brien*, Some Contemporary Aspects of the Principle of Military Necessity. Georgetown.
- Irwin Oder*, The United States and the Palestine Mandate, 1920-1948. Columbia.
- Eric H. Olson*, The New Colonial Administration of West Africa. Syracuse.
- Roy Olton*, Africa in American Foreign Relations during the Nineteenth Century. Fletcher School.
- Gene D. Overstreet*, The Soviet View of India and Communist Policy in India: A Study of Strategy and Tactics. Columbia.
- Robert von Pagenhardt*, The Executive Office and Powers of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Stanford.
- Alexander A. Palamiotis*, The Legal Status of Greece in Post-War International Relations. Utah.
- R. V. Patwardhan*, Possible Development of a Regional System in South East Asia. New York University.
- Oscar Perlmutter*, The Foreign Policy of Dean Acheson: A Case Study in the Conduct of Foreign Relations in a Democracy. Chicago.
- Maria Perry*, Prelude to War in Eastern Europe: Romania and the Powers, 1931-1941. Columbia.
- Robert J. Peterson*, The Status of Manchuria since 1931. Chicago.
- Emil R. Platig*, The Philosophy of International Relations of John Foster Dulles. Chicago.
- Adamantia Pollis*, The Effects of Great Power Policy on Greek Nationalism. Johns Hopkins.
- John A. Power*, Financing of the United Nations and Its Specialized Agencies. Catholic University.
- Ross J. Pritchard*, Will Clayton: A Study of the Role of a Business-Man in the Formu-

- lation of United States Economic Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- Fahim I. Qubain*, The Middle East Petroleum Industry. Wisconsin.
- G. S. Rao*, The Coordination of Specialized Agencies and the United Nations: A Case Study in Technical Assistance Programme. Columbia.
- Vladimir Reisky-Dubnic*, A Study of Propaganda Methods in Czechoslovakia Aiming for Closer Integration with the Soviet Union. Chicago.
- Peter Remec*, The Position of the Individual in International Law According to Grotius, Vattel, Oppenheim. Chicago.
- E. Haynes Reynolds*, The Impact of the East-West Conflict in the Middle East. Southern California.
- George H. Ried*, Administration of an International Police Force. Syracuse.
- Najmuddin Rifai*, Lybia—Road to Independence. Columbia.
- Alfred S. Rigsbee*, A Study of Functional International Organization in Its Administrative Aspect. Indiana.
- Walter L. Riley*, An Analysis of the Law of the International Military Tribunal of the Far East. Washington (Seattle).
- Dorothy Roberts*, An Analysis of the Bi-Partisan Foreign Policy as a Method of Conduct of the Foreign Relations of the United States. Chicago.
- John P. Rudy*, Anglo-American Diplomatic and Economic Relations with Argentina since 1945. Fletcher School.
- Paul Rupprecht*, The International Position of Hungary in the U. S. Foreign Policy, 1933-47. Minnesota.
- Donald E. Russell*, Revolution in China: A Study in American Reactions. Chicago.
- Marina Salvin*, The Soviet Challenge in the Balkans. Columbia.
- Isamu Sato*, The Impact of International Relations upon the Government and Politics of Japan. Chicago.
- Charles E. Savage*, A Study into the Obligatory Character of Resolutions Passed by the Principal Organs of the League of Nations and the United Nations. Florida.
- Bert P. Schloss*, The American Occupation of Germany: An Appraisal. Chicago.
- Donald H. Scott*, The Cultural Relations Program of the United States in Mexico. Southern California.
- Esther Seeman*, The Administration of the Minorities Treaties by the League of Nations and Its Implications for the United Nations. Minnesota.
- Charles B. Selak, Jr.*, Reservations to Multilateral Treaties. Columbia.
- Otis Shao*, American China Policy in 1937. Brown.
- Barbara J. Shockley*, The Creation of a European Nationality. Pennsylvania.
- Herman T. Skofield*, Private Foreign Investment. Fletcher School.
- Donald G. Smith*, The Status of the Inhabitants of the Trust Areas: A Legal, Social, Economic and Political Study. Minnesota.
- Robert F. Smith*, The Policy of the United States toward Political Unity in Germany, 1945-1953. Chicago.
- Glenn Snyder*, Civil-Military Perspectives on Raw Materials Security Policy. Columbia.
- Gordon L. Spangler*, The Washington Conference: A Case Study of Anglo-American Relations. Fletcher School.
- Cummins Speakman*, An Investigation of American Official Information on Political Extremism in Germany during the Weimar Period with Special Emphasis on the First Six Years (1918-1924) and the Final Phase (1930-1933). Yale.
- George S. Springsteen Jr.*, The British Navigation Laws: The Influence of Foreign Nations upon Their Modification and Repeal, 1783-1849: A Study in Commercial Policy. Fletcher School.
- Emil Starr*, The British Labour Party and the Soviet Union, 1939-1949. Chicago.
- Robert B. Stauffer*, Manchuria as a Political Entity: Government and Politics of a Major Region of China, Including Its Relation to China Proper. Minnesota.
- George W. Steckel*, The U.N. General Assembly: Its Powers and Functions. Johns Hopkins.
- David J. Steinberg*, Foreign Procurement and the Stockpiling of Strategic Materials. Harvard.
- Petro Stercho*, Carpatho-Ukraine in International Relations, 1919-1939. Notre Dame.
- Elizabeth I. Sterenberg*, The Role of Forced Labor in Economic Development. Chicago.
- Herman A. Stern*, International Cooperation in the Field of Transport. New York University.
- Virgil H. Stevens*, Personnel Problems Peculiar to International Agencies: A Study in International Administration. Southern California.
- Albert C. Stillson*, The Use of Military Force in Peace by the United States Government: Civilian and Military Attitudes toward the - Use of Military Force in Peace and Their Application. Columbia.

- Jonathan D. Stoddart, The Influence of Immigrant Groups on United States Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- Lois J. Stone, Anglo-Russian Relations in Central Asia, 1885-1892. Columbia.
- Phillips Talbot, The Foreign Policy of India since Independence. Chicago.
- Howard J. Taubenfeld, International Legal Problems of Collective Action by International Organizations. Columbia.
- Loren E. Tesdell, The Middle East and Technical Cooperation. Stanford.
- Barbara J. Teters, Japanese Politics and Treaty Revision, 1870-1895. Washington (Seattle).
- Joseph M. Thom, The International Legal Status of the Refugee. Washington (St. Louis).
- William W. Thomas, Francis Lieber and the International Law of Land Warfare. North Carolina.
- Joseph M. Thomashefsky, The International Legal Protection of Refugees. New York University.
- Clarence E. Thurber, Contributions of the State of California to the Point Four Program. Stanford.
- Peter A. Toma, Czechoslovak-Soviet Relations during World War II. California (Los Angeles).
- Donald R. Toussaint, The French Contribution to the Political Unification of Europe, 1944-1953. Stanford.
- Erwin W. Umbach, A Study of the Foreign Relations of the United States with Austria. Fletcher School.
- Juliane von K. Valentin, German-Japanese Relations in the Period between the Two World Wars. Pennsylvania.
- Charles W. Vear, The Influence of Organized Labor upon American Foreign Policy. Fletcher School.
- G. Hans Voelkel, Discrimination against Aliens in International Law. Columbia.
- Kalman Von Voros, The Origins of the Munich Pact of 1938. Georgetown.
- James L. Weber, The Development of the Foreign Policy Objectives of the British Labor Party, 1919-1939. Fletcher School.
- Melvin A. Weightman, The Present Status of the Concept of Self-Defense in International Law. Pennsylvania.
- John E. Westburg, General Theory and Practice of Modern Federalism. Southern California.
- Urban Whitaker, A Description of American Influences in Chinese Political Thinking: 1911-1923. Washington (Seattle).
- Harold B. Whiteman, Norman H. Davis and the Functional Approach to Collective Security. Yale.
- Ponnambalam Wignaraja, The Conflict between Economic Rationality and Cultural Values: An Analysis of Four Policies for Increasing the Availability of Domestic Savings for Developmental Needs. Yale.
- Robert Wilfong, UNRRA and Displaced Persons. Harvard.
- F. Haydn Williams, Air Power and American Foreign Policy: The Berlin Air Lift. Fletcher School.
- Maurice J. Williams, The Problem of Economic Integration in Western Europe. Chicago.
- Ann R. Willner, Problems in Agricultural Production for the Domestic Market in Venezuela. Chicago.
- Martin W. Wilmington, Regional Cooperation for Supply and Development in the Middle East during World War II (The Middle East Supply Center). New York University.
- Kurt Wimer, United States Executive-Legislative Tensions in Relation to the League of Nations Covenant and the United Nations Charter. New York University.
- Harry Winkler, The Political Orientation of Israel in the Struggle between East and West. Chicago.
- Klaus Wolff, Pioneer Entrepreneurs in Industry: A Study in the Sociology of Industrialization. Chicago.
- Gregory B. Wolfe, The Montevideo Conference, 1933: Reactions of the North and South American Press to Foreign Policy of the United States. Fletcher School.
- Claude Woltz, Bloc Action in the United Nations. New York University.
- Wah Wong, The Problem of 'Self-Determination' in the United Nations. New York University.
- Herbert H. Wood, Jr., International Supervision of Colonial Administrative Unions. Columbia.
- Theodore P. Wright, Franklin Roosevelt and the Ideal of Collective Security. Yale.
- David Wurfel, The Bell Report and After: A Study in the Political Problems of Social Reform through Foreign Aid. Cornell.
- Stephen G. Xydis, The Armed Forces and the - Psychological Strategy of the Great Powers in Greece, 1944-1947. Columbia.

- Agnes Hwun-giat Yao, Comparison of Mandates and Trusteeship. Chicago.
- Abraham Yeselson, American-Persian Relations, 1883-1918. Brown.
- Tien-Cheng Young, The Use of Scientific Management Concepts in International Administration. New York University.
- William I. Zartman, A Study of Neutralism in France since World War II. Yale.
- Rev. Erwin W. Zinger, Korea As a Test of the Effectiveness and Validity of the Concept of Collective Security. Pennsylvania.

II. DISSERTATIONS COMPLETED SINCE THE LAST LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY

- Harold W. Adams; A.B., Connecticut, 1949; A.M., North Carolina, 1950; Ph.D., Clark, 1954. Heinrich von Treitschke, 1834-1874: The Road to Berlin. Clark.
- Mary E. Blagg; B.S., Texas State College for Women, 1942; M.A., ibid., 1943; M.A., Kentucky, 1947; Ph.D., Duke, 1954. Tory Political Theory in America, 1765-1776. Duke.
- Burton R. Brazil; B.A., California (Los Angeles), 1941; Ph.D., Stanford, 1954. Loyalty Oaths in California: Theoretical Background and Implications. Stanford.
- John H. Bunzel; A.B., Princeton, 1948; M.A., Columbia, 1949; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. Political Ideologies of Small Business: A Study of the Conference of American Small Business Organizations. California (Berkeley).
- John W. Chapman; A.B., Swarthmore, 1943; Ph.D., Columbia, 1953. Rousseau and Liberalism. Columbia.
- Everett R. Clinchy, Jr.; A.B., Swarthmore, 1941; A.M., Columbia, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Equality of Opportunity for Latin Americans in Texas. Columbia.
- Laird J. Dunbar; A.M., University of New Mexico, 1948; Ph.D., New York University, 1953. The Emergence and Growth of the Idea of the Compatibility of Administration and Politics in Recent American Theory and Practice. New York University.
- Harry H. Eckstein; B.A., Harvard, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Rational Direction in the British Health Service. Harvard.
- James V. Elliott; B.S., Boston University, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. The Political and Social Thought of Daniel DeFoe: A Study in the Rise of Liberalism as an Ideology. Harvard.
- Victor C. Ferkiss; B.A., California, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; M.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. The Political and Economic Philosophy of American Fascism. Chicago.
- Robert O. Gibbon; B.A., Kansas; M.A., ibid.; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1954. The Relation of the State to the Economic Order in Greek Political Thought: A Study of Greek Political Thinkers. Minnesota.
- Gilbert F. Gilchrist; A.B., University of the South, 1949; M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Political System of James Harrington: A Study in Seventeenth Century Republican Thought. Johns Hopkins.
- John P. Green; M.A., Chicago, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. The Philosophic Premises of Locke's Politics: The Doctrine of the Law of Nature. Chicago.
- Philip S. Haring; B.A., Harvard, 1937; M.A., Chicago, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Major Problems in Modern Political Philosophy. Chicago.
- Robert H. Horwitz; B.A., Amherst, 1946; M.A., Hawaii, 1950; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. The Political Philosophy of Civic Education. Chicago.
- Henry S. Kariel; A.B., Washington, 1948; M.A., Stanford, 1950; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. The Eclipse of Individualism: A View of Some Contemporary American Social Theories. California (Berkeley).
- Bernard Kronick; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1937; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Political Ideas of Winston Churchill. California (Berkeley).
- Kenneth D. McRae; B.A., Toronto, 1946; M.A., Harvard, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Political Thought of Jean Bodin. Harvard.
- Fauzi Najar; B.A., American University of Beirut, 1948; M.A., Chicago, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Political Philosophy of Al-Farabi As a Rationalistic Interpretation of Islam. Chicago.
- Stanley J. Parry; B.A., Notre Dame, 1941; M.A., Georgetown, 1947; Ph.D., Yale, 1954. The Political Science of Johannes Althusius. Yale.
- Frank A. Pinner; Free School of Political Science, Paris, 1936; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. Political Values: An exploratory Investigation. California (Berkeley).

- Philip Rieff*; B.A., Chicago, 1946; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Freud's Contribution to Political Philosophy. Chicago.
- David G. Smith*; A.B., Oklahoma, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1953. The Political Theory of V. I. Lenin: Some Fundamental Concepts As the Basis for a Systematic Critique. Johns Hopkins.
- Victor E. Waller*; B.A., Miami University, 1947; M.A., Duke, 1949; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1953. The Idea of Justice in Sociological Jurisprudence. Minnesota.
- Kenneth Waltz*; A.B., Oberlin, 1948; A.M., Columbia, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Man, the State and the State System in Theories of the Causes of War. Columbia.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

- Jack E. Babcock*; B.S., Washington, 1937; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. Evolution of Industrial Mobilization Planning Technique in the United States, 1920-1945. Georgetown.
- John W. Baker*; A.B., Texas, 1942; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. Tripartism and the Public Interest. California (Berkeley).
- Lucius J. Barker*; A.B., Southern University, 1949; A.M., Illinois, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Offshore Oil Politics: A Study in Public Policy Making. Illinois.
- Hyo Won Cho*; A.B., Wittenberg College, 1950; M.A., Denver, 1952; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1953. The Evolution of RFC Functions: A Study in the Rise and Decline of an Agency. Ohio State.
- Jean M. Driscoll*; A.B., Michigan, 1941; A.M., ibid., 1942; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1953. Legislator and Constitutency: A Case Study in Representation. Northwestern.
- Robert S. Friedman*; A.B., Johns Hopkins, 1948; A.M., Illinois, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Policy Formation in the Appropriation Process, with Special Emphasis on the House Appropriations Committee. Illinois.
- Richard C. Gripp*; B.A., Whittier College, 1948; M.A., Southern California, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Theory of Recent American Federalism. Southern California.
- Nathan Hakman*; A.B., Ohio, 1943; A.M., Syracuse, 1947; Ph.D., Illinois, 1954. The "Group Interest" and the "Individual" in the Political Process: A Critical Analysis of Methods. Illinois.
- John F. Haltom*; B.A., Alabama, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Texas, 1954. National Security and Civil Liberty: Governmental Techniques Employed to Combat Subversive Activities, 1938-1953. Texas.
- Henry L. Janssen*; A.B., Oklahoma, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. Party Systems and the Public Interest. California (Berkeley).
- Lewis J. Lapham*; B.A., Iowa, 1942; M.S., Syracuse, 1943; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. Party Leadership and the House Committee on Rules. Harvard.
- Richard P. Longaker*; B.A., Swarthmore, 1950; M.A., Wisconsin, 1951; Ph.D., Cornell, 1954. Andrew Jackson and the Presidency. Cornell.
- Dick S. Payne*; B.A., Harvard, 1943; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Missouri Basin Development Program: A Study of Related Problems of Federal Cooperation and Coordination in Water Use. Harvard.
- Otto Press*; B.J., Missouri, 1948; M.A., Minnesota, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Administration Losses in Midterm Elections. Minnesota.
- Harry H. Ransom*; B.A., Vanderbilt, 1943; M.A., Princeton, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Air Corps Act of 1926: A Study of the Legislative Process. Princeton.
- Merrill A. Symonds*; A.B., Wesleyan, 1941; M.A., Boston University, 1948; Ph.D., Clark, 1954. George H. Moses of New Hampshire: The Man and the Era. Clark.
- Ross Talbot*; B.A., Illinois Wesleyan, 1941; M.A., Chicago, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. The Politics of Farm Organizations in North Dakota. Chicago.
- Edwin Timbers*; B.A., West Virginia, 1944; M.A., Michigan, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Labor Unions and Fair Employment Practices Legislation. Michigan.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINIS- TRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

- Redmond J. Allman*; B.B.A., Boston University, 1940; A.M., Notre Dame, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Variation in the Number of Associate Justices on the Supreme Court of the United States from 1801 to 1869. Notre Dame.
- Walter F. Berns*; B.S., Iowa, 1941; M.A., Chicago, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Judicial Interpretations of Freedom and the Problem of Virtue. Chicago.
- Virgil C. Blum*; A.B., St. Louis University, 1938; A.M., ibid., 1945; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Legal Aspects of Equality and Religious Liberty. St. Louis.
- Stephen T. Early, Jr.*; B.A., Virginia, 1948;

- M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Mr. Justice McReynolds and the Judicial Process. Virginia.
- William P. Ehling; B.A., Syracuse, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Contempt by Publication: Historical Development in Theory and Practice. Syracuse.
- William F. Fitzgerald; B.S. Loyala (Los Angeles), 1948; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. The Judicial Unenforceability of the Racial Restrictive Covenant. Georgetown.
- Donald W. Flaherty; A.B., Syracuse, 1943; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1954. The Role of the Supreme Court in the Settlement of Inter-Sovereign Disputes. Syracuse.
- Walter Gouch; A.B., St. Paul's College, 1936; M.A., Catholic University, 1944; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1954. The Legal Theory of Justice Benjamin Cardozo. Johns Hopkins.
- Martin B. Hickman; M.A., Utah; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Utah Constitutional Law. Utah.
- Robert S. Lancaster; B.A., Hampden-Sydney, 1929; M.A., University of the South, 1934; Ph.D., Michigan, 1954. The Political Philosophy and Jurisprudence of Judge Learned Hand. Michigan.
- Ruth L. Leffler; B.S., Northwestern, 1938; M.A., ibid., 1943; J.D., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Chicago, 1953. The Concept of Governmental Tort Liability Culminating in the Federal Tort Claims Act: Legal and Political Analysis. Chicago.
- Robert T. Miller; A.B., Baylor, 1941; M.A., ibid., 1941; Ph.D., Texas, 1954. Judicial Interpretation of Religious Freedom in the United States. Texas.
- Julius Paul; Ph.D., Ohio State, 1954. The Legal Thinking of Jerome Frank: A Study in Contemporary American Legal Realism. Ohio State.
- Nelson M. Robinson; B.A., Wisconsin, 1947; M.A., Syracuse, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Regulatory Systems and Hospital Standards. Syracuse.
- John R. Schmidhauser; B.A., Delaware, 1949; M.A., Virginia, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Role of the Supreme Court As Arbiter in Federal-State Relations. Virginia.
- K. T. W. Swanson; B.A., Iowa, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1954. The Rise of Public Prosecution in the American System. Syracuse.
- Socio-Political Integration in the Detroit Metropolitan Area. Michigan.
- Gary Brazier; B.A., Washington, 1946; M.A., Minnesota, 1949; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1953. Intergovernmental Relations in the Field of Public Airports (with Special Reference to Minnesota). Minnesota.
- Oliver C. Carmichael, Jr.; A.B., Vanderbilt, 1940; LL.B., Duke, 1942; A.M., Columbia, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. New York Establishes a State University. Columbia.
- Joseph D. Crumlish; B.S.S., Georgetown, 1946; M.A., Catholic University, 1948; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. The Philadelphia Home Rule Charter Movement. Georgetown.
- Norris G. Davis; B.J., Texas, 1937; M.J., ibid., 1938; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1954. Freedom of the Press in Texas: A Comparative Study of the State Legal Controls on Mass News Media. Minnesota.
- William R. Gable; B.A., Louisiana State, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Chicago, 1953. The Chicago City Council: A Study of Urban Politics and Legislation. Chicago.
- Frank K. Gibson; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1954. The Control of Stream Pollution in West Virginia. North Carolina.
- John Gillespie; A.B., East Central State, 1948; M.A., Oklahoma, 1949; Ph.D., Texas, 1954. Local Government in Travis County, Texas. Texas.
- Charles F. Lee Decker; A.B., Pennsylvania State, 1939; M.S., Syracuse, 1942; Ph.D., Pennsylvania State, 1953. State Grants-in-Aid to Local Governments in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania State.
- Russell W. Maddox, Jr.; A.B., Marshall College, 1946; M.P.A., Wayne, 1948; Ph.D., Illinois, 1953. Extraterritorial Powers of Municipalities in the U.S., Illinois.
- Clara Penniman; B.A., Wisconsin, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Minnesota, 1953. Recent Developments in the Administration of the State Income Tax. Minnesota.
- Robert B. Richert; B.A., Fresno State, 1943; M.A., California, 1948; Ph.D., Michigan, 1954. Participation of Citizens in Advisory Committees and Administrative Boards: Selected Michigan Cities, 1945-1952. Michigan.
- Bernard Rubin; A.M., New York University, 1950; Ph.D., New York University, 1954. Public Relations As a Function of Modern Government: A Study of Its Development in the Executive Department of New York State. New York University.
- Francis J. Sorauf; B.A., Wisconsin, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. The

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Sidney Belanoff; B.A., Michigan, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Relationship between Political Participation and Voluntary Committee System in Wisconsin: An Effort to Achieve Party Responsibility. Wisconsin.

James K. Sours; B.A., Wichita University, 1949; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. Rent Control in Wichita: A Study in Intergovernmental Relation. Harvard.

John E. Swanson; A.B., Depauw, 1940; A.M., California (Los Angeles), 1947; Ph.D., Illinois, 1953. The Use of the Licensing Power by the City of St. Louis, Missouri. Illinois.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN THE UNITED STATES

William R. Bigger; B.A., Wisconsin, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1941; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1954. Flood Control in Los Angeles County: A Study in Inter-Government Relations. California (Los Angeles).

Juan B. Gastambide; S.B., University of Puerto Rico, 1939; B.S.F., Michigan, 1947; M.F., ibid., 1947; M.P.A., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. An Inquiry into the Possibilities of Local Planning in Puerto Rico. Harvard.

Duane W. Hill; B.A., Iowa, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Legal Status of Cities and Towns in Iowa. Iowa.

Benjamin L. Hunton; B.A., Howard, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1942; Ph.D., American, 1954. The Budget of the Department of War, 1922-1932. American.

David L. Jickling; B.A., Chicago, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. The Personnel System of the United States Post Office. Chicago.

David C. Knapp; B.A., Syracuse, 1947; M.A., Chicago, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Agricultural Policy Formation in the Appropriations Process. Chicago.

Winfred P. Minter; B.S., Virginia Polytechnic Institute, 1938; M.S., ibid., 1939; Ph.D., Chicago, 1953. Military Purchasing and Procurement by the Confederate War Department, 1861-65. Chicago.

Arthur J. Misner; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1942; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. The Development of Faculty Participation in University Administration. California (Berkeley).

Martin W. Moser; A.B., Pittsburgh, 1948; A.M., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Maryland, 1954. The Personnel System in the Department of State. Maryland.

Webster Pendergrass; S.B., Tennessee, 1936; S.M., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. Research, Education and Related Activities in Grassland Farming. Harvard.

Harry W. Reynolds, Jr.; B.A., Pennsylvania State, 1947; M.A., Harvard, 1949; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1954. Executive Coordination of Administrative Boards and Commissions in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.

James E. Skillington, Jr.; B.A., Dickinson, 1940; M.A., Buffalo, 1941; Ph.D., American, 1954. Proposed Modifications in Congressional Participation in the Budgetary Process, 1946-1950. American.

Alice W. Wallace; B.A., Central State Teachers College of Michigan, 1936; M.A., Michigan, 1942; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Public Welfare Administration at the City-County Level in Michigan with Special Reference to Ingham and Saginaw Counties. Michigan.

William L. C. Wheaton; B.A., Princeton, 1934; Ph.D., Chicago, 1953. The Evolution of Federal Housing Programs. Chicago.

George L. Willis; A.B., Indiana, 1948; M.A., North Carolina, 1950; Ph.D., Indiana, 1953. Administrative Development of Alcoholic Beverage Control in Indiana. Indiana.

Thomas L. Wood; A.B., Georgia, 1940; M.B.A., Columbia, 1950; Ph.D., American, 1954. Training and Utilization of Personnel with Marginal Intelligence by the United States Air Force. American.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Mohammed I. Adham; B.A., Royal College of Law, Baghdad; M.A., American, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Special Problems of Government in the Arab States of the Middle East. American.

Berndt G. Angman; B.S., Houston, 1948; M.S., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Texas, 1954. A Study of Ideological Development within the Social Democratic Workers Party of Sweden in Relation to the Question of Socialization, 1932-1954. Texas.

David E. Apter; B.A., Antioch, 1950; M.A., Princeton, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Gold Coast in Transition: A Case Study of Political Institutional Transfer. Princeton.

Frederick T. Bent; B.A., Ohio State, 1943; M.A., Chicago, 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. British Municipal Trade Unions: Policies, Practices, Relation to Whitleyism and Influence on Local Government. Chicago.

Leslie R. Bundgaard; B.S., Wisconsin, 1948; M.S., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. Local Government of the Philippines. Georgetown.

Martin T. Camacho; LL.B., Suffolk University, 1937; M.A., Harvard, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Administration of the SCAP Labor Policy in Occupied Japan. Harvard.

- William F. DeMyer; B.A., Siena College, 1943; M.A., Georgetown, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Role of Leon Blum in the French Chamber of Deputies, 1919-1933. Georgetown.
- John Eaves, Jr.; A.B., Clark, 1944; A.M., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., Columbia, 1953. Emergency Powers and the Parliamentary Watchdog: Parliament and the Executive in Great Britain, 1939-1951. Columbia.
- Frederick C. Engelmann; B.A., California (Los Angeles), 1942; M.A., ibid., 1947; M.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of Canada. Yale.
- Donald R. Farmer; B.S., Minnesota, 1944; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Theory and Practice of Soviet Nationality Policy. Minnesota.
- William S. Flash; B.A., Harvard, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Ambivalence in Administration: Regional Hospitals with British National Health. Harvard.
- Robert D. Hayton; A.B., Montana State, 1949; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Politics of Argentine-Chilean Economic Union. California (Berkeley).
- George M. Hougham; B.A., Toronto, 1945; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1954. Minor Parties in Canadian National Politics. Pennsylvania.
- Richard Kramer; B.S., Pittsburgh, 1943; A.M., Columbia, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Practical Morality Taught to Soviet Children, as Illustrated in Four Official Soviet Periodicals, 1937-1951. Columbia.
- Frank C. Langdon; A.B., Harvard, 1941; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1953. The Japanese Policy of Expansion in China, 1917-1928. California (Berkeley).
- Leo B. Lott; Ph.B., Gonzaga, 1942; M.A., Wisconsin, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Venezuelan Federalism: A Case Study in Frustration. Wisconsin.
- James H. McCrocklin; B.A., Texas, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. A Study of the Grade D'Haiti. Texas.
- Edward J. O'Connor; Ph.D., Notre Dame, 1954. India and Democracy: An Analysis of the 1951-1952 Elections and Their Political Impact. Notre Dame.
- Joseph G. La Palombara; B.A., Illinois, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1950; M.A., Princeton, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Democratic Trade Unionism in Postwar Italy. Princeton.
- Emanuel Rackman; A.B., Columbia, 1931; LL.B., ibid., 1933; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Making of Israel's Constitution. Columbia.
- Russell F. Rhyne; B.S., California Institute of Technology, 1942; M.S., ibid., 1943; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1954. Social and Political Changes Associated with the Dutch Program of Technological Development Carried out in Java, 1918-1942. California (Berkeley).
- James S. Roberts; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1954. The Participation of Civil Servants in Partisan Political Activities in Sweden. North Carolina.
- Alvin Z. Rubinstein; B.B.A., City College of New York, 1949; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. An Analysis of Soviet Economic Policy in the Economic and Social Council and the Economic Commission for Europe, 1946. Pennsylvania.
- Robert A. Rupen; B.A., Williams, 1948; M.A., Fletcher School, 1949; Ph.D., Washington (Seattle), 1954. Outer Mongolian Nationalism, 1900-1919. Washington (Seattle).
- Chattar Singh Samra; A.B., Punjab, 1945; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. India in Communist Perspective. California (Berkeley).
- Howard Sorrow; A.B., Duke, 1949; M.A., Wayne, 1950; Ph.D., Duke, 1954. The Higher Public Service of the Commonwealth of Australia. Duke.
- Herbert P. Secher; B.A., Wisconsin, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Problem of the Austrian State: The Post-World War II Experience. Wisconsin.
- Richard F. Staar; B.A., Dickinson, 1948; M.A., Yale, 1949; Ph.D., Michigan, 1954. The Political Framework of Communist Poland. Michigan.
- Joseph L. Sutton; B.A., Michigan, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. A Political Biography of Inukai Tsuyoshi. Michigan.
- George O. Totten; B.A., Columbia, 1946; M.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Japanese Social Democracy. Yale.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION, POLITICS AND LAW

- Yumaz Musmer Altug; L.L.B., University of Istanbul, 1948; Ph.D., Kentucky, 1954. Turkey and Some Problems of International Law. Kentucky.
- John A. Armstrong; Ph.B., Chicago, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Columbia, 1953. Ukrainian Nationalism. Columbia.
- John P. Armstrong; M.A., Chicago, 1948;

- Ph.D., ibid., 1953. A Study of Senator Taft's Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- George C. Betts; A.B., Louisiana State, 1939; M.A., Kent State University, 1940; Ph.D., Syracuse, 1954. The International Criminal Court. Syracuse.
- Thompson Black, Jr.; B.S., U.S. Naval Academy, 1933; M.A., California (Los Angeles), 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Prize Law in World War II. California (Los Angeles).
- Jerry B. Briscoe; B.S., Northwestern, 1948; M.A., Chicago, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Economic Interests in British Relations with China, 1921-1928. Chicago.
- Henry C. Bush; B.A., Chicago, 1946; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. British Opinion Concerning U.S. Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Joseph I. Coffey; B.S., U.S. Military Academy, 1939; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. The Pattern of Soviet Imperialism: A Case History (Poland: 1919-1921.) Georgetown.
- Richard W. Cottam; B.A., Utah, 1948; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. Iran: A Case Study of Nationalism. Harvard.
- Claude B. Cross; B.A., Oklahoma Agricultural & Mechanical College, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Iowa, 1953. The United States and the North Atlantic Treaty. Iowa.
- James F. Davidson; B.A., Yale, 1945; M.A., George Washington, 1951; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. Edmund Burke's Philosophy of International Relations. Chicago.
- John E. Dwan, II; B.A., Pomona College, 1941; M.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Revolution in the Strategy of National Security. Yale.
- Thomas Farr; B.A., Drury College, 1940; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. Some Considerations on Western European Federation. Chicago.
- Vernon L. Ferwerda; B.A., Massachusetts, 1940; M.S., ibid., 1941; Ph.D., Harvard, 1954. The United Nations Role in the Maintenance of Peace. Harvard.
- Michael J. Flach; A.B., Iowa, 1948; A.M., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1954. The Slav Congresses and Pan-Slavism, 1848-1914. Fletcher School.
- John O. Gallagher; A.B., Tufts, 1943; A.M., Fletcher School, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. United States Monetary and Financial Diplomacy and the Failure of the World Monetary and Economic Conference of 1933. Fletcher School.
- Victor H. Gibean; B.A., North Carolina, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Cuban-American Relations during the First World War. North Carolina.
- Clifford Harding; A.M., Iowa, 1945; Ph.D., New York University, 1954. The World Position of Iran as Affected by the Work of Reza Shah. New York University.
- Edward S. Hermberg; B.A., Yale, 1944; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Hans Kelsen's Theory of the Development of International Law. Yale.
- Dagmar Horna; Licentiat Oekonomiae; University of St. Gallen, Switzerland, 1948; M.A., Kansas, 1949; Ph.D., California (Los Angeles), 1954. The Military and Diplomatic Struggle for the Boundaries of Czechoslovakia. California (Los Angeles).
- John M. Howell; A.B., Alabama, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Duke, 1954. The Development of the Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction. Duke.
- William Y. Huang; B.A., St. John's (China), 1940; M.A., Michigan, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. China's Role with Respect to Major Political and Security Questions under Consideration by the United Nations. Michigan.
- Emmanuel A. Keukdjian; Lic. en Droit, University of St. Joseph, Lebanon; Dipl., ibid., 1947; M.A., Harvard, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Commercializing Influence of the Development of Exports on Indigenous Agricultural Economics in Tropical Africa. Harvard.
- Henry A. Kissinger; B.A., Harvard, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Peace, Legitimacy and the Equilibrium (A Study of the Statesmanship of Castlereagh and Metternich). Harvard.
- Kwang Lim Koh; LL.B., Seoul University, 1945; M.A., Rutgers, 1950; LL.M., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., Rutgers, 1953. International Regulation of Fisheries, with Special Reference to Those in the North Pacific Ocean. Rutgers.
- Walter S. Gerst Kohn; M.A., Graduate Faculty, The New School, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The North Atlantic Treaty. The New School.
- Luke T. Lee; Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1954. The Development of the Consular Institution, 1931-1951. Fletcher School.
- Ray W. McDuffee; B.S., Oregon State, 1927; M.A., Georgetown, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The State Department and the Russian Revolutions, March-November, 1917. Georgetown.
- David S. McLellan; B.A., Yale, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The French Image of America. Yale.
- Arno J. Mayer; B.B.A., City College of New York, 1949; M.A., Yale, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Politics of Allied War Aims. Yale.

- Gregory Meiksin; Ph.D., Graduate Faculty, The New School, 1954. The Doctrine of Coexistence in Soviet Diplomacy. The New School.
- Thomas P. Melady; A.B., Duquesne, 1950; M.A., Catholic University, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Role of Taxation in Development of Underdeveloped Countries. Catholic University.
- Hossein Nazem; A.M., Columbia, 1946; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Russia and Great Britain in Iran, 1900-1914. Columbia.
- Benjamin Nimer; B.A., Chicago, 1942; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Walter Lippman: United States Foreign Policy and Its Theoretical Bases, 1913-1931. Chicago.
- Włodzimierz Onacewicz; Dipl. Eng., St. Petersburg University, 1915; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1954. The Diplomatic and Military Preparation of the Aggression against Poland in 1939. Georgetown.
- Mark F. Orr; B.A., North Carolina, 1937; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Administration of Japanese Education under the Occupation. North Carolina.
- Claude S. Phillips, Jr.; A.B., Tennessee, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Duke, 1954. Questions of International Law in the Consideration of Selected Issues by the United States Congress, 1937-1951. Duke.
- Jack C. Plano; B.A., Ripon, 1949; M.A., Wisconsin, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The United Nations and the India-Pakistan Dispute. Wisconsin.
- Mojmir Povolny; Doctor of Law, Masaryk University, Brno, Czechoslovakia, 1947; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. The Role and Function of the UN in Soviet Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Mildred A. Rendt; B.S., New York University, 1948; M.B.A., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., Radcliffe, 1954. Variations in Female Labor Force Participation: Geographic, Industrial, Occupational and Demographic Distribution. Harvard.
- Seymour Rotter; A.B., Cornell, 1947; A.M., Columbia, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Soviet and Comintern Policy toward Germany 1919-1923: A Case Study of Strategy and Tactics. Columbia.
- Warner R. Schilling; B.A., Yale, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Admirals and Foreign Policy, 1913-1919. Yale.
- William E. Scott; B.A., Yale, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Origins of the Franco-Soviet Pact of 1935. Yale.
- Hari Prasad Sharma; Ph.D., Fletcher School, 1954. India's Quest for Security and Peace. Fletcher School.
- Donald Shea; B.A., Minnesota, 1947; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. The Calvo Clause. Minnesota.
- Joginder Singh; B.A., University of the Punjab, 1943; M.A., ibid., 1946; Ph.D., Michigan, 1954. Domestic Jurisdiction and the Law of the United Nations. Michigan.
- Donald Sparks; B.A., Maine, 1940; Ph.D., Chicago, 1954. The Influence of Official Protestant Church Groups on the Formulation and Conduct of American Foreign Policy, 1940-1950. Chicago.
- John G. Stoessinger; B.A., Grinnell, 1950; M.A., Harvard, 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. The Refugee and International Organization. Harvard.
- Marvin R. Summers; B.S., Southwest Missouri State College, 1949; M.A., Iowa, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Chinese Communist Attitudes toward the Soviet Union and Sino-Soviet Relations. Iowa.
- Kudlapur B. Y. Thotappa; B.A., Maharajas College, India, 1946; M.A., ibid., 1947; Ph.D., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., Chicago, 1953. The United Nations and the Specialized Agencies—An Examination of the Problems of International Co-ordination. Chicago.
- John P. Vloyantes; B.A., Western State College of Colorado, 1943; M.S., Utah, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1954. Edward R. Stettinius as Secretary of State. Utah.
- Austin F. Waller; B.A., Carleton, 1940; M.A., Fletcher School, 1942; Ph.D., Michigan, 1954. Australia's Relations with the United States, 1941-1949. Michigan.
- Clarence N. Weems, Jr.; A.B., Vanderbilt, 1930; A.M., ibid., 1933; Ph.D., Columbia, 1954. The Korean Reform and Independence Movement. Columbia.
- Paul S. Welty; S.T.B., Maryknoll Seminary, 1939; M.A., Chicago, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1953. Theodore Roosevelt's Concepts of the National Interests of the United States. Chicago.
- William D. S. Witte; A.B., Southern Methodist, 1947; A.M., ibid., 1948; Ph.D., Columbia, 1954. Quaker Pacifism in the United States, 1919-1942, with Special Reference to Its Relation to Isolationism and Internationalism. Columbia.
- Pamela N. Wrinch; B.A., Michigan, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1949; Ph.D., Yale, 1954. Sir Winston Churchill on Britain's Role towards Europe: "Detachment" and "Combination." Yale.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE.....	826
A Selective Survey of the Literature in the Social Sciences and Related Fields on Modern North Africa. BENJAMIN RIVLIN.....	826
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	849
Pritchett , Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. JACK W. PELTASON...	849
Lipsky (ed.), Law and Politics in the World Community: Essays on Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory and Related Problems in International Law. OLIVER J. LISSITZYN.....	851
Staley , The Future of Underdeveloped Countries: Political Implications of Development. RUPERT EMERSON.....	853
Mead (ed.), Cultural Patterns and Technical Change. WALTER H. C. LAVES.....	854
Dauer , The Adams Federalists. FRANK GRACE.....	856
Neill , The Rise and Decline of Liberalism. CURRIN V. SHIELDS.....	857
Wild , Plato's Modern Enemies and the Theory of Natural Law; Levin- son , In Defense of Plato. ERIC VOEGELIN.....	859
Chapman , Introduction to French Local Government. HENRY W. EHRMANN.....	862
Corwin (ed.), The Constitution of the United States of America: Analy- sis and Interpretation; Annotations of Cases Decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to June 30, 1952. J. A. C. GRANT.....	864
Zeller (ed.), American State Legislatures: Report of the Committee on American Legislatures, American Political Science Association. CHARLES S. HYNEMAN.....	865
Levi , Modern China's Foreign Policy. ALFRED FERNBACH.....	868
Richards , War Labor Boards in the Field. BYRON R. ABERNETHY.....	870
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	872
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	872
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	882
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	895
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....	905

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE

A SELECTIVE SURVEY OF THE LITERATURE IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES AND RELATED FIELDS ON MODERN NORTH AFRICA*

I. A NOTE ON NORTH AFRICAN STUDIES

One of the significant developments in American higher education and scholarship since World War II is the great interest shown in the relatively new discipline of area studies. This new interest is reflected in language study, where the science of linguistics applied during the war in the various armed service education programs opened the way to a study of even the most esoteric tongues. The new interest has perhaps penetrated even more deeply in the social sciences, including political science and international relations.

Institutes and programs devoted to the study of particular areas have emerged throughout the country, but in the carving up of the world into areas of study by American scholars, North Africa seems to have been left out. The area falls somewhere between the Middle or Near East and Africa. Geographically, it belongs to Africa; but it is separated from the major portion of the continent by the Sahara. The tendency among Africanists (most of whom have been anthropologists) has been to disregard Africa north of the Sahara, not only because of the great desert divide but also because the indigenous North African population is not of the same racial strain as most of the peoples south of the Sahara; nor is it as primitive. North Africa has been a seat of civilization for thousands of years—dating back to the pre-Christian era and extending down through a flourishing Christian civilization that was replaced more than a thousand years ago by the Moslem culture that still prevails in the area. It is the Moslem culture that ties North Africa to the Middle and Near East; but Middle or Near Eastern specialists have generally included only Egypt in their study. The great Libyan desert, the projection of the Sahara northward to the Mediterranean, has served effectively as a barrier between Egypt and the Near East on the one hand, and the rest of North Africa on the other. North Africa has thus, with certain few exceptions, been ignored by Africanists and the Middle and Near Eastern specialists. This is the case not only with Americans but with European scholars as well. The notable exceptions have been provided by the scholars of the countries that have had prolonged direct contact with the area, i.e., France, Italy, and Spain.

There are cogent reasons why North Africa should merit the particular attention of American scholars, other than that which is accorded it as an appendage to the Near East or as a misfit in the field of African studies. First, there is the obvious reason that the new role of the United States as a world power makes it incumbent upon American scholars to study all areas of the world. The area of North Africa currently occupies an important place in United States foreign affairs, as it did in the period of the Barbary pirates and during World War II. It is fairly certain that the current American interest will be a more lasting one than either of the previous contacts with the area. At present, whatever research in the political, social, and economic conditions and institutions in the area is going on in this country seems to be confined to researchers within the government of the United States. This is undoubtedly a great improvement over the situation that existed in 1941 when United States officials, faced with a sudden demand for information, scampered frantically for knowledge of any kind about the region.

* Much of the research for this article was made possible by a travel grant to the author by the Social Science Research Council in 1951. The author wishes to express his appreciation to Miss Susan V. Brady for her aid in the preparation of the article.

A second reason why American social scientists should be interested in research on North Africa is that the area poses a number of highly significant problems in human relations. North Africa is an area in which one of the fundamental problems of our times—the working out of an imperialist-colonialist relationship—is coming to a head. In it are to be found the problems created by the impact of an advanced (in the material and technological senses at least) culture on the existing “backward” native culture, and by the process of adjustment and change that takes place in the latter under this impact. In French North Africa the problem is present with further complicating factors, because it involves not only the introduction of the advanced Western culture but also the settlement among the native population, proud possessors of a long cultural heritage and tradition, of large numbers of people bringing with them their contrasting Western cultural pattern. To a lesser extent this is the case in Libya, where it is a problem in Tripolitania. Thus, the problem involves not merely the adjustment of the native Islamic society to the innovations of the European culture but also the mutual adjustment of the two cultures, existing side by side. It is not surprising that this dual-cultural background should give rise to a bitter struggle for power, in some respects not unlike the struggles taking place in South Africa and East Africa. The implications of the socio-political issues in North Africa—nationalism, democracy, the working out of a pluralistic society, European settlement, the development of backward areas, etc.—extend well beyond the confines of North Africa and merit more serious attention by American social scientists.

II. BIBLIOGRAPHIES

There are very few bibliographical collections on North Africa. As a result of the sudden interest of the United States in North Africa during World War II, several bibliographical lists were prepared in the Library of Congress, the most extensive of these being French Colonies in Africa: A List of References, compiled by Helen F. Conover (G.P.O., Washington, 1942). This bibliography devotes much of its space to French North Africa. “List of References on the Spanish Colonies in Africa,” compiled by Florence S. Hellman (July 16, 1942) and “List of References on the Italian Colonies in Africa,” compiled by Grace Hadley Fuller (August 13, 1942, with a supplement issued in 1947), are available on loan in negative photostat from the General Reference and Bibliography Division of the Library of Congress. The European Division of the Library of Congress has recently prepared a bibliography on all of Africa which includes special sections on North Africa. This bibliography, Introduction to Africa: A Selective Guide to Background Reading (The University Press, Washington, 1952), is, as its title implies, elementary and highly selective.

The bibliographies in foreign languages do not offer much more choice. For Morocco, the Institut des Hautes Études Marocaines publishes an extensive bibliography on all phases of Moroccan life in its review Hespéris, under the title "Bibliographie Marocaine." The bibliographies from 1923-1933 were combined by Pierre de Cernival, Christian Franck-Brentano, and Marcel Bousser and published as one volume (Larose, Paris, 1937). For the political scientist, the Hespéris is disappointing because of its very slight reference to political and governmental problems. The government of Spanish Morocco has published several bibliographies, of which the Catálogo de Materias (obras relativas al Islam y África) de La Biblioteca General del Protectorado (Tetuan, Spanish Morocco, Marroqui, 1952) is the most extensive. There are specialized bibliographies: Julien Franc's L'Histoire de la Colonisation de l'Algérie: Les Sources d'Archives (Algiers, 1928); and Bibliographie Militaire des Ouvrages Français et des Articles des Principales Revues Françaises Relatifs à l'Algérie, à la Tunisie et au Maroc de 1830 à 1926 (État-Major de l'Armée, Service Historique, Paris, 1930-1935).

The Middle East Journal has published two important bibliographical articles on part of the area included in this article: Manfred Halpern, "Recent Books on Moslem-French Relations in Algeria," Vol. 3, pp. 211-15 (Apr., 1949); and "Literature on Arab Libya" by James W. Crudington, Vol. 6, pp. 247-51 (Spring, 1952).

It seems appropriate at this point to make mention of some of the leading foreign research institutes concerned with North African affairs. In France and in French North Africa, there are: Institut des Hautes Études Marocaines (Paris and Rabat); Centre des Hautes Études d'Administration Musulmane (Paris); Institut des Sciences Administratives, Sociales et Coloniales (Algiers); Institut des Hautes Études Tunisiennes (Tunis). In Italy, there are: Centro di Studi Coloniali (Florence), Centro di Studi e Scambi Internazionali (Palermo), and Istituto Agricolo Coloniale (Florence).

III. LIMITATIONS OF THE BIBLIOGRAPHY

Before proceeding with the bibliography proper, the reader should be aware of the limitations that govern it. One limitation has already been alluded to, namely the extent of the geographic area covered. The political units involved are Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia (these three countries are often commonly referred to as French North Africa), and Libya. Egypt is excluded, although it is geographically in North Africa, because it has traditionally been considered an integral part of the Near or Middle East. A second limitation is implied in the title of the article. This article deals with modern North Africa; it is not concerned with the period of classic antiquity, for which there exists a considerable body of literature. Naturally, some reference will be made to works of an historical nature, but the main emphasis will be on the literature that contributes to an understanding of the contemporary scene.

The purpose of the article is to acquaint American scholars with the literature on the area and, ancillary to that, to call their attention to the interest it has for the social science researcher and scholar. It does not deal exclusively with works falling traditionally within the scope of political science. Neither is it an exhaustive examination of the literature, particularly with regard to the contributions in foreign languages, which have been treated in a highly selective manner. No attempt is made to include any of the literature in Arabic.

An examination of the literature in the field will reveal that it is, at best, uneven. This is true for both the English and non-English works. The literature in English is quantitatively and, with some few exceptions, qualitatively weak. The non-English literature is quantitatively rich but quite uneven in quality. There are the works of men like Julien, Montagne, and Despois that are in the best tradition of sound scholarship, but there are also many volumes of marginal quality.

Following a description of works dealing with more than one of the political units, the literature will be surveyed country by country. Since the aim is to introduce the area to Americans, some of the more significant journal articles in English will be included. No attempt will be made to deal with the vast array of periodical literature appearing in French, Spanish, and Italian. Neither will this bibliography attempt to delve into the general field of Islamic civilization and culture, except to call attention to certain references of particular interest to the area. Each of the sections will begin with works dealing with the historical, cultural, social, and economic background of the area. Due to the inadequacy of scholarly literature in English, some of the more outstanding writings of journalists and non-technical writers will be noted. A fairly large body of literature in this popular category has been built up. Often the insight to be gathered from these works is better than that to be had from ponderous scholarly tomes.

Except where they shed light upon the institutions and problems of the area itself, works concerning the Allied Occupation and problems arising from it that pertain exclusively to World War II are omitted.

IV. GENERAL WORKS

North Africa was once one of the main centers of Islamic culture and civilization. Today, the Maghrib (the West), as North Africa is called in Arabic, no longer occupies the place it used to in the Moslem World. Nevertheless, it is part of it and in thinking of North Africa one must not lose sight of this fact. The dilemma of the dual-cultural pattern in North Africa exists because of the significance of this Islamic heritage to the people of the area. For a general introduction to the Islamic world the reader is referred to Carl Brocklemann, History of Islamic Peoples, translated from the German by Joel Carmichael and Moshe Pearlman (Putnam, New York, 1947); H. A. R. Gibb's Mohammed- anism (Oxford University Press, London, 1949) and his Modern Trends in Islam (University of Chicago Press, Chicago, 1945); George E. Birk's A Short History of the Middle East from the Rise of Islam to Modern Times (Public Affairs Press, Washington, 1949); and Roger Le Tourneau's Islam Contemporain (Les Editions Internationales, Paris, 1950).

Concerning Islamic practice in North Africa, there is Professor G. H. Bousquet's L'Islam Maghrebin: Introduction à l'Étude Générale de l'Islam (La Maison des Libres, Algiers, 3rd ed., 1949). Herbert J. Liebesney's bibliographical article, "Literature on the Law of the Middle East," The Middle East Journal, Vol. 3, pp. 461-69 (Oct., 1949), can also be consulted for works on Islamic law pertaining to North Africa.

Few works encompass the entire area delimited for this bibliography, i.e., French North Africa and Libya. Indeed it is a formidable task to deal with the entire area, for despite the many similarities in culture, language, religion, and social and political problems that one finds throughout the area, the many divergencies in history, ethnology, geography, etc., detract from its homogeneity. Yet there have been some daring souls who braved the difficulties and who have achieved a modicum of success. Their works serve as a good general introduction to the area.

Carleton S. Coon's Caravan: The Story of the Middle East (Henry Holt, New York, 1951) is the most ambitious and the most satisfying of works of this kind. Bringing to bear the vast knowledge, understanding, and insight accumulated from some twenty-five years of working in North Africa and the Middle East, Coon has produced a remarkable book about the area and its people. Caravan covers the Near or Middle East as well as North Africa west of Egypt. This does not detract from the significance of the book for anyone interested in North Africa, particularly since it reflects the author's great familiarity with parts of the area. The importance of the work lies in its successful portrayal of the social milieu and the pattern of life of the North African native population. Coon has also written a shorter and somewhat less satisfying introduction to the area in a 54-page chapter entitled "North Africa" in Most of the World: The Peoples of Africa, Latin America and the East Today (Columbia University Press, New York, 1949), edited by the late Ralph Linton. A more specialized work treating North Africa and Western Asia is Robert Montagne's La Civilisation du Desert Nomades d'Orient et d'Afrique (Hachette, Paris, 1947). This is a sociological study of the Bedouins, of particular interest to North Africa because it traces the interaction of Arabs and Berbers.

Another highly ambitious and unique work is Galbraith Welch's North African Prelude: The First Seven Thousand Years (Wm. Morrow & Co., New York, 1949). Although covering much of the same area as Coon's Caravan, this book is in no way comparable. Whereas Coon's volume is analytical and organized institutionally, this is essentially descriptive and chronological—the work of a romantic writer who, having had extensive experience in the area, was prompted to write this book by the sudden interest in North Africa aroused by the early events of World War II. Within the confines of some 620 pages, the author has set down in a light, readable, but somewhat discursive manner, the history of North Africa from the time of the earliest recorded period to the present. Although designed for the general reader, it is of some value to serious students as well.

Interest in North Africa during World War II prompted other publications. Among these are Alan Houghton Broderick's North Africa (Oxford University Press, London and New York, 1942), a little volume in "The World Today Series." Not a pretentious work, it is useful as a brief informal account of the geography, history, economics, politics, and social conditions of Libya, Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco. The fact that some portions of the book deal with problems of special interest during the war make it somewhat dated. Serving a similar purpose is the Royal Institute of International Affairs' 26-page pamphlet, North Africa, published in May, 1943 as No. 2 in the RIIA's series of Information Notes. Among works dealing with North Africa from Morocco through Libya mention should be made of Robin Maugham's North African Notebook (Chapman and Hall, London, 1948), a vivid personal account by an observant young British writer, somewhat sympathetic to Arab nationalism, of his six months' stay in the area.

Turning to the general works on French North Africa, there is first Charles-André Julien's monumental Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord (Payot, Paris, in one and two volume editions, 1931.) Julien is in the process of revising this work, which is recognized as standard in the field, and thus far two revised volumes have appeared. The first volume, "Des Origines à la Conquête Arabe 647 A.D.," was revised with the aid of Christian Courtois and appeared in 1951. Roger Le Tourneau aided in the revision of the second volume, "De la Conquête Arab à 1830." Julien, who is Professor of History at the Sorbonne, covers the history of North Africa from antiquity to contemporary times and the work contains a most comprehensive bibliography. Jean Despois' L'Afrique du Nord (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1949) is another work of high scholarship. This work, although mainly concerned with economic geography, contains sections on history, human geography, political institutions, and cultural development. Among the more important subjects treated is the effect of European colonization on the native society and population. An extensive bibliography is included. Also bridging the ethnological and historical fields, and concerned with one of the fundamental problems in the area—that of the relations between Arabs and Berbers—is Eugene Guernier's La Berberie, l'Islam et la France (Editions l'Union Française, Paris, 1950, 2 vols.). The author goes back to the earliest history of the region in surveying the background of the indigenous Berber population that predated the Arab invasions. Volume I is concerned with this early history while Volume II deals with the modern period under French rule. Another difficult ethnological problem in French North Africa involves the indigenous Jewish population. André Chouraqui's Les Juifs d'Afrique du Nord (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1952) contributes much to an understanding of the Jewish communities.

Population growth in backward areas is one of the burning social problems of our times and this problem in French North Africa, together with its social and economic consequences, is the subject of Louis Chevalier's Le Problème Démographique Nord Africain (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1947), published as Cahier No. 6 of the Institut National d'Études Démographiques' "Travaux et Documents" series. Many of the problems considered by Chevalier are discussed from a different vantage point in Industrialisation de l'Afrique du Nord (Colin, Paris, 1952), a study undertaken by the Centre d'Études de Politique Étrangère with aid from the Rockefeller Foundation. This is a collection of many brief studies and essays by experts, including Despois, Montagne, Chevalier, and others, many of whom are either in the North African administrations or closely associated with them. The problem of industrialization is analyzed from every angle by the contributors: geographic, technical, financial, commercial, political, administrative, and social. Both this work and Chevalier's are highly useful for the raw material and statistical data they contain. Professor Melvin M. Knight of the University of California, one of the few American scholars who have devoted attention to North Africa, has written a provocative article on North African demography and land utilization. The article, "Economic Space for Europeans in French North Africa," appearing in the February, 1953 issue of Economic Development and Social Change, published by the University of Chicago's Research Center in Economic Development and Cultural Change, is in a sense a critical evaluation of most of the recent French research on the problem.

A good survey of French North Africa's physical environment is to be found in P. Boudy's Économie Forestière Nord-Africaine, Vol. 1: Milieu Physique et Milieu Humain (Larose, Paris, 1948). In 1952, when interest in French North Africa was heightened as the questions of Tunisia and Morocco were being raised at the United Nations, the Office of Technical Publications of the French Prime Minister issued a 50-page pamphlet with charts, graphs, statistics, and photographs entitled Facts and Figures about French North Africa. Naturally, the facts and figures are selective, designed to illustrate "what has been accomplished in Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco under French administration." There are few official publications of documents or statistics for French North Africa as a whole, these being issued separately by the governments of Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco. The French government publishes annually the Revue Algérienne Tunisienne et Marocaine de Legislation et de Jurisprudence, a convenient compilation of legislation, court decisions, and articles on legal questions. It also issues some non-legal documentation on Algeria, Morocco, and Tunisia in the Notes et Études Documentaires series of La Documentation Française. In addition, the Service de Presse et d'Information of the French Embassy in New York issues News from France in which there are separate series for these areas.

Since French North Africa is not a political entity, works dealing with the governmental framework of the area as a whole are scarce. Herbert J. Liebesny's The Government of French North Africa (University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia, 1943) is perhaps the only work of this kind in English or French. Written during the war, it is now to a considerable extent outdated, but remains a useful analysis of the administrative and legal systems of the area up to 1942.

The standard authoritative reference work on the law of French overseas territories is Arthur Girault's Les Principes de Colonisation et de Législation Coloniale, first published in 1895 and revised in 1936 and 1938 by Louis Milliot. Volume 4 is concerned exclusively with Algeria while Volume 5 is devoted to Tunisia and Morocco, including the international zone of Tangier. In addition to their accurate documentation, the Girault-Milliot work presents in Volume 4 a bibliography on North Africa in general and on Algeria in particular, and in Volume 5 a bibliography on Tunisia and Morocco.

An understanding of governmental and political problems in French North Africa requires a knowledge of French colonial policy. Two works in English, while not concerned exclusively with French North Africa, are important in this connection. The first is Stephen Henry Roberts' History of French Colonial Policy, 1870-1925 (King, London, 1927, 2 vols.), a thorough exposition including social and economic as well as political aspects of French policy. The second is Herbert Ingram Priestly's France Overseas: A Study of Modern Imperialism (Appleton-Century, New York, 1938), published under the auspices of the American Historical Association. This is a fine work in which each North African territory is given individual treatment. The most recent treatise on French colonial policy is Professor Georges Hardy's Histoire Sociale de la Colonisation Française (Larose, Paris, 1953). Hardy, one of France's leading scholars of French colonialism, includes in this work a brief section on the aftermath of the war, with particular attention to the rise of nationalism. The problem of the French Union, with emphasis on French North Africa, has been discussed by General Georges Catroux in "The French Union," which appeared as the November, 1953, issue of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace's International Conciliation. In this connection, Dorothy Pickles' French Politics: The First Years of the Fourth Republic (Royal Institute of International Affairs, New York, 1953) contains chapters on "The Concept of the French Union" and "Achievements and Problems of the French Union." Another useful work in this general area is Daniel Boisdon's Les Institutions de l'Union Française (Berger-Levrault, Paris, 1949). An important article in English on the question of the French Union with some reference to North Africa is Julien's "From the French Empire to the French Union," International Affairs (London), Vol. 26, No. 4, (October, 1950). François Luchaire's Manuel de Droit d'Outre-Mer (Sirey, Paris, 1949) is a legalistic tome, most of which is devoted to French North Africa. The transition from colonial empire to French Union, stressing the wartime and postwar evolution of a new colonial policy, is dealt with in Michel Divèze's La France d'Outre-Mer, de l'Empire Colonial à l'Union Française, 1938-1947 (Paris, Hachette, 1948). The situation in French North Africa during the war, and its effect upon the people, constitutes part of the story told by Kenneth Pendar, one of Ambassador Robert Murphy's vice-consuls in North Africa during the early part of the war, in his Adventure in Diplomacy: Our French Dilemma (Dodd, Mead & Co., New York, 1944).

In the purely political realm, in which the central question is the struggle for power between the rising native Moslem nationalism and the interests of the French settlers and French government, works dealing with the entire area are equally sparse. The most recent work in this field is Julien's L'Afrique du Nord en Marche: Nationalisme Musulman et Souveraineté Française (Juilliard, Paris, 1953). This book is critical of French policy and of some nationalist activity, although it is on the whole favorable to the nationalists. It brings together a wealth of material and insight on this difficult problem and, by dealing with the three territories, it adds a needed perspective to the viewing of the nationalist problem. Another recent thoughtful appraisal of the situation in North Africa is René Schaefer's Drame et Chances de L'Afrique Du Nord (Les Editions Internationales, Paris, 1953), which is primarily a discussion of the socio-cultural background of the nationalist-French conflict in North Africa. G. Surden's La France en Afrique du Nord (Editions Alger Republicain, Algiers, 1946) is a work by a leading Algerian jurist on the question of the mutual adjustment of the French and Moslem populations of North Africa. Two articles on this subject by Charles-André Julien, both appearing in Foreign Affairs, merit mention: (1) "France and Islam," Vol. 18, No. 4, pp. 680-99 (July, 1940); (2) "Crisis and Reform in French North Africa," Vol. 29, No. 3, pp. 445-55 (April, 1951). In the same area, but generally not sharing Julien's viewpoint, are Henry Bénazet's L'Afrique Française en Danger (Fayard, Paris, 1947), which deals with other parts of French Africa as well as North Africa, and Bernard Lavergne's Une Révolution dans la Politique Coloniale de la France: le Problème de l'Afrique du Nord (Mercure, Paris, 1948). An informed American viewpoint is presented by Vernon McKay in his article "France's Future in North Africa," The Middle East Journal, Vol. 2, pp. 293-305 (July, 1948).

Relatively little good work has been done on the prewar rise of nationalism in French North Africa. A factually informative treatment is to be found in two volumes of the Royal Institute of International Affairs' Survey of International Affairs, edited by Arnold Toynbee. Volume I of the 1925 Survey is entitled The Islamic World since the Peace Settlement and its Part II deals with North-west Africa, including Libya. Volume I of the 1937 Survey has a long section on "Unrest in the North-West African Territories under French Rule 1927-1937." An early work, hostile to the liberalization of French policy toward the native population of North Africa, is Charles Louis Collom's Vérités Nord-Africaines (Presse Nord-Africaine, Algiers, 1932).

The placing of the Tunisian and Moroccan questions on the agenda of the United Nations raised the issue of the competence of the United Nations to deal with these questions, particularly in view of France's declaration that these were matters essentially within her domestic jurisdiction and hence, in accordance with Article 2, par. 7 of the U.N. Charter, outside the competence of the United Nations. Georges Day's Les Affaires de la Tunisie et du Maroc devant les Nations Unies (Editions A. Pedone, Paris, 1953) generally supports the French contention. For other arguments on this question, both for and against the French position, the debates on the Tunisian and Moroccan questions in the Security Council and the General Assembly in 1952 and 1953 should be consulted.

V. ALGERIA

Algeria is the part of French North Africa which has had the longest and closest association with France. Unlike Tunisia and Morocco, it is not a protectorate but an overseas territory which, as the Department of Algiers; Constantine, and Oran, has been politically integrated as part of France. In other ways, however, Algeria is distinct from Metropolitan France, particularly in juridical matters concerning the native population. Thus, despite political integration, the social and political problems inherent in the duo-cultural pattern exist in Algeria. This makes the Algerian situation basically similar to the one that prevails in Morocco and Tunisia, although there are distinctions generated by unique local and historical conditions. The absence in the case of Algeria of the drama and urgency that has characterized Tunisian, Moroccan, and Libyan matters before the United Nations is reflected in the relatively scant material that has appeared recently devoted exclusively to Algeria. This is to be regretted, because Algeria is in many ways the crux of the entire dual-cultural problem of North Africa. It is the mainstay of the colon spirit in French North Africa and at the same time it is the home of the most uprooted indigenous population and of a growing, restless proletariat.

The history of the French penetration into Algeria has received full treatment by Augustin Bernard in his L'Algérie (Alcan, Paris, 1929) and in the chapters on Algeria by Julien in his Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord. Victor Piquet's L'Algérie Française (Colin, Paris, 1930) is a general review of the first century of French rule with special attention to colonization and administration. A more recent work is Gabriel Esquer's Histoire de l'Algérie (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1950), appearing in the excellent Que Sais-Je? series of little volumes. Esquer's work is brief but succinct and provides a fairly thorough and reliable survey of the French role in Algeria from 1830 to 1950. The only work in English on the subject is Wilfrid Blunt's Desert Hawk: Abd el Kader and the French Conquest of Algeria (Methuen, London, 1947), a popular history of the early period of French penetration into Algeria focused on the activities of the Emir Abd el Kader, the man who rallied stubborn resistance to the French in Algeria. Another recent work is Jean Blottière's L'Algérie in the Terres Lointaines series (Société d'Editions Géographiques, Paris, 1948). This volume goes back to prehistoric times and is largely a survey of the geography and economy of the country, although it contains some social and political material as well.

Algeria's geography and economy are the subject of M. Larnaude's Algérie (Beyer-Levrault, Paris, 1950), which suffers from the failure of the author to integrate his material satisfactorily. An earlier work dealing with the economic resources and possibilities of Algeria and containing a useful bibliography is Paul Desfeuilles' L'Algérie (Roger, Paris, 1931). Algerian ethnology has not received the attention from social scientists that has been accorded in the case of neighboring Morocco. Some important work was done in this area in the latter half of the nineteenth century. More recently there has been Martial Rémond's La Kabylie (Bacounnier, Algiers, 1937) and the work of an American missionary, Glora Wysner's The Kabylie People (New York, privately printed, 1945). A monograph dealing with the Jews in Algeria and their treatment after the fall of France is Michel Ausky's Les Juifs d'Algérie (Editions du Centre, Paris, 1950).

The problem of acculturation has been dealt with by René Maunier in a careful socio-juridical study, Loi Française et Coutume Indigène en Algérie (Domat-Montchrestien, Paris, 1932), and by Paul Hustin in La Doctrine de l'Association des Indigènes et des Français en Algérie (Domat-Montchrestien, Paris, 1933). Less legalistic is Jean Mélice's Le Triste Sort des Indigènes Musulmans d'Algérie (Mercure de France, Paris, 1935), the reflections of a thoughtful man who served in high administrative posts in Algeria and who is troubled by the difficult problem of Franco-Moslem relations in Algeria.

The major political issue in Algeria centers about the role and position of the native population vis à vis the French settlers. With the rise of nationalist movements, many governmental changes have taken place during the past decade, partly in response to nationalist agitation, partly to take the wind out of the nationalists' sails, and partly to strengthen the position of the colon group. A number of interesting and revealing works deal with this central problem and related issues. Paul-Émile Sarrasin's La Crise Algérienne (Cerf, Paris, 1949) is an analysis of the principle nationalist groupings in Algeria. The usefulness of this book is heightened by its sixteen annexes which contain the most significant documents of the past two decades on the question. Sylvain Wisner's L'Algérie dans l'Impasse: Démission de la France? (Spartacus, Paris, 1948) is highly critical of official French policy. L. Gray Cowan's "The New Face of Algeria," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 66, No. 3, pp. 340-65 (Sept., 1951) and Vol. 66, No. 4, pp. 507-31 (Dec., 1951), is one of the most thorough discussions in French or English of the important Statute of Algeria of September 20, 1947, which attempted to reconcile the demands of the native population for more political rights with their reluctance to give up their traditional "personal status" (being subject to traditional Koranic law). The legal arguments over the Statute are discussed in Paul Émile Viard's Les Caractères Politiques et le Régime Législatif de l'Algérie (Sirey, Paris, 1949), while the entire Algerian legal system is treated by Jacques Lambert in the first (and thus far the only published) volume of his Cours de Législation Algérienne, Tunisienne et Marocaine (Librairie Ferraris, Algiers, 1949). A decade before the Statute of Algeria was passed, the question of the extension of political rights of the Moslem population was a burning issue as the Léon Blum Popular Front government sought to introduce reforms in this field. This attempt is discussed in another monograph by Viard, Les Droits Politiques des Indigènes d'Algérie (Sirey, Paris, 1937). The central figure in the Popular Front's attempt to liberalize French policy was Maurice Violette, a former French Governor-General of Algeria, who drafted the plan of reforms that bore his name, Project Violette. He had previously written a provocative analysis of the question in L'Algérie Vivra-t-Elle? (Alcan, Paris, 1931). In May, 1945 Algeria experienced a serious native uprising in the Constantine-Setif region. Manfred Halpern analyzed the event and the rumblings of Algerian native restiveness in a significant article, "The Algerian Uprising of 1945," in The Middle East Journal, Vol. 2, pp. 191-202 (April, 1948).

The nationalist movement itself has contributed a fairly substantial body of literature, usually in the form of tracts and pamphlets. This literature is not unimportant, since it is a reflection of the thinking of perhaps the most articulate if not the most influential section of the native population. There are two leading nationalist parties in Algeria—the Union Démocratique du Manifeste Algérien (U.D.M.A.) and the Mouvement pour le Triomphe des Libertés en Algérie (M.T.L.D.) U.D.M.A. generally publishes in the Editions Libération while the M.T.L.D. uses the title Editions Algérienne En-Nahda.

Of special importance in this category are the writings of the party leaders, Ferhat Abbas of the U.D.M.A. and Messali Hadj of the M.T.L.D. Typical of the many party tracts are Messali Hadj's Appel aux Nations Unies, published in Paris in 1948 at the time the U.N. General Assembly was meeting there, and U.D.M.A.'s Du Manifeste à la République Algérienne, (July, 1948).

The Algerian government itself publishes some useful documentary material. Since October, 1945, the Service d'Information du Cabinet du Gouverneur Général de l'Algérie has published a series of fascicules entitled Documents Algériens, each of which is a brief but complete study of a subject. Five series of Documents Algériens appear: Politique; Economique; Sociale; Militaire; and Culturelle. At the end of each year, the fascicules are bound together and issued as an annual, Synthèse de l'Activité Algérienne. The Gouvernement Général de l'Algérie also publishes an annual, Exposé de la Situation Générale de l'Algérie, which contains a storehouse of statistical material and summary reports of the activities of all branches of the Algerian government. A singularly interesting companion to this annual is the special Exposé de la Situation Générale des Territoires du Sud de l'Algérie de 1930 à 1946, published by the Direction des Territoires du Sud of the Governor General's office (Imprimerie Officielle, Algiers, 1947). This is one of the very few references available on the southern territories of Algeria. It contains a fine bibliography and an historical survey of the origin and penetration of the territories, as well as the usual statistical, social, economic, geographic, and administrative data. Since 1947 reports on this area have been included in the Exposé de la Situation Générale de l'Algérie. Statistical data for Algeria is to be found in the Annuaire Statistique de l'Algérie, published by the Service de Statistique Générale.

VI. MOROCCO

The literature on Morocco is more copious than that on any of the other North African territories. Morocco's unique political status, that of a protectorate divided into three zones—French, Spanish, and International (Tangier)—and the distinct role it has played in international politics have no doubt contributed to the volume of writings on the country. Furthermore, the fact that the country, its people, and their problems constitute a veritable laboratory in human relations has no doubt accounted for the serious attention devoted to Morocco by a substantial number of reputable social scientists.

Morocco boasts a long history as an independent state prior to the establishment of the French protectorate in 1912. In fact, Morocco was the only North African country not to come under Ottoman domination, and one can understand the fascination that this country holds for historians. In the realm of general history, the most authoritative contributions are Augustin Bernard's Le Maroc (Alcan, Paris, 1931), a work that has gone through more than a half-dozen editions, and the chapters on Morocco in Julien's Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord, cited above. A fine survey of Moroccan history and life that also includes an anthology of extracts from many writers is Georges Hardy's Le Maroc (Renouvard, Paris, 1930). More recently, two works entitled Histoire du Maroc have appeared. One, by Henri Terrasse (Plon, Paris, 1952), is little more than an outline sketch of Moroccan history. Its third part, "The Great Problems of Moroccan History," is perhaps the most rewarding feature of the work, for in it Terrasse focuses attention on some of the fundamental problems that confront Morocco today. Terrasse's history has been translated into English by Hilary Tee as History of Morocco (Éditions Atlantides, Casablanca, 1952). Henri Cambon's Histoire du Maroc (Hachette, Paris, 1952), after sketching Moroccan history to the nineteenth century, devotes itself in greater detail to the study of Morocco during the past two centuries.

More specialized aspects of Moroccan history have also attracted the attention of scholars. The interrelationship of religion and political and social life is characteristic of any Islamic country and in this area Georges Drague's Esquisse d'Histoire Religieuse du Maroc: Confréries et Zaouias (Peyronnet, Paris 1951) fills the need for a comprehensive treatise on Moroccan religious history. Drague's work is especially valuable for its analysis of the religious brotherhoods and for the substantial amount of original material included in it. Another highly specialized study, on an entirely different aspect of Moroccan history, is Earl Fee Cruickshank's Morocco at the Parting of the Ways: The Story of Native Protection to 1885 (University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia, 1935), which deals with the extension of foreign diplomatic and consular protection to Moroccan natives during the nineteenth century. Among the most illuminating specialized works is Roger Le Tourneau's Fès avant le Protectorat (Société Marocaine de Librairie et d'Édition, Casablanca, 1949). This is an analytical description of the economic and socio-political institutions of Fez, one of the oldest cities in North Africa and the intellectual capital of Morocco for centuries. Le Tourneau, one of France's leading specialists on Moslem affairs, in presenting this meticulous study of life in the thriving city before the impact of European imperialism, has made a profound contribution to the study of Moroccan affairs in particular and of Islamic affairs in general. For the political scientist, Part IV, which treats thoroughly the system of city government, is of particular interest.

The historical background of the French conquest of Morocco has been dealt with by Jean Caloni in La France au Maroc (Editions Littéraires et Techniques, Paris, 1937), while an exposition of the last stages of the French "pacification" of Morocco may be found in René Pinon's Au Maroc: Fin des Temps Héroïques (Berger-Levrault, Paris, 1935). The campaign of "pacification" in Morocco and Abd-el-Krim's Rif rebellion in the twenties which prolonged that campaign inspired many popular books, of which the most noteworthy in English are Walter B. Harris' France, Spain and the Rif (Longmans, Green and Co., New York, 1927) and Vincent Sheehan's An American among the Riffi (The Century, New York, 1926). A work describing Spain's role in Morocco from 1904 to 1927 is Historia de la Acción de España en Marruecos (Ibéria, Madrid, 1929).

The outstanding figure in the establishment of the French protectorate was Marshal Louis Lyautey, and his life and work in Morocco have been the subject of a number of biographies. Mention is made here of only the more significant works, such as Georges Hardy's discerning Portrait de Lyautey (Bloud et Gay, Paris, 1949), Louis Barthou's Lyautey de le Maroc (Le Petit Parisien, Paris, 1931), André Maurois' Lyautey, which was translated into English (Appleton, New York, 1931), and the most recent of all, Lyautey le Marocain (Hachette, Paris, 1952), by General Georges Catroux. Catroux, who served with Lyautey in Morocco and who since has become one of France's leading authorities on Moroccan and Moslem affairs, has written what is perhaps the most penetrating volume on Lyautey.

There are several works that incorporate within one volume a brief review of Moroccan history together with a survey of the country's geography, economy, social conditions, and governmental organization. One of the most reliable of these works, appearing in the Terres Lointaines series, is Le Maroc, by Roger Coindreau and Charles Prenz (Société d'Editions Géographiques, Paris, 1949). This book is noteworthy also as one of the few works dealing with all of Morocco—French, Spanish, and Tangier. Other general works are: Initiation au Maroc (Editions d'Art et d'Histoire, Paris, 1937, rev. ed. 1945), which contains a set of essays on modern Morocco by members of the Institut des Hautes Études Marocaine; Maroc, by J. Célérrier (Berger-Levrault, Paris, 1948); Le Maroc, by J.-L. Miège (Presses Universitaires de France [Que Sais-Je? series], Paris, 1950), which has also appeared in an English translation by O. C. Warden (Nicholas Kaye, London, 1953); and Rom Landau's Morocco, which constitutes the September, 1952 (No. 483) issue of International Conciliation. A handy little reference and a source of much factual material is Géographie de Maroc, by Fernand Joly and others (Delagrave, Paris, 1949). In Spanish, there is V. Tomás Perez' Marruecos (Bosch, Barcelona, 1935), a work on the human and economic geography of both French and Spanish Morocco, and Nuestro Protectorado (Fuentenebio, Madrid, 1930), by José G. Sanchez, a work devoted only to the Spanish zone.

One of the all too few scholarly works by an American on modern Morocco is Melvin M. Knight's Morocco as a French Economic Venture (Appleton-Century, New York, 1937). In this book, the effects of twenty-five years of French protection and the workings of the open door system are carefully examined. French contributions in the same area of economic development and covering approximately the same period of time are René Hoffherr's L'Economie Marocaine (Sirey, Paris, 1932) and André Collier's Notre Protectorat Marocain (Rivière, Paris, 1930). Hoffherr is also the principal author of an important monograph on the native economy, Revenus et Niveaux de Vie Indigènes au Maroc (Sirey, Paris, 1934). Two works on economic and social developments in Spanish Morocco are Economía Social de Marruecos, by Tomás García and Rafael de Roda Jiménez (Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Madrid, 1952) and España en Marruecos: La Obra Social, by Vial de Morla (Instituto de Estudios Africanos, Madrid, 1947).

The impact of European imperialism upon native Moroccan society had among its effects the introduction of new social and economic problems, such as the dislocation of the rural economy and its population as land was made available for French settlers, and the growth of a new urban proletariat when many of these dislocated country folk drifted to the newly developed urban centers. Several important studies on these problems have appeared recently, but much more work still needs to be done. A most important contribution is Naissance du Prolétariat Marocain (Peyronnet, Paris, 1951), a collective research inquiry conducted between 1948 and 1950 under the direction of Robert Montagne and issued as one of the Cahiers de l'Afrique et l'Asie. The chief drawback of this work lies in the close association that many of the contributors have with the administration, a fact which may explain the reluctance of the authors to criticize the French administration and its policies. The book is highly significant, however, as a unique work describing one of the most formidable, basic problems in Morocco. Another of the Cahiers de l'Afrique et l'Asie is L'Évolution Sociale du Maroc (Peyronnet, Paris, 1951), which is a collection of three monographs: Une Famille Marocaine, by Jean D'Etienne; L'Évolution de la Vie Citadine au Maroc, by Louis Villème; and Le Prolétariat Marocain de Port Lyautey, by Stéphane Delisle. Change in rural Morocco and the administrative policy and techniques involved in introducing this change are discussed by Yves Barennes in La Modernisation Rurale au Maroc (Librairie Général de Droit, Paris, 1948). The rural population is discussed from a different vantage point by Father Ange Koller, a Franciscan missionary who lived among the Berbers for more than a decade, in his Essai sur l'Esprit du Berbère Marocain (Imprimerie Saint Paul, Fribourg, Switzerland, 1946), a work which is rewarding for the contribution it makes to an understanding of the Berber psychology. Also the result of many years of experience as a missionary is James Haldane's Trekking among Moroccan Tribes (Pickering, London, 1948).

In the field of government and politics, the closest approximation to an analysis of the governmental structure and institutions of French Morocco is André de Laubadère's Les Réformes des Pouvoirs Publiques au Maroc: Le Gouvernement; L'Administration; La Justice (Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1949). Important changes have recently taken place in the structure of the Moroccan government, following years of tension culminating in the crisis that brought about the removal and banishment of the nationalist-minded Sultan, Mohammed Ben Youssef. Although Professor Laubadère's treatise predates the new reforms, it is still germane. The government has not been altered extensively and Laubadère's study provides the essential background for understanding the changes that have taken place. Another extremely valuable treatise on Moroccan governmental institutions is Frédéric Brémard's L'Organisation Régionale du Maroc (Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1949). Concerned largely with the problems of local and regional government, this work presents a systematic analysis of these institutions and then proceeds to consider the problem of centralization and decentralization. Although the author is an advocate of decentralization, he presents a careful and balanced discussion of the ecological, historical, and ethnographic factors involved. Brémard has also written an important treatise on one of the touchiest issues in Morocco in Les Droits Publiques et Politiques des Français au Maroc (Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, Paris, 1950). Although this work is of a largely juristic nature, it deals with a crucial aspect of the dual-cultural pattern, namely, the grant of special privileges and power to the more advanced and new element of the population. A significant collateral work in the field of juridical rights of a minority group in Morocco is André Chouraqui's La Condition Juridique d'Israélite Marocain (Alliance Israélite Universelle, Paris, 1950). Also in the field of rights is an earlier, but nevertheless useful treatise, Pierre Stéfani's Les Libertés Publiques au Maroc (Sirey, Paris, 1938).

A problem somewhat peripheral to the basic political and social issues in Morocco, but of special interest to the political scientist because of the unique international administration, is that of the International Zone of Tangier. The standard work in English on the problems of the international administration is Professor Graham H. Stuart's somewhat dated The International City of Tangier (Stanford University Press, Stanford, 1931). A more recent study is Rom Landau's Portrait of Tangier (Robert Hale, London, 1952). The work of a writer with a sharp reportorial eye, this volume makes a distinct contribution to the understanding of the international regime, although it does not dwell exclusively on matters of administration. The view that Spain should be given exclusive control over Tangier is presented by a Spanish author using the pseudonym "The Man of the Street" in España y Tanger (Hidalgo, Madrid, 1948).

Closely related to the problems of governmental reform and political rights is the question of nationalism. Julien's work, L'Afrique du Nord en Marche, friendly in its attitude toward the nationalists, has already been cited. Less favorable towards the nationalists is F. Taillard's Le Nationalisme Marocain (Cerf, Paris, 1947), which details the rise of the nationalist movement, particularly during and after World War II, and seeks a solution to this knotty problem that would not involve France's removal from Morocco. Professor Robert Montagne has recently added a quite worthwhile book to the literature on nationalism in his Révolution au Maroc (France Empire, Paris, 1953), which also concerns itself with the possible alternative courses Morocco may follow. Much of the work is concerned with the sociological background of the rise of nationalism in Morocco. Prewar developments in Moroccan nationalism in the French and Spanish zones is discussed by Francis H. Mellor in Morocco Awakes (Methuen, London, 1939), while postwar developments, particularly the role of the now deposed Sultan Mohammed Ben Youssef, is treated by Rom Landau in The Sultan of Morocco (Robert Hale, London, 1951). Both books are in the popular vein. A friendly view of Moroccan nationalism and a sharply critical attitude of the French administration in Morocco are voiced by Pierre Parent, a long-time French settler in Morocco, in several little books, two of which, Causerie sur le Maroc de 1951 (Imprimerie Régionale, Toulouse, 1951), and La Vérité sur le Maroc 1952 (Imprimerie Régionale, Toulouse, 1953), have been translated into English and published under the titles Dissertation on Morocco of 1951 and The Truth About Morocco by the Moroccan Office of Information and Documentation, the New York office of the Moroccan Independence (Istiqlal) party.

The crisis of the past few years has focussed attention on Morocco and has brought forth a number of popular books in English that are mixtures of travel experiences, description, observations on native and French life, evaluations of nationalism and French policy, and a smattering of political analysis. In this category are Rom Landau's Invitation to Morocco (Faber, London, 1950) and Moroccan Journal (Hale, London, 1952), Ethel Mannin's Moroccan Mosaic (Jarrolds, London, 1953), and Bernard Newman's Morocco Today (Hale, London, 1953). It is difficult for these writers, or for that matter anyone coming to Morocco, not to take sides, and one may characterize the Landau and Mannin books as pro-nationalist and the Newman book as pro-administration.

Concomitant with the raising of the Moroccan question in the United Nations, there appeared in English several pamphlets on each side of the fence. Reference is made here only to the more substantial of these publications. On the nationalist side, the Moroccan Office in New York published Morocco under the Protectorate: Forty Years of French Administration (New York, 1953), a critical analysis of the French regime designed to demonstrate its discriminatory character. On the other side, the French administration published Morocco Today (Editions Africaines Perceval, Rabat, 1952) and the Comité France Actuelle published Morocco: Patterns in Progress (Washington, 1952). These two publications point up the great progress achieved by Morocco under French tutelage.

The laws, decrees, orders, etc. of French Morocco are published in the Bulletin Officiel du Maroc, and the Boletín Oficial de la Zona de Protectorado Español en Marruecos is published in the Spanish Zone. The Bulletin Economique et Sociale du Maroc, an official publication issued quarterly by the Société d'Études Economiques, Sociales et Statistiques in Rabat, contains many articles of lasting value. The Moroccan Service Central des Statistiques annually publishes an Annuaire Statistique du Maroc and La Conjoncture Economique Marocaine. Several news bulletins are published on Moroccan affairs. In Rabat, the Bulletin d'Information du Maroc is published by the French Residency, while the Moroccan Newsletter is published in English under semi-official auspices. In New York, the nationalist Moroccan Office of Information and Documentation publishes a monthly, Free Morocco.

VII. TUNISIA

Compared to the bibliography lists for Morocco and Algeria, the literature on Tunisia is relatively slim. This may reflect a lack of sufficient interest on the part of scholars and general writers alike in a small country that is overshadowed by bigger neighbors in whom similar problems stand out in bolder relief. Nevertheless, Tunisia possesses a character of its own that distinguishes it from its neighbors and a small body of literature devoted solely to Tunisia has taken shape.

Very few first-class general histories of Tunisia have appeared. A brief summary of Tunisian history is to be found in Histoire de la Tunisie depuis les Origins jusqu'à nos Jours (Peyronnet, Paris, 1938). While not an outstanding work, it merits mention because of its general reliability. The Tunisian chapters of Julien's Histoire de l'Afrique du Nord supplement the studies devoted entirely to Tunisia. Henri Cambon's Histoire de la Régence de Tunis (Berger-Levrault, Paris, 1948) dwells on recent history, particularly developments since 1881, when the country came under French protection. A study of the historical evolution of Tunisia prior to 1881 and of the establishment and working of the protectorate is L'État Tunisien et le Protectorat Français (Rosseau, Paris, 1931, 2 vols.), by Élie Fitoussi and Aristide Bénazet. Although this work is dated, it still remains valuable for its analysis of the operations of the protectorate. A valuable study of the central French figure in the establishment of the protectorate in Tunisia is Jules Ferry: The Renaissance of French Imperialism (Kings Crown Press, New York, 1944), by Thomas F. Power, Jr. One aspect of Tunisian history during the pre-World War II period, the issue of the Italian interests in Tunisia and Mussolini's sabre-rattling thereover, has produced a substantial literature. Since this literature concerns what is obviously a dead issue today, mention is made here only of Charles Monchicourt's Les Italiens de Tunisie et l'Accord Laval-Mussolini de 1935 (Sirey, Paris, 1938) and Giuseppe Morpurgo's Italia, Francia, Tunisia (Augustea, Rome, 1938).

The following volumes come under the category of general works, designed to give a brief account of the country's people, history, economy, social conditions, and administration: Initiation à la Tunisie (Maison-Neuve, Paris, 1950), a collection of essays by various authorities and experts on geography, demography, cultural evolution, administrative structure, economic conditions, etc.; La Tunisie, by Pierre Hubac and others (Cahiers Charles de Foucauld, Paris, 1950), another anthology in the more popular vein; J. Klein, La Tunisie (Presses Universitaires de France, Paris, 1948), part of the Que Sais-Je? series and a useful, concise volume; and Jean Despois' La Tunisie (Larousse, Paris, 1931), an earlier work in the field of human and physical geography. A provocative analysis of the Tunisian scene is La Tunisie (Editions Sociales, Paris, 1951), by Paul Sebag. This is a highly informative book, dealing mainly with economic conditions. It is written from the Marxist-Leninist anti-colonialist viewpoint. Another less recent work critical of French economic policy in Tunisia is La Tunisie Agricole et Rurale et l'Oeuvre de la France (Librairie Générale de Droit, Paris, 1938).

For political scientists, it is unfortunate that there should hardly be any scholarly works on Tunisian governmental structure and administration. The crisis that Tunisia has been experiencing during the past few years has been largely concerned with the matter of representation in governmental bodies, and the absence of a serious analysis of the protectorate administration is keenly felt. One of the very few works in this area is Le Protectorat Tunisien by E. de Bettex (Editions de L'Agence Extérieure, Paris, 1946). This sketchy and elementary work is no substitute for a substantial scholarly work. Another important aspect of the Tunisian crisis, the question of sovereignty and nationality, has been dealt with by Louis Aguesse in Souveraineté et Nationalité en Tunisie (Sirey, Paris, 1930), an important treatise, though somewhat out of date.

The crisis in Tunisia brought on by a rising native nationalism and an intransigent French administration is the subject of Jean Rous' Tunisie-Attention! (Deux-Rives, Paris, 1952). This is undoubtedly the most significant work on contemporary Tunisia. It gives a detailed account of the nationalist struggle and the various proposals for meeting the situation. One of the most valuable features of Tunisie-Attention! is the inclusion of more than one hundred pages of useful documents not readily available elsewhere. An analysis of Tunisian nationalism from its origins to 1952 is contained in "The Tunisian Nationalist Movement: Four Decades of Evolution" by Benjamin Rivlin in the Spring, 1952, issue of The Middle East Journal, Vol. 6, pp. 167-93.

The events of 1952 in Tunisia, which prompted the effort to get Security Council action on the Tunisian question, also led the Commission Internationale Contre le Régime Concentrationnaire to investigate the matter and to publish a report, Livre Blanc sur la Détention Politique en Tunisie (Brusselles, 1953). As for publications of those directly concerned in the struggle over Tunisian nationalism, the Neo-Destour party has published many pamphlets and tracts in Tunis, Paris, Cairo, and New York, in English as well as in French, of which the following may be noted: The Problem of Tunisia: Economic Policy of the Protectorate (Cairo, 1948); An Account of the Tunisian Question and Its Most Recent Developments (Tunisian Office for National Liberation, New York, 1952); and Farhat Hached: Tunisian Labor Leader, Patriot and Martyr (Tunisian Office for National Liberation, New York, 1953). On the other side, the Comité France Actuelle published Tunisia: Dangerous Separation (Editions France Actuelles, Washington, 1952) and the Tunisian Residency published a statistical brochure, Soixante-Dix Ans de Protectorat Français en Tunisie (Tunis, 1952). The laws, decrees, etc. of Tunisia appear in the Journal Officiel Tunisien. In addition the office of the Resident-General publishes an informative quarterly, the Bulletin Economique et Social de la Tunisie. Statistical data for Tunisia is published since 1947 in the Bulletin du Service Tunisien des Statistiques. Previously, from 1940-46, an Annuaire Statistique de la Tunisie was published, and prior to that a Statistique Générale de la Tunisie appeared annually.

VIII. LIBYA

The description "uneven" applied earlier to the literature on North Africa is particularly true in the case of Libya. Unlike ancient Libya, which was the seat of a thriving and prosperous outpost of Rome, modern Libya is best characterized by the paucity of its physical resources, the weakness of its economy, and the consequent sparseness of its population. Undoubtedly, this helps to explain the uneven quality of the literature on Libya; there has been little in Libya to attract social scientists. This does not mean that the literature on Libya is a complete void. In fact, because Libya has in recent years played a role in world politics—a role far beyond its intrinsic importance in the eyes of many observers—a literature has been built up in relation to this role. Much of the writing has been concerned directly with Libya and world politics, but a good portion of it has also dealt with the country's cultural, social, economic, and political conditions.

As is to be expected, Italian writers have manifested the most interest in Libya and its problems. This interest has continued beyond the settlement after World War II under which Italy lost her overseas colonies. Although Libya is today an independent state, Tripolitania has a large and important Italian minority, and economic ties between Italy and Libya still exist. Of this vast amount of literature published in Italian, only a few items will be included here, chosen either as representative examples of the literature or because of their lasting value.

Italy's venture in Libya as part of Italy's drive to play the role of a world power is described in two useful works in English: Luigi Villari's The Expansion of Italy (Faber and Faber, London, 1930), and Italy's Foreign and Colonial Policy, by Maxwell H. H. Macartney and Paul Cremóna (Oxford University Press, New York and London, 1938). An historical monograph dealing with the Italian penetration into Libya based on a scholarly examination of the documents relating to the Turco-Italian war is William C. Askew's Europe and Italy's Acquisition of Libya 1911-1912, (Duke University Press, Durham, N. C., 1942).

Italy's exploitation of Libya did not actually commence until after World War I and the advent of Fascism. The nearly two decades of Fascist rule made a deep impression on the country. Whereas Fascist policy was often ruthless toward the native population, and generally unconcerned with its problems, it expended a great amount of capital in introducing modern techniques to the country, the benefit of which has not been dissipated now that Italy no longer rules Libya. A defense of the Italian efforts in Libya is presented by Marshal Rodolfo Graziani in Pace Romana in Libia (Padua, 1937) and Libia Redenta (Torella, Naples, 1948). Graziani's writings offer an interesting insight into the thinking of the official Fascist leadership towards Libya. The major Italian endeavor in Libya was in the direction of settling Italian peasants on the land. A dispassionate analysis of the program is submitted by the eminent French geographer Jean Despois in his La Colonisation Italienne en Libye: Problèmes et Méthodes (Larose, Paris, 1935). A popular treatment of the subject, looking very favorably on the Italian Fascist efforts, is Martin Moore's Fourth Shore: Italy's Mass Colonization in Libya (Routledge, London, 1940). Another popular book on Libya is Knud Holmboe's Desert Encounter [Translated from the Danish] (G. P. Putnam Sons, New York, 1937), an account of an adventurous journey across Libya in which the author makes some very critical comments about Italy's policy towards the natives of the desert. Il Regime della Proprietà Fondiaria Nell' Africa Italiana, Vol. I, Libia (Cappelli, Bologna, 1942), by Massimo Colucci, is one of the Fascist period works that is still significant for its discussion of the relationship between traditional native land practices and the Italian policy of land alienation. An authoritative balanced account of the earlier years of the Italian administration is contained in Adalgiso Ravizza's La Libia Nel Ordinamento Giuridico (Pauda, Milan, 1931).

Sociological studies of the native Libyan population have been relatively scarce. Pioneer work was done by Colonel Enrico di Agostini in La Popolazione della Tripolitania (2 vols., Tripoli, 1917) and La Popolazione della Cirenaica (Bengasi, 1922-23). Much of the work on the Libyan population, however, has been on selected areas or tribes. The outstanding work of this type is E. Evans Pritchard's The Sanusi of Cyrenaica (Oxford University Press, New York, 1949). This is a work of high scholarship by an eminent English anthropologist with considerable experience in Africa. It is an extremely valuable aid for understanding the Sanusi brotherhood and its role in modern Libyan history. The significance of understanding the Sanusi order is evident when one realizes that the leader of the brotherhood became the first king of united Libya. Evans-Pritchard's work is restricted largely to Cyrenaica and unfortunately there is no comparable work for Tripolitania. Jean Despois' Le Djebel Nefousa (Larose, Paris, 1935) partly fills the gap for some of the Tripolitanian mountain tribes. Despois is also the author of a volume on the third component of the recently created federal state of Libya entitled Mission Scientifique au Fezzan (Chevalier, Paris, 1946). This work serves as an excellent introduction for this little known part of Libya. The people of the Fezzan and their customs are also dealt with in Notes d'Ethnographie et d'Histoire (Institute des Belles Lettres Arabes, Paris, 1948), by J. Lethielleux.

The education of the native Libyan population under Italian rule is discussed by Roland R. de Marco in The Italianization of African Natives (Columbia University Press, New York, 1943). Treating Italian educational policy in East Africa as well as Libya, this work is based entirely on an examination of documentary material and its value is diminished by the author's lack of first-hand experience in the colonies. Dealing also with the problem of education in Libya, and serving as a fitting contrast to the previously cited work, is the UNESCO Educational Mission Report on the Mission to Libya (Paris, 1952). Written by Professor Roger Le Tourneau, a man of considerable experience in North Africa, this report contains an analysis of the development of Libyan education through the years, and of the problems of technical training for industry and agriculture. The report contains a valuable introduction on "Education and the Economic and Social Development of Libya," by Professor Benjamin Higgins of McGill University, who headed the Technical Assistance Mission in Libya.

Le Tourneau's report is one of a number that have appeared in recent years from various United Nations technical assistance missions. Because of Libya's becoming an independent state under the auspices of the United Nations, and because of the special circumstances surrounding United Nations action in this matter, the country's welfare has become an important concern. There have been visits by a number of technical assistance missions. These have resulted in a series of highly informative reports on the basic economic and social structure of the country. The reports have not been revolutionary in their findings but they have confirmed earlier findings and feelings about the country's poverty and the difficulty of making it a viable economic state. John Lindberg's A General Economic Appraisal of Libya (U.N. Technical Assistance Administration, New York, 1952 [U.N. Doc. ST/TAA/K/Libya 1]) surveys natural resources, people, and finance and in general terms discusses the economic position of the country and the conditions for its economic development. A later Technical Assistance report, prepared by Professor Higgins, is The Economic and Social Development of Libya (Technical Assistance Administration, New York, 1953 [U.N. Doc. ST/TAA/K/Libya 3]). This report is a summary of a more comprehensive one (U.N. Doc. A/AC.32/TA.16 rev. 1, 1 July 1952) bearing the same title, which Professor Higgins prepared with a team of some twenty experts representing FAO, UNESCO, ILO, WHO, and TAA. The program and plans set forth in this report constitute a set of recommendations to the Libyan government, and, according to Higgins, should "bring significant results within two or three decades." Economic problems facing Libya have also been discussed in an official British publication: Libya: Economic and Commercial Conditions in Libya (HMSO for the Board of Trade, Overseas Economic Surveys, London, 1952), by H. J. Legg.

Recent political, as well as social and economic, data on Libya is available in the annual reports prepared by the United Nations Commissioner in Libya in 1950 and 1951 (General Assembly: Official Records, 5th Session, Supplement 15, A/1340 and 6th Session, Supplement 17 and 17A, A/1949 and A/1949/Add.1.), and in the annual reports submitted by the British and French administration to the United Nations for 1950 and 1951.

Events leading to the eventual independence of Libya are recorded in Lord

Rennell of Redd, British Military Administration of Occupied Territories in Africa, 1941-1947 (H.M.S.O., London, 1948), an official account of the British occupation of Tripolitania and Cyrenaica, as well as that of Italian East Africa; C. Groves Haines, "The Problem of the Italian Colonies," The Middle East Journal, Vol. 1, pp. 417-31 (Oct., 1947); Benjamin Rivlin "Unity and Nationalism in Libya," The Middle East Journal, Vol. 3, pp. 31-44 (Jan. 1949), and The United Nations and the Italian Colonies (New York, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1950); the Report of the Four Power Commission of Investigation that visited the Italian Colonies in 1947, of which volume three is devoted to Libya; and Ann Dearden, "Independence for Libya: The Political Problem." The Middle East Journal, Vol. 4, pp. 395-409 (Oct., 1950). A recent popular book on the new kingdom of Libya is Nina Epton's Oasis Kingdom: The Libya Story (Roy Publishers, New York, 1953).

BENJAMIN RIVLIN.

Brooklyn College.

BOOK REVIEWS

Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. BY C. HERMAN PRITCHETT. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 297. $5.00.)

This book, like Pritchett's earlier The Roosevelt Court, may be divided into two parts. One, a review of Supreme Court civil liberties decisions from 1946 to 1953, is of chief concern to the layman, to whom the book is primarily addressed. The other, a study of the judicial process, is of major interest to political scientists. In addition to its narrower focus, this volume differs from the earlier one in that the study of the judicial process is approached with slightly less emphasis on "box scores" and more emphasis on dissecting judicial opinions and interpreting decisions.

Pritchett's use of statistics is too well known to require description here. Ever since he started to compile the voting records of justices, he has had many imitators and many hostile critics. It is difficult to see why scholars should be critical of his use of "box scores." His studies depart from tradition only in presenting the materials in a more organized fashion than is commonly done. Others who read the opinions of judges and interpret their decisions also must compile scores, albeit in an unsystematic manner. They soon get to know, for example, that Black and Douglas support libertarian values more frequently than do their colleagues. They know that Frankfurter, after explaining why he believes that judges should upset legislation only in rare cases, frequently votes to uphold legislative regulation of speech.

Pritchett's studies, however, in addition to presenting in a more organized manner what most of us learn in an unorganized fashion, also help to identify variables and show relationships which are not always apparent when we are preoccupied with psychological explanations. By isolating the voting records and concentrating on the end product, a clear picture emerges of values supported by the several justices.

Criticism of Pritchett, in my opinion, should not be for using box scores but for not using them enough. By and large he is concerned with the problem of motivation, with trying to chart the mental balancing which goes on within the mind of each justice. (He hypothesizes that the judge's conception of his role as a judge interacts with personal attachment to particular values to produce a decision, recognizing of course that other factors are also involved.) His chief concern is to correlate voting behavior with a judge's explanations of why he voted the way he did in order to arrive at a thumbnail sketch of the judge's mental set.

In an excellent description of the judicial process, Pritchett makes it clear that the judges operate within the political process, that their own motivations are but one variable, that they must make value choices (Frankfurter and Holmes along with the rest), and that the voting behavior of judges can be studied profitably in the same manner as the voting behavior of legislators. Studies of legislative voting behavior, however, normally pay less attention than does Pritchett to "mind-stuff," or to the individual decision-maker's explanations of why he voted the way he did. It is of course desirable to recognize that Black, Douglas, Frankfurter, and Jackson support different values than did McReynolds or Butler. It is also important to determine what these values are and to understand the judge's explanations. But it would also be of importance to try to relate interests supported by the Supreme Court with other variables. For over a decade Pritchett has been compiling judicial voting records and bringing out the blocs within the Court and the interests they have supported. Have the interests supported by the Court varied during the ten years and have these changes been related to other factors within the political scene? In what way? What factors appear to be related to the success or failure of a particular bloc in having its views dominate the Court? Pritchett's technique would be most helpful in the search for answers to these and similar questions.

A second feature of the book is an interestingly written and soundly presented discussion of Supreme Court civil liberties decisions (broadly defined) during the period of Chief Justice Vinson's tenure. The impact of changed world conditions on the kinds of issues brought before the Court and how and on what bases the Court disposed of these issues are all ably explored.

Pritchett makes many astute observations in these chapters as he masterfully places into a coherent pattern the views, motivations, and decisions of the "libertarian activists," "libertarian restrainers," and the "less libertarian" members of the Supreme Court. In the final chapter Pritchett explores the Vinson Court's record and suggests what the Court's role should be. He argues that the "libertarian restrainers," especially Frankfurter, need not constantly apologize for using judicial power since the American democratic system requires judges to strike down laws which interfere with the operation of the process by which political decisions are reached. The reluctance to use judicial power for such purposes, argues Pritchett, is an outgrowth of the pre-1937 period when problems were different, a period during which legislatures were passing laws of which Pritchett apparently approves as contrasted with his attitude toward some laws passed since. The "libertarian activists," on the other hand, are criticized by Pritchett because their single-minded attention to the desirability of preserving the traditional civil liberties leads them at times to think dogmatically and to overlook other values. Pritchett's purpose in this chapter is to inform the layman and to stimulate him into thinking about the role of the judiciary. In this he succeeds, but the chapter would be strengthened by the deletion of a considerable number of statements which, in my judgment, convey little and sometimes confuse the issue. For example, "It [the Supreme Court] should be representative not of our current thought, but of our best thought" (p. 251).

Whether or not one agrees with Pritchett on his value choices, the discussion is moderate and informing. This volume, combined with The Roosevelt Court, makes a reliable account of Supreme Court activity in important areas since 1937. The greatest value of these pioneering studies lies, however, in the light they shed on how the judiciary operates. Pritchett is among the few who have studied the judicial process on the basis of a developed theoretical framework and in a systematic way. For this he deserves highest praise.

JACK W. PELTASON.

University of Illinois.

Law and Politics in the World Community: Essays on Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory and Related Problems in International Law. EDITED BY GEORGE A. LIPSKY. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1953. Pp. xx, 373. $6.00.)

It is undeniable that there is still much confusion with respect to the nature of international law and its relation to world politics. This collection of seventeen essays, in which a rich variety of viewpoints and interests is represented, both confirms the existence of the confusion and, for the discerning, provides material to dispel it. For some of the contributors Kelsen's "pure theory of law," with its insistence on a "legal science" of norms from which "politics" are purportedly excluded, supplies the inspiration and the point of departure. Others are more interested in understanding the role of law as an instrument of policy, solving concrete problems in world affairs, or exploring empirical data. The results of the various approaches placed in close juxtaposition are instructive.

Noteworthy among the policy-oriented contributions is Professor Covey T. Oliver's devastating analysis of George Kennan's famous lectures. The whole edifice of Kennan's attack on the alleged "legalism" of American foreign policy is taken apart and shown to rest on a grossly inadequate understanding of what law is. The inadequacy of Kennan's concept of law is the more striking in the light of the achievements of American legal thought in recent decades. Perhaps the clue to the confusion mentioned at the beginning of this review is to be sought in the fact that some political scientists and men in public life are not properly aware of the new ideas about law developed in American law schools and courts. Oliver rightly calls for more popular presentations by legal scholars and for a really factual study of the role of "lawmen" in foreign policy. His own view of the meaning of "law"—that it "is coming more and more, in the international field especially, to refer to the whole power process within the political order"—should be compared with Professor Quincy Wright's concept of "law" as a limitation on "politics." This concept is elaborated in an essay which calls for a "balancing" of law and politics in order to permit both stability and progress. The creative potentialities of legal techniques in world affairs are also stressed in Edvard Hambro's comments on the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on reparation for injuries suffered in the service of the United Nations.

Professor Eagleton's plea for more use of the law in the United Nations points in the same direction as Oliver's discussion of the role of law in foreign policy and comments on the Anglo-Iranian oil dispute, although it is by no means clear that the two authors share a common understanding of "law." In contrast, Professor Morgenthau, in an excellent but hardly novel analysis of the "Political Limitations of the United Nations," inveighs against "legalism" and reiterates his familiar thesis on the decisive and ineluctable role of traditional national policies and traditional methods of diplomacy. He fails to explain why, in a rapidly changing world where total disaster has become possible, we are fated to cling to traditional policies and methods. Morgenthau's general position receives able support from Professor Hula's sapient demonstration of political obstacles to the international legal protection of human rights. As usual, the pessimistic conservatives are strong in observation and analysis but weak in imagination and faith.

Among the contributions devoted to more strictly legal topics, Professor Lauterpacht's paper on "Rules of Warfare in an Unlawful War" deserves special mention. He succeeds in establishing a clear and convincing position on this new and increasingly important problem largely because, with some reluctance, he lets common sense triumph over "legal logic." Also outstanding is a masterly essay by Professor Leo Gross on "States as Organs of International Law and the Problem of Autointerpretation." By strict logical analysis Gross charitably but deftly and completely demolishes one of the foundations of Kelsen's theory of international law—his doctrine of sanctions. The logical contradictions inherent in the "pure theory of law" and its efforts to squeeze international law into a definition of law as a "coercive order" also show up in Professor Robert W. Tucker's admittedly strained analysis of the principle of effectiveness. The crippling effects of the Kelsenian preoccupation with the formal "validity" of norms, the straightjacket of conceptualism, and the misguided attempts to isolate law from politics are further evident in Professor Guggenheim's disappointing effort to define and justify positivism (in the Kelsenian sense) in international law; in the otherwise impressive analysis by Professor Verdross of the impact of the United Nations Charter on general international law; and in Professor Heinrich Brandweiner's examination of the international status of Austria. (They are also reflected, in a different way, in Morgenthau's and Hula's deprecation of the usefulness of law.) Somewhat apart stand Professor Scelle's brief reflections on international juridical personality and J. G. Starke's discussion of regionalism as a problem of international law. The editor himself contributes an introduction presenting a highly laudatory view of Kelsen and his work.

There are also a number of papers in which theory is subordinated to the examination of concrete legal and political materials. Professor Nussbaum contributes a very brief but highly informative and revealing account of the forms and observance of treaties in the Middle Ages which has some startling implications for our times. Professor Kunz analyzes intelligently and thoroughly the Geneva Conventions of 1949; and Alwyn V. Freeman deals competently with the political powers of the Council of the Organization of American States.

One closes the volume with the conviction that the variety of meanings attached to the word "law" is so great that it is not practicable to seek a single definition acceptable to all. The way out of the confusion must rather be sought in the realization of the fact that the word means different things to different people. Once this is realized, it will become clear that some of the heated controversies now raging are over words rather than substance. This is not to deny, of course, that a choice can be made among the various concepts of law on pragmatic grounds.

The excellence of the contents of this valuable symposium, which can be read with much profit by every political scientist, is unfortunately not matched by the quality of editorial work. There is a superabundance of printer's errors and other technical defects, and some of the contributions from abroad are poorly translated. The footnotes are annoyingly relegated to the the end of the volume and there is no index.

OLIVER J. LISSITZYN.

Columbia University.

The Future of Underdeveloped Countries: Political Implications of Development.
By EUGENE STALEY. (New York: Harper and Bros. 1954. Pp. xiv, 410.
$5.00.)

If the current drive for the development of underdeveloped areas should fail to catch hold and transform the face of the earth, its failure could certainly not be attributed to a lack of literature on the subject. The flood of books, articles, and official documents devoted to it which has appeared in the last few years is not only an impressive tribute to the importance of the problem but also perhaps a confirmation of the notion that the fashions of the moment are as significant determinants of activity in academic circles as in other spheres of life. Among the most recent and most useful contributions to this literature is the present work by Eugene Staley, which is in part a product of the deliberations of a Study Group of the Council on Foreign Relations; and it might be added, to convince any who doubt the availability of other materials, that its "List of Authors and Works Cited" runs to no less than eight closely-printed pages.

As the subtitle indicates, the task which Mr. Staley has set for himself is less the exploration of the economic aspects and intricacies of development, although these are by no means neglected, than its political and social implications, both domestic and international. The two major themes of the book, as the author states them in his Introduction, are that economic development of Asia, Africa, and parts of Europe and the Americas is vital for the survival of the West, very much including the United States, and that such development "while a necessary condition, is not a sufficient condition to insure the growth in these countries of trends favorable to human well-being and to the better world we should like to see." More particularly, he is insistent that material progress alone is not enough to check the advance of communism which has itself, he suggests, outstripped the non-Communist world in ruthlessly removing obstacles to economic growth, mobilizing investment, and getting an industrial revolution underway in underdeveloped areas within its grasp. In his discussion of the Communist-free world rivalry he lays salutary stress on the peculiar turn of events by which the followers of Marx have come to have ideas as their "most strategic export" while the United States places an undue reliance on the improvement of material conditions.

In the opinion of this reviewer the outstanding strength of this book lies not in the novelty of its ideas but rather in the breadth of its intellectual horizons and in its balance and restraint. A convinced and well-informed advocate of the necessity for concentration on development, Mr. Staley deceives neither himself nor his readers with any illusions as to the ease with which it can be accomplished or any certainty that we will like the results if it is accomplished. He has no simple panacea or technique to suggest which will set the process he is discussing in motion and make it self-generating, the latter being the true criterion as to whether or not success has been achieved. On the contrary, he returns with regularity to the conception that development is the product of the interaction of a large number of complexly interrelated forces and states of mind and fact. The industrial system, as he sees it, is not a prefabricated piece of machinery which can be picked up and, given adequate amounts of capital and technical assistance, installed in working order in any part of the world, but is intimately bound up with the political and social environment in which it must work. Where the environment is unsuitable, as must be assumed to be the case in preindustrial societies, no significant and sustained advance can be made until the people themselves have come to have the will to develop. That such a will is as yet actually present for large masses of mankind must be open to the gravest question.

In brief, this is a mature and sophisticated book which, if it is perhaps somewhat overoptimistic as to the possibility of achieving the high objectives which Mr. Staley sets as the goal of the development process, serves effectively to place the problem in its proper complex setting. The two major issues which must be faced are, firstly, the question as to the likelihood of its taking place on a large scale in the presently foreseeable future, and, secondly, assuming that it does, what kind of a world it will bring along in its train. Mr. Staley rightly points out that by no means all the countries which have reached a high level of development have combined it with liberal and democratic institutions and outlooks, and it requires barely a glance at the history of the last few decades to become persuaded that peace and development are by no means synonymous terms. In demonstrating that the problems surrounding development are both difficult and hazardous, Mr. Staley has rendered a highly useful service.

RUPERT EMERSON.

University of California (Berkeley).

Cultural Patterns and Technical Change. EDITED BY MARGARET MEAD. (Paris: UNESCO. 1953. Pp. 348. $1.75.)

International technical assistance programs depend basically upon people for the successful introduction of knowledge and techniques, whether in the fields of education, agriculture, engineering, or public health. The extensive character of these programs today and their central importance to the development of a viable and stable system of international relations give high importance to the work of the individual technical experts. In both the bilateral and multilateral programs, an increasing amount of attention has been given to the manner of selecting, training, and briefing the experts. Individual United Nations agencies have become acutely aware of the problem as evaluations of programs are undertaken, and the United Nations Technical Assistance Board recently went so far as to have a special study made on the briefing and orientation of experts as part of its responsibilities under the Expanded Technical Assistance Program. In the United States there have been numerous efforts to improve the quality of personnel sent abroad on technical assistance assignments and a great deal of attention has been given to means whereby they can be most effectively trained and oriented.

This UNESCO publication constitutes a major contribution in meeting needs of this kind in both bilateral and multilateral technical assistance programs. It is a handbook for the technical assistance expert whose task it is to help the government and people in cultures foreign to the expert and foreign to the countries from which the technical know-how is sought. It is also intended as an aid to the receiving countries since they, too, need help in seeing their technical problems in the light of the special characteristics of their own cultures.

Prepared by the World Federation of Mental Health and edited by Margaret Mead with the assistance of an outstanding editorial advisory committee, this manual is an introduction to the cultural elements that are affected by, and that also affect, the application of foreign technical knowledge and skills in any country. It includes brief analyses of five cultures (Burma, Greece, the Tiv of Nigeria, Palau, and the Spanish Americans of New Mexico), with special attention to such elements as family, social orientation, individual orientation, economic motivation, religion, community and village organization, time concepts, status of women and children, health, standards of living, government, etc. There is no single outline or uniform manner of treatment for the five cultures but rather an indication in respect to each of the "kind of thing and the kind of activity which may be of value in facilitating the technological change for itself and in preserving the cultural integrity of those among whom the changes are introduced" (p. 13). It is definitely not a handbook or guide in which answers to specific operational questions are to be found.

With these analyses of five cultures as background, a series of studies then follows to illustrate how programs in agriculture, nutrition, maternal and child care, public health, industrialization, and fundamental education are affected by cultural difference. Here, somewhat more specifically than in the studies of cultures, the volume seeks to identify particular difficulties that must be faced and suggests how more successful programs in various parts of the world have dealt with them. A concluding section deals with mental health implications of technological change and with the principles involved in developing mental health during the technical change. A very useful international bibliography is appended.

In terms of the importance of technical assistance in the world today and in terms of the critical role of the expert in these programs, this volume represents an important contribution to the conduct of international relations.

Placed in the hands of headquarters administrators of technical assistance programs, of experts going to "the field," and of administrators in recipient countries, it should introduce greater realism in the programs and help to avoid the many frictions that have occurred from lack of understanding of cultures. The calibre of the editorial staff and of the international advisory committee has assured a work of high quality in an area in which technical knowledge has long been hidden from practitioners and operators by a highly specialized jargon. This volume gives evidence further of the seriousness with which the UNESCO Secretariat has viewed continuing difficulties in the administration of technical assistance programs. (Note in this connection the more recent UNESCO publication, Social Aspects of Technical Assistance in Operation, which reports on an international conference held under joint UN-UNESCO auspices in 1953.) It also reflects the concern of member states of UNESCO, which authorized its preparation, that means be found to alleviate some of the tensions arising in non-industrialized countries from the introduction of technology, and to harmonize technological influences with the cultural values of the country.

WALTER H. C. LAVES.

Indiana University.

The Adams Federalists. BY MANNING J. DAUER. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1953. Pp. xxiii, 381. $6.00.)

The scope of this study is much broader than its title would suggest. Although its central theme is the relation of John Adams to the Federalist party, the study really constitutes an attempt to explain the factors that contributed to the successful development of self-government in the United States in the period from 1789 to 1803. In approaching this problem the author takes direction from three points of view. The first is that the social scientist must establish the actual social structure of the period with which he is concerned. The second is that the theories and governmental policies of the period must be studied with reference to their relation to population groups distinguished according to their varying economic, religious, and cultural backgrounds. The third viewpoint is that in a political society employing free elections, the elections should be studied to determine whether there are patterns of political behavior.

This is a tremendous task which Professor Dauer set for himself, but within the scope of a single volume he achieves a remarkable degree of success. The study begins with two chapters which describe the basis of the political divisions of the period, followed by two chapters dealing, respectively, with the political and economic theories of John Adams. Although these four chapters cover for the most part familiar material, Professor Dauer has done a fine bit of condensation. Within their compass he has provided the social, economic, and political background (both its real and theoretical components) for the analysis that is to follow. The fifth chapter really begins the story suggested by the title. It treats Adams' relations with the Federalists from 1788 to his election to the presidency in 1796. The remaining chapters (6 through 17) continue the story through the election of 1800 and set forth the conclusions of the study. It is in this section that the problems comprehended by the author's second and third points of view are treated. Beginning with a careful analysis of the election of 1796 and the patterns of political behavior manifested in it, Professor Dauer proceeds to study the theories and policies of the Adams Administration as they were related both to the various groups within the country and to the position of America in the family of nations. The effect of these theories and policies upon the various groups within the country is then evaluated in terms of the election of 1800. The author thus treats for one of the most critical periods in our history two problems which in one form or another are constants in such a country as ours—first, the problem of compromising group conflicts at the domestic level, and, second, the problem of preserving at the international level the nation's independence and security. The two problems were, of course, inseparable in Adams' time just as they are today, and it is in connection with this parallel that the present volume makes much of its contribution.

A number of the conclusions drawn by the study would seem to be of great significance for the present. The social, political, and economic forces of the period did not stand still to accommodate the dogmas of any political group. In the party conflict of Adams' period victory came to the party which was best able to bring its appeal and its program into line with the realities of the time. A second important conclusion reached in the study is that it is virtually impossible in our system for the President to stand above party strife. His authority rests upon political power reflected in parties, and he must work within this framework. He may, however, and Professor Dauer suggests that this was Adams' major contribution, by pursuing a course of moderation serve the cause of compromise and facilitate such an agreement among the various groups as will be acceptable to the great majority.

The value of this volume is enhanced by the inclusion of appendices which in addition to the text of the Sedition Act of 1789, show congressional districts for the period from 1793-1803, the alignment of parties in 1796, and voting records on key issues for the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Congresses (with maps showing records for House members). Tables throughout the study, copious documentation, and a lengthy bibliography add further to the value of the book and make it something of a source book for the period.

This is a sound, scholarly piece of work, and only by such studies will the complete story of our political development be told.

FRANK GRACE.

University of Michigan.

The Rise and Decline of Liberalism. By THOMAS P. NEILL. (Milwaukee: The Bruce Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. xi, 321. $5.50.)

The phenomenon of modern liberalism has attracted the attention of numerous scholars anxious to explain why the liberal triumph of the nineteenth century was transformed into the defeat of the twentieth. In this book the author, a history professor at St. Louis University, skillfully elaborates the classic Catholic interpretation of liberalism as an unfortunate secular alternative, now spent, to a society properly ordered by Christian principles. The orientation of the study is, quite understandably, European, with the main attention paid to the fortunes of British liberalism.

The bulk of the volume is historical narrative treating the course of liberalism from its emergence as a critique of the ancien régime to its disintegration as a creed and movement during the period of World War I. The author has unearthed no new historical findings, but he has related his story well. His evidence is convincing and his analysis is balanced. Despite some curious twists (such as the use of Edmund Burke as a spokesman for nineteenth-century liberalism, and the imputation that Beard's thesis regarding the American Constitution is a "Marxist interpretation"), the author is precise and discriminating in propounding his argument. For example, he accurately delineates the unique character of American liberalism and the historic tension between liberalism and democracy in Britain. Certainly he has presented us with as plausible an interpretation as historical scholarship allows. And even though his writing is occasionally repetitious and somewhat uneven (especially in the last few chapters), his presentation is highly readable. So on the whole this is an eminently worthy study in the history of ideas.

The most significant chapter is the final one, where the author articulates the thesis which animates his narrative of the rise and decline of liberalism. His thesis is that the price of liberalism was too high. As a solvent of the old order liberalism produced some good, but in failing to provide an adequate alternative, it produced much bad. The good was actually derived from the Christian view of man which the liberals borrowed, minus its intellectual foundation of Christian truth. Consequently the liberals made each man his own sovereign and eventually destroyed the associative basis of social life. To protect the masses from exaggerated individualism, the liberal state was compelled, contrary to its spirit, to assume greater and greater responsibility for the lives of its members. The logical end product is the secular totalitarian state.

According to this analysis the tragic flaw of liberalism is the substitution of the "individual" for the Christian idea of social man endowed with moral rights and duties beyond human call. The liberals ignored original sin and accepted the fallacy of the natural harmony of interests. They mistakenly conceived of freedom as the absence of external restraints, of freedom without responsibility. But true liberty, as the Christian knows, is not an end in itself. Liberty is a means directed by a purpose embedded in the moral consensus of society. As the consensus supplied by Christianity disintegrated in modern society, eroded away by the positivist denial of objective moral truth, the new and terrible reintegration of social life in the form of totalitarianism appeared. Incapable of forging a new society to replace the one it destroyed, liberalism lost its force as other creeds and movements came to dominate the scene.

The author's thesis stops short of the plea for reaffirmation of Christian tenets, a usual accompaniment of this Catholic interpretation. Professor Neill simply dissects liberalism as a creed and movement and diagnoses the moral crisis of liberal society. Perhaps in his projected second volume (apparently to be entitled Liberalism in Prospect), which will deal primarily with the American scene, the burden of argument will be a plea to return to the faith of the Mother Church.

This book is useful, then, as an unambiguous statement of the Catholic attitude towards liberalism, and why the Catholic thinker shares this attitude. But this book cannot be dismissed as just another Catholic tract. It is also a penetrating critique of liberal tenets, a critique which lays bare the fatal deficiency of modern liberalism: a theory of value both tenable and compatible with the liberal creed. Anyone concerned with the problems of contemporary social and political thought will therefore find this a rewarding book, and will look forward to the publication of its companion volume.

CURRIN V. SHIELDS.

University of California (Los Angeles).

Plato's Modern Enemies and the Theory of Natural Law. BY JOHN WILD. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1953. Pp. xi, 259. $5.50.)

In Defense of Plato. BY RONALD B. LEVINSON. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 674. $10.00.)

The world wars in which we are engaged are wars of the spirit, as Nietzsche prophetically styled them. The warfare on the battlefields was preceded, and is accompanied, by the literary warfare of the ideologists against the classic and Christian substance of Western civilization. Of the many phases on the various fronts not the least interesting, though perhaps not the most dangerous, is the bush-war, if the metaphor be allowed, conducted during the last twenty-five years by ideologists in the English-speaking world against Plato. Some of the outstanding encounters were John J. Chapman's Lucian, Plato and Greek Morals (1931), Warner Fite's The Platonic Legend (1934), R. H. S. Crossman's Plato Today (1939), Alban D. Winspear's The Genesis of Plato's Thought (1940), and Karl R. Popper's The Open Society and Its Enemies (1945; 2nd. ed. 1950).

The reception of this class of literature followed, on the whole, the lines of the schism in Western civilization in general, and its English-speaking subdivision in particular. The so-called liberals (from muddled, through pink, to red) were enthusiastic. The scholars expressed their anger with more or less politeness. As representative I quote a sentence from a lecture by Mure, before the Royal Institute of Philosophy, on occasion of Popper's treatise: "One would say, indeed, that he had flung scholarship to the winds in the pursuit of his thesis, could one be sure that he had had any to fling." My own attitude should be reported, for what it is worth. I read Winspear's treatise at the time of its publication, because I considered it my duty to know what a Marxist ideologist would do to Plato; and I considered my duty done with reading that one sample. I have not seen Crossman's Plato Today, because I had read previously one of his other books. Chapman and Fite I have sampled but not read. My intention to follow the same course in the case of Popper was frustrated, because too many students wanted my more detailed criticism of the work.

The adumbrated situation provides the setting for the two books under review. Their authors are philosophers and scholars who ordinarily would not spend their time writing volumes of criticism on ideological literature. None of the enumerated anti-Platonic writings taken singly would have justified their enterprise. But the series forms a pattern; and the cumulative effect of the ideological attack makes itself felt in the wide acceptance of the caricature of Plato as a sort of fascist, or generally totalitarian, thinker. The social effect of acceptance has motivated both Wild and Levinson; and Wild, in particular, mentions the students whose request for information forced him, over the years, to pay closer attention to the ideologists. That social pressure is in itself a significant phenomenon. It is possible only because, on the one hand, our academic institutions are deeply corroded by personnel who furnish resonance for publications of their sect; while, on the other hand, entirely too many talk about the "classical and Judaea-Christian tradition" without shouldering the burden of appropriating it through study of the sources. The two books have importance, therefore, not only as a criticism of the literature in question, but as documents of the intellectual climate. A future historian will read them with interest, especially the fat volume of Levinson, for they reveal what kind of literary production required detailed analysis and refutation because its readers, who presumably were educators and their students, swallowed it hook, line and sinker. The aggregate social effect, thus, has motivated the books. And apparently it was Popper's work that broke the camel's back; for, while the others receive their due share of attention, it is on Popper that both authors bestow most of it.

In their defense of Plato the two authors use in part the same tactics. Wild devotes about one fourth of his book to direct criticism of the above mentioned literature, under chapter headings of "Plato as an Enemy of Freedom and the Open Society" and "Plato as an Enemy of Democracy." Having accomplished his task of demolition as briefly as possible, he proceeds to develop a theory of natural law on the basis of Plato's philosophy, in order to show positively its supreme importance for the rational foundation of social order. This second part of his book far overshadows in importance the first; we can only regret that the occasion will not allow a detailed examination of the author's position. It must be sufficient to say that Wild re-establishes ontology as the basis of a theory of natural law and, therefore, has to go back of the Stoics to Plato and Aristotle in order to find the idea of nature from which could arise the notion of a law of nature. Anybody who is concerned with problems of natural law today will receive help in clarifying his own position from a careful examination of Wild's "Moral Realism." Even the reader who agrees with Wild on principle will feel, however, that his argument would gain in weight, if for its basis it went somewhat further back than Plato. Felix Heinemann's Nomos und Physis (Basel, 1945) could be used with profit.

In the first part of his book, with its direct criticism of the anti-Platonic literature, Wild refers on occasion to Levinson's work (which was in progress at the same time as his) for a more detailed elaboration as well as for the philosophical foundation, of his own criticisms. Levinson first states carefully the nature of "The Attack on Plato" (pp. 3-25), and then proceeds to a detailed examination of the charges against Plato and their refutation. Hence, the main body of the work is organized as a classification of the charges and their subdivisions, such as the attacks on Plato as a literary artist, on his mental and moral stature, on his opinions concerning sex and marriage, on his humanitarianism, on his opinions concerning slavery, barbarians, manual workers, and the common man in general, on his Sicilian politics, his duplicity, his lust for self-aggrandizement and power, and, finally, on his totalitarianism. The text is followed by sixteen appendices (pp. 583-645), in small print with double columns, on charges of a more intricate nature which require a correspondingly more extensive treatment.

By virtue of its size, orderly organization, and thoroughness the work of Levinson becomes a handbook on ideological anti-Platonism. Moreover, since, the refutation of the charges required an elucidation of Plato's own position concerning the various problems, it is a handbook on that part of Plato's work that is involved in the charges. Beyond its primary critical purpose the book is a convenient reference work on Platonic topics which appear frequently in current political debate. The critical work itself is a giant feat of excellent and devoted scholarship. To be sure, the ideological literature in question is an easy target for a scholar who knows his business. But anybody who has ever tried to criticize a piece of work which includes mistranslations, use of passages out of context, distortions through omission or generalization, appeals to prejudices of the reader, inarticulate premises, impertinent non-sequiturs, misreading of an author's intentions in the light of Marxism, Freudianism, or Positivism, and so forth, will know that such an "easy target" requires an unusual amount of critical labor. Levinson has performed his task, which often must have been unbearably tedious for him, not only with merciless competence, but with rare good humor and in urbane form. The book can be read with pleasure as a model of critical work; the pleasant form only heightens the effect of the massacre.

Wild and Levinson, and especially the latter, have done a public service. We are in their debt for their performance of a tiresome but necessary task. And they have raised a warning signal for ideologists that the time when they could get away with everything is over. For all that, unstinted praise is deserved. Still, the war is not over; and there are certain drawbacks in the method of both authors which require attention. They both proceed by accepting the charges of the ideologists at their face value and then refuting them by recourse to the Platonic text. That procedure is effective in the forensic sense, because the vast majority of the charges are made with such preposterous incompetence that confrontation with reality by a competent scholar is devastating. Moreover, it is the only procedure possible in the analysis of detail. Nevertheless, it should be supplemented by a questioning of the charges, not with regard to their contents, but with regard to their premises. Unless that is done, quite possibly the essential points of both the ideological and the philosophical positions will be missed. If, for instance, the charge that Plato is an enemy of the open society (in Popper's sense of the word) is examined and effectively refuted, as is done by both Wild and Levinson, and if nothing more is said about the matter, then the critic has made the fateful admission that the "open society" is an issue at all and that it would be a bad thing if Plato were found guilty of being its enemy. The detailed examination, therefore, should be followed (or preceded) by an explanation of why the question as such is nonsensical. Plato was not a democrat or fascist, not a totalitarian or humanitarian, not a friend or an enemy of the open society, for the good reason that he was a philosopher and not a political ideologist. Hence, one can save the reputation of Plato forensically by refuting the charges on this or that count, and still destroy the work of Plato by admitting the question at all. Neither Wild nor Levinson, let us hasten to say, are guilty of such betrayal. They both are aware of the problem and mention it. Nevertheless, one would have wished to see it more in focus and given the space which it deserves.

The restraint which both authors show in this respect is all the more surprising because their main target, Popper's Open Society and Its Enemies, would have offered them the best possible occasion for penetrating to the center of the evil. For the concepts of the closed and open society, which have achieved a certain notoriety through Popper, were drawn by him from Bergson and perverted practically into the opposite of the meaning which they have in the Deux Sources de la Morale et de la Religion. In Bergson's conception, the archaic society is closed by the authority of its myth; it opens when individuals appear, the prophets, mystics, and philosophers, who open their soul to transcendental reality and establish the possibility of existence in spiritual community, under this higher authority, in opposition to the closed society. And one of the great figures in this liberating opening of society was Plato. Popper's misinterpretation of the concepts of a great philosopher seems to have escaped both Wild and Levinson. It could have been put to good use in the detailed refutation of charges against Plato. And, more important, it would have shown, in a model case, the root of the evil, that is, the hatred of the ideologist for the authority of the spirit.

ERIC VOEGELIN.

Louisiana State University.

Introduction to French Local Government. By BRIAN CHAPMAN. (London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd. 1953. Pp. 238. 18 s.)

This volume comes close to being a model monograph in the field of comparative politics. The author, Lecturer in Government at the University of Manchester, not only gives a painstaking and accurate picture of the structure and workings of French local government, but also draws frequent and extremely careful comparisons with corresponding institutions in Great Britain. The minutiae of his report on the French scene are enlivened by quickly told but revealing instances conveying the atmosphere of life and politics in villages and towns. More than one learned footnote fills the reader with the delight ordinarily transmitted only by a Clochemerle-like novel or by the sequences of a French film.

A wide range of research materials as well as informed close-range observation lead the author to a number of important conclusions which sometimes run counter to timeworn clichés. Usually French government is characterized quite simply as centralized. Now, since all French communes are subject to the corps préfectoral, local government is indeed centralized, if centralization means the subordination of local decisions to the agreement of state officials. But the picture is altered a great deal by the fact that here the state officials deciding on local matters are members of the departmental prefectures or even sub-prefectures, not of the ministry in Paris. Hence they are aware of local difficulties, easily approachable, and fully informed. At least under ordinary circumstances ministerial circulars leave much to prefectural discretion.

Although such important services as education and police are all but removed from local control in France, the author observes, on the whole correctly, that there is more interest and more vitality in French local government than in its British counterparts. To a considerable extent this can be explained by the smallness of most French communes (in 1946 almost two-thirds of them had under 500 inhabitants). But one of the most fundamental causes of the vitality is probably the personal element palpable throughout the local government system. The concentration of authority in the hands of the French mayor and the fact that a local political career is commonly regarded as the proper and natural step to a national career tend highly to personalize the processes of local government. (It is true that these phenomena, healthy at the bottom, have unfortunate results on the apex of political life: in parliament local issues are given far too much weight especially for the limited resources of an insufficiently expanding economy. Since local influences often favor claims of seniority, it is extremely difficult to renovate political leadership, as the restoration of the cadres of the Third Republic, fairly soon after the establishment of the Fourth, has clearly shown.)

The author gives a carefully balanced account of what is efficient and what is not in the processes of French local government. Among the factors which hinder the, in many respects, prompt, smooth, and predictable dispatch of business, he cites the present system of local finance and the frequent illicit interference at higher levels, especially by deputies and senators.

For those interested in the growth of administrative law and in the possible protection of the citizen from administrative abuse by local authorities, the author's excellent chapters on the tutelage of local government and on the administrative courts will prove particularly rewarding. His analysis of the complicated machinery and of the functioning of the Conseil d'Etat is masterful, and it is only to be regretted that the author was not able to consult the recently published jubilee volume on the supreme administrative court. The conclusions reached appear extremely sound. In judicial control of administrative acts the French remedies are as effective as the British, more clearly defined, more easily invoked, and less expensive. Yet the French administrative courts are not as successful as the British in fearlessly denouncing attempts to infringe on the freedom of the individual. To explain such differences fully it would have taken deeper-probing investigations than the author is able to include in the compass of his study, modestly called an "Introduction."

The value of his work would have been enhanced, if Mr. Chapman had found it possible to consider the problems besetting local government against the broader political issues of various periods. It would, for instance, be most interesting to see the law of 1884, the basis of all communal government in France, interpreted as part of the large legislative reform movement of that era. The author's pertinent statement that a number of reforms which recommend themselves in our times cannot be carried out because they smack too much of experiments tried during the Pétain regime, would be made more significant by a general consideration of the extent to which Vichy used and abused ideas and men—to the great detriment of present-day France.

But then not everything could be discussed in such an admirably succinct volume as the author has given us.

HENRY W. EHLMANN.

University of Colorado.

The Constitution of the United States of America: Analysis and Interpretation; Annotations of Cases Decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to June 30, 1952. BY THE LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS. EDWARD S. CORWIN, EDITOR. (Washington: Government Printing Office. 1953. Pp. xxiv, 1361. $6.25.)

Senator Wiley's preface quite properly characterizes this monumental work as "a map, so to speak, of the great historical landmarks of constitutional jurisprudence." It clearly is the best map yet published, and is the book bargain of the year. In general, the volume follows the pattern set by W. C. Gilbert in the 1938 edition. The annotations have been made with care, and testify to the fact that we have come to view our Constitution almost exclusively through the case law. A table listing over 4,000 cases involving questions of constitutional interpretation, detailed tables of contents preceding each Article and each Amendment, and a subject-matter index give ready access to the body of the work. Frequent cross references also are helpful, but even more should have been given.

Commercial publishers, apparently in an effort to drain every drop of value from judicial opinions, have almost completely abandoned any effort to distinguish between even the purest obiter and remarks having at least some bearing upon the outcome of the case. Professor Corwin and his staff, which included Robert J. Harris, have avoided all pretence of such delusive completeness, and as a result cases generally are cited only for points for which they constitute real authority. Many of the annotations approximate essays upon the subject at hand. Those concerning naturalization, the contract clause, executive agreements, the interpretation of state law by federal courts, the expansion of the writ of habeas corpus, the right to counsel in state courts, and the admissibility of forced confessions are especially good.

This is not to say that the work is perfect. My students have found the references to Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat 1 (1820), very misleading, and at no point do the editors bring out the fact that this case clearly sustained the trial of a federal crime in a state tribunal and rejected the now accepted rule that overlapping state and national criminal laws may coexist. In the section on bankruptcy, no mention is made of Faitoute Iron & Steel Co. v. City of Ashbury Park, 316 U.S. 502 (1942), which certainly has weakened Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122 (1819). Indian Motorcycle Co. v. United States, 283 U.S. 570 (1931), is not (as stated on page 106) the only case "since the turn of the century" in which "the national taxing power has been further narrowed in the name of Dual Federalism"—see Burnett v. Coronado Oil Co. 285 U.S. 393 (1932). And of course the Constitution did not "deprive the States of all admiralty jurisdiction and vest it exclusively in the federal courts," as stated on page 572. That, as we are correctly told seven pages later, was accomplished by statute. There are other defects of similar nature, but they are found so much less frequently than in any other treatise of comparable scope that one must marvel at the care with which this volume has been edited.

Now that the Court follows tests of "reasonableness" in virtually all fields of constitutional law, even those where absolutes once prevailed, e.g., the contract clause, there certainly is no reason to expect any decrease in the flow of precedents. The time soon may come when we will not be able to afford the luxury of new editions of such works as this at fairly short intervals, but will be held to supplemental volumes instead. With this in mind, the Legislative Reference Service might be well advised to keep careful notes as it makes use of this edition, looking toward the publication of a supplement. With such a supplement, it could continue to serve as an excellent basic volume until such time as a completely new revision becomes imperative.

J. A. C. GRANT.

University of California (Los Angeles).

American State Legislatures: Report of the Committee on American Legislatures, American Political Science Association. EDITED BY BELLE ZELLER. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1954. Pp. ix, 294. $3.50.)

This book reports the findings, conclusions, and proposals for action of twelve people who constituted the Association's Committee on American Legislatures. Two of the members have long been directors of research for state legislative councils. One is an official of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress. Still another for many years has occupied positions in a state capitol which permit close observation of a legislature at work. The other eight members of the Committee are in academic life and have written about legislatures and lawmaking. No doubt we may safely presume that what these twelve persons thought most important to say about American state legislatures is essentially what American political scientists generally believe ought to be said on that subject.

The Committee lists in six numbered statements the objectives toward which it has been working and which it hopes this book will help to achieve. The six boil down to three: (1) to collect a body of factual data which will support recommendations for reorganization or reform of state legislatures; (2) to cause other persons and organizations to stir up interest in and encourage reform; and (3) to stimulate "broader research" relating to legislatures and the legislative process. The role of this book in this broad program seems to me to be the following: (1) it arrays familiar and newly collected information about state legislatures; (2) it indicates what the Committee likes and does not like about state legislatures and therefore may be said to identify problems; and (3) it makes recommendations for change in organization, procedures, and behavior.

The principal addition to our previous stock of facts about state legislatures is presented in a chapter of 25 pages entitled "Party Organization and Control." This is a summarization of the returns on a questionnaire which went to "two or more competent persons in each state." "At least one reply was received from each of the forty-eight states—in most cases two or three" (p. 192). Tables show the distribution of party affiliations in recent sessions of each state legislature; show how committee members are chosen and how often committees meet; and evaluate the strength of party loyalty and the effectiveness of the agencies or instruments of parties in the several states. What appears in the tables is, of course, extended by many statements of fact in the text. There are also, scattered throughout the book, many facts that I was not familiar with about training and orientation of new members of legislatures, retirement benefits for legislators, limitations on debate and rules of procedure in legislatures, physical format of legislator's handbooks, facilities for and practices in bill drafting, availability of office space for legislators, and registration of lobbyists. I have not been diligent in my reading on these subjects and do not know how much of the information which appears in this book has previously appeared in professional journals and reference books like The Book of the States.

Far more prominent in this book than arrays of factual information are recommendations for action which the Committee thinks will elevate the quality of our legislators, assure better relations between the legislature and other parts of our state governments, and improve the product of the lawmaking process. The numbered sentences and paragraphs which appear under the heading "Recommendations" add up to an even 50. Here and there in the text are additional specific recommendations for change, and many a sentence that purports to indicate what exists or occurs is heavily weighted with implication that something else would be better. If this book comes to have an honored place in our literature I am sure it will be because people like the reforms which are proposed and not because people think the Committee's research efforts were noteworthy.

The Committee did not bring together in summary statement either its judgment as to what would be a near-ideal lawmaking body for an American state or its views as to what are the most praiseworthy features and main inadequacies of the legislatures we now have. I am unable to construct such a statement on either point by assembling the unequivocal statements which appear at various places in the book. The best I can do for the reader of this review is to provide some summary statements of my own which attempt to indicate main preoccupations of the Committee, the beliefs of Committee members about necessary relationships among parts of a complex whole, and the convictions of Committee members as to what the American people would like or what is good for them.

1. The Committee appears to believe that the main features of legislative organization which are best for one state will be best for all of them. There is no outright assertion to this effect in the book, but it seems to me to be the clear implication of the whole book. Neither descriptive statement nor evaluative commentary brings together the significances for legislative structure of differences in total state population or density of population; of differences in urban-rural distribution of population or differences in concentration of urban population in one, two, or more than two great cities; of differences in party structure which differentiate two states like one-party Alabama and two-party Indiana. The nearest the Committee comes to an admission that the basic features of legislative structure ought to respond to the conditions of life in a state is the assertion (p. 78) that "The larger and more populous states seem to require more legislation and thus more time from the legislator."

2. Although the main concern of the Committee was with reconstruction or reform and the implication of its book is that there is a near-ideal legislative structure applicable to all states, it does not supply the reader with the parts which would enable him to construct a conclusion as to what the Committee thinks would be near-ideal. I cannot tell whether the Committee thinks that allstate legislatures (or for that matter any of them) ought to be about as near a fulltime lawmaking group as Congress is, or as the New York State legislature is, or as the Arkansas legislature is. The Committee was not even able to make up its mind whether all states ought to have unicameral bodies or whether some may be conscience-clear if they retain the bicameral form. (See pp. 58-60 for its ambivalence on this point.) It does say firmly that legislatures need not be as large as they are in most states; that a unicameral body and the lower house of a bicameral legislature ought not have fewer than forty members; that in bicameral legislatures the desirable ratio of members is one in the senate to three in the lower house; and that legislative councils should be improved in some states that have them and established in all states that do not have them.

3. The Committee indulges in positive assertions of highest significance if true, without supplying any support in evidence, in reasoning from generally accepted beliefs, or in presentation of grounds for personal preference. Illustrative: "Lower houses are usually more democratically constituted; yet because of their larger size they can be more easily controlled by frequently conservative legislative oligarchies, and because of the smaller constituencies of their members can be more readily dominated by localism, which often makes them resistant to the broader needs of the state as a whole" (p. 50). "... there is little correlation between high salaries and superior laws" (p. 78). "Limiting sessions intensifies all evils associated with legislative halls" (p. 93). "The tendency everywhere is for the debates on the floors of both houses of the state legislature to decline in importance, and for the real consideration of proposed legislation to be given by the committees" (p. 95).

4. The book is highly uneven in its treatment of evidence and reasoning for and against its recommendations. Probably it did the best job of balancing pros and cons on the question of unicameralism vs. bicameralism. On some points where the Committee thinks the state legislatures ought to do something that Congress is doing, the fact that Congress does it is presented as evidence that the state legislatures ought to do it; but on points where Congress is doing exactly what the Committee thinks state legislatures ought not to do, the misdeeds of Congress are not mentioned. The Committee asserts that local government units have "not proved satisfactory" as bases for construction of legislative districts and recommends that they be disregarded in laying out districts "insofar as is consistent with efficient election administration" (p. 46). There is no mention of the relation that party organization which is fitted to local government units bears to the ability of voters to learn about candidates for legislative posts and to get together in the effort to nominate or elect one candidate and defeat another. While the entire discussion of district making and assignment of representatives appears to be based on the presumption that the ratio of population to seats in the legislature ought to be uniform throughout the state, there is no mention of the likelihood that 50 legislators from the great city may be members of a common tightly-knit party organization and cast their votes in keeping with a common agreement or instruction, and so have a collective power quite out of proportion to the power of any other 50 legislators who speak for people living in smaller cities, towns, and rural areas.

5. Finally, the Committee does not supply guides for further inquiry. There are admissions of inadequate knowledge and pointings to needed research. But there are no precise formulations of problems that need to be explored, coupled with thoughtful comment about the setting of the problems in a bigger complex of which they are a part. This is not to say that this first report of the Committee will spur no one to careful and imaginative research on matters relating to state legislatures and their behavior. The Committee states that "The fundamental basis of all legislative improvement in the United States, both national and state, is no doubt a root-and-branch reform in our system of party politics with a view to creating more responsible party government" (p. 213). On page 88 it makes the positive recommendation that elections for members of state legislatures "should not be scheduled in presidential election years, or years when the mayors of large cities are elected." Who can fail to see the joinder of these two statements as a challenge for research?

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN.

Northwestern University.

Modern China's Foreign Policy. BY WERNER LEVI. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1953. Pp. 399. $5.50.)

Werner Levi has trod where angels fear to. His objective has been to analyze and interpret in 350 pages the nature of Chinese foreign policy over the eventful eleven decades since 1842, emphasizing the significant trends and causative factors, both internal and external. The Chinese response to the situations which have confronted them constitutes the focus of the analysis.

Beginning with a study of the inadequacy of the old Confucian order when confronted with the imperious Westerner, the author traces the development of the strategy of playing off the Western powers—and later also Japan—against each other, and the interplay between the movement for internal reform and foreign relations. He finds that Chinese policy favored the maintenance of China's territorial integrity, and that the development of Chinese nationalism was a response to the need for unity against repeated foreign encroachments. The relation between the Revolution of 1911 and foreign loans, and the diplomatic failures and successes of the T'uchun and Kuomintang periods are analyzed, and reference is made to the inability of Sun Yat-sen to obtain support from the West before he turned to the Soviet Union and the Communists for assistance.

The tragic events of the fifteen years 1937–1952 receive closer attention in the last third of the book. In evaluating the reasons for the fall of the Kuomintang on the mainland, Professor Levi draws a sharp distinction between the political debate in the United States and the historical record. In his judgment the blame rests primarily on the weaknesses of the Chiang Kai-shek regime and the difficulties inherent in the situation as a result of a long war and other internal factors, rather than upon the role played by the United States. The final chapters are devoted to an incisive summary of the theory and practice of Chinese Communist foreign policy. From such sources as Soviet Press Translations and Survey of China Mainland Press, material is gathered to trace the bases for the hate campaign against the United States (the source of all evil), relations with the Soviet Union (likely to remain very close for some time despite potentialities for friction), and Communist China's expansionist ambitions in Asia.

Professor Levi explains his failure to use Chinese language sources as "an omission that might justly be considered inexcusable if the purpose of the book were not analytical rather than descriptive." Although the value of his work might have been enhanced by the use of these sources, the wealth of materials in Western languages, extensively referred to in his notes, is probably sufficient for his purpose.

The difficulties confronting the author were not only those inherent in interpretation but also those of selection and emphasis. The omission of descriptive material and adequate maps may make possible a focus on analysis, but, by its assumption of considerable prior knowledge, it limits the usefulness of the book for the beginner. On the other hand, the scholar may complain that he remains uncertain as to the bases from which some of the inferences are drawn, and may at points question whether the descriptive data will adequately support some of the generalizations made. Was, for example, the reform edict of September 1, 1906 an attempt by the Manchu government to foster a modern nationalism (p. 92), or was it really based on a revival of Confucian principles? Again, what is meant by the generalization (p. 146) that the intellectuals as represented in the Kuomintang "were little superior to the war lords?"

It is certainly true that the inclusion of the descriptive material would have resulted in an unwieldy volume several times the length of this one. At the same time the virtue of brevity may be pushed to the point of sacrificing thoroughness. Professor Levi refers often to the relation of foreign policy to internal situations, but too frequently the underlying strategic, economic, and cultural factors and their effects on foreign relations are not carefully analyzed. A more thorough analysis would also require greater consideration of alternatives confronting policy makers. Finally, such vital matters as the Revolution of 1911, relations among the Soviet Union, the Chinese Communists, and the Kuomintang in the 1920's, American policy toward China during the Second World War, the Yalta agreements and the power vacuum after the war, all receive such hasty treatment that the author runs the danger of leaving his reader with erroneous impressions.

It follows that the results of Professor Levi's efforts are mixed. On the one hand, his book seems superficial and suggestive, rather than definitive. On the other, it contains some valuable insights. Viewed as a statement of one man's intelligent opinion about the nature of some very important events, the work is stimulating and provocative. The difficulties he encountered should not serve to discourage further analytical studies toward the same objectives.

ALFRED FERNBACH.

University of Virginia.

War Labor Boards in the Field. BY ALLAN R. RICHARDS. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1953. Pp. vii, 281. $1.25.)

When an agency of the federal government establishes field offices in various parts of the United States, what planning and forethought go into the decision to decentralize, and into the process of decentralization itself? What answers will be found to questions concerning the use of other agencies already in the field, the geographical jurisdiction of each field office, the problems of staffing the field offices, the extent of authority to be delegated, the fixing of guides and criteria for the exercise of delegated authority? How can the necessity for unified direction and policy determination be reconciled with the necessity for variations to meet local requirements, and industrial, geographical, and cultural differences prevailing in diverse sections of the country? How can authority and discretion be delegated, yet their exercise by field offices be effectively coordinated, supervised, and controlled? Shall responsibility be channeled through the regional director to the national office, or shall it be along functional lines with each functional division or bureau in the field responsible to its counterpart in the national office? Can dual or multiple and divided supervision be effective? Can technical and administrative supervision and responsibility be separated?

These and many other questions of administrative policy demand consideration before field offices are established, and should be resolved by careful thought and planning in the home office before regional directors are given responsibility for local administration of federal law. Allan R. Richards' study of war labor boards in the field reveals the attempts of one agency, the National War Labor Board, to meet these problems. The results of his study make it abundantly clear that too many of these questions were not only not resolved prior to the establishment of regional war labor board offices in 1942, but were never fully and carefully thought out and resolved by the time the Board—and its successor, the National Wage Stabilization Board—ceased to exist in 1947.

Perhaps it is too much to expect that an agency suddenly charged with the tremendous responsibilities of a national wage stabilization program plus the settlement of labor disputes in the hectic environment of a wartime economy should find the time for planning and thought, especially during its formative period. Those associated with the Board will quickly recall the pressure for action and reduction of "backlogs" which left little time for contemplation and theoretical analysis of administrative procedures. Yet, as the author points out, while the speed of war made planning more difficult, it at the same time made it more important. In this instance the difficulties of planning were not overcome. "If the National War Labor Board's program holds any administrative lesson," concludes the author, "it is that an agency considering decentralization must necessarily do a thorough job of substantive and procedural planning before decentralizing. In this regard the National War Labor Board failed miserably."

Here is a valuable case study of the administrative process in one wartime agency. Through the whole study runs a theme of confusion and frustration in regional offices originating in the failure of the national office to plan sufficiently for decentralization, to provide adequate guides and criteria for field decisions, and to clarify lines of authority and responsibility between national and regional offices. It is a case study which should be read by every administrator responsible for the direction of the work of field offices, for the War Labor Board was not unique in its "miserable failure." Similar shortcomings can be credited to older, peacetime agencies which have the time and opportunity to profit by the experiences of the War Labor Board so clearly scrutinized and exposed in this book.

Utilizing War Labor Board material now in the National Archives, interviews with former Board employees, and his own experience in one of the regional offices, and drawing on a strong background of public administration theory, the author has produced a worthwhile addition to the literature on a very important area of public administration, long neglected by scholars, known as field administration. The author emphasizes its importance by pointing out, as did the Hoover Commission, that "approximately ninety per cent of all federal employees" work in the field. The neglect is underlined by the comment that fewer than ten case studies of field problems are available, while the "literature on top level administration outnumbers the literature on field administration by at least twenty to one."

BYRON R. ABERNETHY.

Texas Technological College.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The American President. BY SIDNEY HYMAN.
(New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. 342.
$4.00.)

The evolution of the presidential office is one of the spectacular developments in American political history. The contrast of the undernourished years of General Washington's tenure and the luxuriance of the present office is sufficient to challenge the attention of scholars. In recent years there has appeared a veritable deluge of scholarly works upon different phases of this subject. This growth in the executive office features two distinct developments—administration and political leadership.

Most of our recent studies relate to some aspect of the administrative facet, from painstaking investigations of specific periods, like those of Leonard White on the earliest administrations, to those on the interrelations between legislative and administrative functions, such as that of Charles Hyneman.

Though scholars like Pendleton Herring have made memorable contributions, the growth of the president's political leadership has received much less attention. The subject is intriguing. A president may simultaneously be the recognized leader of a minority faction of his party, and of the whole people, depending upon the issues which are immediately involved. Crisis on the domestic and international fronts, with the resultant decline in partisanship, prepares the fallow for the emergence of the president as the representative of the whole people. Of recent presidents, Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and Dwight Eisenhower have unquestionably filled that role.

The present study by Sidney Hyman relates essentially to the political aspects of the presidential office. The author is interested in the types of individuals who are chosen by the American electorate and in the views which they have held concerning the scope of presidential powers. With the former, Mr. Hyman is quite successful. His analysis of "The President as an Artist" (Ch. 4) is like a breath of fresh air. He understands the problems of institutionalized political leadership. And he is quite familiar with the difficulties of a president in the patronage "rat race." He writes like a journalist, with verve and a scintillating style. But there are many lacunae in his knowledge of the personal qualities of those who have filled the presidential office. He knows Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, the two Roosevelts, and Truman quite well. But his conversance with, or perhaps his interest in, several of the less famous presidents is not apparent.

Though the author's approach is novel, and his treatment equally unconventional, many of his views represent a distinct contribution to the subject. For instance, he insists that our traditional classification of presidents as strong or weak, on the basis of their utilization of powers constitutionally delegated to one or the other departments of government, is unrealistic and not quite accurate historically (p. 66). All regarded themselves as constitutional officers. They were primarily strong or weak in relation to their ability to manipulate public opinion. The author is likewise cognizant of the preponderant power of the agrarian population in the nomination and election process; nevertheless he is a fairly effective defender of the present system, rather than of proposals for a nationwide presidential primary and the abolition of the electoral college. In all, the study is quite satisfactory and is a welcome addition to the literature on the presidential office.—CORTEZ A. M. EWING, University of Oklahoma.

Hidden Threads of History: Wilson through Roosevelt. BY LOUIS B. WEHLE. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ALLAN NEVINS. (New York: Macmillan Company. 1953. Pp. xix, 300. $4.00.)

The hidden threads of history here presented are the personal experiences and observations of a man who performed many public services and had constant close personal contacts with people who were themselves high in public affairs from Wilson through Roosevelt and on into the period of postwar reconstruction. In fact some of the more significant personal relationships which Mr. Wehle here reveals began somewhat earlier. He was in college with FDR, for example, and a friendship developed between the two men which was continued by correspondence and conferences until the Spring of 1944 when, on his own initiative, he conferred with the President concerning a successor to Vice President Wallace. Consequently, the part played by Mr. Wehle in Roosevelt's career and his analyses of the man are his most important contributions. His description of the TVA power struggle would probably come next.

Mr. Wehle believes that "obscure random occurrences have sometimes made history" and that lives of nations and of men often turn on narrow margins. Thus he undertakes here to reveal the "obscure occurrences" and "narrow margins" in which he may have played some part and to which he may have made some contribution. Naturally, not all of his efforts changed the course of history.

The Democrats did not go along with his suggestion in 1920 of a Hoover-Roosevelt slate for the national ticket. Some of the party leaders seemed sufficiently responsive to the recommendation but Mr. Hoover was something of a problem. He wasn't sure whether he was a Republican or a Democrat. The best he could do was to classify himself as a progressive with a small "p." Nor was Mr. Wehle successful in 1944 in persuading Mr. Roosevelt to accept James Byrnes as his running mate. The President agreed as to Byrnes' fitness but regarded him as unavailable on religious grounds—a former Roman Catholic who had become an Episcopalian as the result of marriage to a member of that faith. Mr. Wehle wanted someone from the deep South "to offset the enraging effect in the South of Mrs. Roosevelt's personal crusade for racial equality." He thought it unnecessary to mention this point to the President but he did indicate his firm conviction that Henry Wallace, whom he regarded as "superficial," "impulsive" and "immature," should not be renominated. He does not take credit, however, for blocking the renomination of Wallace nor for the nomination of Mr. Truman.

Those who wish a better understanding of the last three or four decades will discover in this carefully written account many interesting and informative sidelights. The author's observations of men and events are thoughtful and objective. Even his admiration for Roosevelt and the Roosevelt record is counterbalanced by serious qualifications. There were "gigantic blunders," he says, and many failures. He believes the President's "overconfidence in his superficial judgments, his shortsighted motives of party expediency, and his zest for the game of personal power," too often "led to a definitely second-rate statecraft." However, in preparing his own balance of accounts on this period he reaches the conclusion that the historian who undertakes to prepare a final balance sheet may find himself "as greatly overworked as was Roosevelt himself."—E. ALLEN HELMS, The Ohio State University.

Race, Jobs, and Politics: The Story of FEPC.

By LOUIS RUCHAMES (New York: Columbia University Press. 1953. Pp. x, 255. $3.75.)

Governmental action against discrimination in employment can be based, theoretically, on three different approaches: an educational program leading to voluntary cooperation; an educational program for long-range results coupled with a regulatory program with sanctions available for immediate gains; and finally, a regulatory program alone. Insofar as I know, the third approach has never been suggested. However, both of the first two methods have been tried, and the results obtained from the national FEPC and the eleven state and twenty-eight city FEPC's seem to indicate that under certain conditions the educational, voluntary approach has been of little value, but that the educational program coupled with the use of sanctions when they were necessary has had some success. Professor Ruchames' book tells the story of the use of the first method by the two Fair Employment Practice Committees created by executive order during World War II. He begins by tracing the forces that led to the issuance of the first order (there were ultimately three), and then examines the Committees in action. Because of the lack of funds, the first FEPC did not investigate individual charges of discrimination, but devoted its energies to holding public hearings throughout the country in an effort to educate the public as to the government's anti-discrimination policy. With the establishment of fifteen field offices, the second FEPC shifted its emphasis and did attempt to resolve individual complaints—with some notable successes and failures.

Much space is devoted to a discussion of FEPC's friends and enemies. Management groups and the AF of L were generally antagonistic, while the CIO was usually cooperative. Other government agencies were sometimes friendly and sometimes antagonistic. USES offices in the North were generally cooperative, while those in the South often assisted employers wishing to discriminate. The War Shipping Administration, the Maritime Commission, and the War Manpower Commission oftentimes did not seem to believe that the war could be won and discrimination be reduced at the same time. Relations with Congress were never good, with the friends of FEPC refusing to come to the aid of the Committee when their colleagues voted inadequate funds, accused the Committee of being communistic, and used arguments which were blatantly false. Indeed, the purpose of the Smith Committee hearings in 1944 seemed to be to discredit the Committee and to provide a forum and lend support to a particularly difficult respondent.

One chapter is devoted to FEPC progeny, both state and local. Inasmuch as these state and local FEPC's are the only ones in existence at this time, I should have preferred a fuller treatment of the subject. In one of the most interesting chapters, the author raises questions about FEPC and private enterprise, FEPC and the South, and FEPC and industrial strife. Here, again, a fuller discussion would have been welcome.

Much of the author's material has been reported elsewhere, but what is presented is well written (although somewhat repetitive) and should be useful for students. The book as a whole, and the chapter dealing with "The Committee in Structure and Function" in particular, would make an interesting assignment in a course in public administration. The last chapter, in which the author discusses "The Movement for Permanent FEPC Legislation," is a good case study of parliamentary maneuvering designed to defeat a proposed bill. Also, the book would be useful to illustrate the shift in American thinking from laissez-faire to positive government.—FELIX RACKOW, Brown University.

The History of Voting in New Jersey: A Study of Election Machinery, 1664-1911. BY RICHARD P. MCCORMICK. (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 228. $5.00.)

A scholarly "history of the development of the election process in New Jersey from the beginnings of English settlement down into the twentieth century," which makes a valuable contribution to a field hitherto neglected except for the colonial period and with respect to special aspects of the subject in a few states since that time.

Public Opinion and Propaganda: A Book of Readings. EDITED BY DANIEL KATZ, DORWIN CARTWRIGHT, SAMUEL ELDERSVELD

AND ALFRED MCCLUNG LEE. (New York: The Dryden Press. 1954. Pp. xx, 779. $6.25.)

A compilation of well-chosen selections from the contributions of 91 publicists and writers in the various social sciences to the subject of public opinion, prepared under the auspices of the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues and designed for use in all the social disciplines which give attention to the study of public opinion and propaganda.

Index to Congressional Committee Hearings in the Library of the United States House of Representatives Prior to January 1, 1951. COMPILED BY RUSSELL SAVILLE. (Washington: Government Printing Office. 1954. Pp. 485.)

The Index for the most part lists House Committee hearings. The main arrangement is alphabetical by title. There is also an arrangement by committees, and a table by Congress and bill numbers.—J.B.C.

Metropolitan Los Angeles: A Study in Integration. VIII. Water Supply. BY VINCENT OSTROM. (Los Angeles: The Haynes Foundation. 1953. Pp. xii, 177. Cloth, $2.75; paper, $2.25.)

A study of the problem of water supply for the metropolitan region of Southern California with much wider interest than the sub-title might indicate. Although there is an emphasis upon the administrative phases of the problem, the study extends generally to governmental aspects.

Era of the Oath: Northern Loyalty Tests during the Civil War and Reconstruction. BY HAROLD MELVIN HYMAN. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1954. Pp. xiv, 229. $5.00.)

Alan Barth's description of our day as the "era of the oath" is applied by the author to the Civil War and Reconstruction, as he traces the historical events (without much analysis of court decisions). He concludes that the oaths failed: they did not measure loyalty, were condemned by the courts and eventually discarded, and were taken by persons holding neutral reservations not contemplated by their framers.

The Test of Freedom. BY NORMAN THOMAS. (New York: W. W. Norton & Co. 1954. Pp. 211. $3.00.)

A further elaboration of the well-known viewpoint of the author on the subject of civil liberties dealing with "the state of liberty under the twin attacks called communism and McCarthyism."

From the Declaration of Independence to the Constitution: The Roots of American Constitutionalism. EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY CARL J. FRIEDRICH AND ROBERT G. McCLOSKEY. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1954. Pp. lxxviii, 71. $.75.)

A reprint of several basic documents, including the Declaration of Independence, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution, with a sophisticated 60-page introduction on the background of political thought and the adoption of the documents.

Elihu Root and the Conservative Tradition. BY RICHARD W. LEOPOLD. EDITED BY OSCAR HANDLIN. (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1954. Pp. x, 222. $3.00.)

This volume reviews the career of Elihu Root as lawyer, Secretary of War, Secretary of State, United States Senator, and elder statesman with a view to assessing his contribution to American conservatism, the lead in the formulation of which, according to the editor, has generally fallen into the hands of lawyers, who are "most sensitive to the restraints of the legal system" and who wish "to extend those restraints to all politics."

Franklin D. Roosevelt: The Ordeal. BY FRANK FRIEDEL. (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1954. Pp. 320. $6.00.)

The Ordeal is the second volume of the author's projected six-volume life of Franklin D.

Roosevelt. It carries the subject from the end of his Navy career, through his campaign for the Vice-Presidency and his siege with polio, up to his election as Governor of New York.

The Republican Roosevelt. BY JOHN MORTON BLUM. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 170. $3.50.)

An attempt at a somewhat new interpretation of Theodore Roosevelt as President and political leader by an associate editor of The Letters of Theodore Roosevelt (8 vols., Cambridge, 1951-1954).

Review and Reflection: A Half-Century of Labor Relations. BY CYRUS S. CHING. (New York: B. C. Forbes and Sons Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. vi, 204. $3.95.)

An informal and interesting presentation of the experiences and conclusions of a prominent figure in the field of labor relations in the United States during the last fifty years.

American Planning and Civic Annual. EDITED BY JAMES HARLEAN. (Washington: American Planning and Civic Assoc. 1953. Pp. xii, 162.)

A joint publication of the American Planning and Civic Association and the National Conference on State Parks, which presents addresses and reflects the tenor of discussions at the 1953 conferences of the two organizations. The Civic Association's meeting stressed metropolitan and regional planning, and that of the National Conference gave attention to park progress and financing.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Durham, James A. Congress, the Constitution and Crosskey. Indiana Law Journal. Spring, 1954.

Freund, Paul A. Umpiring the Federal System. Columbia Law Review. April, 1954.

Lerner, Wilbur R. Fred M. Vinson in the Executive Branch. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1954.

Nigro, Felix A. Senate Confirmation. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1954.

Oliver, William W. Vinson in Congress. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1954.

The Question of Statehood for Hawaii and Alaska. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. June-July, 1954.

Rogers, Lindsay. The Nation's Government: Checks and Balances. Think. April, 1954.

Schubert, Glendon Austin, Jr. Politics and the Constitution: The Bricker Amendment during 1953. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Schwarzer, William W., and Robert R. Wood. Presidential Power and Aggression Abroad: A Constitutional Dilemma. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1954.

Scott, Hugh, and Rufus King. Rules for Congressional Committees: An Analysis of House Resolution 447. Virginia Law Review. April, 1954.

Wechsler, Herbert. The Political Safeguards of Federalism: The Role of the States in the Composition and Selection of the National Government. Columbia Law Review. April, 1954.

Williams, C. Dickerman. The Office of the President: A Reorganization Is Needed. American Bar Association Journal. April, 1954.

State Government

Abrams, Yehuda H. Recent Developments in the Modes of Collection of the Use Tax. George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

de Grazia, Alfred. State Constitutions—Are They Growing Longer? State Government. April, 1954.

Elmer, Arthur C. State Parks: Their Needs and Problems. State Government. June, 1954.

Gove, Samuel K. State and Local Government in Illinois: A Bibliography. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1954.

Kammerer, Gladys M. The Governor as Chief Administrator in Kentucky. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Landers, Frank M., and Howard D. Hamilton. State Administrative Reorganization in Michigan: The Legislative Approach. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1954.

Oberst, Paul, and Thomas P. Lewis. Claims Against the State of Kentucky—The Board of Claims. Kentucky Law Journal. March, 1954.

Ross, Russell M. The Powers of the Governor of Iowa. Iowa Journal of History. April, 1954.

Rothenberg, Leon. State Budgets—1954. State Government. May, 1954.

Ruud, Millard H. A Legislative Audit of Judicial Opinions—A Proposal. Texas Law Review. May, 1954.

State and Local Government in Utah. Utah Foundation, Salt Lake City. 1954.

Trewhitt, H. L. Tennessee Amends Her Constitution. State Government. June, 1954.

Weir, Robert H. Reorganization—1954 Style. State Government. April, 1954.

Local Government

Alford, Albert L. Encouragement for the County. County Officer. May, 1954.

Austensen, Phillip J., and J. B. Zatman. Montgomery County at the Crossroads. County Officer. May, 1954.

Balmer, Bert. Watersheds—Their Management in the Pacific Northwest. Western City. May, 1954.

Bollens, John C. Cities and the Urban Fringe. Public Management. June, 1954.

Dick, Bruce R., et al. Newmarket Looks Ahead: A Community Survey. Department of Government, University of New Hampshire. 1954.

Haar, Charles M. Wayne Township: Zoning for Whom?—In Brief Reply. Harvard Law Review. April, 1954.

Heyerdahl, Carl L. Indiana Still Seeks Home Rule. National Municipal Review. April, 1954.

Jones, Victor. Urban Counties—Suburban or Metropolitan Governments? Public Management. May, 1954.

Lawson, Harry O. Municipal Finance: A Study of Nine First Class Cities. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. [1954.]

Lewis, Thomas P., James S. Kostas, and Charles N. Carnes. Consolidation—Complete or Functional—of City and County Governments in Kentucky. Kentucky Law Journal. March, 1954.

McGeary, M. Nelson. Councilman Learns His Job. National Municipal Review. June, 1954.

Nolan, Val, Jr., and Frank E. Horack, Jr. How Small a House?—Zoning for Minimum Space Requirements. Harvard Law Review. April, 1954.

Pope, H. G. New Agencies in City Government. Public Management. June, 1954.

Rodda, Clinton. The Accomplishment of Aesthetic Purposes under the Police Power. Southern California Law Review. February, 1954.

Scott, John L. Are Suburbs Parasites? Public Management. May, 1954.

Scott, Stanley. Annexation? Incorporation? A Guide for Community Action. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 2nd ed., revised. 1954.

Sherwood, Frank P. What Is Behind the City's Budget? Public Management. April, 1954.

Studenski, Paul. New York Area Still

Stymied. National Municipal Review. May, 1954.

White, Melvin and Anne. Impact of Economic Fluctuations on Municipal Finance. National Tax Journal. March, 1954.

Wrongful Subdivision Approved by the Plan Commission: Remedies of the Buyer and City. Indiana Law Journal. Spring, 1954.

Intergovernmental Relations

Bowen, Don L. City-County Fiscal Relations. County Officer. May, 1954.

Eminent Domain: Intergovernmental Conflicts. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1954.

Federal-State-Local Relations: A Selected Bibliography. American Municipal Association and Council of State Governments. 1954.

Hart, Henry M., Jr. The Relations between State and Federal Law. Columbia Law Review. April, 1954.

Kansas Commission on Federal-State Relations: A Tentative Report. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. [1954.]

Ratchford, B. U. Revenue Bonds and Tax Immunity. National Tax Journal. March, 1954.

Rhyne, Charles S. Broader Inquiry Advocated. National Municipal Review. April, 1954.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Alagia, D. P. A Case for the Bricker Amendment. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1954.

Allen, Francis A. Chief Justice Vinson and the Theory of Constitutional Government: A Tentative Appraisal. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1954.

Antieau, Chester James. The Federalism of Freedom. Kentucky Law Journal. March, 1954.

Degler, Carl N. A New Effort to Rewrite the Constitution. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

Dixon, Robert G., Jr. The Fifth Amendment and Federal Immunity Statutes. Part II. George Washington Law Review. April, 1954.

Elias, George, Jr., and Neal E. Williams. The Right of Silence before Congressional Committees: First Amendment Guarantees. George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

From Judicial Grant to Legislative Power: The Admiralty Clause in the Nineteenth Century. Harvard Law Review. May, 1954.

Green, Leon. Public Destruction of Private Reputation—A Remedy? Minnesota Law Review. May, 1954.

Huad, Leo Albert. The Fifth Amendment—

An Evaluation. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1954.

Indritz, Phineas. Post Civil War Ordinances Prohibiting Racial Discrimination in the District of Columbia. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1954.

King, Rufus. Immunity for Witnesses: An Inventory of Caveats. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1954.

Latham, Earl. The Supreme Court and the Supreme People. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Limiting State Action by the Fourteenth Amendment: Consequences of Abandoning the Theory of First Amendment Incorporation. Harvard Law Review. April, 1954.

Lockhart, William B., and Robert C. McClure. Literature, the Law of Obscenity, and the Constitution. Minnesota Law Review. March, 1954.

Malick, Clay P. Terry v. Adams: Governmental Responsibility for the Protection of Civil Rights. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

Neill, Agnes A. The Attorney General's List of Subversive Organizations: Due Process Aspects. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1954.

Trimble, E. G. Search and Seizure under the Fourth Amendment as Interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. Kentucky Law Journal. March, 1954.

Wolfram, Harold W. Peril, Pursuit and the Privilege against Self-Incrimination: The Problem of the Apparently Innocuous Question. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Valentine, Andrew J. Congressional Investigation of Subversive Activities Where There Is Danger of State Prosecution. George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

American Bar Research Center Publication No. 1. Part I: List of Unpublished Legal Theses in American Law Schools. Part II: List of Current Legal Research in American Law Schools. 1954.

Bradway, John S. Legal Aid: Its Concept, Organization and Importance. Louisiana Law Review. April, 1954.

Broeder, Dale W. The Functions of the Jury: Facts or Fictions? University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr. The Public Security and Wire Tapping. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Evasion of Supreme Court Mandates in Cases Remanded to State Courts since 1941. Harvard Law Review. May, 1954.

The Federal Taxing Power and Regulation of Crime. Indiana Law Journal. Spring, 1954.

Howard, N. R. A Newspaper Editor Looks at Canon 35. Journal of the American Judicature Society. April, 1954.

McCoy, Philbrick. The Judge and Courtroom Publicity. Journal of the American Judicature Society. April, 1954.

Meltzer, Bernard D. Involuntary Confessions: The Allocation of Responsibility between Judge and Jury. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Scott, Austin W., Jr. Federal Control over Use of Coerced Confessions in State Criminal Cases—Some Unsettled Problems. Indiana Law Journal. Winter, 1954.

Sellin, Thorsten, ed. Prisons in Transformation. [Symposium.] The Annals. May, 1954.

The Statute of Limitations in Criminal Law: A Penetrable Barrier to Prosecution. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1954.

Vanderbilt, Arthur T. The First Five Years of the New Jersey Courts under the Constitution of 1947. Rutgers Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Ballard, Rene N. The Administrative Theory of William Howard Taft. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

Bernstein, Marver H. The Politics of Adjudication. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Brown, Paula. Bureaucracy in a Government Laboratory. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Budge, Hamilton W., and C. Addison Keeler, Jr. Exhaustion of Administrative Remedies. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Friedsam, H. J. Bureaucrats as Heroes. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Harris, Overton. Some Principles Governing the Board for Correction of Naval Records and the Federal Statute Creating It. Georgetown Law Journal. January, 1954.

Horowitz, Morris A. Administrative Problems of the Wage Stabilization Board. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. April, 1954.

Jaffe, Louis L. The Effective Limits of the Administrative Process: A Reevaluation. Harvard Law Review. May, 1954.

———. Primary Jurisdiction Reconsidered. The Anti-Trust Laws. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1954.

Kidney, Edith B. Fringe Benefits for Salaried Employees in Government and Industry. Civil Service Assembly. 1954.

Kintner, Earl W. The Status of Hearing Officers: A Quest for Information. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1954.

Lawrence, David L. Balancing Good Politics and Good Administration. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1954.

Lawton, Frederick J. The Role of the Administrator in the Federal Government. Public Administration Review. Spring, 1954.

McFadden, Richard Charles. Labor-Management Relations in the Illinois State Service, 1952. Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations, University of Illinois. 1954.

Sherwood, Frank P. Economic Mobility and a Flexible Civil Service. Public Personnel Review. April, 1954.

Storey, Robert G. The Second Hoover Commission: Its Legal Task Force. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1954.

Weinberg, A. A. A New Look at Retirement Systems. Public Management. April, 1954.

Wengert, E. S., G. Lyle Belsley, and Charles H. Bland. Prescription for the Public Service. Civil Service Assembly. 1954.

Youmans, E. Grant. The Administrative Mind. Public Personnel Review. April, 1954.

Young, Philip. A Program for the Improvement of the Federal Civil Service. Public Personnel Review. April, 1954.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Berdahl, Clarence A. Democratic Presidential Politics in Illinois, 1952. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1954.

Breckenridge, Adam Carlyle. Pre-primary Trial Dropped. National Municipal Review. April, 1954.

Dorr, Harold M. Nomination by Money Deposit. National Municipal Review. June, 1954.

Heckman, Jerome H. Diversification of Control of the Media of Mass Communication—Policy or Fallacy? Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1954.

Hudson, Ruth Alice, and Hjalmar Rosen. Union Political Action: the Member Speaks. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. April, 1954.

Hyman, Herbert H., and Paul B. Sheatsley. The Political Appeal of President Eisenhower. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-1954.

Law and the Entertainment Industry. [Symposium.] California Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Literary and Artistic Products and Copyright Problems. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Spring, 1954.

National Party Convention Sites, 1832-1952. Iowa Journal of History. April, 1954.

Nimmer, Melville B. The Law of Ideas. Southern California Law Review. February, 1954.

Steiner, Ivan D. Primary Group Influences on Public Opinion. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Stone, Kathryn H. Choosing the President of the U.S.A. Carrie Chapman Catt Memorial Fund. 1954.

Turano, Peter J. Organization and Operation of the Democratic Party in Wayne County, Michigan. Edwards Brothers. 1953.

Verification of Election Results. Illinois Legislative Council. 1954.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Dakin, Melvin G. The Capital Gains Treasure Chest: Rational Extension or Expedient Distortion? Louisiana Law Review. April, 1954.

Defense Against Recession: Policy for Greater Economic Stability. Committee for Economic Development. 1954.

Federal Finances. 1. The Problem. 2. Reducing Expenditures. 3. The Tax Program. Committee on Federal Tax Policy. 1954.

Kassman, H. S., and J. J. Sexton, Jr. The Income Tax Treatment of Cooperatives. National Tax Journal. March, 1954.

Pechman, Joseph A. Yield of the Individual Income Tax during a Recession. National Tax Journal. March, 1954.

Business and Labor

Aaron, Benjamin. The California Jurisdictional Strike Act. Southern California Law Review. April, 1954.

Bayne, David C., S. J., Mortimer M. Caplin, Frank D. Emerson, and Franklin C. Latham. Proxy Regulation and the Rule-Making Process: The 1954 Amendments. Virginia Law Review. May, 1954.

Cohen, Samuel Harris. Labor, Taft-Hartley and the Proposed Amendments. Labor Law Journal. June, 1954.

Cohen, Sanford. The Impasse in Collective Bargaining Law. Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

Edelman, Murray. Labor's Influence in Foreign Policy. Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

Forkosch, Morris D. Judicial Review of NLRB Representation Proceedings. Labor Law Journal. April, 1954.

France, Robert R. Seizure in Emergency Labor Disputes in Virginia. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. April, 1954.

Jacobs, Joseph M. Are "Independent Contractors" Really Independent? Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

Kramer, Victor H. The Antitrust Division and the Supreme Court: 1890-1953. Virginia Law Review. May, 1954.

Krislov, Joseph. Administrative Approaches to Craft Severance. Labor Law Journal. April, 1954.

Lahne, Herbert J. The Duration of Labor Agreements and the Contract Bar Doctrine of the National Labor Relations Board. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Levinson, David. The Guaranteed Annual Wage and Unemployment Compensation. Labor Law Journal. June, 1954.

Lewis, J. Norman. Picketing in New York State. Labor Law Journal. April, 1954.

Nolan, John E., Jr. The SEC and Allowances in Corporate Reorganization. Georgetown Law Journal. March, 1954.

O'Shaughnessy, James B. An Amendment to Taft-Hartley: A Rejection of Racial Discrimination. Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

Riesenfeld, Stefan A. The New American Patent Act in the Light of Comparative Law: Part II. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. April, 1954.

The Role of Contempt Proceedings in Enforcing Orders of the NLRB. Columbia Law Review. April, 1954.

The SEC's No-Sale Rule and Exchange of Securities Pursuant to Voluntary Reorganization. Harvard Law Review. May, 1954.

Seidel, Arthur H. Venue in Patent Litigation. George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

Sherman, Sidney. Primary Strikes and Secondary Boycotts. Labor Law Journal. April, 1954.

Smedley, Robert W. A Plan for Union Democracy. Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

von Mehren, Robert B. The Antitrust Laws and Regulated Industries: The Doctrine of Primary Jurisdiction. Harvard Law Review. April, 1954.

Weston, Glen E. Resale Price Maintenance and Market Integration: Fair Trade or Foul Play? George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

Wyle, Benjamin, and William H. Englander.

"Free Speech" or Lawful Coercion? Labor Law Journal. April, 1954.

Agriculture

The Proposal to Apply "Flexible" Price Supports to Basic Farm Products. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. April, 1954.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Altmeyer, Arthur J. Your Stake in Social Security. Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 206. 1954.

Bogert, George Gleason. Proposed Legislation Regarding State Supervision of Charities. Michigan Law Review. March, 1954.

Horovitz, Samuel B. Workmen's Compensation—Expressing the Claimants' Views. Mississippi Law Journal. May, 1954.

Military Affairs and National Security

Davis, F. James. Conceptions of Official Leader Roles in the Air Force. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Gerwig, Robert. Judicial Control of Administrative Discretion Exercised by Military Authorities. Mississippi Law Journal. May, 1954.

Goldberg, Alvin I. The Scope of Judicial Review in Criminal Prosecutions for Refusing to Submit to Induction. George Washington Law Review. April, 1954.

Jurisdiction over Civilians under Article 3(A) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice—the Toth Case. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Mack, Raymond W. The Prestige System of an Air Base: Squadron Rankings and Morale. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

McLean, Joseph E. Planning for Civil Defense. National Municipal Review. June, 1954.

The Move for New Internal Security Measures. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. May, 1954.

Snedeker, James. Military Justice. Journal of the State Bar of California. April, 1954.

Walker, Daniel. An Evaluation of the United States Court of Military Appeals. Northwestern University Law Review. January-February, 1954.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Include Coffee under Commodity Exchange Act. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. National Forest Grazing Lands. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Military and Naval Construction. Hearings. Also House Report No. 1679. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Federal Reserve Act Amendments. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Technical Cooperation Administration (Educational and Training Activities). Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Colorado River Storage Project. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Revising the Organic Act of the Virgin Islands. House Report No. 1603. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Amending Railroad Retirement Act, Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Amending Securities Act of 1933, Securities Exchange Act of 1934, Trust Indenture Act of 1939, and Investment Company Act of 1940. Hearing. Also House Report No. 1542. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Public Health Service Act (Grant-in-Aid Amendments). Hearings. Also House Report No. 1543. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Public Works. Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1954. Hearings. Also House Report No. 1527. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Rules. Legislative Procedure. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Communist Methods of Infiltration (Entertainment). Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist Activities in the Baltimore Area. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist Activities in the Chicago Area. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist Activities in the Philadelphia Area. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Organized Communism in the United States. House Report No. 1694. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Compensation and Pension Bills for Veterans and Their Dependents. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Extension of Time for Initiating Courses under Public Law 550 and Completion of Courses under Public Laws 16 and 894. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Social Security Act Amendments of 1954. Hearings. Also House Report No. 1698. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Progress Report—First Session. House Report No. 1610. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

House and Senate. Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs. Termination of Federal Supervision over Certain Tribes of Indians. Joint Hearings before Subcommittees. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. January 1954 Economic Report of the President. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. General Farm Program. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Regulation of Coffee Futures Trading. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Appropriations. Military Construction, 1954. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Doctor Draft Act Amendments. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Reserve Officer Personnel Act of 1954. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Gold Reserve Act Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Housing Act of 1954. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Progress Report on RFC Liquidation. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Study of Coffee Prices. Hearings before Special Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Finance. Employment Security Administrative Financing Act. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. The Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Subversion and Espionage in Defense Establishments and Industry. Hearings before Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Revision of the Organic Act of the Virgin Islands. Senate Report No. 1271. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Appointment of Representatives in Time of National Emergency. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1459. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Composition and Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Item Veto. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Juvenile Delinquency (National, Federal, and Youth-Serving Agencies). Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Power Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1954.

———. Subversive Influence in Certain Labor Organizations. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Antidiscrimination in Employments. Hearings before Subcommittee on Civil Rights. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. President's Health Recommendations and Related Measures. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. President's Recommendations Relating to Education. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Fringe Benefits for Federal Employees. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1190. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Rules and Administration. Voting in the Armed Services. Senate Report No. 1471. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund. Senate Doc. No. 121. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Retirement Policy for Federal Personnel. Senate Doc. No. 89. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Segregation in the Public Schools. [Opinion of the Supreme Court, Brown v.

Board of Education.] Senate Doc. No. 125. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Other Federal

Department of Commerce. Appraisal of Census Programs. Report of the Intensive Review Committee. 1954.

———. Bureau of the Census. Governments Division. Local Government in Metropolitan Areas. 1954.

———. State Government Finances in 1953. 1954.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Public Health Service. Health Manpower Source Book. Section 4: County Data. Prepared by Margaret Y. Pennell and Marion E. Altenderfer. 1954.

Department of Labor. Bureau of Labor Statistics. Consumer Cooperatives in the United States. Bulletin No. 1158. 1954.

———. Workmen's Compensation in the United States. Bulletin. No 1149. 1954.

Federal Communications Commission. Statistics of the Communications Industry in the United States . . . 1952. 1954.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Doctrine of Responsible Party Government: Its Origins and Present State. BY AUSTIN RANNEY. (Urbana: The University of Illinois Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 176. Paper, $3.00; cloth, $4.00.)

Most of the recent controversial literature regarding party government contains little or no reference to the work of earlier generations of political scientists and fails to profit by their contributions. Professor Ranney sets out to analyze the works of a group of these writers and to discover what they have to contribute to the present disputation. He selects for study the writings of Wilson, Lowell, Ford, Goodnow, Ostrogorski, and Croly, and concludes that "There is very little indeed in the present-day discussion of the doctrine of responsible party government that they did not consider and, in some respects, consider more thoroughly and satisfactorily than any of the writers of our own time are doing" (p. 155).

What the study shows to an even greater extent is that the earlier writers were guilty of most of the same mistakes and incompletenesses of analysis that plague the subject today. In some degree, Mr. Ranney reveals these errors by his own dissection of the problems. Following the course between the Scylla of logomachy and the Charybdis of ambiguity and confusion arising out of the loose use of words, he holds a steady tiller. Not all confusion is avoided, but definite progress is made.

The author points out, for instance, that writers frequently move from the existent to the ideal without realizing their shift, and that they often overlook the fact that the requirements of democracy within the parties may conflict with the necessities of democracy between the parties. He makes it clear that supporters of "party government" who believe that their opponents simply fail to understand the logic of the political process seriously underestimate the depth of the chasm that separates them from their opposition.

But Professor Ranney, and many of the contemporary writers he refers to, would do well to reread Walter Lippmann and remind themselves of the dangers entailed in the use of such terms as "the people" and "the will of the majority." Writers pro and con on majority rule have concentrated too much on the questions of what ought to happen when a majority wills "X," and of what institutions would best secure this result. Since, as all followers of opinion polls must realize, a majority will or opinion on most of the questions that governments have to answer does not exist, this controversy becomes, if not irrelevant, at least peripheral. Along with the belief that "the people" have a will on most political issues frequently goes the conviction that they can do no more than say "yes" or "no" to questions over whose formulation they have no control. Thus in England Bagehot and in this country Henry Jones Ford, with his emphasis on the limited role of the voter, combine majoritarianism with philosophies that are essentially aristocratic. (The fact of this combination seems to have escaped the notice of writers on this subject.) The sharp distinction between control and participation on which such a theory must rest is indeed far less valid than the largely discredited distinction between politics and administration. The truth of the matter is that there is both less and more "popular will" than writers of the "majoritarian" and "party government" schools seem to believe. It may be suggested that we need less attention to the question posed by the author, "What is democratic government, and what does it require?" and more to the questions, "What kind of (democratic) government do we want, what do we have, and how do we get from here to there?"

If Professor Ranney's book serves to stimulate attention to these questions, and to provide useful aids to analysis, it will have earned its keep, and more.—J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College.

Democracy in Alberta: The Theory and Practice of a Quasi-Party System. By C. B. MACPHERSON. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 258. $5.50.)

Students of comparative government and of political parties have written extensively of variations in party systems. Several general descriptive concepts have become familiar, although their use is often qualified by warnings that unique characteristics attach to every party system.

There is the multi-party system, chiefly associated with continental countries; there is the two- or three-party system, chiefly associated with Anglo-American democracy; there is one-party totalitarian government; and there is no-party or nonpartisan government, most often advocated for local jurisdictions where efficiency of administration rather than decision on public policies is the principal goal.

In this book on democratic government in the province of Alberta, Canada, Professor Macpherson develops the concept of a "quasi-party" system. He argues that between 1921 and 1935, when the United Farmers of Alberta dominated provincial politics, and since 1935, when control abruptly shifted to the Social Credit movement, a type of party government has prevailed that does not fit the conventional concepts and cannot be thought of adequately as a deviation from them. He suggests that this quasi-party system may be found in others of the prairie provinces, and to a degree in Canadian federal government, and that its roots in the social and economic structure are sufficiently deep to make it a continuing twentieth-century political form.

A social-economic-political movement captures most of the legislative seats. Control is not complete, however, for there is organized party opposition that wins a few seats. Because the movement wins elections and must govern, it displays enough of the essential attributes of a political party to be called one. Yet in the content of the movement's program, emphasis falls on effective administration rather than policy formation, and there is deliberate rejection of alternate-party government. These are the distinctive political features in Alberta.

Two basic characteristics of the province's economy are cited to explain its political organization. It is a petit-bourgeois society made up preponderantly of "independent commodity producers," and it occupies a position of quasi-colonial dependence on the financial and manufacturing interests of eastern Canada. The homogeneity of the economy provides no basis for a competitive party politics within the province, and the party system in the dominion government is viewed as the instrument by which the agricultural provinces are exploited.

Historically, these two conditions led to the imperfectly fulfilled experiences of "delegate democracy" under the U.F.A. and "plebiscitarian democracy" under Social Credit. The author traces these experiences, and then interprets and evaluates them in terms of two theories of the function of party. He prefers the class theory of democracy, first developed prior to universal suffrage, in which the party system contains and moderates class opposition and protects against arbitrary government, rather than the prevalent pluralistic theory of twentieth-century, liberal-democratic thought in which the party system mediates neutrally among numerous diverse group interests. He concludes in the end that in the specific conditions of Alberta the quasi-party system can perform in a reduced degree the functions of a regular party system, and is the only system that can do so.

The book is the fourth of a series sponsored by the Canadian Social Science Research Council dealing with the development of the Social Credit movement in Alberta. It is not of the same mood with much contemporary empirical research in the United States, and some readers less familiar with the scene than the author may view with surprise—and certainly will view with envy—the essential simplicity and confidence of his analysis. The theoretical scheme as well as the descriptive data in the volume will warrant the attention and the appreciation of all students of party government.—ALEXANDER HEARD, University of North Carolina.

Evolution of Provincial Autonomy in India, 1858 to 1950, with Special Reference to Uttar Pradesh. By P. N. MASALDAN. (Bombay: Hind Kitabs Ltd. 1953. Pp. viii, 215. Rs. 10-0.)

The main feature of this competent contribution in the field of Indian constitutional history by Dr. Masaldan of Lucknow University is a concise and methodically-organized description of the institutions of provincial government erected by the Constitution of 1935. Emphasis is on mechanics rather than dynamics. However, there is a valuable survey of the operation of the system in Uttar Pradesh (the United Provinces), where a ministry composed of such notables as Pt. Pant, Dr. K. N. Katju, and Madame Pandit took office in 1937, in accordance with the controversial decision of the Congress party not to boycott the Constitution. The author concludes that, until the breakdown of the system over the issue of India's participation in the war, there was harmonious cooperation between the Ministry and the British-appointed Governor, and that the popular Assembly was able to produce "some very important and useful" legislation. A somewhat cursory "Postscript" describes the provisions relating to state government in the 1950 constitution, thus illuminating the great structural similarities between the old and the new systems and, hence, the firm continuity prevailing in the development of contemporary Indian political institutions.

One issue having great relevance for the actual viability of provincial autonomy is alluded to in a fascinating manner by Dr. Masaldan, but not pursued. He quotes without comment the judgment of the Simon Commission of 1927 that "an initial difficulty" in the formulation of a federal scheme for India arose from the fact that the existing territorial units were mere administrative areas rather than states "possessed of individuality and consciousness," and that "No one of them has been deliberately formed with a view to its suitability as a self-governing unit within a federated whole. . . ." The current intensity of agitation for reorganization of states on a linguistic basis testifies that this "initial difficulty" has been inherited as an urgent problem in free India.—GENE D. OVERSTREET, Michigan State College.

Russia: What Next? BY ISAAC DEUTSCHER.
(New York: Oxford University Press. 1953.
Pp. vii, 230. $3.00.)

In this, the third of his four books bearing on Soviet Russia, Mr. Deutscher has embarked on a journey into prophecy via the route of wishful thinking. His purpose is to inform us that "Stalinism" is dying and (from all appearances) is about to give way to a "democratic regeneration" instituted from above by Malenkov and his fellow future reformers.

Deutscher sees Stalinism as a blending of the Bolshevik Revolution with the barbaric, nationalistic, and despotic traditions of old Russia. This unhappy union emerged, in his opinion, because the failure of socialist revolutions abroad drove the Bolsheviks into a policy of national isolation—a development which threw them back upon the "barbarism" of the Russian environment and forced them to abandon proletarian democracy in favor of autocracy. Stalin succeeded to power because he more than anyone represented these new circumstances. ("The trend of the time found in Stalin its 'organ'.")

Stalinism, however, was bound to destroy the conditions necessary for its own self-perpetuation. By promoting technology, education, and economic planning, by socializing industry and collectivizing agriculture, and by other such "achievements" that remain "great and universal in the Russian Revolution," Stalinism has fashioned a new set of conditions that are out of joint with the despotism, the "primitive magic," and the national isolation upon which the regime has previously rested. The new generation, Malenkov among them, is aware of this disjunction and is in revolt against Stalinist "primitive magic." It is eager to introduce "rationalization" into all spheres of national life, and to achieve a national (and presumably democratic) political system. What Deutscher is saying, essentially, is that an advanced culture (technology plus Marxism) has been victorious over a backward culture (old Russia) with which it was compelled, for a time, to live. The victory of socialist "material conditions" has rendered the old habits of thought and government (the "superstructure") intolerable, and they will therefore disappear. Bolshevism will then return to the path of freedom from which it was temporarily deflected. The events following Stalin's death—the announced amnesty, the purges of the secret police, the reversal of the "doctors plot," the shifts in foreign policy—are all seen by Deutscher as confirmation that the revolt against Stalinism has already begun.

Like all Deutscher's writing, this book contains many brilliant and exciting passages, and scintillating prophecies that invite our admiration. Unfortunately, however, the argument upon which they rest is schematic and teleological, reflecting, in its logic, assumptions and formulas, long-standing Marxist intellectual habits. Thus, for example, the realities of political power in a totalitarian dictatorship are virtually passed over in favor of the threadbare Marxist notion that the "material conditions" will eventually determine the forms of politics and culture. One detects also a nostalgia toward the myths surrounding the Bolshevik Revolution and a reluctance to part with the belief that the initial promise of progress and salvation will somehow pay off in the end. By reason of these predilections Deutscher is led to invent doubtful distinctions between "Stalinism" and "Bolshevism" and to assign responsibility for Soviet despotism to historical circumstance rather than to the Bolshevik movement itself. The same predilections may also account for his disregard of the palpable fact that the Nazis managed to impose despotism and their own brand of "primitive magic" on a society that was technologically and culturally far more advanced than the USSR.

The value of the book is further reduced by the frequent inclusion of sweeping, unsupported, and questionable generalizations; by its habit of ascribing to speculations the validity of established fact; and by its tendency to account for extremely complex developments in the oversimplified language of the flashing poetic phrase.—HERBERT McClosky, University of Minnesota.

Zaibatsu Dissolution in Japan. By T. A. Bisson. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 314. $5.00.)

Mr. Bisson's book may be considered on two levels: the factual account of the implementation of American policy for the dissolution of the zaibatsu combines in Japan; and the value judgments that he places on what was done and what was not done.

With regard to the first, he has done a thorough piece of research based on the English language sources. The story is a technical one, but he tells it well, taking the reader step by step through the various stages of the dissolution problem. It is doubtful if much more could be added from the American sources available. It is equally doubtful if the Japanese sources will ever reveal many of the details of the other side of the question: Japanese reaction and countermeasures to the dissolution program. It is not the type of thing about which public records were kept.

When Mr. Bisson judges the dissolution program, he enters a controversial field, and the reader is not left in doubt as to where Mr.

Bisson stands. He feels that American policy was unrealistic from either an economic or a political point of view. He states that the assumption that democracy in Japan should rest on the American concept of individualism was dangerous and quotes John Embree: " 'In the Japanese ideology individualism is a selfish sin.' " He argues that the nationalization of the zaibatsu combines would have been a logical policy. The Japanese railway and communications systems have long been nationalized. Nationalization, he says, would have preserved the advantages of large-scale operations and would have been based on collectivistic social patterns.

There are several good arguments against Mr. Bisson's thesis. On the one hand, would he, by the same criterion, throw out other parts of SCAP's program, such as the guarantees of the individual's freedom, because these could be labelled "un-Japanese"? On the other hand, if his thesis be granted that free enterprise was not for the Japanese, is there any guarantee that state ownership would be any more benevolent than zaibatsu ownership? Japanese history does not sustain him. Finally, are we not confusing political and sociological terms when we speak of nationalization based on collectivistic social patterns? It should be added, at once, that Mr. Bisson gives both the pros and cons in discussing controversial issues.

Mr. Bisson feels that the program of dissolution generally failed and that independent Japan will soon revert to the major features of the zaibatsu system. He is probably right, although it is slower in happening than he, in all probability, expected.

Nine appendixes containing documents, a selected bibliography, a good index, and charts of the organization of the Big Four zaibatsu enhance the value of the book.—PAUL S. DULL, University of Oregon.

Forteckning över statliga utredningar 1904–1945.

By RIKSDAGSBIBLIOTEKET. (Norrköping: Östergötlands dagblads tryckeri. 1953. Pp. vi, 1405. Kr. 40.)

The Swedish Parliamentary Library has rendered a great service by preparing and publishing a bibliography of Swedish government commission of inquiry reports for the period 1904–1945. Two volumes by Erik Thyselius, printed in 1896 and 1904, had contained a detailed chronological list of the government commissions for the period 1809–1903. The present continuation of Thyselius, prepared by Ivar Beskow and Anders Lindberger, is arranged first in large groups by the government departments to which they relate and then chronologically under the department. For each commission, there is usually a statement as to the membership and activities as well as to the content of the report, or reports, and whether printed in separate form, or as a parliamentary document, or in the series Statens offentliga utredningar, or elsewhere, or whether not printed and in that case where copy is located. The series Statens offentliga utredningar, in which most of the commission of inquiry reports are printed currently, began only with 1922. The present work includes a careful index to commission members with identification as to date of birth and death, a thirty-nine page chronological list (two columns to the page), and a subject index.—J.B.C.

Sveriges officiella statistik. Allmänna val. Riksdagsmannavalen, ören, 1949-1952. BY STATISTISKA CENTRALBYRÅN. (Stockholm: Kungl. Boktryckeriet P. A. Norstedt & Söner. 1953. Pp. 246.)

The statistical report on the elections to the Swedish Parliament, 1949-1952, reproduces the table of contents in English, gives translations of Swedish words occurring frequently in the tables, and has a one-page English summary.—J.B.C.

The Growth of Scandinavian Law. BY LESTER BERNHARDT ORFIELD. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press for Temple University Publications. 1953. Pp. xx, 363. $8.50.)

Mr. Orfield's book attempts to give the American reader an introduction to the general historical development and structure of the legal systems of Denmark, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden. The author's emphasis is on history, institutional structure, and public law. It is regrettable that the area of private law is almost entirely omitted, since material on it is least accessible to American scholars.

Kanchō kankō—butsu sōgō mokuroku. BY BRANCH LIBRARIES DIVISION, NATIONAL DIET LIBRARY. (Tokyo. 1952. Pp. 650. Yen 1400.)

For the period September, 1945 to December, 1950, the Branch Libraries Division of the National Diet Library at Tokyo has prepared with the help of the libraries in the various ministries and other agencies of the Japanese government a catalogue of Japanese official publications, arranged in the order of the Nippon decimal classification with an alphabetical agency index. Aside from the occasional titles in English, the work is entirely in Japanese. Vol. 2 (pp. 550, yen 1400), continuing the checklist for the years 1951-52, is being published in 1954. Many of the publications issued soon after World War II appeared only in very limited editions, and the locations are given for those of unusual scarcity. Beginning with January, 1927 and continuing through December, 1943, the Cabinet Printing Office published an extremely useful catalog of currently issued Japanese official publications, at first quarterly and then monthly. The period January, 1944 through August, 1945 apparently still remains to be covered.—J.B.C.

De ontwikkeling van het Minister-presidentschap. BY DR. E. VAN RAALTE. (Leiden: Universitaire Pers. 1954. Pp. xi, 226.)

The development of the "primeminister-ship" is studied beginning with the year 1917, the date of the author's thesis on the prime minister. He considers the situation in the Netherlands, Belgium, Great Britain, France, West Germany, Soviet Russia, and Ireland. Although the text of the study is in Dutch, there is an eight-page summary in English at the end.—J.B.C.

L'Évolution récente des institutions politiques dans les territoires d'Outre-Mer et territoires associés. BY THE DIRECTION DE LA DOCUMENTATION OF THE PRÉSIDENTIE DU CONSEIL AND BY THE DIRECTION DES AFFAIRES POLITIQUES OF THE MINISTÈRE DE LA FRANCE D'OUTRE-MER. (Paris: La Documentation Française. 1954. Pp. 40. Notes et études documentaires, no. 1, 847. 100 francs.)

In the preamble of the 1946 Constitution of France is the statement that "La France forme avec les peuples d'Outre-Mer une Union fondée sur l'égalité des droits et des devoirs, sans distinction de race ni de religion." The study begins with the recommendations of the Brazzaville Conference in 1944, mentions that Title VIII of the Constitution is devoted to the French Union, traces the extension of public rights and duties to the overseas and associated territories, outlines their participation in the central legislative bodies, and gives a statement of the democratic development in the territories themselves.—J.B.C.

Annuaire des États Associés: Cambodge—Laos—Vietnam. 1953. (Paris: Editions Dilou-tremer et Havas. 1953. Pp. 578.)

The first annual for the three associated states of Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, in Indo-China, includes for each a section on government and administration and a directory of the government.—J.B.C.

The Persian Gulf Gazette. Vol. 1, No. 1, Oct. 1, 1953. (Bahrain: Her Majesty's Political Resident in the Persian Gulf. 1953. 9d, or 8 annas a no. with supplements separately priced.)

The Gazette is published quarterly with "notices of appointments and of all Orders in Council, Regulations, Rules and other instruments affecting the exercise of Her Majesty's jurisdiction in Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, the trucional States and Muscat and Oman, and also notices of other matters of concern to persons subject to Her Majesty's jurisdiction in those states." Instruments of a legislative character are issued in supplements which can be purchased separately. A 260-page supplement to No. 1 contains the "Texts of Orders in Council, Regulations, Rules and Legislative Notices in force in Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar and the trucional States on the 1st of October, 1953."—J.B.C.

Interpretación de la Historia de Sudamérica. By ARTURO VILELA. (La Paz: Biblioteca Pacena, Alcaldía Municipal. 1953. Pp. 224.)

A general survey of political trends in the nine Spanish-speaking countries of South America, expanded from a Master's thesis written at Northwestern University in 1945. Although it offers little new substantive information, the last half of the book considers the political personality of the southern states and offers an interesting appraisal of the political process in Latin America by an informed native observer. It was published under the aegis of the municipal council of La Paz, Bolivia, as part of a program through which the revolutionary government of President Paz Estenssoro is seeking to make available the works of Bolivian writers of "revolutionary mentality" to encourage "civic virtue" in the masses. In this case at least the government seems to be willing to support a systematic study of politics rather than a blatant apology for the government in power.

Those Perplexing Argentines. By JAMES BRUCE. (New York: Longmans, Green, & Co. 1953. Pp. xi, 362. $5.00.)

A very simpático study of Argentine characteristics by a former U.S. ambassador which should contribute to our understanding of the reasons for the Argentine attitude toward the U.S. and the faltering of democracy in that country.

Governments of Latin America. By MIGUEL JORRÁN. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Co. 1953. Pp. xii, 385. $4.50.)

A textbook for college courses on Latin-American governments presenting the subject, not in the usual country-by-country fashion, but topically.

Handbook of Latin American Studies: 1949. EDITED BY FRANCISCO AGUILERA. (Gainesville: University of Florida Press. 1952. Pp. xii, 289. $7.00.)

A selective and annotated guide to material published in 1949 on anthropology, art, economics, education, geography, government, history, international relations, labor and social welfare, language and literature, law, music, philosophy, and sociology. Prepared by the Hispanic Foundation of the Library of Congress.

Latin American Politics and Government. By AUSTIN F. MACDONALD. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1954. 2nd ed. Pp. viii, 712. $6.00.)

The second edition of this textbook on Latin-American governments (the first edition appeared in 1949) incorporates the changes brought about by several revolutions and the adoption of eight new constitutions. There is a new chapter on the relations of Latin America and the United States.

Bolivia: A Land Divided. By HAROLD OSBORNE. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1954. Pp. ix, 144. $2.50.)

Ecuador: Country of Contrasts. By LILO LINKE. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1954. Pp. ix, 173. $2.50.)

Paraguay: A Riverside Nation. By GEORGE PENDLE. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1954. Pp. vi, 115. $2.50.)

These three concise and informative volumes, latest in a series on Latin America (which also includes Brazil, Chile, Colombia, and Uruguay), cover geographical regions, historical aspects, transportation, agriculture, and comments on politics, social structure, and national economy.

Soviet Military Doctrine. By RAYMOND L. GARTHOFF. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. xviii, 587. $7.50.)

This book is the result of a research project undertaken by the RAND Corporation on behalf of the U.S. Air Force. It is a technical and extremely important work, being the first thorough analysis in English of the military doctrines of the USSR. The author has made extensive use of Soviet documents and other source materials, including interviews with former Russian and German officers. He deals competently with the background and development of Soviet principles of war, some of which are inheritances from the Imperial era, the relation of partisan forces to general military strategy, and the effect of the Marx-Lenin-Stalin philosophy on military planning. Of special significance is the discussion of the evolution of the attitude of the USSR High Command on the issue of the correct role of air power in modern war. The work is invaluable to students of military history and of contemporary strategic problems. The excellent documentation and bibliography add to the book's intrinsic value.

Imperial Communism. By ANTHONY T. BOUSCAREN. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. vii, 256. $3.75.)

A rather sketchy survey of Communist activity and policy in areas outside of the USSR. The author, now Professor at Marquette University, herds into the Communist fold many who would be surprised indeed to find themselves there, for example the members of the Fabian Society in England, Leon Jouhaux in France, and certain of the former Spanish Republican leaders now in exile. The book's chief value lies in the authors exposé of the tactical nature of Soviet actions.

The Men Who Ruled India: The Founders of Modern India. By PHILIP WOODRUFF. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1954. Pp. 402. $5.00.)

The first of two volumes (the second to be titled "The Guardians") describing the successive stages of European penetration and rule of India, written about the major personalities of each stage. This volume spans the period 1600 to 1858.

Naissance de Nouvelles Démocraties: Introduction et développement des institutions parlementaires dans les pays de l'Asie du Sud et dans les territoires coloniaux. By SIDNEY D. BAILEY. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1953. Pp. xiii, 200. 650 Fr.)

A French translation of two short English-language studies; the first, "Problems of Parliamentary Government in Colonies," appeared in Parliamentary Affairs, Winter 1952-3, and the second, "Parliamentary Government in Southern Asia," is by Sydney D. Bailey and was published by the Institute of Pacific Relations in 1953.

Erlebte Weltgeschichte 1869-1953. Memoiren. By FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER. (Nürnberg: Gluck & Lutz. 1953. Pp. 719.)

The autobiography of the famous German pacifist and proponent of a new Christian education. Foerster who, incidentally, is related to General Moltke, received his first prison sentence in 1895 for criticizing the Kaiser's military budget. The book gives a detailed analysis of Wilhelminian, Weimar, and Nazi Germany as well as the author's views on several other countries where he had to live because of consistent and strong criticism of German nationalism, including the United States where he has made his home since 1940.

Statistisches Taschenbuch über die Heimatvertriebenen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland und in West-Berlin. (Wiesbaden: Statistisches Bundesamt. 1953. Pp. xii, 163.)

The manual of official statistics of refugees in the German Federal Republic and West Berlin is based upon the census of 1950, is limited to statistical tables, and is accompanied by a useful chronological table.—J.B.C.

Planen und Bauen in der Sowjetischen Besatzungszone und im Sowjetsektor von Berlin. By DR. BARTHO PLÖNERS. (Bonn: Bundesministerium für gesamtdeutschen Fragen. 1953. Pp. 126.)

A study of the organization of planning and building in the Soviet Zone of Germany, published as one of the unnumbered series "Bonner Berichte aus Mittel- und Ostdeutschland," and includes the text of the pertinent laws and regulations.—J.B.C.

Die Drei Ringe: Lebensgeschichte eines Industrieunternehmens. By GERT VON KLASS. (Tübingen, Germany: Rainer Wunderlich Verlag Hermann Leins. 1953. Pp. 487.)

A personalized story of the rise and fall of the famous German Krupp enterprise under three generations of the Krupp family. Told in a highly readable manner sympathetic to the Krupps.

Greece: A Political and Economic Survey, 1939-1953. BY BICKHAM SWEET-ESCOTT. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1954. Pp. vii, 207. $4.00.)

A factual and compact summary evenly divided between the political and economic; appendices treat the problems of Cyprus and Greece's northern frontiers, and include useful current statistics and a bibliography.

The Origins of the Labour Party: 1880-1900. BY HENRY PELLING. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 258. $4.00.)

A detailed and well-written history of the formative years of the Labour party to the turn of the century. The emphasis is on the political relations and conflicts among the various men and movements that took part in the struggle to give labor a political voice.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

General

Abbamonte, G. Libertà e Convivenza. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. July-December, 1953.

Blau, P. M. Co-operation and Competition in Bureaucracy. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1954.

Community Security vs. Man's Right to Knowledge. International Symposium in Honor of the Bicentennial of Columbia University. Columbia Law Review. May, 1954.

Demoulin, R. Recherches de Sociologie Électorale en Régime Censitaire. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1953.

Naville, P. Critique de la Bureaucratie. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. No. 15, 1953.

Technical Assistance Programs. A Symposium. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. April, 1954.

U.S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. Strength of the International Communist Movement. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. Committee Print No. 2. 1954.

Warlomont, R. La Notion de Représentation Publique. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. October-December, 1953.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Cotter, C. P. Emergency Detention in Wartime: The British Experience. Stanford Law Review. March, 1954.

The Future of the House of Lords. A Symposium. Parliamentary Affairs. Winter, 1953-54.

The Future Organisation of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Project. London, H.M.S.O., 1953 (Cmd. 8986).

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. British Information Services. Britain's Defense Effort. London, 1954.

Great Britain. Conservative Party. Research Department. Budget, 1954. London, Conservative and Unionist Central Office, 1954.

Great Britain at the Crossroads: a Dilemma of Industrialization. Population Bulletin. May, 1954.

Guénault, P. H. British Monopoly Legislation in Practice. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1954.

Harrison, W. The British Constitution in 1953. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1954.

Hawtrey, R. G. British Resources and Commonwealth Development. Eastern World. April, 1954.

Hornsey, G. Corporate Taxation—a Comparative Study. Modern Law Review, January, 1953.

Inglis, B. Government and the Press. Cambridge Journal. July, 1953.

Letwin, W. L. The English Common Law Concerning Monopolies. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Milne, R. S. Has Britain an Economic General Staff? Public Administration (Sydney). March, 1953.

Planning Britain's Atomic Factories. BEAMA Journal. March, 1954.

Porta, G. D. L'Istituto della "Public Corporation" in Gran Bretagna. Rivista di Politica Economica. March, 1954.

Public Ownership. An Interim Report by the Trades Union Congress General Council. Annals of Collective Economy. April-September, 1953.

Queen beyond the Seas. Economist. May 15, 1954.

Stone, W. T. Political Trends in Britain. Editorial Research Reports. May 10, 1954.

Wilson, H. H. The Problem of Internal Security in Great Britain, 1948-1953. Garden City, Doubleday Short Studies in Political Science No. 4, 1954.

Colonial Areas

Annual Report: Federation of Malaya, 1952. London, H.M.S.O., 1953.

Dobby, E. H. G. Malaya's Rice Problem. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Farley, R. Rise of a Peasantry in British Guiana. Social and Economic Studies. March, 1954.

Great Britain. British Information Services. Reference Division. Britain's Colonial Policy and Record. New York, 1954.

Hughes, C. A. The British Guiana General Election, 1953. Parliamentary Affairs. Spring, 1954.

Jackson, B. W. The Gold Coast. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Kenya After the Constitution. Economist. April 10, 1954.

Next Step in Malaya. Economist. May 15, 1954.

Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Federal Information Services. The New Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Salisbury, 1954.

Commonwealth of Nations

Alexandrowicz-Alexander, C. H. Delegation of Legislative Power in India. American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter, 1954.

Apartheid and the Scriptures; a Conference of Theologians. Round Table. March, 1954.

Benham, F. The Colombo Plan. Economica. May, 1954.

Borrie, W. D. The Commonwealth Special Problems of the Member Nations: Australia. Melbourne, Australian Institute of International Affairs, 1954.

Brown, G. W. Canadian Nationalism. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Commonwealth Debate at Lahore. Economist. April 10, 1954.

Cowen, D. V. Legislature and Judiciary: Reflections on the Constitutional Issues in South Africa. Part II: The Sovereignty of Parliament. Modern Law Review. July, 1953.

DaCosta, E. P. W. Replanning India's Plan. New Commonwealth. February 1, 1954.

Dennis, E. Hopes and Fears in Canadian Politics. Dalhousie Review. Spring, 1954.

Dhami, S. S. Rural Development in India. International Labour Review. May, 1954.

Fyzee, A. A. A. Islamic Law and Theology in India. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

G. L. The Pattern of Canadian Politics. World Today. April, 1954.

Gokhale, B. Minorities in India. Confluence. March, 1954.

Goswami, B. K. Indian Tax System. Modern Review (Calcutta). March, 1954.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. What is the Commonwealth? London, 1954.

Griffith, G. L. Australia's "Streamlined" Arbitration System. Australian Quarterly. September, 1953.

Harvey, A. G. The South African Political Scene. Dalhousie Review. Spring, 1953.

Her Majesty's Oversea Service. Economist. June 26, 1954.

India in Asia: a Political Prologue. Eastern Economist. December 25, 1953.

India in Asia: an Economic Review. Eastern Economist. December 25, 1953.

Mandelbaum, D. G. Planning and Social Change in India. Human Organization. Fall, 1953.

Mehnert, K. Die Rolle der Intelligenzia in Südasien. Osteuropa. October, 1953.

Mehta, H. E. India since Independence—Plans and Aspirations. World Affairs Interpreter. April, 1954.

Park, R. L. East Bengal: Pakistan's Troubled Province. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1954.

Pethick-Lawrence, Lord. Indian Constitutional Government. Asian Review. January, 1954.

Robson, W. A. India as a Welfare State. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Shea, T. Agrarian Unrest and Reform in South India. Far Eastern Survey. June, 1954.

Summary of Legislation in India 1952. Delhi, Manager of Publications, 1953.

United Nations. General Assembly. Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa. Report. New York, 1953 (Supplement No. 16; A/2505 & A/2505/Add. 1).

Webster, W. A. R. Financial Control: the Role of the Treasury. Journal of Public Administration (Colombo). October, 1953.

Windmiller, M. Indian Communism Today. Far Eastern Survey. April, 1954.

Western Europe

Albering, L. A. H. La Situation Politique aux Pays-Bas. Revue Politique. December, 1953.

Barbano, F. Aspetti Psicologici et Politici di Una Campagna Elettorale. Politico. April, 1954.

Beyer, P. Benelux. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. April, 1954.

Bonnaud-Delamare, R. Progress of the Administrative Reform in France. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 3, 1953.

Les Budgets Économiques Nationaux en Europe Occidentale. Bulletin Économique Pour L'Europe. July, 1953.

Calve Serer, R. La Politique Intérieure dans L'Espagne de Franco. Écrits de Paris. September, 1953.

Couvée, D. H. Die Presse der Niederlande. Politische Bildung. No. 47, 1954.

de Laubadère, A. Du Pouvoir de l'Administration d'Imposer Unilatéralement des Changements aux Dispositions des Contrats Administratifs. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

F. C. E. The Portuguese Empire. British Survey. April, 1954.

La Flotte Française. Réalités. May, 1954.

Hampe, K. A. Das Staatsangehörigkeitsrecht Irlands. Hamburg, Forschungsstelle für Völkerrecht und Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht. 1954.

—. Das Staatsangehörigkeitsrecht Spaniens. Hamburg, Forschungsstelle für Völkerrecht und Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht, 1954.

Hocke, G. R. Die Presse der Italienischen Republik. Politische Bildung. No. 44, 1953.

Hoffmann, S. Une Étude de Sociologie Politique en Suède. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1953.

Hughes, H. S. The Crisis of Italian Christian Democracy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1954.

L'Intégration Métropole—Ostre Mer. Union Française et Parlement. October, 1953.

Iribarne, M. F. How Spain is Governed. Madrid. Diplomatic Information Office, 1953.

Ivre, I. Democrazia e Socialismo nella Svezia Socialdemocratica. Ponte. November, 1953.

Kinh Buu. Union Française et Commonwealth. Politique Étrangère. January, 1954.

Kirchheimer, O. Parteistruktur und Massendemokratie in Europa. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. May, 1954.

Krusius-Ahrenberg, L. Les Partis et la Situation Politique Actuelle en Finlande. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1953.

Kugelberg, B. Industrial Democracy. Skandinaviska Banken Quarterly Review. October, 1953.

Matton, H. The Budget as a Working Programme of the Government. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1954.

Mawaharro, J. Évolution et Problèmes Fondamentaux du Système Fiscal Espagnol. Revue de Science et de Législation Financières. No. 1, 1954.

Mérigot, J. G. Loi des Finances et Réforme Fiscale. Revue de Science et de Législation Financières. No. 4, 1953.

Pactet, P. Les Commissions Parlementaires. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Perspectives of Holland and Belgium. Atlantic Monthly. April, 1954.

Philippart, M. "Déconcentration" et "Décentralisation." Revue Politique. October, 1953.

Pickles, D. The French Presidency. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Pinay, A. France's Political and Economic Problems. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Portugal. A Survey. Economist. April 17, 1954.

Pour Une Nouvelle Orientation Politique. Revue Socialiste. March, 1954.

Riend, G. L'Union Française et l'Indochine. Revue des Deux Mondes. May 15, 1954.

Sauvy, A. L'Europe et sa Population. Paris, Editions Internationales, 1954.

Sweden's Uneasy Stability. Banker. March, 1954.

Taylor, E. The Communists' New Look in France. Reporter. March 30, 1954.

Tejada, F. E. Los Fueros Como Sistemas de Libertades Políticas Concretas. Arbor. September-October, 1953.

La Verité sur la Finlande. Écrits de Paris. February, 1954.

Waline, M. L'Élection Présidentielle de Décembre 1953. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Watson, C. Population Policy in France. Population Studies. March, 1954.

Central Europe

Andreae, W. Zur Weiterentwicklung Unserer Sozialordnung. Wirtschaftsdienst. January, 1954.

Bitschl, H. Gutachten zur Grossen Steuereform. Wirtschaftsdienst. October, 1953.

Böhler, W. J. Katholische Kirche und Staat in Deutschland. Politische Bildung. No. 44, 1953.

Ellwein, T. Die Staatshaushalte Einst und Jetzt. Politische Bildung. No. 47, 1954.

Firnberg, H. Bevölkerungspolitische Probleme Österreichs. Zukunft. August-September, 1953.

Frenkel, E. Steuerpolitik und Steuerrecht der Sowjetischen Besatzungszone. Bonn, Bundesministerium für Gesamtdeutsche Fragen, 1953.

Jaspers, K. The Political Vacuum in Germany. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Johns, J. R. H. Comments on Austrian Government. Public Administration (Sydney). September, 1953.

Kirchheimer, O. Notes on the Political Scene in Western Germany. World Politics. April, 1954.

Knauss, R. Die Armee in der Demokratie. Politische Bildung. No. 42, 1953.

Köttgen, A. Bundesregierung und Oberste Bundesbehörden. Öffentliche Verwaltung. January, 1954.

Küng, E. Funktion und Verantwortung der Gewerkschaften in der Heutigen Wirtschaftsordnung. Wirtschaftsdienst. January, 1954.

Leontin, L. L'Économie de la Zone Soviétique de l'Allemagne. Revue de Défense Nationale. August-September, 1953.

Lugger, A. Die Gemeinden und Ihre Finanzwirtschaft im Aufbau Österreichs. Österreichische Monatshefte. October, 1953.

Menzel, E. Die Auswärtige Gewalt der Bundesrepublik in der Deutung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. May, 1954.

Meyer, H. C. Germany Renascent. Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1954.

Nagel, H. Judicial Review in Germany. American Journal of Comparative Law. Spring, 1954.

Ranke, H. Evangelische Kirche und Staat. Politische Bildung. No. 43, 1953.

Saury, P. Les Églises et la Politique Allemande. Revue de Défense Nationale. March, 1954.

Scheuner, U. Art. 146 GG und das Problem der Verfassungsgebenden Gewalt. Öffentliche Verwaltung. October, 1953.

Schuster, H. Das Röntgenbild des Bonner Parlamentes. Politische Bildung. No. 47, 1954.

Trossmann, H. Aufgaben und Arbeitsweise des Deutschen Bundestages. Politische Bildung. No. 39, 1953.

U. S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. Tensions within the Soviet Captive Countries: Soviet Zone of Germany. Part III. 83d Cong., 1st Sess. Sen. Doc. No. 70, Part 3, 1954.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Aron, R. Tout ce qu'on Sait sur l'U.R.S.S. Réalités. May, 1954.

Bauer, E. Was ist "Titoismus?" Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. April, 1954.

Böttcher, E. Hintergründe der Neuen Wirtschaftspolitik Moskau's. Osteuropa. February, 1954.

Boldyrev, V. Some Peculiarities of Soviet Criminal Law. Journal of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. January-February, 1954.

Chambre, H. Politique Économique. Esprit. March, 1954.

Culture at the Service of the Totalitarian State. A Symposium. Proceedings of the Conference of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. New York, March 20-22, 1953.

Durand, C. Yougoslavie. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Feierabend, L. The Gottwald Era in Czechoslovakia. Journal of Central European Affairs. October, 1953.

Gaev, A. The Soviet Press at War. Journal of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. January-February, 1954.

Galai, N. Influence of the Bolshevik Revolution and the Social Doctrine of the USSR on Modern Warfare. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. March, 1954.

Hofmann, W. Sowjetunion—Landwirtschaft—Agrarische Arbeitsverfassung. Osteuropa. February, 1954.

The Ideological Struggle in the USSR. A Symposium. Proceedings of the Conference of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. New York, March 20-22, 1953.

Invested Fortress. Military Review. May, 1954.

Jasny, N. Soviet Economic Growth. Social Research. Spring, 1954.

Koch, H. Sofia: ein Neues Patriarchat der Ostkirche. Osteuropa. October, 1953.

———. Sowjetunion—Ideologie—Stalins Erbe—das Russisch-Ukrainische Verhältnis. Osteuropa. April, 1954.

Long, J. F. L. Changing the Face of Southern Russia. Air Power. Spring, 1954.

Lowenthal, R. The Djilas Crisis. Twentieth Century. April, 1954.

Manning, C. A. The Soviet Nationalities Problem. Armenian Review. March, 1954.

Markert, W. Von der Oktoberrevolution zur "Revolution von Oben." Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. January, 1954.

Mehnert, K. Moskau's Neuer Dreijahrplan des Konsums. Osteuropa. February, 1954.

Meissner, B. Sowjetunion—Innenpolitik—Administrativ-Territoriale Gliederung—Innenpolitische Entwicklung. Osteuropa. February, 1954.

Moscow's New Course. Twentieth Century. March, 1954.

The New Stage of Soviet Dictatorship. A Symposium. Proceedings of the Conference of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. New York, March 20-22, 1953.

Poplyuiko, A. The Change in the Social Aspect of the Peasantry in the USSR. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. April, 1954.

Radkey, O. H. An Alternative to Bolshevism: the Program of Russian Social Revolutionism. Journal of Modern History. March, 1953.

Radovioka, S. Albanien—die Kleinste Volksdemokratie. Zukunft. September, 1953.

Salas Lopez, F. Aspectos Militares y Estratégicos de la U.R.S.S. Cuadernos de Política Internacional. April-June, 1953.

Slapnicka, H. Tschechoslowakei—Regierung und Verwaltung. Osteuropa. February, 1954.

Soviet Army Tactics. Military Review. June, 1954.

Sowjetunion—Innenpolitik—Bevölkerungsverschiebungen. Osteuropa. April, 1954.

Sowjetunion—Landwirtschaft—Umweg zur Agrostadt? Osteuropa. April, 1954.

Styépanovitch, N. Constitutional and Administrative Reform in Yugoslavia, 1950-1953. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1954.

Tush, B. Persecution of the Church in Poland. Munich, Institute for the History and Culture of the USSR, 1954.

L'U.R.S.S. Après Staline. Esprit. March, 1954.

U. S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. Tensions within the Soviet Captive Countries. Pt. II. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. Senate Doc. No. 70, pt. 1. 1954.

The USSR Today and Tomorrow. Proceedings of the Conference of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. Munich, August 15-17, 1953.

Wetter, G. A. Le Développement Idéologique du Bolchevisme. Cahiers de Bruges. October, 1953.

Zelenika, I. The Yugoslav Air Force. Air Power. Spring, 1954.

Middle East and Africa

A. Z. The Spanish Zone of Morocco. World Today. May, 1954.

Action Sociale Outre-Mer. Informations Sociales. December, 1953.

Cragg, K. The Intellectual Impact of Communism upon Contemporary Islam. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

Dimock, M. E. Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East. Progress Report—1 April 1954. Ankara, 1954 (mimeo).

Farmanfarma, A. Constitutional Law of Iran. American Journal of Comparative Law. Spring, 1954.

Feyzioglu, T. Les Partis Politiques en Turquie. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Fischer, A. J. Persia—a New Departure. Contemporary Review. November, 1953.

Hafta, R. P. Ethiopia Today. Swiss Review of World Affairs. March, 1954.

Hodgkin, T. Stresses in French Africa. Twentieth Century. May, 1954.

Hussein, A. Social Reform in Egypt with Special Reference to Rural Areas. Muslim World. January, 1954.

Jordan: Constitution of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. Constitutional and Parliamentary Information. April 1, 1954.

Katsh, A. I. Israel. A Symposium. Journal of Educational Sociology. April, 1954.

Lenormand, F. Le Communisme dans le Moyen-Orient. Écrits de Paris. November, 1953.

Liebesny, H. J. Religious Law and Westernization in the Moslem Near East. American Journal of Comparative Law. Autumn, 1953.

Mari, S. The Agrarian Reform in Egypt. International Labour Review. February, 1954.

Onar, S. S. The Analysis and the Criticism of the Causes of Appearance of the Public Corporations in Turkey and the Legal and Administrative Structure of These Corporations. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1954.

Peretz, D. The Arab Minority of Israel. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

Report on Jordan. National and English Review. April, 1954.

Rondot, P. Les Structures Socio-Politiques de la Nation Libanaise. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Sherwood, F. P. Technical Assistance in Public Administration. Los Angeles, University of Southern California, School of Public Administration, 1954.

Stock, E. New Phase in Israel. Foreign Policy Bulletin. March 1, 1954.

T. R. L. Egypt since the Coup d'État of 1952. World Today. April, 1954.

Tilen, V. V. Impressions of Ethiopia. Contemporary Review. May, 1954.

Turkey. A Survey. Economist. May 15, 1954.

Veale, D. African Universities. Corona. July, 1953.

Von Haller, A. Bericht aus Liberien. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. April, 1954.

Southeast Asia

Aron, R. L'Asie entre Marx et Malthus. Preuves. May, 1954.

Compton, B. R. The Indonesian Election Law. Far Eastern Survey. April and May, 1954.

Deng Chih-Hsiung. Überseechinesen. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. March, 1954.

Donnithorne, A. G. Western Business in Indonesia Today. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Fall, B. B. Social Administration under the Viet Minh. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

The Resources of Indo-China. Economist. May 8, 1954.

A Survey of the Social Task of the Mass Education Department. Indonesian Affairs. September-October, 1953.

Van der Kroef, J. M. The Dutch Position in Indonesia Today. Far Eastern Survey. June, 1954.

Zain, Z. Some Aspects of the Economic Problems and the Policies of Indonesia. Indonesian Affairs. September-October, 1953.

Pacific and Far East

Bodenschatz, M. Die Neugestaltung des

Japanischen Luftrechts. Zeitschrift für Luftrecht. July, 1953.

Bonten, G. Incertitudes Japonaises. Revue de Défense Nationale. May, 1954.

L'Économie Chinoise en 1952-1953 d'après les Documents Officiels de Pékin et de Hong-Kong. Notes et Études Documentaires. September 24, 1953.

Elsbree, W. H. The 1953 Philippine Presidential Elections. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Green, O. M. China's Testing Year. Fortnightly. April, 1954.

———. Communists and Peasants in China. Eastern World. April, 1954.

Hanrahan, G. Z. The People's Revolutionary Military Council in Communist China. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1954.

Harris, R. China in the Twentieth Century. History Today. April, 1954.

Hsia, R. The Chinese Economy under Communist Planning. Pacific Affairs. June, 1954.

Ikematsu, F. Political Parties in Flux. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 7-9, 1953.

Just, A. W. Situation der Volksrepublik China. Aussenpolitik. April, 1954.

Leadership in New China. Economist. June, 19, June 26, July 3, 1954.

Lenormand, F. Le Vrai Danger; la Chine Rouge. Écrits de Paris. February, 1954.

Levine, S. B. Prospects of Japanese Labor. Far Eastern Survey. May, 1954.

1954-55 Budget. Oriental Economist (Tokyo). April, 1954.

Rosse, R. M. The Working of Communist China's Five Year Plan. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Schiller, O. Der Agrarpolitische Kurs Rotchinas. Osteuropa. April, 1954.

Swearingen, R. The Communist Line in Japan. Far Eastern Survey. April, 1954.

Wurfel, D. The Philippine Rice Share Tenancy Act. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Yin, K. Y. Industrial Development in Taiwan. Free China Review. March, 1954.

Latin America

Benítez, H. La Iglesia y el Justicialismo. Revista de la Universidad de Buenos Aires. October-December, 1953.

Cavalcanti, Th. B. Les Tendances des Récentes Constitutions Brésiliennes. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. October-December, 1953.

de la Souchère, E. Expérience Bolivienne et Révolution Hispanique. Temps Modernes. October, 1953.

———. Venezuela. Monthly Review. April, 1954.

Grant, J. A. C. Judicial Control of Legislation. A Comparative Study. American Journal of Comparative Law. Spring, 1954.

Guatemala. Atlantic Monthly. April, 1954.

Langrod, G. Administrations Latino-Américaines: le Chili. Revue Administrative. November–December, 1953.

Nasio, J. La Universidad y el Justicialismo. Revista de la Universidad de Buenos Aires. October–December, 1953.

La Planification Économique et l'Industrialisation de l'Argentine. Notes et Études Documentaires. September 26, 1953.

La Réforme Agraire en Bolivie. Informations Sociales. November, 1953.

Sylvain-Bouchereau, M. Die Republik Haiti. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. March, 1954.

Teixeira de Freitas, M. A. A Reforma Administrativa Brasileira. Revista do Serviço Público. May, 1953.

Urquidí, A. Aspectos sociológicos de Bolivia. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. January–April, 1953.

Walker Linares, F. Le Syndicalisme Rural au Chili. Revue Internationale du Travail. December, 1953.

Wright, J. L'Argentine d'Aujourd'hui. Revue Politique. October, 1953.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Stresemann and the Revision of Versailles: A Fight for Reason. BY HENRY L. BRETON. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 199. $3.00.)

This is a valuable addition to the scholarly literature dealing with German foreign policy during the 1920's. It covers the efforts of that outstanding German statesman, Gustav Stresemann, to overcome the major restrictions of the Versailles Treaty and to win a position of equality for his country through diplomacy and reason rather than through military power.

The author has based his study on extensive original documentary sources, and has produced a more comprehensive and integrated account of Stresemann's foreign policy than has hitherto been available.

Stresemann assumed responsibility for German foreign policy in 1923 at the height of the Ruhr occupation when the obstacles to the regaining of any German influence in Europe seemed insurmountable. During the next six years, he demonstrated that even a country stripped of its military power could by skillful diplomacy achieve a number of its major foreign policy objectives, such as the evacuation of the Ruhr, the modification of the reparations schedule, the conclusion of the Locarno Treaties, the admission of Germany to the League of Nations, and the ultimate withdrawal of Allied forces from the German Rhineland five years ahead of schedule.

Stresemann's diplomatic strategy was based on methods which seem amazingly familiar today: (1) taking advantage of the disunity among the Western powers to weaken the strict enforcement of the Versailles treaty; (2) exploiting the general fear of Communist influence in Europe to gain concessions for Germany; and (3) arguing that Germany's economic value to Europe as a whole was too great to justify any policies which would lead to German economic disintegration. In the revival of Western Germany in recent years, Konrad Adenauer seems to have taken several pages out of Stresemann's book.

The author not only discusses Stresemann's international negotiations, but also emphasizes how skillfully the German statesman as a parliamentary leader dealt with the domestic opposition to his methods. For six years, he made himself virtually indispensable to the various government coalitions of Weimar Germany, countering the opposition of the German nationalists to his policies of conciliation, but utilizing the effect of their political pressure to persuade the Allies of the wisdom of making concessions to his weakened country. He was admittedly opportunistic many times, and often illustrated the belief that politics was the art of the possible.

This period of the mid-1920's, which illustrated the successes of policies of rapprochement, merits careful study at the present time when diplomatic negotiations are not often regarded with much approval. Stresemann, bargaining from weakness, achieved much for his country. Modern statesmen, bargaining from strength, might well emulate his techniques of winning concessions abroad and countering nationalistic opposition at home.—ELTON ATWATER, Pennsylvania State University.

Problems of Stability and Progress in International Relations. By QUINCY WRIGHT. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1954. Pp. xiv, 378. $5.00.)

For many years Professor Quincy Wright has been one of the leading American authorities on political science, international law, international relations, and related subjects. Articles, reviews, reports, and books, including the monumental two-volume A Study of War, have flowed from his prolific pen. The present volume contains twenty-one essays, written between 1946 and 1952. All but three have been published previously. Two of the unpublished essays, dealing with problems of institutionalizing international peace and security, were first delivered as lectures at the University of California (Berkeley) in May, 1952, on the occasion of the retirement of Professor Hans Kelsen.

The essays offer much food for thought for the general reader; but the style and content indicate that they were written primarily for the professional student of international affairs. They are full of shrewd, sane, informed comments on such topics as the balance of power, collective security, public opinion, international tensions, trends in world organization, the role of the United Nations, possibilities of international negotiations, new trends in international law, problems of war and peace, the atomic bomb and world politics, education and international stability.

Professor Wright defines with great precision the fundamental dilemmas of international relations in a world in which "conditions and opinions are out of harmony" and in which statesmen can neither organize a stable balance of power nor rely on law for security. "During the period immediately ahead," he believes, "diplomats must utilize the methods of power politics, which alone can be successful in preventing universal conquest so long as opinions remain dominantly national." In 1947 he stated that "the alternatives before the world are universal empire or universal federation"; but he holds that the former can be prevented and that the latter is premature. Indeed, in 1951 he cautioned that "any major reconstruction of the world order . . . should be conceived only as a long-run goal." His hope for the immediate future rests in the reduction of international tensions by skillful negotiations and in the evolution of a more complex balance of power. Ultimately he puts his faith in changes in world public opinion and in the development of "a system of states organized by effective law."—NORMAN D. PALMER, University of Pennsylvania.

A Short History of International Organization. By GERARD J. MANGONE. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. ix, 326. $5.00.)

Teachers who in the past have had to refer students interested in the history of international organization either to brief chapters in general texts or else to unmanageable quantities of detailed documentation or specialized readings will be grateful to Gerard Mangone for this impressive and compact work. Moving in 326 pages from ancient Sumer to the United Nations and even venturing a look into the future, he has written as fine a history of international organization as can be written in so short a space.

Mr. Mangone, faced with a nearly impossible task of condensation, exhibits a fine sense of proportion by transporting us away from 2850 B.C. with jet-like speed so that we arrive at the signing of the Treaty of Westphalia within eight pages, and after another eight pages of text, at the Congress of Vienna. Successive chapters deal with "The Age of Consultation" (1814-1914), the development of international law, the rise of regional international organizations, and the future of international law and organization. There are two chapters on international administration, one covering nineteenth-century developments, and the other the work of the specialized agencies; and there are two chapters on the "periods of collaboration," namely, the days of the League of Nations and the United Nations.

Documentary appendices follow nearly all chapters. The author has prepared them with intelligence, and they enhance the value of the textual material. Thus a 23-page treatment of the development of international law can itself develop into an enriching experience if students consider such materials as excerpts from Grotius' De jure belli ac pacis and selections from the legal opinions on La Jeune Eugénie and The Antelope.

The excellent bibliographical references and notes will lead students easily to more information on their favorite subjects. This guidance is especially helpful because of the necessarily brief treatment many important questions receive; e.g., the work allows two pages for the League Secretariat, five for its modern counterpart, a little over one paragraph for technical assistance, and no space whatever to the role in the U.N. of nongovernmental organizations.

Within the limits imposed on him, Mr. Mangone has acquitted himself admirably, and it will be an even happier day when his publishers allow him to write a more comprehensive history.—RICHARD N. SWIFT, New York University.

Foundations of the World Republic. By G. A. BORGESE. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 328. $6.50.)

An eloquent, occasionally witty, occasionally moving argument, opening with the charge that "The era of humanity has not begun, but the age of nations has ended." Peace, Power, and Justice are the three concepts around which these essays are built. Before his death the author was secretary-general of the Committee to Frame a World Constitution at the University of Chicago.

Empire by Mandate: A History of the Relations of Great Britain with the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. By CAMPBELL L. UPTHEGROVE. (New York: Bookman Associates. 1954. Pp. 239. $3.50.)

This is primarily a history of Britain's management of her League mandates, but the author goes on to argue that the mandate principles were drawn largely from the tenets of British colonial policy and that they today offer a method for the solution of the vast problems of colonial nationalism.

Survey of International Affairs, 1951. By PETER CALVOCORESSI. ASSISTED BY KONSTANZE ISEPP. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 505. $10.50.)

The Royal Institute's annual volume provides a handy, well-written commentary, based primarily on newspaper sources and such official documents as governments have made available to contemporary historians. The Persian oil dispute is considered at length, a section by George Kirk explores the growing Anglo-Egyptian controversy, and F. C. Jones contributes the chapters on China and Japan.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1936. Vol. I: General; The British Commonwealth. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1953. Pp. lxxvi, 892. $4.25.)

Illusory hopes for arms limitations are still pursued in the concluding sessions of the Geneva Armaments Conference and the London Naval Conference; correspondence on both war debts and international economic cooperation is voluminous; and the British Commonwealth relations center on trade, tariffs, and other commercial matters.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1936. Vol. III: The Near East and Africa. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1953. Pp. lxi, 542. $3.00.)

A volume devoted almost solely to the Ethiopian-Italian war, and the accompanying problems of League action, U. S. neutrality, and recognition.

Advance to Barbarism: How the Reversion to Barbarism in Warfare and War-Trials Menaces Our Futures. By F. J. P. VEALE. (Appleton, Wis.: C. C. Nelson Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. xvii, 305.)

A reissue of the English edition published in 1948. The author denies both the legal and moral foundations of the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials and predicts that their result—far from deterring aggressors in the future—will result only in the waging of war to the bitter end since defeat can lead only to the gallows. The book is also an indictment of modern total war.

The Origins of the War of 1914. Volume II: The Crisis of July 1914. From the Sarajevo Outrage to the Austro-Hungarian General Mobilization. EDITED AND TRANSLATED BY LUIGI ALBERTINI. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 727. $11.00.)

An Italian history, heavily documented and with excellent index, covering in detail a familiar and tragic period.

Hungarian Premier: A Personal Account of a Nation's Struggle in the Second World War. By Nicholas Kállay. WITH A FOREWORD BY C. A. MACARTNEY. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. xxxvii, 518. $6.00.)

The personal memoirs of a man who had served as Prime Minister of Hungary in the fateful years 1942-1944; an important contribution to the study of the political developments in and around Hungary and of the Hungarian foreign policy of the period, though replete with attempts by the author to defend his policies.

The Century of Total War. BY RAYMOND ARON. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1954. Pp. 379. $5.00.)

An astute journalist gives the current international struggle its historical setting, disposes of much of the ideological confusion, pays special attention to the changes in and the role of Western Europe, and chooses continued "cold" or "limited" war as the only acceptable choice between capitulation and a third World War.

South Africa in a Changing World. BY EDGAR H. BROOKES. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. 151. $3.00.)

A thoughtful but rather loosely organized series of lectures on some of South Africa's problems, including her membership in the Commonwealth and her relations with India and the United States.

A History of the School of International Affairs and Associated Area Institutes, Columbia University. BY L. GRAY COWAN. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. vi, 105. $2.25.)

This little summary records the prompt response of Columbia University to new needs for international and regional studies and describes the programs of education and research which have been developed.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

H. ARTHUR STEINER*

University of California (Los Angeles)

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Halle, Louis J., Jr. Elements of Modern Peacemaking. Foreign Service Journal. May, 1954.

Marshall, George C. Essentials to Peace. Social Science. Spring, 1954.

Mayo, H. B. The Western Alliance; Ideological or Defensive? International Journal (Toronto). Spring, 1954.

A Plan of Research in International Communication; A Report. World Politics. April, 1954.

Radio in the Cold War. World Today. June, 1954.

United States

The American Foreign Service; Its Past, Present and Future [bibliography]. Foreign Service Journal. March, 1954.

Bowles, Chester. A Bipartisan Policy for Asia. Harper's. May, 1954.

Dillard, Hardy C. The Treaty-Making Controversy; Substance and Shadow. Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1954.

Diplomacy and the Communist Challenge;

* Prepared with the assistance of Mr. P. Alan Dionisopoulos.

A Report on the Views of Leading Citizens in Twenty-five Cities. Council on Foreign Relations, New York, 1954.

Edelman, Murray. Labor's Influence in Foreign Policy. Labor Law Journal. May, 1954.

Everett, John T., Jr. The Bricker Amendment and United States Foreign Affairs. University of Cincinnati Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Feis, Herbert. Europe versus Asia in American Strategy. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Fuess, John C. World Labor and American Foreign Policy. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Harriman, W. Averell. Leadership in World Affairs. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Jenkins, Alfred le S. Present United States Policy toward China. Department of State Bulletin. April 26, 1954.

———. The United States and a Divided China. Ibid. June 7, 1954.

Liska, Jiri. The Multiple Equilibrium and the American National Interest in International Organization. Harvard Studies in International Affairs. February, 1954.

Listening to the Voice of America and Other Foreign Broadcasts in the Soviet Satellites; a Comparative Summary. Bureau of Applied Social Research, Columbia University. New York, 1954.

Luchsinger, Fred. Idealism and Realism in American Foreign Policy. Swiss Review of World Affairs. March, 1954.

McLeod, Scott. Security in the Department of State. Department of State Bulletin. March 29, 1954.

Malenbaum, Wilfred. Grants and Loans in U. S. Foreign Assistance. World Politics. April, 1954.

Northrop, F. S. C. United States Foreign Policy and Continental European Union. Harvard Studies in International Affairs. February, 1954.

Popper, David H. American Security and the United Nations. World Affairs Interpreter. Spring, 1954.

Ringland, Arthur C. The Organization of Voluntary Foreign Aid: 1939-1953. Department of State Bulletin. March 15, 1954.

Schubert, Glendon A., Jr. Politics and the Constitution; the Bricker Amendment during 1953. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Stein, Harold. An Administrative Tangle [review article]. World Politics. April, 1954.

Stewart, John Q. Natural Law Factors in United States Foreign Policy. Social Science. June, 1954.

Stratton, Samuel S. Balance Sheet on Korea. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. April, 1954.

United States Military Policy [a symposium]. Current History. May, 1954.

Wainhouse, David. The United States and Charter Review. Department of State Bulletin. April 26, 1954.

Latin America

Cardoza y Aragón, Luis. Guatemala y el Imperio Bananero. Cuadernos Americanos. March-April, 1954.

Dreier, John C. Organizing Security in the Americas. Department of State Bulletin. May 31, 1954.

Fabela, Isidro. La Conferencia de Caracas y la Actitud Anticomunista de México. Cuadernos Americanos. May-June, 1954.

Holland, Henry F. U. S. Economic Relations with Latin America. Department of State Bulletin. May 17, 1954.

Matos, José. Asociación Guatemalteca de Derecho Internacional. Revista de la Asociación Guatemalteca de Derecho Internacional. No. 1, January, 1954.

Overzicht van de Latijns-Amerikaanse Samenwerking. Internationale Spectator ('s-Gravenhage). April 22, 1954.

Padilla Nervo, Luis. México en Caracas. Cuadernos Americanos. May-June, 1954.

Powers, Marshall K. Communism in Latin America; An Interim Assessment. World Affairs. Spring, 1954.

The Struggle for the Guianese. Fortnightly. May, 1954.

Commonwealth of Nations

Abbott, Douglas C. Canada's Contribution to World Prosperity. Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science. January, 1954.

Brown, George W. Canadian Nationalism; An Historical Approach. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Canada and the United Nations. External Affairs (Ottawa). May, 1954.

Gaitskell, Hugh. The Search for Anglo-American Policy. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Gordon-Walker, P. C. The Art of Commonwealth Relations. New Commonwealth. February 15, 1954.

Greening, W. E. Trouble along American-Canadian Boundary. Fortnightly. May, 1954.

Knox, F. A. Canada and the World Economy. Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Levi, Werner. Behind Nehru's Foreign Policy. World (New York). April 1, 1954.

Montgomery, Edward. "Amalgamation" British Style. Foreign Service Journal. June, 1954.

Srivastava, G. P. Some Aspects of Indian Foreign Policy. Modern Review (Calcutta). March, 1954.

Sydney and After; Next Phase of Commonwealth Economic Cooperation. Round Table. March, 1954.

Twitty, Tom and Wade, M. Canada; A Great Small Power. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series, No. 103. 1954.

Underhill, F. H. Canada and the Canadian Question 1954. Queen's Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Webster, Charles K. Some Fundamentals of Britain's Foreign Policy. Dalhousie Review. Spring, 1954.

Western and Central Europe

Benoist, Jacques. La Sarre et l'Europe; La Politique Sarroise de la France. Revue des Deux Mondes. April 15, 1954.

Boothby, Robert. The Leadership of Western Europe. Twentieth Century. April, 1954.

La Conférence de Berlin. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. March, 1954.

Crossman, R. H. S. Break the Deadlock. Twentieth Century. May, 1954.

Développements Récents de Benelux. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. March, 1954.

German Reparations to Israel; the 1953 Treaty and Its Effects. World Today. June, 1954.

Goormaghtigh, John. France and the European Defence Community. International Journal. Spring, 1954.

Murray, John. Western Europe in the Spring of 1954. Studies (Dublin). Spring, 1954.

Pinay, Antoine. France's Political and Economic Problems. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Portugal; the Quiet Phenomenon. Economist (London). April 10, 1954.

Problèmes Posés, Sur le Plan Juridique—Interne et Externe—Par la Reunification Éventuelle de l'Allemagne. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. March, 1954.

Robinson, Kenneth. The End of Empire. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Smogorzewski, K. M. Germany's Future Role in Europe. Fortnightly. May, 1954.

Wiking, Paula. Scandinavia and Asia. Eastern World (London). March, 1954.

Wlatnig, Friedrich. Austrian Foreign Policy on the Eve of the Four-Power Conference. Swiss Review of World Affairs. February, 1954.

U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe

Cherry, Robert L. and Mangun, C. W., Jr. Technical Assistance in Public Health; the 6-Year Program in Greece. Public Health Reports. May, 1954.

Greenlaw, Phyllis A. Peace in Soviet Strategy. Russian Review. April, 1954.

Hartmann, Frederick H. Soviet Russia and the German Problem. Yale Review. June, 1954.

McGhee, George C. Turkey Joins the West. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Macridis, Roy C. Stalinism and the Pattern of Colonial Revolt. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

On the Anniversary of the Ankara Agreement [a symposium]. Review of International Affairs (Belgrade). February 16, 1954.

Pešels, Branko M. Legal Trends in "People's Democracies;" the Satellite States. George Washington Law Review. April, 1954.

Les Relations Internationales de la Yougoslavie dans la Période de 1950 à 1953. Questions Actuelles du Socialisme (Paris). January-February, 1954.

Soviet Cultural Collaboration; the Role of the Friendship Societies in the Satellite States. World Today. May, 1954.

Tito-Broz, Josip. The Meaning of My Visit to Turkey. Yugoslav Review. May, 1954.

Middle East and Africa

Alexander, Lewis M. The Arab-Israeli Boundary Problem. World Politics. April, 1954.

Britain, Egypt and the Canal Zone since July 1952. World Today. May, 1954.

Byroade, Henry A. Facing Realities in the Arab-Israeli Dispute. Department of State Bulletin. May 10, 1954.

———. The Middle East in New Perspective. Ibid. April 26, 1954.

Cooke, Hedley V. Foreign Investment in the Middle Eastern Region, 1944-1953. Middle Eastern Affairs. April, 1954.

Cragg, Kenneth. The Intellectual Impact of Communism upon Contemporary Islam. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

Gerig, Benjamin. African Issues before the Trusteeship Council's Thirteenth Session. Department of State Bulletin. May 10, 1954.

Glubb, J. B. Violence on the Jordan-Israel Border: A Jordanian View. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Hahn, Lorna H. Tunisia; A Challenge to American Foreign Policy. Middle Eastern Affairs. May, 1954.

Jernegan, John D. America and the New India. Department of State Bulletin. April 19, 1954. The Middle East and South Asia—The Problem of Security. Ibid. March 22, 1954.

Johnson, Eric. The Near East and the West. Department of State Bulletin. May 24, 1954.

Klein, W. C. Some Remarks on European Cooperation in Tropical Africa. African Affairs. April, 1954.

Lacheraf, Mostefa. Colonialisme et Féodalités Indigènes en Algérie. Esprit. April, 1954.

Overzicht van de Samenwerking tussen de Arabische Staten en van hun Geschillen met Andere Landen sedert September 1953. Internationale Spectator. March 22, 1954.

Peretz, Don. The Arab Minority of Israel. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

Stone, William T. Security in the Mideast. Editorial Research Reports. March 31, 1954.

Pacific and Far East

Alexandrowicz-Alexander, Charles H. The Legal Position of Tibet. American Journal of International Law. April, 1954.

Aron, Raymond. Problèmes Actuels de la Diplomatie on Extrême-Orient. Politique Étrangère. March, 1954.

Ashida, Hitoshi. Japan and its Role in the World Today. World Affairs Interpreter. Spring, 1954.

Clubb, O. Edmund. Asia and the Geneva Conference. Eastern World. April, 1954.

Collar, H. J. Recent Developments of British Commercial Relations with China. Royal Central Asian Journal. January, 1954.

Emerson, Rupert. Paradoxes of Asian Nationalism. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.

Goré, Francis. La Chine Nationaliste et Communiste au Pays des Lamas. Politique Étrangère. January, 1954.

Ishibashi, Tanzan. The World and Japanese Economy in 1954. Oriental Economist. March, 1954.

Murphy, Robert. America, Japan, and the Future of the Pacific. Department of State Bulletin. March 22, 1954.

———. Japan's Progress and Prospects. Ibid. April 5, 1954.

Saposs, David J. The Split between Asian and Western Socialism. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

La Situation en Corée. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. January, 1954.

Tamura, Kosaku. The Rhee Line and International Law. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 7-9 (1954).

Taylor, George E. Power in Asia. Virginia Quarterly Review. Summer, 1954.

Thomas, S. B. The Chinese Communists' Economic and Cultural Agreement with North Korea. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

Southeast Asia

Donnithorne, Audrey G. Western Business in Indonesia Today. Pacific Affairs. March, 1954.

[Indochina Symposium.] Foreign Policy Bulletin. May 15, 1954.

Regala, Roberto. The Stakes of the Free World in Southeast Asia. Philippine Law Journal. December, 1953.

Trager, Frank N. and Helen G. Burma; Land of Golden Pagodas. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series, No. 104. March, 1954.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Barkway, Michael. Mugwumpery in the Randall Report. International Journal. Spring, 1954.

Calderwood, James D., and De Rycke, Laurence. A Door to the Present; A Discussion of Current Programs and Problems of Technical Assistance. International Development Placement Association, Inc., Monograph Series No. 1. May, 1954.

Corporate International Investment Policies and Programs. American Economic Review. May, 1954.

Dorsey, Stephen P. Economic Cooperation between the U. S. Government and the Countries of the Near East. Department of State Bulletin. April 12, 1954.

Economic Doctrines Implied in the Reports of the United Nations and of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development on Underdeveloped Countries. American Economic Review. May, 1954.

Jacobsson, Per. The Problem of Convertibility for Western Europe. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Meier, Gerald M. The Problem of Limited Economic Development. Economia Internazionale (Genoa). November, 1953.

Plessz, Nicola. Méthodes d'Études des Réformes Agraires dans les Pays Insuffisamment Développés. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

The Theory of International Trade in a World of Trade Barriers and Controls and of Variegated National Economic Systems. American Economic Review, May, 1954.

International Law

Benton, W. E. Some Early Developments of an International Criminal Jurisdiction. Southwestern Law Journal. Winter, 1954.

Christopher, Warren M. The Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act; Key to a New Frontier. Stanford Law Review. December, 1953.

Drachsler, Leo M. The Status of Alien Corporations in the Law of the United States. Fordham Law Review. March, 1954.

Dubin, Joseph S. The Universal Copyright Convention. California Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Farran, C. D'Olivier. The Sovereign Order of Malta in International Law. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1954.

Feliciano, Florentino P. The Belligerent Occupant and the Returning Sovereign; Aspects of the Philippine Law of Belligerent Occupation. Philippine Law Journal. October, 1953.

Gold, Joseph. The Interpretation by the International Monetary Fund of Its Articles of Agreement. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1954.

Haight, George W. International Law and Extraterritorial Application of the Antitrust Laws. Yale Law Journal. March, 1954.

Halecki, Oscar. The Natural Law and International Affairs Today. Fordham Law Review. March, 1954.

Henn, Harry G. The Quest for International Copyright Protection. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Johnson, D. H. N. The Minquiers and

Ecehros Case. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1954.

Lipartiti, Ciro. L'Adattamento degli Ordinamenti Giuridici Interni alle Norme del Diritto Internazionale Sancito nelle Carte Costituzionali degli Stati. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. January-March, 1954.

Loewenstein, Karl. Sovereignty and International Cooperation. American Journal of International Law. April, 1954.

Martin, Paul. Recent Developments in International Law. Canadian Law Review. March, 1954.

Olmstead, Cecil J. International Law. New York University Law Review. January, 1954.

Piotrowski, G. L'Ordre International et la Question de Sujets de Droit. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. January-March, 1954.

Plischke, Elmer. Reactivation of Prewar German Treaties. American Journal of International Law. April, 1954.

Weis, Paul. The International Protection of Refugees. American Journal of International Law. April, 1954.

Whitney, William D. Sources of Conflict between International Law and the Antitrust Laws. Yale Law Journal. March, 1954.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Evans, Luther H. UNESCO and Asia. Eastern World. May, 1954.

Honig, F. The International Civil Service; Basic Problems and Contemporary Difficulties. International Affairs. April, 1954.

Lodge, Henry Cabot, Jr. The United Nations Record of Accomplishment. Department of State Bulletin. May 10, 1954.

Observations sur l'Affaire des Fonctionnaires Américains Congédiés par le Secrétaire Général à la Demande du Gouvernement des États-Unis. Politique Étrangère. January, 1954.

Pate, Maurice. UNICEF up to Date. Children (Washington). March-April, 1954.

Tripp, Brenda M. H. UNESCO in Perspective. International Conciliation. March, 1954.

United Nations Review. [Vol. I, No. 1, July, 1954. Published monthly by Department of Public Information, United Nations. Absorbs the former United Nations Bulletin.]

Wolfers, Arnold. Collective Security and the War in Korea. Yale Review. June, 1954.

Military and Security Questions

Activités dans le Cadre du Traité de l'At-lantique Nord. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. March, 1954.

Allaib, M. La Pseudo-impasse de la Communauté Européenne de Défense. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. April, 1954.

Bebr, Gerhard. European Defence Community and the North Atlantic Alliance. George Washington Law Review. June, 1954.

Billote, Général. La Communauté Européenne devant la Situation Stratégique. Revue des Deux Mondes. May 1, 1954.

de Clermont-Tonnerre, Thierry. L'Armée Européenne; Une Analyse sans Passion. Politique Étrangère. April-May, 1954.

Duncannon, Viscount. The Story of the Atlantic Committees. Quarterly Review. April, 1954.

Lemonnier, A. G. Deux Ans de Collège NATO. Revue de Défense Nationale. May, 1954.

Lodge, Henry Cabot, Jr. The Importance of the European Defense Community to the Free World. Department of State Bulletin. May 17, 1954.

Mason, Leonard M. SACLANT. Marine Corps Gazette. April, 1954.

Van Karman, Theodore. NATO Brain Bank. Air Force. May, 1954.

Regional Organizations

Benham, Frederic. The Colombo Plan. Economica. May, 1954.

Mackay, M. C. J., Baroness. Politieke en Regionale Organisatie in het Caraïbische Gebied. International Spectator. April 8, 1954.

Robertson, A. H. The Council of Europe, 1949-1953—I. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1954.

Schuman, Robert. Origines et Élaboration du "Plan Schuman." Les Cahiers de Bruges. December, 1953.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Conference on West Indian Federation. The Plan for a British Caribbean Federation, agreed by the Conference . . . held in London in April, 1953. London, H.M.S.O., 1953 (Cmd. 8895).

Council of Europe. Consultative Assembly. Fifth Ordinary Session. Part II: June 23-24, 1953; Part III, September 15-26, 1953. Official Report, Vols. 1-5; Documents, Vols. 1-5; Texts Adopted, Vols. 2-3. Strasbourg, 1953.

European Coal and Steel Community. État Prévisionnel Général pour l'Exercice 1954-1955. n.p., 1954.

— The High Authority. Second General Report on the Activities of the Community

(13th April 1953 to 11th April 1954). n.p., 1954.

Germany. Bundesministerium für Gesamtdeutsche Fragen. The Efforts Made by the Federal Republic of Germany to Re-establish the Unity of Germany by Means of All-German Elections; Papers and Documents. 2nd enlarged edition. Bonn, 1954.

ICAO. Secretariat. Index of ICAO Publications. December, 1953.

International Court of Justice. Index to the Reports of Judgments, Advisory Opinions and Orders. The Hague, 1953. (Sales No. 115.)

ILO. Director-General. Report . . . Geneva, ILO, 1954.

——— International Organisations Committee. Report . . . Geneva, ILO, 1954.

——— Relationship between the Activities of the ILO and Those of Other International and Regional Organizations in the Social Field. Geneva, ILO, 1954.

ITU. General Secretariat. Documents of the Plenipotentiary Conference of the ITU, Buenos Aires, 1952. Geneva, 1953.

Netherlands. Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Directorate-General for the Economic and Military Aid Program. Road to Recovery; The Marshall Plan: Its Importance for the Netherlands and European Cooperation. The Hague, 1954.

Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Report . . . Covering the Period 9 September 1953–21 February 1954. UN Doc. A/2641, April, 1954. UN, 1954.

Organisation for European Economic Co-operation. European Economic Cooperation; Sixth Survey Prepared . . . for the Council of Europe. Paris, OEEC, 1954.

——— OEEC at Work for Europe . . . Paris, OEEC, 1954.

Pan American Union. Report on the Activities of the Organization of American States, 1948–1953; Submitted to the Tenth Inter-American Conference. Washington, 1953.

——— Strengthening of Internal Security. Washington, 1953.

United Kingdom. Ministry of Defence. Statement on Defence 1954. London, H.M.S.O., 1954 (Cmd. 9075).

——— Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Memorandum Regarding United Kingdom Association with the European Defence Community, April 13, 1954. London, H.M.S.O., 1954 (Cmd. 9126, Misc. No. 10, 1954).

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1954, unless a different place or date is shown.

Economic and Social Council. Bibliography on the Processes and Problems of Industrialization in Under-developed Countries. 29 March 1954. (Doc. E/2538.)

——— Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. Annual Report . . . 15 February 1953–18 February 1954. March, 1954. (E/2553; E/CN.11/378.)

——— UNESCO Activities in 1953 of Interest to the ECAFE. Kandy, 27 January 1954. (Doc. E/CN.11/384.)

——— Economic Commission for Latin America. Sixth Annual Report (26 April 1953–10 February 1954). (Doc. E/2536; E/CN.12/AC.24/9/Rev.1.)

——— Study of the Prospects of Inter-Latin American Trade; Southern Zone of the Region. (Doc. E/CN.12/304; Rev.2.)

——— Statistical Commission. Report on International Definition and Measurement of Standards and Levels of Living. Report of a Committee of Experts . . . (Doc. E/CN.3/179; E/CN.5/299.)

——— Technical Assistance Committee. Technical Assistance Activities under the Expanded Programme. Status Report as at 31 January 1954. (Doc. E/TAC/35.)

General Assembly. Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa. Report . . . (Doc. A/2505 and A/2505/Add. 1.)

——— International Law Commission. Nationality including Statelessness. Third Report on the Elimination or Reduction of Statelessness. By Roberto Cordova, Special Rapporteur. (Doc. A/CN.4/81.)

——— Regime of the Territorial Sea. Third Report . . . by J. P. A. François. (Doc. A/CN.4/77.)

——— UN Command. Korean Question. Report . . . on the Operation of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. April, 1954. (Doc. A/2642.)

——— UN High Commissioner for Refugees. The Promotion of Permanent Solutions for the Problems of Refugees . . . 29 January 1954. (Doc. A/AC.36/32.)

Secretariat. Department of Economic Affairs. Demographic Yearbook, 1953. 5th issue. 1953. (Sales No.: 1953.XIII.9.)

——— Department of Public Information. La Comisión Económica para América Latina. (Sales No.: 1954.I.7.)

——— The Economic Commission for Europe. Geneva, 1953. (Sales No.: 1954.I.3.)

——— Structure of the United Nations (Seventh Revision). (Doc. ST/DPI/8.)

——— Department of Social Affairs. The Impact of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. 1953. (Sales No.: 1953.XIV.1.)

Secretary-General. Economic Development of Under-developed Countries. International Flow of Private Capital . . . Memorandum. . . 19 February 1954. (Doc. E/2546.)

——— Financial Implications of Actions of the [Economic and Social] Council . . . Note by the Secretary-General. 31 March 1954. (Doc. E/2559.)

——— Inter-Agency Agreements and Agreements between Specialized Agencies and Other Intergovernmental Organizations. 6 November 1953. (Doc. ST/SG/3.)

Security Council. Report by the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization to the Security Council pursuant to the Council's Resolution of 24 November 1953. 1 March 1954. (Doc. S/3139/Rev.2.)

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington, Government Printing Office, 1954"; and the congressional materials are those of the 83rd Congress, 2nd Session.

Congress. House. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Eighth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Report by Hon. Frances P. Bolton and Hon. James P. Richards. April 26, 1954. Committee Print.

——— The Mutual Security Act of 1954. Hearings . . . April 5 . . . June 8, 1954.

——— Mutual Security Legislation and Related Documents with Explanatory Notes [to December, 1953]. Committee Print.

——— Ad hoc Committee. To Control the Exportation and Importation of Arms, Ammunition, and Implements of War. Hearing . . . February 25, 1954.

——— Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy. East-West Trade. Hearing . . . February 16, 1954.

——— To Promote the Foreign Policy of the United States by Fostering International Travel and the Exchange of Persons. Hearings . . . February . . . March . . . , 1954.

——— Special Study Mission to Southeast Asia and the Pacific. Report. . . . Committee Print.

——— Senate. Committee on Appropriations. Department of Defense Appropriations for 1955. Hearings. . . [March 15–June 10, 1954.] 2 vols.

——— Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and the United States Information Agency Appropriation, 1955. Hearings. . . [March 22–May 17, 1954.] 2 Parts.

——— United States Aid to India. Report of the Investigations Division. . . April 1954. Committee Print.

——— Committee on Foreign Relations. East-West Trade. Hearing . . . on the Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951. April 9, 1954.

——— Statements of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles and Adm. Arthur Radford, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff. Hearings . . . March 19 and April 14, 1954.

——— Tensions within the Soviet Captive Countries: Rumania (Part 2); Soviet Zone of Germany (Part 3), Czechoslovakia (Part 4). S. Doc. No. 70, Parts 2, 3, and 4.

——— Universal Copyright Convention and Implementing Legislation. Hearings . . . April 7 and 8, 1954.

——— Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. How the United Nations Charter has Developed. Staff Study No. 2. The Problem of Membership in the United Nations. Staff Study No. 3. Committee Prints.

——— Review of the United Nations Charter. Hearings. . . Part 1 [Washington]: January 18 and March 3, 1954. Part 2 [Akron, Ohio]: February 12, 1954. Part 3. [Milwaukee, Wis.]: April 10, 1954.

——— Special Subcommittee on Security Affairs. Strength of the International Communist Movement [revised]. Committee Print No. 2.

——— Committee on the Judiciary. Activities of United States Citizens Employed by the United Nations. Second Report of the Subcommittee. . . March 22, 1954. Committee Print.

Department of State. International Educational Service. The International Educational Exchange Program. 12th Semiannual Report, July–December, 1953. [1954.] (Pub. No. 5409.)

——— Italy—1954. (Pub. No. 5426.)

——— On the Geneva Conference. Background Notes No. 1 (April, 1954). Public Services Division, Department of State, 1954.

Director of Foreign Operations. East-West Trade Trends. Fourth Report to Congress [under the] Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951 (the Battle Act). Second Half of 1953. [1954.]

Library of Congress. Checklist of Archives in the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Tokyo, Japan, 1868-1945. Microfilmed for the Library of Congress, 1949-1951. Photoduplica-tion Service, Library of Congress, 1954.

National Commission for UNESCO. The National Interest and Foreign Languages. Discussion Guide and Work Paper. . . . Preliminary edition. April, 1954.

President. Recommendations Concerning U. S. Foreign Economic Policy; Message of the President to the Congress. (Department of State Pub. No. 5451.)

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

La Pensée Politique et Constitutionnelle de Montesquieu: Bicentenaire de L'Esprit des Lois, 1748-1948. A Symposium. (Paris: Sirey. 1952. Pp. 328.)

The title of this symposium, held by the Comparative Law Institute of the University of Paris in celebration of the bicentennial of Montesquieu's main work, is actually somewhat misleading. It covers not only Montesquieu's political and constitutional ideas but the whole wide range of thought of this universal genius. In addition to acknowledgements of his achievement as a systematic political scientist, the volume includes encomiums of his contributions to the humanities, philosophy of history, and the social sciences (Comte himself paid him the tribute of being "le précurseur de la sociologie").

For obvious reasons, his constitutional thought, especially the doctrine of the separation of powers, is at the center of the symposium both in organization and emphasis, and it is here that the volume makes its major contribution. In a lucid essay, M. Eisenmann dispels some of the misinterpretations which twentieth-century jurisprudence has injected into the doctrine. In spite of Montesquieu's deductive method, it would surely have been strange if this astute observer had been so oblivious of political realities as to suggest the complete isolation of the three basic governmental powers in water-tight compartments. Such an isolation would have prevented the very balancing process which provided the rationale for the separation. A more plausible view is that inherent in the political interpretation prevalent in the nineteenth century, which in essence emphasized Montesquieu's intent of supplementing the separation with a system of checks and balances. The two essentials of the doctrine, as M. Eisenmann sees it, consist of a prohibition against relegating two of the three governmental powers to one and the same organ (which does not exclude participation by one organ in the power of another) and against identity in the social composition of two or more branches of the government. In this constitutional method, which is to serve the central purpose of insuring the security of the citizen against arbitrary action of the sovereign power, social balance plays as important a part as the juristic separation of the powers of the government.

A frequently-voiced criticism of Montesquieu, which stands in urgent need of correction, has reference to his alleged misunderstanding of the British Constitution. In his introductory essay, M. Mirkine-Guetzévitch demonstrates the strictly utopian rôle which British institutions were to play in this context. Montesquieu selected Great Britain for the part, in spite of the considerable discrepancies between his doctrine and British actuality, because of the relatively high degree of liberty which it had attained.

By their very nature symposia of this type can lay claim neither to much originality nor to critical thought. This volume is no exception. Most of the information is known. Nevertheless, the Comparative Law Institute has been eminently successful in producing a useful book by drawing together up-to-date interpretations of Montesquieu's thought, including at the same time discussions of its historical antecedents as well as of its influence on European and American political thinking. —PETER J. FLIESS, Louisiana State University.

La Politique des États et leur Géographie. By JEAN GOTTMANN. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1952. Pp. xi, 228.)

Gottmann follows the rational French school, headed by Paul Vidal de la Blanche, in taking political geography out of the realm of simple determinism. In Gottmann's thinking, politics and geography are completely intertwined. Relief, frontiers, population, resources, all play their roles; but the changing symbolism and organization of politics are as significant to a total pattern of interrelationships as are the more stable physical features of the globe.

Diversified compartmentalization of the world—which is both social and physical—is basic to varied political phenomena and to the tensions of international relations. Political compartments, beginning as trading cities and finally developing into states, occur at the points of interchange in commodities, people, and ideas. These points are generally set at the natural sites where men must delay their travels, meet with each other, and exchange their material and spiritual goods. In course of time, symbolism, organization, and a sense of political cohesion evolve and form the basis for the state.

It may be thought that the stabilizing influence of an emerging symbolism would conflict with the enriching effects of continued interchange. The two actually supplement each other, and are both needed if the state is to develop fully.

The thinking of the French school can be valuable to the American political geographer as an antidote to conceptions of physical determinism; and to the American political scientist as a reminder that politics are intermixed with the features of the physical world.
—JAMES L. BUSEY, University of Colorado.

Political Thought in England: Tyndale to Hooker. BY CHRISTOPHER MORRIS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. x, 220. $2.00.)

This little volume covers roughly the period between the appearance of Tyndale's The Obedience of a Christian Man in 1528 to the end of the 16th century and more particularly the publication of Hooker's Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. The material discussed during this period constitutes naturally an indispensable introduction to the study of the Stuart period and the Puritan Revolution. Mr. Morris is primarily concerned with a careful exposition of the most significant pamphlets and tracts of the Tudor period rather than with an overall analysis and evaluation of the character and the relevance of the political speculation he covers. He discusses the bearing of the classic and feudal past upon the thought of the 16th century writers and pamphleteers; the mixture of theological and utilitarian considerations in the literature defending the King's prerogative and advocating the duty of obedience; and the religious, political, and philosophic assumptions of the Elizabethan period. But probably the most interesting parts of the book are the analysis of Shakespeare's political views and attitudes, and the concluding chapters on the Catholic and Protestant positions respectively and the synthesis attempted by Richard Hooker in the closing years of the century. A detailed bibliography of the source material of the time as well as of secondary literature adds to the value of the book.—ROY C. MACRIDIS, Northwestern University.

Les Socialismes Français et Allemand et le Problème de la Guerre: 1870-1914. BY MILORAD M. DRACHKOVITCH. (Geneva: Librairie E. Droz. 1953. Pp. xii, 385.)

The scope of this work is broader than its title indicates. While the relation of German and French Socialism to the problem of war forms the focus of discussion, the author proceeds further into a critical analysis of the causes of the basic divergencies of the socialist movement in the two countries. M. Drachkovitch feels that despite the official unity of the Marxist front on the question of war and imperialism, as expressed by the successive resolutions of the Second International, there always existed a deep and fundamental cleavage in outlook and theory between the French and German Socialist parties. This divergency was never reconciled and grew from the basic antagonisms exemplified by the Proudonist, syndicalist foundation of French socialism vis à vis the stoutly orthodox Marxism of German Social Democracy. The fact that this divergency was merely covered over by the official pronouncements of the International accounts for the collapse of that organization in 1914. Thus the failure of the International to prevent or stop World War I, and the inability of the various socialist parties to overcome social patriotism by proletarian internationalism, illustrate the lack of meaning which the formalized theses and resolutions of the International had for the rank and file of the workers. The book supplements and deepens the analysis presented by Professor Fainsod in his International Socialism and the World War.

Gettell's History of Political Thought. BY LAWRENCE C. WANLASS. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc. 1953. 2nd ed. Pp. xii, 418. $5.00.)

This new edition of Gettell's well known History of Political Thought by Professor Wan-lass has left the original work substantially unchanged. There has been some revision of the section on the Middle Ages and new material has been added to the concluding sections on Liberalism, Fascism and Communism, but the basic late nineteenth-century approach of Gettell still dominates the work.

Freedom, Loyalty, Dissent. BY HENRY STEELE COMMAGER. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 155. $2.50.)

Five short essays on "The Necessity of Freedom," "The Necessity of Experimentation," "Free Enterprise in Ideas," "Guilt by Association," and "Who is Loyal to America."

Le Syndicalisme en France. BY GEORGES LEFRANC. (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1953. Pp. 125.)

In this brief work Georges Lefranc summarizes the history of syndicalism in France from 1895 to 1950. It is, therefore, a companion book to his earlier Le Syndicalisme dans le Monde, published in the same series as the present work in 1949. Like the earlier work, it constitutes a short but accurate reference for one already acquainted in the field and at the same time a convenient starting point for the beginner.

Robert Owen of New Lanark. BY MARGARET COLE. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. vi, 231. $3.50.)

Margaret Cole here presents a succinct and pleasantly written life of the most successful of the nineteenth-century English social reformers. Mrs. Cole treats her subject with gentle understanding and has called upon her extensive knowledge of the British reform movement to give us a definitive account of the life, deeds, and significance of Robert Owen. Of particular interest is her tracing of the modern application of many of Owen's "utopian" ideas, thus underscoring his continuing influence in the twentieth century.

Brownson on Democracy and the Trend toward Socialism. BY LAWRENCE ROEMER. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1953. Pp. xvi, 173. $3.75.)

Born in New England and reared in the Calvinist tradition, Orestes A. Brownson was converted to Roman Catholicism at the age of forty-one. As a writer and journalist he gained considerable reputation in England and America as a staunch defender of the more extreme Roman Catholic position. In this book

Mr. Roemer has collected from Brownson's voluminous writings those dealing with the problems of democracy and socialism and has combined them into a useful summation of Brownson's political views. The book is of value to students of social movements and especially to those interested in the problem of church and state.

Julius Bahnsen; Eine Untersuchung zur Vorgeschichte der modernen Existenz. BY HEINZ-JOACHIM HEYDORN. (Göttingen-Frankfurt a.M.: Verlag "Öffentliches Leben" G.m.b.H. 1952. Pp. 287.)

This volume is an attempt to rescue from oblivion the contribution of a non-Marxian Hegelian of the left to the intellectual history of the nineteenth century. The author gives a brief summary of biographical data and then analyzes systematically Bahnsen's philosophy. Of particular interest for the political scientist are the chapters on "Will and History," "State and Society," and "The Dialectics of Law." The study has considerable interest for contemporary scholars because of Bahnsen's penetrating insights into the dangers lurking in the optimistic assumptions of liberalism and the origins of the contemporary crisis of civilization.

Les Idées Politiques et Sociales de la Résistance (Documents Clandestins—1940-1944). TEXTS CHOSEN AND INTRODUCTIONS BY HENRI MICHEL AND BORIS MIRKINE-GUETZÉVITCH. (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1954. Pp. xi, 410.)

Having ably described, in their respective introductory chapters, in what ways and through what channels the political thought of the French resistance grew and found expression during World War II (Michel) and having summarized its main problems and trends (Mirkine-Guetzévitch), the co-authors offer a selection of various wartime documents, such as articles of underground newspapers, speeches by French leaders abroad, and political declarations of various French political groups. The documents are arranged according to major topics.

Theory and Method in the Social Sciences. BY ARNOLD M. ROSE. (Minneapolis: The University of Minnesota Press. 1954. Pp. xii, 351. $5.00.)

A collection of essays, some of which have been published before, offered for the purpose of encouraging "research in sociology along certain neglected channels and with certain relatively neglected research tools." Some of the chapters will be of interest to political scientists.

Relation of the State to Industrial Action and Economics and Jurisprudence. By HENRY

CARTER ADAMS. EDITED BY JOSEPH DORFMAN. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 182. $3.00.)

A reprint of two late-nineteenth-century essays by an American economist, with an introduction on the author's career and ideas by the editor.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Adams, A. E. Pobedonostsev and the Rule of Firmness. Slavic and East European Review. December, 1953.

Aiken, Henry David. Ultimacy of Rightness in Richard Price's Ethics. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. March, 1954.

Allmayer, V. F. Galilei Primo Uomo Moderno. Belfagor. March, 1954.

Bailey, Sydney D. The Father of Russian Marxism. Contemporary Review. May, 1954.

Baker, Gordon E. Thomas Jefferson on Academic Freedom. American Association of University Professors Bulletin. Autumn, 1953.

Bayet, Jean. Lucrèce devant la Pensée Grecque. Museum Helveticum. March, 1954.

Berve, H. Wesenszüge der Griechischen Tyrannis. Historische Zeitschrift. February, 1954.

Bever, P. Van. L'Italie du XVIII^e s. et J.-J. Rousseau. Revue de Littérature Comparée. January-March, 1954.

Bizet, J.-A. La Critique de la Civilisation au XVIII^e Siècle et ses Antécédents Religieux. Études Germaniques. January-March, 1954.

Boehlich, Walter. Sören, Prinz von Dänemark [Kierkegaard]. Der Monat. March, 1954.

Bondu, André. Le Tragique Destin de Philippe-Égalité. La Revue Libérale. January-March, 1954.

Bowman, Herbert E. Revolutionary Elitism in Černyševskij. American Slavic and East European Review. April, 1954.

Bradley, Ritamary. Backgrounds of the Title Speculum in Mediaeval Literature. Speculum. January, 1954.

Braham, A. Spencer. The Philadelphia Press and the Millerites. Pennsylvania Magazine. April, 1954.

Brett, S. Reed. Queen Elizabeth I's Legacy to the Stuarts. Quarterly Review. April, 1954.

Bussmann, W. Treitschke als Politiker. Historische Zeitschrift. April, 1954.

Campenhausen, Hans Freiherr Von. Die Ersten Konflikte Zwischen Kirche und Staat und Ihre Bleibende Bedeutung. Universitas. March, 1954.

Capek, Milic. James's Early Criticism of the Automaton Theory. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.

Caprariis, Vittorio de. Umanesimo e Politica di Socrate. La Parola del Passato. XXXI/1953.

Capurso, Marcello. I Legittimisti della Restaurazione e la Polemica Anti-borghese. Nuova Antologia. March, 1954.

Chesne, A. Chesnier du. Les Égaréments de Lamartine: Quelques Variantes de son "Histoire des Girondins." Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France. January-March, 1954.

Chroust, Anton-Hermann. The Meaning of Philosophy in the Hellenistic-Roman World. Thomist. April, 1954.

———. Treason and Patriotism in Ancient Greece. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.

Cogniot, Georges. Le Caractère National de l'Oeuvre de la Commune. Cahiers du Communisme. April, 1954.

Cohen, Bernard. Emerson's "The Young American" and Hawthorne's "The Intelligence Office." American Literature. March, 1954.

Constable, Giles. The Alleged Disgrace of John of Salisbury in 1159. English Historical Review. January, 1954.

Cope, Jackson I. "The Cupri-Cosmits:" Glanvill on Latitudinarian Anti-Enthusiasm. Huntington Library Quarterly. May, 1954.

Courtrès, C. Le Système Verbal Grec et la

- Doctrine du Temps chez Aristote. Revue Thomiste. LIII/3. 1953.
- Coussin, J. Suétone Physiognomiste dans les Vies des XII Césars. Revue des Études Latines. XXXI/1953.
- Dawson, Christopher. The Tradition of Christian Monarchy. Month, May, 1953.
- Demenach, J.-M. Barrès et les Contradictions du Nationalisme. Esprit. April, 1954.
- Devlin, C. Ilario Belloc, Poeta, Politico e Storico. La Civiltà Cattolica. 19 December, 1953.
- Díaz, Furio. Idea del Progresso e Giudizio Storico in Voltaire. Belfagor. January, 1954.
- Drexler, Hans. Die moralische Geschichtsauffassung der Römer. Gymnasium. 61/3. 1954.
- Fagerstrom, D. I. Scottish Opinion and the American Revolution. William and Mary Quarterly. April, 1954.
- Fontaine, Jacques. Isidore de Séville et l'Astrologie. Revue des Études Latines. XXXI/1953.
- Fraenkel, Josef. Mathias Acher's Fight for the "Crown of Zion." Jewish Social Studies. April, 1954.
- Frisch, Morton J. Burke on Theory. Cambridge Journal. February, 1954.
- Frisch, Morton J. Lincoln's Doctrine of Statesmanship. University of Kansas City Review. Spring, 1954.
- Fritz, Kurt von. The Composition of Aristotle's Constitution of Athens and the So-called Draconian Constitution. Classical Philology. April, 1954.
- Frye, Roland M. Swift's Yahoo and the Christian Symbols for Sin. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.
- Groot, Ede. Contemporary Political Opinion and the Revolutions of 1848. History. June, 1953.
- Grossmann, Walter. Schiller's Philosophy of History in His Jena Lectures of 1789-90. PMLA. March, 1954.
- Guillemin, A. Sénèque Directeur des Ames. II. Son Activité Pratique. Revue des Études Latines. XXXI/1953.
- Guttsman, W. L. Aristocracy and the Middle Class in the British Political Elite, 1886-1916. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1954.
- Harpaz, E. Mably et la Posterité. Revue des Sciences Humaines. January-March, 1954.
- Hölscher, Vro. Anaximander und die Anfänge der Philosophie. Hermes. 81/3. 1953.
- Hyma, Albert. Erasmus and the Reformation in Germany. Medievalia et Humanistica. Fas. VIII/1954.
- Irazusta, Julio. Colón y Su Tiempo. Estudios Americanos. February, 1954.
- Jachmann, G. Das Homerische Königtum. Maia. October-December, 1953.
- Jackson, Gabriel. Joaquín Costa: Prophet of Spanish National Recovery. South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1954.
- Kibre, Pearl. Scholarly Privileges: Their Roman Origin and Medieval Expression. American Historical Review. April, 1954.
- Klinkhamer, Marie Carolyn. The Catholic University of America, 1889-1905: Ideological Foundations. Catholic Educational Review. March, 1954.
- Koch, Adrienne. James Madison and the Workshop of Liberty. Review of Politics. April, 1954.
- Kukiel, M. La Révolution de 1830 et la Pologne. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. July-September, 1953.
- Lang, Mabel. The Generation of Peisistratus. American Journal of Philology. January, 1954.
- Leeman, A. D. Seneca's Plans for a Work "Moralis Philosophia" and Their Influence on His Later Epistles. Mnemosyne. VI/4. 1953.
- Lenin. [Various Articles]. Cahiers du Communisme. January-February, 1954.
- Levenson, J. R. The Abortiveness of Empiricism in Early Ch'ing Thought. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.
- Luquet, G.-H. L' "Encyclopédie" fut-elle une Entreprise Maçonnique? Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France. January-March, 1954.
- Magid, Henry M. Mill and the Problem of Freedom of Thought. Social Research. Spring, 1954.
- Maravall, José Antonio. El Concepto de Reino y los "Reinos de España" en la Edad Media. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1954.
- Margaret Mary, Sister. Slavery in the Writings of St. Augustine. Classical Journal. May, 1954.
- Marken, Jack W. The Canon and Chronology of William Godwin's Early Works. Modern Language Notes. March, 1954.
- Mead, A. R. The McGuffey Heritage. Educational Forum. March, 1954.
- Mead, Sidney E. Abraham Lincoln's "Last Best Hope of Earth": The American Dream of Destiny and Democracy. Church History. March, 1954.

Miliband, Ralph. The Politics of Robert Owen. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.

Montenegro, A. El Tradicionalismo Político de Sócrates. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1953.

Nadeau, Maurice. De l'Intellectuel au Révolutionnaire. [Trotsky]. Les Lettres Nouvelles. March, 1954.

Ong, Walter J. Ramus et le Monde Anglo-Saxon d'Aujourd'hui. Revue de Littérature Comparée. January-March, 1954.

Palmer, R. R. Much in Little: The Dutch Revolution in 1795. Journal of Modern History. March, 1954.

Palmer, R. R. The World Revolution of the West, 1763-1801. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Pankhurst, Richard K. B. Anna Wheeler: A Pioneer Socialist and Feminist. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Park, Charles E. Puritans and Quakers. New England Quarterly. March, 1954.

Parry, Stanley J. The Premises of Brownson's Political Theory. Review of Politics. April, 1954.

Pavano, Giuseppe. La Morte degli Eroi nell'Iliade. Rivista di Filologia. XXXI/4. 1953.

Peach, Bernard. The Indefinability and Simplicity of Rightness in Richard Price's Review of Morals. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. March, 1954.

Piane, M. Delle. Appunti Preliminari per Uno Studio su Pietro Dubois: I. La Letteratura su P. Dubois. Studi Senesi. LXIV/3. 1952.

Popkin, Richard H. The Development of the Philosophical Reputation of Joseph Glanvill. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.

Poulet, Georges. Fénelon et les Temps. La Nouvelle Revue Française. April, 1954.

Pross, Helge. A Romantic Socialist in Prussia. German Quarterly. March, 1954.

Quadri, G. La Risposta del Cattolicesimo Francese alla Rivoluzione. Studi Senesi. LXIV/3. 1952.

Ramat, Raffaello. Classicismo delle "Istorie Fiorentine." Nuova Antologia. March, 1954.

Reardon, B. M. G. Richard Hooker's Apology for Anglicanism. Hibbert Journal. April, 1954.

Reesor, Margaret E. The Stoic Concept of Quality. American Journal of Philology. January, 1954.

Rein, G. Adolf. Bismarcks Gegenrevolutionäre Aktion in den Märztagen 1848. Die Welt als Geschichte. XIII/4. 1953.

Riber, Lorenzo. Erasmo y los Intelectuales Germanicos. Arbor. February, 1954.

Riemer, Neal. The Republicanism of James Madison. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Robbins, Caroline. "When Is It That Colonies May Turn Independent": An Analysis of the Environment and Politics of Francis Hutcheson. William and Mary Quarterly. April, 1954.

Sánchez Diana, José Maria. El Despotismo Ilustrado de Federico el Grande y su Influencia en España. Arbor. April, 1954.

Santa Pinter, J. J. Algunos Aspectos de la Diplomacia Bizantina. Revista de la Facultad de Derecho y Ciencias Sociales. December, 1953.

Schoeck, R. J. Towards Understanding St. Thomas More. Month. January, 1954.

Silberner, Edmund. French Socialism and the Jewish Question. 1865-1914. Historia Judaica. April, 1954.

Spini, G. Gaetano Mosca e la Storia dell'Italia Unitaria. Studi Senesi. LXIV/3. 1952.

Strasburger, H. Der Einzelne und die Gemeinschaft im Denken der Griechen. Historische Zeitschrift. April, 1954.

Sullivan, Richard E. Early Medieval Missionary Activity: A Comparative Study of Eastern and Western Methods. Church History. March, 1954.

Temko, Allen. The Burning of the Talmud in Paris [A.D. 1242]. Commentary. May, 1954.

Theiler, Willy. Schichten im 6. Buch des Polybios. Hermes. 81/3. 1953.

Topazio, Virgil W. Diderot's Supposed Contribution to d'Holbach's Works. PMLA. March, 1954.

Trent, Max. Athen und Melos und der Melierdialog des Thukydides. Historia. II/3. 1954.

Valensin, A. Platon et la Théorie de l'Amour. Études. April, 1954.

Villey, Michel. Deux Conceptions du Droit Naturel dans l'Antiquité. Revue Historique de Droit Française et Étrangère. 31/4. 1953.

Vretska, Karl. Die Geisteshaltung der Geschichtsschreiber Sallust und Livius. Gymnasium. 61/3. 1954.

Wagner, Vern. The Lotus of Henry Adams. New England Quarterly. March, 1954.

Weathers, Willie T. Edward Taylor and the Cambridge Platonists. American Literature. March, 1954.

Weathers, Winston. Xenophon's Political Idealism. Classical Journal. April, 1954.

Wellesley, K. Can You Trust Tacitus? Greece and Rome. February, 1954.

Wendehorst, A. Albertus Magnus und Konrad von Hochstaden. Rheinische Vierteljahrsblätter. 18/1-2. 1953.

Whitaker, Arthur P. La Aparación de la Idea de Hemisferio Occidental. Estudios Americanos. April, 1954.

Whitmore, P. J. S. English Thought and Learning in the Works of Pierre Bayle. French Studies. April, 1954.

Wickert, Lothar. Theorie und Wirklichkeit in Platon's Staatsdenken. Rheinisches Museum der Philologie. 97/1. 1954.

Will, Édouard. Trois Quarts de Siècle de Recherches sur L'Economie Grecque Antique. Annales. January-March, 1954.

Woodhead, A. G. Peisander. American Journal of Philology. April, 1954.

Zabkar, Louis V. The Theocracy of Amarna and the Doctrine of the Ba [Egypt]. Journal of Near Eastern Studies. April, 1954.

Ziegler, Konrat. Zur Textgestaltung von Cicero De Legibus. Hermes. 81/3. 1953.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Ambrosini, Gaspare. Il Rinnovamento del Diritto Pubblico nell'Opera di V. E. Orlando. Nuova Antologia. April, 1954.

American Federalism [Various Articles]. Columbia Law Review. April, 1954.

Antieau, Chester James. The Federalism of Freedom. Kentucky Law Journal. March, 1954.

Bastid, P. La Théorie des Chartes. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. July-September, 1953.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr. The Public Security and Wire Tapping. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Cuello Calón, Eugenio. Vicisitudes y Panorama Legislativo de la Pena de Muerte. Anuario de Derecho Penal y Ciencias Penales. September-December, 1953.

Durham, James A. Congress, the Constitution and Crosskey. Indiana Law Journal. Spring, 1954.

Forer, Lois G. Some Aspects of Civil Liberty in Pennsylvania. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Fyzee, Asaf A. A. Islamic Law and Theology in India: Proposals for a Fresh Approach. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.

Galati, Domingo. La Naturaleza de la Norma Jurídica. Revista de la Facultad de Derecho y Ciencias Sociales. December, 1953.

Goldschmidt, Werner. Problemas de Justicia en "Medida por Medida" de Shakespeare. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1953.

Griswold, Erwin N. The Fifth Amendment: An Old and Good Friend. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1954.

Hall, Jerome. Unification of Political and Legal Theory. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Horvath, Barna. Between Legal Realism and Idealism. Northwestern University Law Review. January-February, 1954.

Kauper, Paul G. Church, State, and Freedom. Michigan Law Review. April, 1954.

Klingner, Friedrich. La Idea de Justicia de Hesiodo a San Augustin. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1953.

Lener, S. I Diritti di Libertà nella Costituzione Italiana. La Civiltà Cattolica. 19 December, 1953.

Letwin, William L. The English Common Law Concerning Monopolies. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Ludwig, Frederick J. Journalism and Justice in Criminal Law. St. John's Law Review. May, 1954.

Morse, Howard N. An Excursion into Legal Philosophy—Maiden Voyage. Dickinson Law Review. March, 1954.

Spence, James R. The Law of Crime Against Nature. North Carolina Law Review. April, 1954.

Tejada, F. E. de. Filosofia Jurídica Brasileña. Estudios Americanos. March, 1954.

Special Study and Analysis

Abbamonte, G. Libertà e Convivenza. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. VIII/3-4. 1953.

Anderson, C. Arnold. Human Nature: The Common Concern for the Humane Disciplines. Ethics. April, 1954.

Apartheid and the Scriptures. Round Table. March, 1954.

Aron, Raymond. L'Asie entre Marx et Malthus. Preuves. May, 1954.

Bachelet, Vittorio. Uomini e Masse. Civitas. January, 1954.

Barberis, Corrado. Sviluppo e Spirito della Proprietà Fondiaria in Europa. Civitas. December, 1953 and January, 1954.

Barjon, L. Le Silence de Dieu dans la Littérature Contemporaine. Études. May, 1954.

Baroni, Pier Giovanni. L'Ideale d'Europa dall'Umanismo al Risorgimento. Civitas. February-March, 1954.

- Benton, William. Europe and Senator McCarthy. Fortnightly. April, 1954.
- Bergson, Abram. On the Concept of Social Welfare. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1954.
- Blanchot, Maurice. Réflexions sur le Nihilisme. La Nouvelle Revue Française. May, 1954.
- Billy, Jacques-Serge. Le Problème de la Finalité des Sociétés Politiques et les Explications Idéologiques. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1954.
- Borne, E. Morale Laïque et Morale Naturelle. La Vie Intellectuelle. March, 1954.
- Bruckberger, Raymond L. Die Christenheit und Europa. Neues Abendland. April, 1954.
- Brunner, Otto. Das Zeitalter der Ideologien: Anfang und Ende. Die Neue Rundschau. 65/1. 1954.
- Buchanan, James M. Social Choice, Democracy and Free Markets. Journal of Political Economy. April, 1954.
- Bureaucracy and Democratic Government [Various Articles]. Annals. March, 1954.
- Caillois, Roger. La Guerre Courtoise. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. October-December, 1953.
- Catholicism. Problèmes du Catholicisme Français [Various Articles]. La Nef. January, 1954.
- Cerini, Matteo. La Logica di Stalin. Rassegna Italiana. February, 1954.
- Chastaing, M. Sociologie et Psychologie ou l'Arbre de la Science Objective. La Vie Intellectuelle. May, 1954.
- Clark, Colin. The Poverty of Nations. Encounter. March, 1954.
- Clive, Geoffrey. "The Teleological Suspension of the Ethical" in Nineteenth-Century Literature. Journal of Religion. April, 1954.
- Coats, A. W. The Historist Reaction in English Political Economy. Economica. May, 1954.
- Cobban, Alfred. The Open Society: A Reconsideration. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.
- Colton, Joel. The French Socialist Party: A Case Study of the Non-Communist Left. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.
- Communism and the West [Various Articles]. Nuovi Argomenti. January-February, 1954.
- Coser, Lewis and Howe, Irving. Images of Socialism. Dissent. Spring, 1954.
- Cragg, Kenneth. The Intellectual Impact of Communism upon Contemporary Islam. Middle East Journal. Spring, 1954.
- Dabin, Jean. Sur la Science Politique. Revue de Droit Public et de la Science Politique. January-March, 1954.
- Daniel, Vera. Physical Principles in Human Co-operation. Sociological Review. XLIV/7. 1952.
- Deutsch, Karl W. Game Theory and Politics: Some Problems of Application. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1954.
- Díez del Corral, Luis. Secularización y Dinamismo Histórico. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1954.
- Dirks, Walter. Die "Klerkalen" und die "Liberalen." Frankfurter Hefte. May, 1954.
- Dugan, John T. The License of Liberty: Art, Censorship, and American Freedom. Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. March, 1954.
- Elia, Leopoldo. Funzioni e Ordinamento dello Stato Moderno. Civitas. January, 1954.
- Emerson, Rupert. Paradoxes of Asian Nationalism. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.
- English, Raymond. "I Am But Mad North-North-West." Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1954.
- Falnes, Oscar. European Progress and the Superior Races: As Viewed by a Fin-du-Siècle Liberal. Charles H. Pearson. Journal of the History of Ideas. April, 1954.
- Fejto, F. Mac-Carthysme et Fascisme. Esprit. May, 1954.
- Fennell, Desmond. Madrid: Eine "Dritte Kraft" in der Spanischen Politik. Dokumente. February, 1954.
- Fleming, D. F. Are We Moving toward Fascism? Journal of Politics. February, 1954.
- Frank, S. L. The Utopian Heresy. Hibbert Journal. April, 1954.
- Freyer, Hans. Der Mensch und die Gesellschaftliche Ordnung der Gegenwart. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 110/1.
- Friedsam, H. J. Bureaucrats as Heroes. Social Forces. March, 1954.
- Fromm, Eric. The Psychology of Normalcy. Dissent. Spring, 1954.
- Galard, H. de. Avènement du McCarthysme. Les Temps Modernes. February and March, 1954.
- Gálíndez, Jesús de. Revolución Socio-Económica en Ibero-América. Cuadernos Americanos. March-April, 1954.

- Gambra, Rafael. La Última Posición de Camus. Arbor. February, 1954.
- Gell, C. W. M. The Moral Imperative [Albert Schweitzer]. Dalhousie Review. Winter, 1954.
- Gini, C. La Concezione del Progresso Economico in Oriente ed in Occidente. Il Politico. December, 1953.
- Giuliani, A. I Due Storicisme. Il Politico. December, 1953.
- Goodspeed, S. S. Mexico: President and Constitution. Mid-America. April, 1954.
- Grant, Robert M. Gnosis Revisited. Church History. March, 1954.
- Herberg, Will. Religious Communities in Present-Day America. Review of Politics. April, 1954.
- Hermens, Ferdinand A. Politics and Ethics. Thought. Spring, 1954.
- Holcombe, Arthur N. Presidential Leadership and the Party System. Yale Review. March, 1954.
- Horia, Vintila. Historicismo y Lucha Social en Italia. Arbor. March, 1954.
- Hughes, H. S. The Crisis of Italian Christian Democracy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Spring, 1954.
- Hughes, H. Stuart. Die Neuen Spenglerianer. Die Welt als Geschichte. XIII/4. 1953.
- Illig, L. and Schnippenkötter, J. Naturwissenschaft und Humanismus. Gymnasium. 61/3. 1954.
- Jaeger, Hans. Die Weltsituation des Sozialismus. Deutsche Rundschau. March, 1954.
- Johnson, Oliver A. Human Freedom in the Best of All Possible Worlds. Philosophical Quarterly. April, 1954.
- Jones, W. H. M. In Defense of Apathy: Some Doubts on the Duty to Vote. Political Studies. February, 1954.
- Kading, Daniel. Moral Judgments in Social Science. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1954.
- Kemp, John. Pain and Evil. Philosophy. January, 1954.
- Kirk, Russell. The Ethics of Censorship. Shenandoah. Spring, 1954.
- . The Face of Britain: A Year's Retrospect. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1954.
- Koestler, Arthur. Petit Guide des Névroses Politiques. Preuves. March, 1954.
- Kruszewski, Charles. The Pivot of History. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.
- Lacroix, Jean. Sens et Valeur de l'Athéisme Actual. Esprit. February, 1954.
- Latif, Syed Abdul. Islam and Social Change. International Social Science Bulletin. V/4. 1953.
- Leclercq, Jacques. Interclassismo Cristiano e Solidarietà di Classe. Civitas. December, 1953.
- Lee, D. E. and Beck, R. N. The Meaning of "Historicism." American Historical Review. April, 1954.
- Lee, Harold N. The Hypothetical Nature of Historical Knowledge. Journal of Philosophy. April 1, 1954.
- Loewenstein, Karl. Sovereignty and International Co-operation. American Journal of International Law. April, 1954.
- Lowenthal, Richard. The Djilas Crisis. Twentieth Century. April, 1954.
- Luthy, Herbert. Democracy and its Discontents: II. France. Encounter. May, 1954.
- Mackenzie, Murdo. Is There a National Neurosis? Sociological Review. XLIV/6. 1952.
- Mackenzie, W. J. M. Representation in Plural Societies. Political Studies. February, 1954.
- Madison, Charles A. Justice Black: Defender of the Bill of Rights. Chicago Jewish Forum. Spring, 1954.
- Maloney, Martin. "A Grammar of Assassination"—The Semantics of the Literature of Violence. Etc. Winter, 1954.
- Martin, Lucien. L'Affaire Hiss. Esprit. May, 1954.
- Mauriac, François. Die Angst. Dokumente. February, 1954.
- Mayo, H. B. The Western Alliance—Ideological or Defensive. International Journal. Spring, 1954.
- Mead, Robert G., Jr. Meditación Sobre la Libertad Intelectual en el Mundo Hispánico. Cuadernos Americanos. March-April, 1954.
- Melby, Ernest O. Education for Renewed Faith in Freedom. Educational Forum. March, 1954.
- Merian-Genast, Ernest. Das Problem der Freiheit im Europäischen Drama der Gegenwart. Universitas. April, 1954.
- Messineo, I. I Cattolici e la Vita Politica. La Civiltà Cattolica. April 3, 1954.
- Momigliano, Arnaldo. M. I. Rostovtzeff. Cambridge Journal. March, 1954.
- Muhlen, Norbert. Democracy and its Discontents. I. Germany. Encounter. April, 1954.
- Mukhopadhyaya, Rani. Harold Laski and the Ideal of Nationalism. Modern Review. April, 1954.
- Nation. La Crise de l'Idée de Nation [Various Articles]. L'Age Nouveau. May, 1954.

Neisser, Hans. Stability in Late Capitalism. Social Research. Spring, 1954.

Niceforo, Alfredo. Los Destinos Magníficos y Progressistas. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. XV/2. 1953.

O'Malley, Frank. The Culture of the Church. Review of Politics. April, 1954.

Ortega y Gasset, José. [Various Articles]. Clavileño. November-December, 1954.

Pierce, Roy. De Gaulle and the RPF—A Post-Mortem. Journal of Politics. February, 1954.

Pierrard, André. Le M.R.P.: Formation Cléricale et Réactionnaire de la Bourgeoisie qui Trahit la Nation. Cahiers du Communisme. March, 1954.

Piettre, A. Le Progrès Social: Frein ou Moteur du Progrès Économique. Études. April and May, 1954.

Popkin, Richard H. The Sceptical Crisis and the Rise of Modern Philosophy. Review of Metaphysics. March, 1954.

Pumphrey, R. J. The Evolution of Thinking. British Journal for the Philosophy of Science. February, 1954.

Rahv, Philip. The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor. Partisan Review. May-June, 1954.

Rainey, Homer P. The Nature and Function of Our Freedoms. Southern Speech Journal. March, 1954.

Rawick, George P. From Faith to Dogma: The Development of the Communist Party Line, 1928-1939. South Atlantic Quarterly. April, 1954.

Reardon, B. M. G. Towards a Christian View of the Meaning of History. Quarterly Review. April, 1954.

Rodríguez, F. R. Notas sobre el Capitalismo Americano. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1953.

Roucek, Joseph S. La Sociología de la Violencia. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. XV/3. 1953.

Sachs, David. On Ends Justifying Means. Dissent. Spring, 1954.

Sanches, L. A. Nuevas Notas Sobre el Romanticismo (Americano). Universidad de la Habana. Nos. 104-111, January-December, 1953.

Sartre, J.-P. Les Communistes et la Paix. Les Temps Modernes. April, 1954.

Schieder, T. Das Verhältnis von Politischer und Gesellschaftlicher Verfassung und der Krise des Bürgerlichen Liberalismus. Historische Zeitschrift. February, 1954.

Schrag, Oswald O. The Main Types of Existentialism. Religion in Life. Winter, 1953-54.

Schulz, Klaus Peter. Sorge um die Deutsche Linke. Deutsche Rundschau. April, 1954.

Schulz, Walter. Über den Philosophiegeschichtlichen Ort Martin Heideggers. Philosophische Rundschau. 1/2-3. 1953-54.

Schütz, Paul. Restauration und Tradition. Neues Abendland. April, 1954.

Schutz, Alfred. Concept and Theory Formation in the Social Sciences. Journal of Philosophy. April 29, 1954.

Schwartz, Benjamin. A Marxist Controversy on China. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.

Sempill, G. D. The Exalted State. Hibbert Journal. April, 1954.

Shils, Edward and Young, Michael. The Meaning of the Coronation. Sociological Review. December, 1953.

Smith, John E. The Revolt of Existence. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Solana, Miguel F. G. Democracia, Totalitarismo y Corporativismo. Cuadernos de Política Social. 19/1953.

Swisher, Earl. The Intellectuals' Dilemma on China Policy. Social Science. April, 1954.

Thomas, Norman. Our Welfare State and Our Political Parties. Commentary. April, 1954.

Tonneau, J. Une Leçon de Prudence Politique. La Vie Intellectuelle. April, 1954.

Topitsch, Ernst. Gesetz und Handlung: Zur Kritik der Marxistischen Geschichtsphilosophie. Merkur. April, 1954.

Topitsch, Ernst. The Sociology of Existentialism. Partisan Review. May-June, 1954.

Turkevich, John. The Progress of Soviet Science. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Valentini, E. L'Intellettualismo e l'Antintellettualismo nel Cristianismo di Ugo Spirito. La Civiltà Cattolica. March 6, 1954.

Valyi, Félix. Asia and the Western Mind. Asia. March, 1954.

Vieg, J. A. La Teoria dell' Amministrazione Democratica. Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. January-February, 1954.

Vito, F. La Posizione dell'Uomo nel Pensiero Economico Contemporaneo. Rivista Internazionale di Scienza Social. January-February, 1954.

Waldo, Dwight. Administrative Theory in the United States. Political Studies. February, 1954.

Walsh, Charles J. Economics and the Common Good. Thought. Spring, 1954.

Warlomont, R. La Notion de Représenta-tion Publique. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. October-December, 1953.

Weber, Eugen. Political Language and Political Realities. Cambridge Journal. April, 1954.

Williams, G. H. and Others. Issues Between Catholics and Protestants at Midcentury. Religion in Life. Spring, 1954.

Wootton, Barbara. The Long Term Impact of the Social Sciences on Democratic Political Practice. Confluence. March, 1954.

Wright, Quincy. Moral Standards in Government and Politics. Ethics. April, 1954.

Yeaza Tigerino, Julio. Notas para un Estudio sobre Sistemas Políticos. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1954.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Cleveland, H. van B. Economics as Theory and Ideology. World Politics. April, 1954.

Ginsberg, Arthur. Hypothetical Constructs and Intervening Variables. Psychological Review. March, 1954.

Riemer, Svend. Premises in Sociological Inquiry. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1954.

Schutz, Alfred. Concept and Theory Formation in the Social Sciences. Journal of Philosophy. April 29, 1954.

Zeuthen, F. Recent Developments in Economics. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1954.

Research Methods and Organization

Bell, Wendell. A Probability Model for the Measurement of Ecological Segregation. Social Forces. May, 1954.

A Plan of Research in International Communication: A Report. World Politics. April, 1954.

Richardson, Stephen A. A Framework for Reporting Field Relations Experiences. Human Organization. Fall, 1953.

Motivation and Personality

Cameron, William Bruce and McCormick, Thomas C. Concepts of Security and Insecurity. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1954.

Horwitz, Murray and Lee, Francis J. Effects of Decision Making by Group Members on Recall of Finished and Unfinished Tasks. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. April, 1954.

Lane, Robert E. Political Character and Political Analysis. Psychiatry. November, 1953.

Lindzey, Gardner and Urdan, James A. Personality and Social Choice. Sociometry. February, 1954.

Masling, Joseph M. How Neurotic is the Authoritarian? Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. April, 1954.

Meyer, H. D. and Pressel, G. L. Personality Test Scores in the Management Hierarchy. Journal of Applied Psychology. April, 1954.

Ross, Aileen D. Philanthropic Activity and the Business Career. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Sullivan, Patrick L. and Adelson, Joseph. Ethnocentrism and Misanthropy. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. April, 1954.

Turner, Ralph H. Self and Other in Moral Judgment. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Opinions and Attitudes

Hollander, E. P. and Bair, J. T. Attitudes toward Authority-Figures as Correlates of Motivation among Naval Aviation Cadets. Journal of Applied Psychology. April, 1954.

Janis, Irving L. and King, Bert T. The Influence of Role Playing on Opinion Change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. April, 1954.

McKeachie, Wilbert J. Individual Conformity to Attitudes of Classroom Groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. April, 1954.

Scudder, Richard and Anderson, C. Arnold. Range of Acquaintance and of Repute as Factors in Prestige Rating Methods of Studying Social Status. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Steiner, Ivan D. Primary Group Influences on Public Opinion. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Group Behavior

Argyris, Chris. The Fusion of an Individual with the Organization. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Blau, Peter M. Co-operation and Competition in a Bureaucracy. American Journal of Sociology. May, 1954.

Borgatta, Edgar F. Analysis of Social Interaction and Sociometric Perception. Sociometry. February, 1954.

Bressler, Marvin and Westoff, Charles F. Leadership and Social Change. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Brown, Paula. Bureaucracy in a Government Laboratory. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Christie, Lee S. Organization and Information Handling in Task Groups. Journal of the Operations Research Society of America. May, 1954.

Combs, Arthur W. and Fisk, Robert S. (eds.). Human Relations Training for School Administrators. Journal of Social Issues. 1954, #2 (whole issue).

Davis, F. James. Conceptions of Official Leader Roles in the Air Force. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Heberle, Rudolf and Howard, Perry H. An Ecological Analysis of Political Tendencies in Louisiana: The Presidential Elections of 1952. Social Forces. May, 1954.

Key, V. O. The Direct Primary and Party Structure. American Political Science Review. March, 1954.

Lockard, W. Duane. Legislative Politics in Connecticut. American Political Science Review. March, 1954.

Mack, Raymond W. Ecological Patterns in an Industrial Shop. Social Forces. May, 1954.

Mack, Raymond W. The Prestige System of an Air Base: Squadron Rankings and Morale. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Norris, Thomas L. Decision-Making Activity Sequences in a Hacienda Community. Human Organization. Fall, 1953.

Payne, Raymond. An Approach to the Study of Relative Prestige of Formal Organizations. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Stahl, Gustav R. A Statistical Report of Industry's Experience with Role Playing. Group Psychotherapy. January-March, 1954.

Strauss, George. Factors in the Unionization of a Utilities Company: A Case Study. Human Organization. Fall, 1953.

Wilson, R. C.; High, W. S.; Beem, H. P.; and Comrey, A. L. A Factor-Analytic Study of Supervisory and Group Behavior. Journal of Applied Psychology. April, 1954.

Culture and Institutions

Benham, Frederic. The Colombo Plan. Economica. May, 1954.

Burkhead, Jesse. The Balanced Budget. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1954.

Ferguson, E. James. Speculation in the Revolutionary Debt: The Ownership of Public Securities in Maryland, 1790. Journal of Economic History. Winter, 1954.

Form, William H. The Place of Social Structure in the Determination of Land Use. Social Forces. May, 1954.

Friedsam, H. J. Bureaucrats as Heroes. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Gerver, Israel and Bensman, Joseph. Towards a Sociology of Expertness. Social Forces. March, 1954.

Mandelbaum, David G. Planning and Social Change in India. Human Organization. Fall, 1953.

Olmsted, Donald W. Organizational Leadership and Social Structure in a Small City. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Rude, George E. Prices, Wages and Popular Movements in Paris during the French Revolution. Economic History Review. April, 1954.

Scudder, Richard and Anderson, C. Arnold. Migration and Vertical Occupational Mobility. American Sociological Review. June, 1954.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Bergson, Abram. On the Concept of Social Welfare. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1954.

Buchanan, James M. Social Choice, Democracy, and Free Markets. Journal of Political Economy. April, 1954.

Davis, Joseph S. Adam Smith and the Human Stomach. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1954.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

Problems related to the organization and administration of public enterprises have become of central importance to the economic development and political stability of most of the countries served by the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. These problems also present an important challenge to the educational institutions of that region as they relate to the training of personnel for both public and private administration and management positions. To the governments and people of the countries outside the ECAFE region and particularly to students of government, the problems faced by the ECAFE countries hold special interest, not only because of their significance for the welfare of the countries themselves and to the political stability of the world, but also because so many of the problems have been the subject of study and debate in most Western countries.

The first detailed discussion of these problems on a regional basis took place at a seminar held in Rangoon, March 15-26, 1954, on the subject, "The Organization and Administration of Public Industrial Enterprises." It was sponsored by the United Nations (Technical Assistance Administration and ECAFE) and the International Institute of Administrative Sciences (Brussels). The agenda of the seminar included the following items: trends in the development of public enterprises in the ECAFE region; types of organizations suitable for public industrial undertakings; organization relationships within the governmental structure; financing of public enterprises; commercial aspects of public enterprises; problems of internal administration; and public understanding.

Participants came from the governments of Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, China, France, India, Japan, Pakistan, Philippines, and the United Kingdom, and observers came from Israel and the USSR. Consultants on organizational and administrative problems of public enterprises included T. E. Chester, Acton Society Trust (United Kingdom); Louis Closon, Institut National de la Statistique et des Études Économiques (France); T. Benson Gyles, United Nations Expert at Sindri Fertilizer Project (India); W. Friedmann, University of Toronto (Canada); T. H. Kew-ley, University of Sydney (Australia); Orhan Mersinli, Assistant General Director of Highways (Turkey); Bertil Olters, Regional Director of Royal Swedish Telecommunications Board (Sweden); and Harold Seidman, Government Corporation Specialist, Bureau of the Budget (U.S.). In addition, the UNTAA made available the services of Mr. G. W. Cadbury and Mr. F. J. Tickner. Walter H. C. Laves served as secretary general for the seminar and was responsible both for its preparations, including documentation and the selection of consultants, and for the management of the seminar itself.

The seminar had special significance because of the long preparation which began with work by the ECAFE Secretariat under the direction of U Nyun, Chief of the Industry Division, and a series of meetings of the ECAFE Committee on Industry and Trade. Subsequently, conversations were held with most of the governments in the ECAFE region to determine the precise nature of interest and to agree upon an agenda. Documentation was secured from a large number of countries, both in Asia and in the Western world.

The United Nations plans to issue a volume based on the basic discussion papers revised in the light of the seminar discussion, and it is hoped to make arrangements for the publication of the best among the fifty or more information memoranda dealing with the experiences of some two dozen Western countries on problems in the organization and administration of public enterprises.—WALTER H. C. LAVES.

The American University of Beirut sponsored the first all-Arab conference on public administration, which was held on the university campus, July 30-August 1, 1954. Leading career government officials and professors of political science from the Arab states attended.

The Twelfth Annual Meeting of the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists was held April 29-May 1, 1954, at the State University of Iowa with an attendance of 218 persons. Mr. Allan B. Kline, President of the American Farm Bureau Federation, gave the address at the opening general session. John Gange, Executive Director of the American Political Science Association, spoke at the Friday luncheon on "Prospects for Political Science." Also at the luncheon Professor William Anderson presented a progress report on the work of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, and Professor James K. Pollock reported on the activities and status of the International Political Science Association. The topic for the general session on May 1 was "The Bricker Amendment." This issue was debated by Iowa State Senator D. C. Nolan and Professor Glendon A. Schubert, Jr. of Michigan State College.

Round-table discussions were held on the following topics: "The New Conservatism in American Political Thought," "Emerging Political Issues in the Midwest," "Legislative Reapportionment in the Midwest States," "Foreign Views of American Foreign Policy," and "The Crosskey Interpretation of the Constitution." Professor Crosskey acted in the capacity of discussant for the round-table discussion of his work.

The officers of the Conference for 1954-55 are: Asher N. Christensen, the University of Minnesota, president; Edward H. Buehrig, Indiana University, vice-president; A. LeRoy Bennett, Michigan State College, secretary-treasurer. Two newly elected members of the Executive Council are Royden Dangerfield, University of Illinois, and Vernon Van Dyke, State University of Iowa. The 1955 meeting of the conference will be held at Purdue University on May 5-7.—A. LEROY BENNETT.

The Western Political Science Association held a joint meeting with the Pacific Northwest Political Science Association, April 9-10, 1954, on the campus of Oregon State College, Corvallis, Oregon. The following officers were elected for next year: president, Herman Trachsel, University of Wyoming; vice-president, Curtis W. Martin, University of Colorado; council members, Frank Jonas, University of Utah (one-year term); William Gore, University of Washington; Ivan Hinderaker, University of California (Los Angeles); and Dwight Waldo, University of California (Berkeley). Allan R. Richards, University of New Mexico, will continue as secretary-treasurer. The association will hold its 1955 annual meeting in Boulder, Colorado, one day before the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association.—ALLAN R. RICHARDS.

The Northern California Political Science Association held its annual meeting on May 8, at the College of San Mateo. Papers were delivered and discussions held on "Persistent Issues in American Foreign Policy," "Executive-Legislative Relations in the Conduct of Foreign Affairs," "Civil Rights Issues Today," and "Water Resources Development in California." Professor Claudius O. Johnson of Washington State College addressed the luncheon on "The State of Victoria Investigates Communism." Officers elected for 1954-1955 were: president, John M. Selig, City College of San Francisco; vice-president, Thomas S. Barclay, Stanford University; and secretary-treasurer, Robert C. McKenzie, University of San Francisco. The following were designated members of the Council: Joseph P. Harris, University of California; Richard J. Roberts, University of Santa Clara; Joseph Rupley, Safeway Stores; Charles Lohmyer, San Francisco Naval Shipyard; Philip W. Buck, Stanford University; John McLaughlin, California State Personnel Board; and Earl Campbell, San Jose State College.—JOHN M. SELIG.

The annual meeting of the Social Science Section of the Ohio College Association was held at the Ohio State University in Columbus, Friday and Saturday, April 9 and 10, 1954. Political scientists and economists from the faculties of Ohio universities and colleges comprise the group. Of the sixty-four in attendance, thirty-three were political scientists from fifteen institutions.

The program for the Friday afternoon session included a paper on "The Bricker Amendment" by Alfred Hotz, Western Reserve University, and one on "European Union" by Daniel Wit, Cincinnati. The evening meeting was addressed by John A. Skipton, director of the newly established Ohio Legislative Service Commission. At a joint dinner on Friday, Willard H. Ellsbree, Ohio University, presented some of his experiences as a member of the United Nations Economic and Social Council during the previous summer. The Saturday morning program was devoted to local topics. Harvey Walker, Ohio State, discussed "Metropolitan Fringe Problems," and Roland Gregg, Toledo Municipal League, presented "An Approach to the Metropolitan Problem." The joint luncheon on Saturday was addressed by R. S. Milne, Bristol, England, currently at Ohio State, on "National Economic Planning in Great Britain."

The officers elected for the year 1954-55 are: president, Donovan Emch, political science, Toledo University; vice-president, Vant Kebker, economics, Ohio Wesleyan University; secretary-treasurer, Mona Fletcher, political science, Kent State University.—MONA FLETCHER.

The William E. Borah Foundation Conference on the Causes of War and the Conditions of Peace, sponsored jointly this year by the Foundation and the Pacific Northwest Conference on Higher Education, was held at the University of Idaho, March 18 and 19, 1954. The Conference theme, "Man's Right to Knowledge and the Free Use Thereof," was adopted in cooperation with Columbia University's bicentennial program. The principal speakers and their subjects were as follows: Thurgood Marshall, Director-Counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People—"Race and Caste Distinction: Effective Barriers to Education and Democracy"; Dr. John A. Krout, Vice-President of Columbia University—"Higher Education and Man's Right to Knowledge and the Free Use Thereof"; Dr. Paul F. Lazarsfeld, professor of sociology at Columbia University—"Mass Media and Modern Society"; and Dr. Ursula M. Niebuhr, head of the department of religion, Barnard College—"Men's Freedom under God."

Following these major addresses, a total of nine public forums dealing with related subjects were held. Over 200 students, faculty members, and visitors traveled from institutions of higher learning throughout Montana, Utah, Oregon, California, and Idaho to participate in the conference. Approximately 1200 people were in regular attendance at the forums.—BOYD A. MARTIN.

United Nations Charter review was the subject of a two-day institute co-sponsored by the Minnesota World Affairs Center and the Center for Continuation Study of the University of Minnesota on April 9 and 10, 1954. A number of Minnesota citizens, assisted by resource persons from area colleges and universities (Carleton, Hamline, Macalester, St. Thomas, and Minnesota), prepared advance working papers for the four discussion groups. Security arrangements, membership questions, domestic jurisdiction, and regional arrangements were the major topics discussed. The points of view expressed by the nearly 200 persons in attendance revolved around the central question, "Should the United Nations Charter be revised, or is it the best that can be achieved at the present time?"

Faculty members who led the discussions included: Pierce Butler, Jr., attorney, St. Paul; Lawrence S. Finkelstein, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Reginald Lang, professor of government and international relations, Carleton College; Werner Levi, professor of political science, University of Minnesota; Linden A. Mander, professor of political science, University of Washington; Charles McLaughlin, associate professor of political science, University of Minnesota; Hans J. Morgenthau, professor of political science, University of Chicago; and Richard W. Van Wagenen, director of the Center for Research on World Political Institutions and associate professor of politics, Princeton University.

David W. Wainhouse, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, gave the concluding address of the Institute, speaking on "The United States and Charter Review." Mr. Wainhouse was introduced by Dr. Charles Mayo, new president of the American Association for the United Nations. William C. Rogers, Director of the World Affairs Center, was general chairman for the Institute.—WILLIAM C. ROGERS.

The Pennsylvania State University held its Third Institute on World Affairs and International Cooperation as part of the main summer session from June 28 to August 7, 1954. The theme of the institute was "The American Impact Abroad: Its Effect on International Cooperation and Understanding." A course in international understanding was taught again by Dr. Richard H. Heindel, Dean of the College of Arts and Science, University of Buffalo, and until recently Deputy Director of the UNESCO Relations Staff of the U.S. Department of State. Weekly lectures by distinguished authorities in world affairs were another feature of the institute. The speakers were: Everett R. Clinchy, President of the National Conference of Christians and Jews; Elmo C. Wilson, President of International Research Associates; Thomas J. Watson, Jr., President of International Business Machines Corporation; Willard W. Beatty, until recently Deputy Director of the Department of Education of UNESCO; and Milton S. Eisenhower, President of the Pennsylvania State University. Weekly round-table discussions together with the showing of special documentary and educational films on world problems made up the remainder of the institute program. Elton Atwater, associate professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, was the general coordinator of the institute activities.

To bridge the gap between theory and practice in politics, the Ninth Annual Summer Forum in State and Local Government in Michigan was offered for graduate and undergraduate credit by the departments of secondary education and political science at Michigan State College, July 6-23, 1954. Sponsoring or cooperating groups for the forum included the Department of Public Instruction, the Michigan Institute of Local Government, the Michigan Municipal League, the Michigan Citizenship Clearing House, as well as Michigan's leading colleges and universities.

One hundred and twenty-five of Michigan's political and academic leaders served on panels to discuss current governmental affairs in Michigan. Topics discussed at the forum included: "Are states' rights threatened by the developments of the last two decades?" "What is being done to solve the 'fringe' area problems?" "Do we need to broaden the base of participation and financing of our political parties?" "How adequately is Michigan meeting the needs of education at the primary, secondary, and higher education levels?" "What is the role being played by the President's and Governor's Commissions on Intergovernmental Relations?" A special feature of the forum this summer was the participation of state, national, and local officials of the two national parties and interest groups to discuss party organization, nominations, elections, and lobbying in the afternoon sessions.

The first year of the Curriculum Development Project of the Northwestern University Political Science Department culminated with a conference on "A Search for the Relevant Political Concepts," which met for five days, June 15-19, 1954. Seven essays were prepared and distributed prior to the conference to persons attending. They were: "Power as a Political Concept," by Hans Morgenthau, University of Chicago; "A Decision-Making Approach to the Study of Political Phenomena," by Richard C. Snyder, Princeton University; "Some Aspects of Structural-Functional Analyses and Political Science," by Marion Levy, Princeton University; "Values in the Political Science Curriculum," by Dwight Waldo, University of California (Berkeley); "The Problem of Political Ideas," by Louis Hartz, Harvard University; "The Group in Political Science," by Charles B.

Hagan, University of Illinois; and "The Role of Public Law in Political Science," by Foster H. Sherwood, University of California (Los Angeles). Other persons attending the conference included: David Apter, Princeton University; Sidney Baldwin, Wesleyan University; Robert Dahl, Yale University; Willmoore Kendall, Yale University; Norton Long, Western Reserve University; Herbert McClosky, University of Minnesota; Paul W. Nitze, U.S. Department of State; E. E. Schattschneider, Wesleyan University; and David Spitz, Ohio State University.

Political scientists who served as consultants to the Northwestern University Curriculum Development Project during the year 1953-54 included Gabriel Almond, Princeton University; Harold Enarson, formerly of the White House staff and now Secretary to the Mayor of Philadelphia; Willmoore Kendall, Yale University; and Adam Watson, specialist in Central European and Near East affairs of the British Embassy staff in Washington, D. C. Mr. Kendall also spoke for political science in a symposium on "Social Determinants of Scientific Study"; other papers were by Professor A. C. Crombie of the University of London (on conditions surrounding the emergence of modern science), and by Professor C. Addison Hickman of North Carolina State College (on economics).—CHARLES S. HYNE-MAN.

A four-day Training Institute for Public Personnel Officers was held in Knoxville on the campus of the University of Tennessee, June 8-11, 1954, under the joint auspices of the Southern Regional Conference of the Civil Service Assembly and the Bureau of Public Administration, University of Tennessee. Fifty-one registrants from public personnel agencies in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia attended one or more of the institute sessions; the group included representatives of city, county, state, and federal agencies located in the southeast. The Institute was designed to provide an opportunity for staff members of public personnel agencies to learn more about their respective specialties and the relation of those specialties to the broader aspects of public personnel administration. Forbes E. McCann, Chief of Examinations and Recruitment, Personnel Department, City of Philadelphia, conducted a two-day session on methods and techniques of recruiting and examining, and Ismar Baruch, Technical Advisor to the United States Civil Service Commission, presided during a similar two-day program devoted to position classification and pay administration. Richard O. Niehoff, Division of Personnel, Tennessee Valley Authority, led a discussion of the place of training in personnel and general management; J. Fred Ogburn, Jr., Director of Personnel, City of Richmond (Virginia), and E. B. Schultz, Chief, Labor Relations Branch, Division of Personnel, Tennessee Valley Authority, served as instructors during a discussion of the problem of employee relations. The institute culminated in a banquet at which Harry L. Case, Director of Personnel, Tennessee Valley Authority, delivered the principal address. The University of Tennessee presented appropriate certificates to those who participated in the institute.

The department of political science of Marshall College sponsored a workshop on "Revising the United Nations Charter," June 1-18, 1954. Professors Conley H. Dillon and Carl Leiden served as lecturers, with the former as director, and Professor Clyde Eagle-ton of New York University was a special consultant. The workshop was attended by graduate students and teachers.

A Workshop in Practical Politics, sponsored jointly by the Washington State Citizenship Clearing House and the State College of Washington, was held on the State College campus on April 17, 1954. The workshop provided twenty leading students from the State College of Washington and six from the University of Idaho an opportunity to hear and talk to six political leaders from both political parties in the state. Assistant Professor Daniel M. Ogden, Jr. served as the director.

The Second Annual Institute on Management in Government and Business was held in Portland, Oregon, June 29, 1954. Assistant Professor Morton Kroll of the department of political science, University of Oregon, was in charge of developing plans for the program. Some thirty-five leaders from business, the federal government, and agencies of state and local government participated in the discussion of common problems of management.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

A Center for Middle Eastern Studies was established in the spring of 1954 at Harvard University for the purpose of integrating and reinforcing instruction in the languages, literatures, history, economics, and culture of the region extending from the eastern Mediterranean to the frontiers of India, with particular emphasis on the modern period. The director of the center is William L. Langer, Coolidge Professor of History, who will work with the Committee on Middle Eastern Studies, an advisory body representing not only various departments of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences but also specialized graduate schools like the Law School, the Littauer Center for Public Administration, the Graduate School of Business Administration, and the School of Public Health.

The function of the new center is to train specialists for academic and non-academic work in an area which has become increasingly important in world affairs and in which the interests and responsibilities of the United States have grown steadily since the end of World War II. The center provides: a Regional Studies Program for the Middle East, comparable to the Regional Studies programs already in operation at Harvard University for the Soviet Union and for East Asia; joint programs for the Ph.D. combining one of the conventional fields, such as anthropology, economics, government, history, or Semitic languages and history, with Middle Eastern Studies; and a focal point for the planning and development of post-doctoral research in various problems of the modern Middle East.

The Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies in Washington, D. C. opened an overseas branch of the school in June, 1954. Through a cooperative arrangement with the University of Rangoon, the branch will be known as the Rangoon-Hopkins Center for Southeast Asian Studies. Under the arrangement with the University of Rangoon, a working library suited to the needs of the center will be provided, and a member of the faculty of the School of Advanced International Studies will serve as co-director of the center. The new center will provide opportunities for students from the school in Washington to carry on field study and research under effective supervision. Dr. William T. Phillips, professor of international economics, is the first co-director and has a group of students from the school with him in Burma to organize the work of the center.

The School of Public Administration, University of Puerto Rico, has recently completed a translation program, sponsored by the Foreign Operations Administration, under which the following works on public administration have been translated into Spanish for use in Latin America: James D. Mooney, The Principles of Organization, rev. ed.; William E. Mosher, J. Donald Kingsley, and O. Glenn Stahl, Public Personnel Administration, 3rd ed.; and L. Urwick, The Elements of Administration.

Since May, 1953, chapters of Pi Sigma Alpha, the national political science honor society, have been installed at the following institutions: North Texas State College, University of New Hampshire, State University of Iowa, American University, Washington and Lee University, and Florida State University.

The Society for Personnel Administration recently announced the appointment of a Committee on Professional Standards composed of the following members: O. Glenn Stahl (chairman), U.S. Civil Service Commission; Mitchell Dreese, George Washington University; Catheryn Seckler-Hudson, the American University; Lloyd M. Short, University of Minnesota; E. Charles Woods, Bureau of the Budget; and Wilton H. Dickerson, U.S. Civil Service Commission. The purpose of the committee is to study the existing literature and to outline research needs for better definition of the nature of, and requirements for, entry and progress in the field of personnel management, both public and private.

During the past few months the National Municipal League sponsored a series of ten radio broadcasts entitled "Citizens at Work." The series dramatized over the National Broadcasting Company network citizen action for community betterment in cities competing in the All-America Cities contest, conducted annually by the League and Look magazine.

The Falk Foundation of Pittsburgh has granted $105,000 to the Citizenship Clearing House for an intensified and expanded program to prepare college students for participation in political affairs. The grant provides for continued support to Citizenship Clearing House activities at selected colleges and universities; a summer program of seminars and workshops, which will bring together teachers of political science, college administrators, and political leaders from the major parties; and the establishment of local affiliates, particularly in the South and Midwest.

The Social Science Research Council will offer in 1955 the several types of fellowships and grants awarded in the present year, and in addition plans to hold two institutes in mathematics for social scientists in the summer of 1955. A more detailed announcement of the following offerings is to be issued in October, and applications for most types of awards will be due soon after the first of January:

Research Training Fellowships, predoctoral and postdoctoral, for "more advanced research training than that which is provided in the usual Ph.D. program." All Ph.D. requirements except the thesis must be met before tenure of fellowship may begin, but application need not be deferred until that point has been reached.

Faculty Research Fellowships, providing half-time support for research for three-year terms. Open to college and university social science teachers, normally not over 35 years of age.

Grants-in-Aid of Research, to aid scholars of established competence in meeting direct expenses of their own research projects. Not open to candidates for degrees.

Undergraduate Research Stipends, open only to college juniors, for supervised research during the summer and the ensuing senior year. Some appointees will be granted first-year graduate study fellowships for the next year.

Institute in Mathematics for Social Scientists, eight-week sessions to be held during the summer of 1955. Open to predoctoral and postdoctoral students and younger faculty members in social sciences who wish to improve their mathematical competence. A limited number may receive stipends.

In addition to the fellowships and grants listed above, the Council will be able during the coming year to offer certain other types of assistance for study and research:

Interuniversity Summer Research Seminars will be supported on the basis described in Social Science Research Council ITEMS, March, 1954, pp. 4-6.

Summer Research Training Institutes will be organized if groups of social scientists indicate interest in intensive technical or interdisciplinary training in fields related to their primary interests and experience. A description of this program was published in ITEMS, June, 1954, pp. 18-19.

Legal and Political Philosophy: The Council has assumed responsibility for continuing administration of a program of predoctoral and postdoctoral fellowships for advanced study and research in this field, which was inaugurated and administered last year by the Rockefeller Foundation.

History of American Military Policy: Grants may be made to support research on this nation's military policies and impinging factors, covering any period between 1750 and 1939 except the Civil War period. Applications for these special grants should be made before November 1. This program is described in ITEMS, June, 1954, pp. 14-15.

Inquiries should if possible be made early in the autumn, so that there will be ample time for preparation of definite applications before the closing dates. The address is: Social Science Research Council, 726 Jackson Place, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

The American Association of University Women has announced twenty-seven fellowships to be offered to American women for advanced study or research during the academic year 1955-56. The amount of the fellowships ranges from $2,000 to $3,500. In general, the $2,000 fellowships will be awarded to young women who have completed residence work for the Ph.D. degree or who have already received the degree; the $2,500-$3,500 awards will be made to the more mature scholars who need a year of uninterrupted work for writing and research. Applications and supporting materials must reach the office in Washington by December 15, 1954. For detailed information, write to the Secretary, Committee on Fellowship Awards, American Association of University Women, 1634 Eye St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

The Washington Semester program at the American University has been expanded by the addition of a third academic unit. Colleges and universities which have recently affiliated with the program are: Baldwin-Wallace College, Boston University, Hillsdale College, Hope College, Lewis and Clark College, Mary Baldwin College, Millikin University, Mills College, Muskingum College, Ohio Wesleyan University, Oklahoma Baptist University, Otterbein College, Pacific University, the University of the South, and Union University.

By action of the Board of Regents of the University of California, the social science building on the Los Angeles campus was named Charles Grove Haines Hall in honor of the former president of the American Political Science Association. Haines Hall, which will house most of the social science departments, became the new home of the political science department in April.

The Connecticut Society for Public Administration resumed activity on an expanded scale during the past academic year, sponsoring three one-day conferences that were widely attended by young careerists in public administration, graduate students, academic persons, and political officials. The topics were inter-governmental administrative relations, state-local fiscal relations, and public management-union relations. Professor Karl A. Bosworth of the University of Connecticut has served as secretary-treasurer; Professor Stephen K. Bailey of Wesleyan University, as vice-president, and the president has been William Sherman, Comptroller of the Town of Greenwich.

The Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation of Pittsburgh has granted $30,000 to Goucher College for a three-year program designed to encourage and train college women for more active participation in politics. Brownlee Sands Corrin, assistant professor of political science, has been appointed field director for this program, to be administered by the department of political science under the chairmanship of Professor C. I. Winslow.

Frederick N. Cleaveland, associate professor of political science at the University of North Carolina, is currently directing a research project concerning the role of state governments in the conduct and support of scientific research and development. The study is being financed by the National Science Foundation and will focus upon six states: California, Connecticut, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, and Wisconsin. In each of these states there is an intensive examination of the nature and scope of scientific research and development activities carried on or supported by state government agencies, an analysis of agency organization and procedures for planning and administering research programs, and a consideration of relevant state policies regarding scientific research. The project staff is made up of a research team in each of the six states. In addition to the project director, the senior research staff includes: Hubert Marshall, department of political science, Stanford University; Elroy Lehmann, department of geology, Wesleyan University (Connecticut); Allan Richards, department of government and citizenship, University of New Mexico; Dean Clark Ahlberg, L.C. Smith College of Engineering; Guthrie Birkhead, the Maxwell School, Syracuse University; and Clara Penniman, Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. Dr. John C. Honey of the Program Analysis Office is representing the National Science Foundation in the design and planning of the research. Intensive field work was done during the summer of 1954, and the study is scheduled to be completed by June, 1955.

During the past academic year the department of political science at Northwestern University sponsored a series of discussions on the general topic, "The Nature and Uses of Theory in the Social Sciences." Papers were presented by spokesmen for the several social science departments of the University.

The University of Virginia has entered into a contract with the Department of State for a special program for ten Japanese graduate student-trainees in government for the academic year 1954-55. The project coordinator for the Japanese students will be John Gange, Director of the Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs of the University of Virginia.

The Yale University Press has inaugurated a series of publications entitled Yale Studies in Political Science. The Regulation of Businessmen, by Robert E. Lane, assistant professor of political science at Yale University, is the first volume in the series. The editorial committee for the series consists of Frederick M. Watkins, chairman, Robert A. Dahl, and David N. Rowe. During 1953-54, Edward McWhinney served as editor of the series.

Professors John T. Holden, Robert B. Dishman, and David C. Knapp, of the department of government, University of New Hampshire, have been serving as consultants to the New Hampshire Commission to Recommend Reorganization of the Tax Structure.

Pedro Muñoz Amato, dean of the College of Social Sciences and director of the School of Public Administration, University of Puerto Rico, delivered a series of lectures on public administration at Tegucigalpa, Honduras, sponsored by the Honduran Ministry of Finance, during the last week of July. August 1-7 he lectured at the opening of the Central American School of Public Administration, which has been established in San José, Costa Rica, by the Technical Assistance Administration of the United Nations. He also attended a seminar on the teaching of the social sciences in Central American universities, sponsored by UNESCO and held at San José, Costa Rica, August 15-23.

Charles S. Ascher, of Brooklyn College, took part in a round table of the International Institute of Administrative Sciences at The Hague in July and in the International Congress of Comparative Law in Paris last August.

Professor Harold F. Alderfer, Director of the Institute of Local Government and professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, has been named as consultant to the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and is participating in a study being conducted in South Carolina to show the impact of federal grant-in-aid programs on the state and local governments. Professor Alderfer was awarded an honorary Doctor of Laws degree by Parsons College, Fairfield, Iowa, at the June commencement in recognition of his outstanding contribution to state and local government both in the United States and abroad.

Wilfred E. Binkley, professor of political science at Ohio Northern University, is one of the two appointees of President Eisenhower to the twelve-member National Historical Publications Commission.

The personal records and semi-official correspondence of Ralph J. Bunche will be acquired by the library of the University of California (Los Angeles). Dr. Bunche graduated from UCLA in 1927.

Maurice G. Burnside, a former member of the department of political science at Marshall College, is the Democratic candidate for Congress in the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia.

Robert P. Benedict, professor of government at Boston University, gave three lectures last July on American-European understanding in educational and cultural matters at the International Teachers' Conference, sponsored by the Centre Quaker International at Kastl Eerde, Ommen, Holland.

George I. Blanksten, of Northwestern University, spent the summer in Brazil as a member of a team of social scientists studying the impact of technical assistance programs. Professor Blanksten was on leave from the University during the spring, summer, and fall of 1953 for work on the project, which is directed by Professor T. E. Schultz of the department of economics at the University of Chicago.

Lynton K. Caldwell, professor of political science at Syracuse University, recently completed an assignment for the University of Michigan as consultant in public administration to the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines.

Thomas I. Cook, of the Johns Hopkins University, acted as consultant to the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in Washington during the summer months.

Joseph Dunner, of Grinnell College, who spent the summer in Western Europe, was invited to address the Deutsche Politische Gesellschaft in Munich and the Dante Alighieri Society in Rome.

D. F. Fleming, research professor of international relations at Vanderbilt University, lectured during the past summer in the Fulbright Conference on American Studies at Cambridge University on postwar american foreign policy.

H. Duncan Hall attended as an observer the Commonwealth Parliamentary Conference and Council meetings held in August and September, 1954, in central Africa. He accompanied the members of Parliament from all parts of the Commonwealth on their tour of the territories from Kenya and Uganda to Southern Rhodesia.

Roy C. Macridis, of Northwestern University, attended the International Political Science Conference on Comparative Politics at the University of Florence in April, reading a paper on comparative politics and political science. Professor Macridis visited several European and English universities after the conference.

M. Nelson McGeary, of the department of political science, Pennsylvania State University, was elected president of the Pennsylvania Political Science and Public Administration Association. His choice for the two-year term of office was made at the annual meeting of the association held in Harrisburg in April.

Charles A. Micaud, associate professor of political science at the University of Virginia, spent the summer in France doing research on communism under a Rockefeller Foundation grant.

Hans J. Morgenthau, professor of political science at the University of Chicago, lectured at the Salzburg Seminar in Austria during the summer session.

Mark Neuwelt, of Western Reserve University, has been awarded a research fellowship by the Ford Foundation to make a study of the central organization of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. On leave from Western Reserve, he will spend most of 1954-55 at Harvard University.

Benjamin Rivlin, of Brooklyn College, spent the summer in France and French North Africa studying Franco-Moslem relations under a grant-in-aid of the Social Science Research Council.

Wallace S. Sayre, of Columbia University, was awarded an honorary Doctor of Laws degree in June by Marshall College.

Paul D. Stewart, associate professor of political science at Marshall College, is a candidate for the Huntington Municipal Council.

William S. Stokes, professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin, will be one of the North American participants in the Conference on Responsible Freedom in the Americas, organized by Columbia University, October 25-30, 1954.

Ronald M. Stout, associate professor of political science at Colgate University, was engaged during the summer in the collection of cases for the teaching of public administration to undergraduates. Under a research grant from Colgate University, he gathered material in Albany and New York City.

Albert L. Sturm, professor of political science at West Virginia University, was a consultant to the Task Force on Water Resources and Power, Hoover Commission, during the summer.

Egbert S. Wengert, professor of political science at the University of Oregon, has been serving as a member of a constitution committee appointed by the governor and the legislature to determine whether major constitutional revision is required in Oregon.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

John Clarke Adams has been granted a two-years' leave of absence from the University of Buffalo to serve as professor of public administration at the American University of Beirut and to act as director of the newly established in-service training program in public administration for Arab government officials.

Henry M. Alexander, of the University of Arkansas, was a visiting professor of political science at the University of Missouri during the 1954 summer session.

David Apter, who recently received the Ph.D. degree at Princeton University after completing extensive field research in the Gold Coast, West Africa, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Northwestern University.

Robert S. Avery returned to the University of Tennessee in September after a years' leave of absence.

Stephen K. Bailey, formerly of Wesleyan University, has been appointed director of the graduate program of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University. He will hold the William Church Osborn Professorship of Public Affairs.

Sidney Baldwin, who completed his work for the Ph.D. degree at Syracuse University while serving as a member of the faculty of Wesleyan University, has accepted an appointment as instructor of political science at Northwestern University.

William M. Beany, assistant professor of politics at Princeton University, has been granted a leave of absence for 1954-55.

Paul Beckett has been promoted to professor of public administration at the State College of Washington.

George A. Bell has been appointed predoctoral instructor in political science at the University of Michigan.

Fredrick T. Bent has been appointed chairman of the department of public administration at the American University of Beirut.

Marver H. Bernstein has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in the department of politics, Princeton University.

Donald C. Blaisdell has been appointed visiting professor of political science at Wellesley College for 1954-55.

Charles Blitzer has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at Yale University. He has been awarded a research grant by the Rockefeller Foundation and is on leave of absence during 1954-55 to conduct research in England on the idea of property in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Virgil C. Blum has joined the department of political science at Creighton University as an instructor.

Henry L. Bretton has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the University of Michigan.

Richard G. Brown, Military Intelligence Research Specialist, Office of Assistant Chief of Staff, Department of the Army, has been advanced to the rank of professorial lecturer in political science in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

George P. Bush has been promoted to the rank of professor in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

Robert K. Carr, of Dartmouth College, was a visiting professor at Columbia University during the 1954 summer session.

H. Paul Castleberry, who has been on leave of absence as a Fulbright lecturer in Egypt, has been promoted to associate professor of international relations at the State College of Washington.

Chen Kin Cheng, associate professor of political science at the University of Hawaii, was a visiting member of the faculty at the University of North Carolina during the 1954 summer session.

Harwood L. Childs resumed his duties as professor of politics at Princeton University in September after spending the past year in Brazil.

Sven Christian Clausen, professor of law at the University of Copenhagen and distinguished playwright, is a Whitney-Fulbright visiting lecturer at the University of North Carolina during the fall semester.

Winston W. Crouch, of the University of California (Los Angeles), has received a Fulbright award to spend the 1954-55 academic year in New Delhi, India.

Robert Dahl, of Yale University, taught at Northwestern University during the 1954 summer session.

James F. Davidson has been appointed to an assistant professorship in political science at the University of Tennessee.

Claude J. Davis has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at the University of Tennessee for the year 1954-55.

W. Phillips Davison, associate of the Rand Corporation, has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in political science in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

David Derge, formerly a graduate teaching assistant at Northwestern University, has accepted an instructorship in political science at the University of Missouri.

Karl W. Deutsch, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was a visiting professor in the department of political science at the University of Chicago during the summer quarter, 1954.

Gottfried Dietze has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the Johns Hopkins University, beginning in September, 1954.

Robert B. Dishman is serving as acting chairman of the department of government at the University of New Hampshire during the current academic year.

Jean Driscoll, formerly a member of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee, is serving as research associate in connection with the Curriculum Development Project of the Northwestern University political science department.

Stephen Early, Jr., formerly of the University of Virginia, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at DePauw University.

William Ebenstein, professor of politics at Princeton University, was visiting professor of political science at the University of Michigan during the summer of 1954.

Samuel J. Eldersveld, of the University of Michigan, has been granted a Fulbright fellowship to the Netherlands and will be on sabbatical leave for the academic year 1954-55.

Russell R. Elliott has been promoted to associate professor of history and political science at the University of Nevada.

Alona E. Evans is on leave of absence during 1954-55 from Wellesley College to study the status of political asylum in international law.

R. Barry Farrell has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at Yale University. He spent the summer of 1954 in Europe as the recipient of the Blanche Elizabeth MacLeish Billings Memorial Award.

Russell H. Fifield has been promoted to the rank of professor of political science at the University of Michigan. He returned to Ann Arbor in September after a years' leave spent in research in Southeast Asia.

Wesley R. Fishel has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Michigan State College. He will continue as assistant director of the Governmental Research Bureau.

Russell H. Fitzgibbon, professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), taught in the summer session at the University of Nebraska.

Peter J. Fliess, of Louisiana State University, has been promoted to associate professor of government, effective September, 1954.

Alexander George, associate of the Rand Corporation, has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in political science in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

Louis L. Gerson has been promoted to assistant professor in the department of government and international relations at the University of Connecticut.

Charles Gilbert, a member of the staff of Senator Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota while writing his thesis for the Ph.D. degree at Northwestern, has accepted a position in the political science department at Oberlin College. During the second semester of 1953-54, Mr. Gilbert was an instructor at Swarthmore College.

Gilbert F. Gilchrist, who received his Ph.D.

degree from the Johns Hopkins University in June, 1954, is spending the present year in England on a Fulbright fellowship.

William Goodman is on leave from the University of Tennessee during the fall quarter of 1954 to teach at Vanderbilt.

George Grassmuck, formerly assistant professor of political science at UCLA, has been appointed associate professor of public administration at the American University of Beirut.

Raymond H. Gusteson has been advanced to the rank of associate professor in the department of government at Ohio University, Athens, Ohio.

Randy H. Hamilton, Washington Director of the American Municipal Association, has been promoted to the rank of professorial lecturer in public administration in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

Robert J. Harris has resigned as professor and head of the department of government at Louisiana State University to accept an appointment as professor of political science at Vanderbilt University, effective September 1, 1954.

Lashley G. Harvey returned to Boston University and the chairmanship of the government department on September 1 after a year's leave, which he spent at the Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East, Ankara, Turkey.

Lowell H. Hattery has been promoted to the rank of professor in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

Jerzy Hauptmann, chairman of the political science department at Park College, has been promoted to the rank of associate professor.

Carroll Hawkins, associate professor of political science at Michigan State College, began a year's sabbatical leave on September 1, 1954.

John T. Holden, chairman of the department of government at the University of New Hampshire, is spending the present academic year as a Fulbright lecturer in public administration and political theory at Chulalonghorn University in Bangkok, Thailand.

David Horton, of Westminster College, was a visiting professor of political science at the University of Missouri during the 1954 summer session.

Philip E. Jacob has been promoted to professor of political science at the Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania. Professor Jacob is Director of the Summer School and the College Collateral Courses.

Judith Norvell Jamison, who has been awarded a fellowship by the Haynes Foundation, is on a year's educational leave of absence from the Bureau of Governmental Research, University of California (Los Angeles).

Philip Jessup, of Columbia University, was visiting professor during the summer session at the University of Hawaii.

Franklyn A. Johnson, chairman of the Division of Human Relations, Rollins College, has been named state director of the Florida Citizenship Clearing House which was activated on May 15 at Rollins College.

George McTurnan Kahin has been promoted to an associate professorship in government at Cornell University, effective July 1, 1954.

Robert F. Karsch has been advanced to professor of political science at the University of Missouri.

John H. Kautsky, recently a research associate at the Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been appointed visiting assistant professor of government at the University of Rochester.

John Kerry King, of the University of Virginia, is on leave during 1954-55. He has been awarded a Carnegie research fellowship for research at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

Hans F. Kirchberger retired in June from his position as political science lecturer in the University of Wisconsin Extension Division.

Marshall Knappen, of the University of Michigan, has been granted a sabbatical leave for the year 1954-55.

Alan A. Kuusisto has been promoted to associate professor of government at the University of New Hampshire. He returned recently from Finland where he spent the past year as a Fulbright scholar.

Lionel H. Laing, professor of political science at the University of Michigan, will be absent on sabbatical leave during this academic year in order to visit parts of the Commonwealth. He sails from Vancouver in October for New Zealand and Australia.

Robert E. Lane has been reappointed to a second three-year term as assistant professor of political science at Yale University. He resumed his duties this fall after a year's leave of absence on a fellowship of the Ford Foundation Fund for the Advancement of Education and membership in the Summer Seminar in Political Behavior Research sponsored by the Social Science Research Council at the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan.

Harold D. Lasswell, professor of law and political science at Yale University, has been granted leave of absence for 1954-55 to serve on the staff of the Institute of Behavioral Sciences at Palo Alto.

Arnaud B. Leavelle has been promoted to professor of political science at Stanford University.

Luke Lee, recently of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, is teaching courses in comparative government this year at the St. Lawrence University.

Gordon K. Lewis, who received his Ph.D. in government from Harvard University in June, 1954, has been appointed associate professor of political science at the University of Puerto Rico.

John D. Lewis, of Oberlin College, served as visiting professor at Columbia University during the 1954 summer session.

Kenneth Lindsay, former member of Parliament and former Minister of Education in England, has been appointed visiting professor of political science for the spring term 1954-55 at the University of Oregon.

George A. Lipsky, recently assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Berkeley), is serving during 1954-55 as visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University.

John J. Logue, who taught at the University of Notre Dame during 1953-54, has been appointed instructor in government at Fordham.

Norton E. Long, of Western Reserve University, was visiting professor of political science at the University of Michigan during the summer of 1954.

S. Gale Lowrie retired in June, 1954 from his position as professor and head of the department of political science at Cincinnati.

Clay P. Malick is serving as chairman of the department of political science at the University of Colorado during the absence of Professor Leo C. Riethmayer.

Gerard J. Mangone will be on leave from Swarthmore College for the academic year 1954-55 as a Fulbright scholar at the University of Padua in Italy.

Conrad L. McBride, formerly an instructor at Pomona College, has been appointed instructor in political science and research associate in the Bureau of State and Community Service, University of Colorado.

Daniel S. McHargue, assistant professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been assigned to the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines for 1954-55.

Joseph E. McLean, associate professor in the department of politics at Princeton University, has been named Commissioner of Conservation and Economic Development for the State of New Jersey.

Douglas H. Mendel, formerly teaching fellow at the University of Michigan, has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Wallace Mendelson resumed his regular duties as professor of political science at the University of Tennessee in September after a year's leave of absence.

Edmund C. Mester, recently on the staff of the United States Military Academy, is teaching at the University of Cincinnati during the current academic year.

Edward W. Mill, formerly of the State Department and Princeton University, has accepted an associate professorship in government at the University of Hawaii.

John H. Millett, assistant professor of government at the University of Rochester, has been granted a year's leave of absence to study the role of interest groups in British political life under a Ford Foundation fellowship.

Emmet V. Mittlebeeler has been appointed assistant professor in the department of political science and public administration at the American University. Dr. Mittlebeeler, who has been the professional assistant to Representative John M. Robsion, Jr., will serve as the academic director of Unit III of the Washington Semester Program.

George E. Moore, of Fairmont State College, was a visiting member of the department of political science at West Virginia in the 1954 summer session.

Rodney L. Mott, Director of the Division of Social Science at Colgate University, has been appointed visiting professor at the University of Kyoto in Japan for the autumn term of the current academic year. Professor Mott will be on leave of absence from Colgate University until February 1, 1955. During the summer, as director of the Kyoto American Studies Seminar, sponsored by the University of Illinois, he conducted an intensive seminar on American constitutional law for graduate students and for professors of law and political science at Japanese universities.

James N. Murray, Jr., formerly of Northwestern University, has been appointed to a full-time instructorship in political science at the State University of Iowa.

Ivan G. Nagy, who has been awarded a fellowship by the Fund for Adult Education to enable him to study methods for securing adult participation in the study of international relations, is on leave during 1954-55 from the University of Oregon.

Fred Warner Neal, formerly visiting lecturer in political science at the University of Michigan, is in Yugoslavia on a research project for the American Universities Field Staff. In connection with this project he also has a grant from the American Philosophical Society.

W. Grafton Nealley has been advanced to a full professorship in government at Adelphi College.

Franz Neumann, on leave from Columbia University during 1953-54, was visiting professor at the Free University of Berlin during the spring semester under an exchange program between Columbia and Stanford Universities and the Free University, sponsored by the Ford Foundation.

Robert G. Neumann is on leave from the University of California (Los Angeles) to spend the year at the Universities of Bordeaux and Strasbourg under a Fulbright award.

Sigmund L. Neumann returned to Columbia University in September as visiting professor of government.

Richard E. Neustadt has been appointed assistant professor of government in Columbia College.

Gerhart Niemeyer, of the Council on Foreign Relations, has accepted a part-time appointment as visiting lecturer at Yale University for the current academic year to teach courses in international organization.

Clark F. Norton, professor of political science at DePauw University, was a visiting professor at West Virginia University during both terms of the 1954 summer session.

Fritz Nova has been appointed associate professor of history and political science at Villanova University.

Vincent Ostrom has been advanced to an associate professorship in political science at the University of Oregon. He has been awarded a faculty research fellowship by the Social Science Research Council which will enable him to devote half of his time during the next three years to a study of the process of public policy formation.

Louise Overacker is on leave from Wellesley College to continue a study of labor parties in England.

Saul K. Padover, of the New School for Social Research, is teaching part time at Columbia University during 1954-55.

Thomas W. Palmer, Jr., who has completed tours of duty with a Point-Four economic development commission in Brazil and with the Central Intelligence Agency in Washington, has accepted an appointment beginning September 1, 1954, as Coordinator of Latin American Studies at Boston University.

Cheryl Petersen has been appointed to the staff of the department of political science at Wellesley College.

Claude S. Phillips, Jr., who has recently completed his doctorate at Duke University, has been appointed to an instructorship in the department of political science at the University of Michigan.

Rollin B. Posey, of Northwestern University, is a visiting professor at the University of Puerto Rico during the first semester of 1954-55 and is teaching courses in public administration and government and business.

Lawrence Preuss, of the University of Michigan, has been appointed visiting professor of political science at the University of California (Berkeley) for the year 1954-55.

James Prothro, associate professor of political science at the Florida State University, is on leave of absence during 1954-55 to study at Columbia University under a Ford fellowship.

Henry Reining, Jr., Dean of the School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, has accepted an appointment with the University of Michigan to serve for three months as consultant in public administration to the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines.

Leo C. Riethmayer is on leave of absence from the University of Colorado until June, 1955, to serve as professor of public administration in the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines.

Elston Roady has been promoted to associate professor of political science at the Florida State University.

Charles I. Robertson, instructor of politics at Princeton University, has received an appointment as instructor in the department of government at Smith College.

Howard M. Roelofs has been advanced to assistant professor of government at Cornell University.

Arnold A. Rogow, of the department of political science, State University of Iowa, is spending the academic year 1954-55 as a fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Palo Alto, California.

John H. Romani, formerly research fellow, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, has been appointed predoctoral instructor in political science at the University of Michigan.

Clinton L. Rossiter has been promoted to professor of government at Cornell University.

Joseph S. Roucek, of the University of Bridgeport, spent the summer as visiting professor of education at the University of Oregon.

Francis E. Rourke has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the Johns Hopkins University, beginning in September, 1954.

David N. Rowe, professor of political science at Yale University, is on leave of absence during 1954-55 to serve as the Taiwan (Formosa) representative of the Committee for Free Asia.

Dankwart A. Rustow returned in September from a year in Turkey and the Near East to resume his duties as assistant professor of politics at Princeton University.

Wallace S. Sayre has joined the department of public law and government at Columbia University as professor of public administration.

Warner R. Schilling will be at Columbia for the academic year 1954-55, dividing his time between the Institute for War and Peace Studies and lecturing in the government department at Columbia College.

Charles P. Schleicher, on sabbatical leave from the University of Oregon this year, is a Fulbright lecturer at Allahabad University in India.

John R. Schmidhauser, of the University of Virginia, has been appointed to a full-time instructorship in political science at the State University of Iowa.

Carl J. Schneider has been advanced to associate professor of political science at the University of Nebraska.

William E. Scott has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at Yale University.

Chandler Shaw, professor of history and political science at Bethany College, was a visiting professor in the 1954 summer session at West Virginia University.

Wilbur S. Shepperson, who has been awarded a Commonwealth Fund fellowship, is on leave from the University of Nevada during the academic year 1954-55.

Foster H. Sherwood, of UCLA, taught in the 1954 summer session at Northwestern University.

Donald V. Smiley, formerly a graduate teaching assistant at Northwestern University, has accepted an instructorship in political science at Queen's University, Kingston, Canada.

Frank J. Sorauf, instructor in political science at the Pennsylvania State University, served as a research associate for the Secretary of State in Madison, Wisconsin, during the summer months.

James R. Soukup, graduate student in political science at the University of Michigan, has been granted a Fulbright fellowship to Japan (Keio University) for the year 1954-55.

Edmund F. Spellacy, of the department of government, University of Hawaii, has been appointed by the Governor of Hawaii to the Commission on the Organization of the Administrative Branch.

Wladyslaw J. Stankiewicz has been appointed visiting research fellow at the Center of International Studies, Princeton University.

Murray S. Stedman resumed his teaching duties at Swarthmore College and became acting chairman of the department of political science in September after a leave of absence with UNESCO in Paris.

Richard W. Sterling, formerly of Yale University, is a teaching intern under the Ford Foundation in the department of government at Dartmouth College.

John G. Stoessinger has joined the department of political science at Wellesley College.

Leo Strauss, of the University of Chicago, is a visiting professor at the Hebrew University in Israel during the 1954 academic year.

K. Thor Swanson has been appointed to an instructorship in political science at the State College of Washington.

Carl B. Swisher resumed his duties as chairman of the department of political science at the Johns Hopkins University in September after a year's leave of absence.

James D. Teller, Civilian Chief, Standards Branch, Directorate of Personnel Planning, Department of the Air Force, has been promoted to the rank of adjunct professor of public administration in the department of political science and public administration at the American University.

Kenneth Thompson has been granted a continuation of his leave from Northwestern University to permit him to remain on the staff of the Rockefeller Foundation during the year 1954-55.

John S. Thomson, assistant professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin, has been granted a foreign study and research fellowship by the Ford Foundation for a year's work in Burma.

John A. Toomey, who did his graduate work at the New School for Social Research, has been appointed instructor in social studies at Windham College, Putney, Vermont.

John Turner, of the University of Minnesota, spent the summer in England where he did research on the internal organization and dynamics of the Labor party.

Vernon Van Dyke, of the State University of Iowa, has been promoted to the rank of full professor, effective July 1, 1954.

Harold M. Vinacke has been appointed head of the department of political science at the University of Cincinnati.

Robert A. Walker has been advanced to a full professorship in political science at Stanford University.

Lawrence C. Wanlass, assistant professor of political science at Mount Holyoke College, has been granted a Fulbright award. He will spend the year at the University of the Philippines in Manila where he will study the theory and practice of communism in Southeast Asia.

Robert E. Ward has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan. He will continue as assistant director of the Center for Japanese Studies at the University of Michigan.

Henry Wells, visiting lecturer in the School of Public Administration, University of Puerto Rico, during the academic year 1953-54, has been appointed associate professor and chairman of the political science staff, University of Puerto Rico.

John E. Westburg, formerly of the University of Southern California, has been appointed research assistant to the Legislative Counsel, in the Legislative Counsel Bureau of Nevada.

Troy R. Westmeyer, assistant professor of government, has been granted partial leave from Boston University for the first semester 1954-1955 to serve as Executive Director of the Massachusetts Fiscal Survey Commission.

John P. White, who received his Ph.D. from the University of Chicago in 1953 and who has been employed by the Navy Department, has been appointed to an instructorship in the department of political science at the University of Michigan.

Ruth Widmayer has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Oregon.

René de Visme Williamson, formerly of the University of Tennessee, has been appointed professor and chairman of the department of government at Louisiana State University, effective September, 1954.

George L. Willis has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Cincinnati.

William R. Willoughby is on leave from the St. Lawrence University during 1954-55 to do research at the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton University.

Hubert H. Wilson, associate professor of politics at Princeton University, is on leave during the first term of 1954-55.

Daniel Wit, of the University of Cincinnati, has been appointed visiting professor of political science at the University of Michigan for the year 1954-55.

Roland Young, of Northwestern University, was a visiting professor at Harvard University during the 1954 summer session.

William H. Young has been appointed budgetary assistant to the president of the University of Wisconsin. He will continue to serve half time in the department of political science.

I. William Zartman taught in the summer session at the Johns Hopkins University.

Paul E. Zinner is a visiting assistant professor of government at Columbia University during the 1954-55 academic year.

IN MEMORIAM

Waldemar Gurian died of a stroke in South Haven, Michigan, on May 26, 1954, at the age of fifty-two. He had suffered repeated illnesses in the last two years and had gone to the vacation resort after a research leave of absence in Germany.

He was born in St. Petersburg (Leningrad), Russia. Although some reference books and many obituary notices described him as a convert to Catholicism, he was baptized in that Church as a child. Russian origin and Catholicism provide fundamental clues to his thought and outlook. This religious bridge with the West was made through his mother, who moved to Germany before World War I. During the war years he was educated at the Collegium Albertinum, a Dominican school in Venlo, Holland. Later he attended the Hohenzollern Gymnasium at Dusseldorf.

His university work at Berlin and Cologne, done under such teachers as Max Scheler, culminated in his doctoral thesis on the German Youth Movement. With his doctorate he had an almost medieval sense of being a member of the academic world, perhaps, as it were, an ex-officio member of the world's universities. A powerful mind, voracious reading, an almost universal curiosity, and a remarkably retentive memory enabled him to discourse professionally with his colleagues in almost all the humanities.

At the same time he was wholly free from the erudite provincialism of the academic specialist. His generous concern for important issues and titanic impatience with the petty questions from which academicians sometimes make their claims to originality were expressed in equally unforgettable fashion. He had, and not accidentally, a journalist's sense of urgency. The work of the journalist, or better, publicist, helped him to carry on enormous learning without a trace of pedantry. Between 1923 and 1937 he acted mainly as a free-lance writer. In 1923-24 he was night-editor of the Koelnische Volkszeitung, the greatest Catholic newspaper of the Rhineland. Thereafter he remained on the staff, reviewing books in a spirit which belied his nom de plume, Hoplite.

Between 1929 and 1931 he published his major works (in German), The Political and Social Ideas of French Catholicism, 1789-1914 and Bolshevism: Theory and Practice. The latter, translated into many languages, is one of the basic books of modern scholarship for the understanding of Soviet Communism. On the latter subject he wrote a multitude of books and articles, of which mention may be made of Bolshevism: An Introduction to Soviet Communism (1952) and his contribution to the Arden House Conference (1954) on the concept of Partijnost (Party-mindedness). The work on French Catholicism grew out of his permanent interest in Lammenais and in the general field of Church history. For many years he was committed to writing a history of the Church in the modern world. But he published only some articles on Lammenais and Louis Veillot, on French integral nationalism, a book on Hitler and the Christians, and a collaborative volume, The Catholic Church in World Affairs (1954).

The accession of Hitler to power caused him and his family (wife and daughter) to seek refuge in Switzerland (1934). There, in difficult financial conditions, he edited with Otto Knabe Deutsche Briefe (1934-1937), a mimeographed weekly designed to point out the hideous nihilism of Hitler's movement, and the editors took special pains to deliver their paper to the German Catholic bishops.

In 1937, Gurian came to Notre Dame where he remained until his death. He became an American citizen in 1943 and professor of political science in 1944. At Notre Dame he was an indefatigable promoter of lectures, discussions, and research projects. Under his editorship The Review of Politics, a quarterly, began publication in 1939. This journal, primarily interested, as its editorial page proclaims, "in the philosophical and historical approach to political realities," is his most characteristic achievement. In later years Gurian headed the Notre Dame Committee on International Relations, established (1949) with the help of a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, and organized the Center for Eastern European and Soviet Studies, with the help of a grant from the Ford Foundation. In 1950 he was president of the Catholic Historical Association. His death leaves an empire of functions and jobs to his successors. His colleagues will long miss his stimulation, encouragement, and challenges, and, in particular, the fruits of his long reflection on the problem of morals and power.—MATTHEW A. FITZSIMONS.

Charles C. Rohlfling died on April 3, 1954, at the age of 52. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1923 and became an instructor in the political science department the following year. He received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Pennsylvania in 1930 and the degree of Bachelor of Laws at Temple University in 1934. He was made professor of political science in 1940 and served as chairman of the political science department from 1937 to 1949.

Professor Rohlfling was a student of government who conceived his obligations to extend widely into the arena of public affairs. There is space to chronicle only a few of the more important responsibilities he accepted. From 1943 to 1952 he was a member of the Executive Committee of the Greater Philadelphia Movement, an influential organization for civic betterment including in its membership leaders from many sides of Philadelphia life. As chairman of its Legal Affairs Committee, he played a leading part in establishing Philadelphia's new home-rule charter.

He served on two committees appointed by the Governor of Pennsylvania—one to investigate alleged disfranchisement of voters, the other to investigate the affairs of the Philadelphia Registration Commission. For a period of eight years he was a member of the Board of Supervisors of Middletown Township, Delaware County, Pennsylvania.

Professor Rohlfling gave his time generously to a wide variety of private enterprises which sought his aid and counsel. He was active in the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors, serving as its president in 1945-46. The National Foundation for Education and Citizenship named him to its Executive Committee. He was also a member of the Executive Committee of the Pennsylvania Public Charities Association.

Professor Rohlfling received the professional recognition of his colleagues. He was a member of the Executive Council of the American Political Science Association from 1944 to 1947 and of the Board of Editors of the American Political Science Review from 1946 to 1949. For three years he served as president of the Pennsylvania Political Science and Public Administration Association.

In addition to many articles, he wrote National Regulation of Aeronautics, and was co-author of Business and Government, The American Government and Its Work, and A Survey of Pennsylvania.

Professor Rohlfling moved without ostentation and with gentleness among the many concerns and associations of his academic and public-oriented life, exercising a sure influence on the side of peace and wisdom. His generous spirit in the affairs of the University of Pennsylvania and the wider community in which he labored will be missed by many.—JOHN PERRY HORLACHER.

Roger Vernon Shumate, professor of political science at the University of Nebraska, died unexpectedly in Lincoln, May 22, 1954, two months after his fifty-fourth birthday. Professor Shumate received his bachelor's and master's degrees at the University of California at Berkeley and his doctorate at the University of Minnesota in 1933. He served as instructor in political science at the University of Cincinnati from 1929 to 1931, at the University of Minnesota from 1931 to 1933, and at the University of Pittsburgh from 1933 to 1937. Before entering college he had served a year in the Navy and a year in the United States Merchant Service. He joined the department of political science at the University of Nebraska as an associate professor in 1937 and became a full professor in 1944.

In his seventeen years at Nebraska, Professor Shumate really had two careers—teaching and service with the state government. Within a few months of his arrival in Nebraska he was named Director of Research for the newly organized Legislative Council. In this capacity he supervised the preparation of a very large number of studies for the legislature and traveled widely over the state in connection with committee and sub-committee hearings on matters before that body. In less skilled hands the post of Director of Research might easily have become political in the derogatory sense of the word. With rare insight and acumen Professor Shumate prevented that sort of development, so that at his death the agency which he headed enjoyed the respect not only of the legislators for whom and with whom he worked, but also of the executive branch of the state government and of his university colleagues. His research reports, although they did not enjoy wide circulation outside the state, were models of careful investigation and balanced presentation. In the course of his work for the legislature he acquired an unrivaled knowledge of the government of the state and its local units, as well as of the imponderables of politics and administration. In the opinion of his colleagues his service to the state government added greatly to his effectiveness as a teacher, bringing to life by apt and concrete illustration the abstractions of books.

Professor Shumate's work as a teacher was in the fields of political parties and public law. He was thorough and systematic and held his students to high standards of performance quite in keeping with the discipline which he vigorously imposed upon himself. Although for much of the time he was under the heavy pressure of his duties at the state capitol, Professor Shumate discharged with admirable conscientiousness his teaching obligations. During the last five years of his life he added to his teaching service two important university committees. For four years he was chairman of the Committee on University Publications and for two years was a member of the Committee on Student Affairs, both burdensome assignments which he discharged with great efficiency and fidelity. In his premature death the state and the university have lost a valuable public servant and his colleagues a loyal friend.—LANE W. LANCASTER.

CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING THE TREATMENT OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION TEXTBOOKS

[Editor's Note: The correspondence below relates to the section entitled "Misinformation about Administrative Law" in Professor Kenneth Culp Davis' "Some Reflections of a Law Professor about Instruction and Research in Public Administration," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 728-52, at pp. 739-48 (Sept., 1953). See also Vol. 48, pp. 174-85, especially at p. 185. (March, 1954).]

TO THE EDITOR:

As Professor Kenneth Culp Davis points out in the March, 1954 issue of the REVIEW, that part of his September, 1953 article which he feels "may be the most important," namely, the part entitled "Misinformation about Administrative Law," remains unanswered. It will be recalled that in his article Professor Davis, drawing upon his experience as a law teacher and textbook writer, analyzed the contents of the textbooks in public administration which contain substantial discussions of administrative law and concluded that "the proportion of misinformation is exceedingly high." In the statement of March, 1954, Professor Davis added: "Furthermore, some of the misinformation has been so much repeated in political science literature, one writer citing another, that many readers may be reluctant to believe that it is misinformation."

Let us examine some of the misinformation which Professor Davis attributes to our colleagues by reviewing half of the half dozen criticisms he makes of the public administration textbook which he calls "Book 1."

The first example of misinformation quoted by Professor Davis and then refuted by him at length is the following sentence from Book 1: "In the United States there is no legal limit upon the right of courts to review the decisions of administrative tribunals." This happens to be the opening sentence of a whole chapter on judicial review of administrative action, and one does not have to read this chapter to realize that Professor Davis is criticizing this sentence out of its context. For example, Professor Davis, himself, shortly quotes the following additional sentence from Book 1: "As a general rule, courts attempt to distinguish between questions of law and fact by reviewing the former and not the latter."

The last sentence is quoted from Book 1 by Professor Davis as another piece of misinformation, because, he explains, "under the dominant doctrine the courts review findings of fact to the extent of determining whether they are supported by substantial evidence." This is, however, the very point Book 1 itself makes in a qualifying sentence located only one sentence removed from the allegedly wrong sentence, but one which Professor Davis failed to quote. The omitted sentence reads: "In findings of fact, however, the rule prevails that there must be evidence sufficient to support the decision."

Another of Professor Davis' quotations from Book 1 is the following: "the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation." Professor Davis calls this "plainly false," because "in many hundreds of cases the courts have interfered; the review of deportation orders makes up a large portion of all review of federal administrative action." Political scientists who write on this question (including the author of Book 1, as will shortly appear) are more precisely aware than this of the extent of judicial review in deportation cases. They know, for example, that no more than 30 out of over 300 deportation cases acted on by the federal courts in 1951-1952 were won by those threatened with deportation, and that the courts are thus "normally" so hesitant to interfere with deportation orders that the present Administration is seriously considering action to permit easier review in such cases, and, in fact, the Attorney General has recently submitted a bill to both houses of Congress which would implement this change. But the main trouble with Professor Davis' objection to Book 1's discussion of this point is the fact that his quotation of Book 1 is fallacious. For, instead of having said "the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation," Book 1 actually says: "While the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation, they will set aside orders, [etc]."

If the REVIEW is to maintain accepted standards of analysis and criticism, it would seem necessary to require quotations that are more genuine and criticisms that are more germane than these.

ALBERT LEPAWSKY
University of California (Berkeley)

TO THE EDITOR:

My purpose is the constructive one of suggesting that instruction can be significantly improved if the textwriters who discuss administrative law will substitute concrete and specific illustrations for their abstract and general exposition.

No professor in any leading law school of the United States would try to teach this type of subject matter through abstract generalizations of the kind that are the main reliance of the public administration texts. Even the textwriters show in their texts that they are incapable of developing their own understanding through that method. This fact is not necessarily a reflection on them. They are attempting the impossible. They cannot develop or convey an understanding of segments of administrative law unless they are willing first to think and then to write in terms of the concrete and the specific. The essence is too often in the applications of the generalizations.

The proof of these assertions lies in the extent to which able textwriters have saturated their texts with misinformation. To present this proof, I have devoted a section of my article to "Misinformation about Administrative Law." I have set forth some thirty or forty examples of such misinformation.

Professor Lepawsky chooses three of my thirty or forty examples and says that I have criticized sentences out of context. I shall answer him by setting forth each context, so that the reader can judge for himself.

The first sentence which Professor Lepawsky says I have taken out of context is the first sentence in a chapter. The entire first paragraph of the chapter, including the first sentence, is as follows:

"In the United States there is no legal limit upon the right of the courts to review the decisions of administrative tribunals. Legislatures cannot insulate administration against judicial review by introducing into the statute clauses designed to thwart review. Our doctrine of constitutional limitations is such that the judiciary can question every administrative act. Even if a state constitution attempted to set up an administrative commission whose acts were not subject to review by the state courts, judicial review could be accomplished in the federal courts under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The sum and substance of the situation is that the courts may review to the extent they deem desirable; that there is no method whereby one may know whether they will or will not review in individual cases; and that administrative decisions are final to some undefined extent, and there seems to be a tendency at work to make them increasingly so."

The paragraph is well written in the sense that every one of the five sentences contributes to a single underlying theme. Because the underlying theme is based upon misunderstanding, each of the five sentences is erroneous, whether considered singly or as a part of the paragraph. If the paragraph were rewritten to render it accurate, most of the sentences would assert the opposite. Following is my revision, which I think is accurate in all respects:

"In the United States the limits upon the right of courts to review administrative decisions are many. Not only can the legislatures insulate administration against judicial review but they frequently do it. Our constitutional system permits many limitations on the power of the judiciary to question administrative action. As early as 1840, in Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. 497, 516, the Supreme Court acted on the basis of its view that: 'The interference of the Courts with the performance of the ordinary duties of the executive departments of the government, would be productive of nothing but mischief.' In 1900 the Supreme Court said in Keim v. United States, 177 U.S. 290: 'It has been repeatedly adjudged that the courts have no general supervising power over the proceedings and action of the various administrative departments of government.' The law is now what it was in 1903, when the Supreme Court said in Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U.S. 505, 507: '... we know of no provision in the Federal Constitution which forbids a State from granting to a tribunal, whether called a court or a board of registration, the final determination of a legal question. . . . Due process is not necessarily judicial process.' Usually one may know from the decided cases whether or not courts will review in individual cases. For instance, the courts usually give effect to such a statutory provision as 54 Stat. 1197 (1940), 38 U.S.C.A. §11a-2 (1954): 'Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, except as provided in sections 445 and 817 of this title, the decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs on any question of law or fact concerning a claim for benefits or payments under any Act administered by the Veterans' Administration shall be final and conclusive and no other official or any court of the United States shall have power or jurisdiction to review any such decisions."

If the reader has any doubts that this revision is accurate, I refer him to the full discussion of the authorities in my book Administrative Law, pp. 812-67. In addition, further developments on the subject are discussed in my most recent article, "Unreviewable Administrative Action," published earlier this year in the June and July issues of Federal Rules Decisions.

How curious that Professor Lepawsky, in accusing me of taking the one sentence out of context, does not say a word about the context, but instead quotes from the following page a single sentence that is completely irrelevant to the sentence under discussion.

The second sentence Professor Lepawsky says I have taken out of context is the first sentence of a new section entitled "Distinction between Law and Fact." The first four sentences of that section, including the one in question, are as follows:

"As a general rule, courts attempt to distinguish between questions of law and fact by reviewing the former and not the latter. The notable exceptions to this rule are the rate-fixing cases wherein the Supreme Court has stated that where confiscation is alleged, the appellate courts will grant a trial de novo. In findings of fact, however, the rule prevails that there must be evidence sufficient to support the decision. It is this latter rule which vitiates the entire hypothesis."

What do these four sentences mean? Do they mean that the courts do review questions of fact? Or do they mean that the courts do not review questions of fact? Does the third sentence contradict the first? Frankly, I am unsure how to answer these questions. What I am sure of is that each of the four sentences involves a misstatement. Even if the third sentence contradicts the first, both are still wrong. A statement that the old gray mare was black is not corrected by a later statement that she was white.

A rewriting of the four sentences to make them accurate would be something like the following, which I submit as fully accurate:

"As a general rule, whenever administrative action is reviewable, courts review both questions of law and questions of fact, but they substitute judgment on the former and not on the latter. The Supreme Court has never required de novo trials in rate-fixing cases; even in the extreme Ben Avon and St. Joseph cases, in which independent judicial judgment on both law and facts was required, the court permitted the review to be on the administrative record. Under the dominant doctrine governing scope of review, the courts do not determine whether the evidence is sufficient, for that would involve substitution of judicial judgment, but the courts limit themselves to a determination of whether the finding is supported by substantial evidence. The distinction between law and fact thus remains at the heart of the principal formula for judicial review of administrative action."

Although I think this revision is accurate, I would not recommend it for a political science text, for even the most brilliant student could not possibly understand the meaning without the aid of concrete applications of the generalizations.

The third sentence Professor Lepawsky says I have taken out of context is the statement that "the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation." He says: "But the main trouble with Professor Davis' objection to Book 1's discussion of this point is the fact that his quotation of Book 1 is fallacious. For, instead of having said 'the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation,' Book 1 actually says: 'While the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation, they will set aside orders etc.' " The ironical fact is that Professor Lepawsky goes wrong precisely because he fails to take account of either the immediate context or the larger context! Why does he cut off his quotation in the middle of the thought? The fact is that the rest of the sentence renders the entire sentence erroneous. The sentence is the third and last sentence of a paragraph immediately under the heading, "Conclusiveness of Administrative Determinations." The entire paragraph is as follows:

"The adequacy of the administrative hearing sometimes determines whether the courts will review. This is, of course, tied up with the question of whether the hearing satisfies due process. While the courts normally will refuse to interfere with immigration orders for deportation, they will set aside orders based on any arbitrary trial."

In this immediate context, the meaning of the third sentence is that courts "normally" set aside deportation orders only for "arbitrary trial" or denial of procedural due process. The fact is that the most frequent reasons for setting aside deportation orders are error of law and lack of evidence. The Supreme Court has summarized scope of review of deportation orders in Kessler v. Strecker, 307 U.S. 22, 34 (1939): "If the hearing was fair, if there was evidence to support the finding of the Secretary, and if no error of law was committed, the ruling of the Department must stand and cannot be corrected in judicial proceedings. If, on the other hand, one of the elements mentioned is lacking the proceeding is void and must be set aside."

The larger context is the textwriter's erroneous idea that "courts are reluctant to review" what he calls "a legal right which is a privilege." He erroneously says, for instance: "It is not easy to get the courts to reverse Post Office Department fraud orders, because the attitude is taken that the government is performing a business service to individuals on favorable terms." Then he erroneously says: "In cases involving the police power, or where individual freedom is restricted in the interest of society as a whole, the situation is different."

The courts interfere as much with deportation and fraud orders as they do with regulatory orders. The courts interfere less frequently with SEC, CAB, and FTC orders than they do with deportation orders. For instance, twenty CAB orders were reviewed in 1951 and only one reversed; twenty-three were reviewed in 1952 and only one reversed. But because the variables are plural, judicial reluctance or lack of it cannot be proved or disproved with statistics about proportion of reversals; if the agency is careless, reversals increase; if lawyers challenge too many orders, the proportion of reversals decreases. In one sense, courts "normally refuse to interfere" with any administrative orders, for less than two per cent of federal administrative adjudications are judicially reviewed, but the context shows that the textwriter was not using his words in this sense.

Professor Lepawsky falls into rather elementary error when he says that "the courts are thus 'normally' so hesitant to interfere with deportation orders that the present Administration is seriously considering action to permit easier review in such cases, and, in fact, the Attorney General has recently submitted a bill to both houses of Congress which would implement this change." The proposal is not to change scope of review but only the method. The proposal is to continue habeas corpus as a method of review and to add to it a review under section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act. Attorney General Brownell has explained that his purpose is not to change the scope of review: "Regarding the scope of review, it is doubtful whether the scope is now any different in habeas corpus from that which is accorded to the orders of other agencies under section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act."

KENNETH CULP DAVIS
University of Minnesota

TO THE EDITOR:

1. To begin with, I have counted myself, for several years, as an admirer of Professor Davis, largely on the basis of the many excellent articles on administrative law that he has contributed to the law journals. Since the publication of his casebook and his text on the subject, I have used both in my own courses in administrative law, and I am still using his text as collateral reading. I have felt, and I still believe, that Professor Davis understands a great deal about the processes of government and about bureaucratic behavior—in both the judicial and executive branches. Granting, as I do, that Professor Davis "knows" a lot of "political science," it is the more regrettable that he is unwilling to indulge a more charitable assumption concerning the possibility that political scientists (i.e., non-lawyers) might conceivably understand some of the mysteries of administrative law. Herein, it seems to me, lies one of the basic criticisms invited by the tone and manner of expression of the Davis article: that Davis has foreclosed the possibility of finding anything other than misinformation about administrative law in the public administration textbooks, by donning the blinders of professional mysticism. To be specific, Davis suggests that the author of "Book 1" (third edition) is hopelessly confused as to the permissible scope of judicial review under Section 10 (e) of the Administrative Procedure Act, because the phrase "throughout the whole [or entire] record" is used synonymously with the statutory language: "unsupported by substantial evidence . . . [in] the whole record." Since this edition discusses the two leading Supreme Court decisions and cites the leading law journal article (Jaffe's "Judicial Review: Substantial Evidence on the Whole Record") on p. 514, the author obviously had exposed himself to the proper authorities; Davis' argument must be that the author was incapable of understanding this complex point. One would assume that an awareness of legal history would push one towards charity rather than towards dogmatism in matters such as these; after all, none other than the esteemed Learned Hand was confused on this very point when the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided the Universal Camera case; and when that same case reached the Supreme Court, what did Justice Frankfurter do other than to resurrect the "reasonable man" of Holmes' dissent in Lochner v. New York, and make this the yardstick of judicial discretion, or "the judgmental process of review." The subject cannot be crystal clear, even to Professor Davis, for he has written elsewhere in this regard: "Obviously the test of reasonableness under the substantial evidence rule is unprecise and susceptible of different application by different courts or even by the same court in different cases." Davis, Administrative Law, p. 915.

2. However sympathetic one may be toward the objectives Professor Davis had in mind in writing his article, it is difficult to condone his methods. Any quotation necessarily is made out of context, but it is unworthy of a scholar to quote systematically "out of context." It takes no particular acumen in the law, even in administrative law, to indulge in semantic exorcise; one might, for instance, turn to Davis' article (p. 740) where he is taking Book 1 to task, and, by the process of skipping a few intervening sentences, quote him as follows: "Statutes usually forbid judicial substitution of judgment on questions of fact. . . . Under the dominant doctrine the courts review findings of fact to the extent of determining whether they are supported by substantial evidence, and this means that many orders are set aside that would stand if the courts did not review the facts." In other words, Professor Davis, the courts are forbidden to review questions of fact, but they do so anyhow? This brings us back to the error of Book 1, which states (still quoting from Professor Davis, at p. 740): "Legislatures cannot insulate administration against judicial review by introducing into the statute clauses designed to thwart review."

If Professor Davis were to rejoin at this point that this sort of word-game playing is unfair, unprofitable, and before long, unintelligible, I should of course be forced to agree. It certainly is. It is equally unfair to impeach statements in a book published in 1946 on the basis of a statute enacted later that year and a Supreme Court decision which came some five years later. It is not the author of Book 1's lack of prophetic gifts that is at issue. Similarly, it might be pointed out that it is curious that Professor Davis selects the earlier edition of this text to attack, when it is apparent that he had available to him the then recently published third edition, which he cites only in a footnote. Notwithstanding his assertion that "the new errors in the new edition are even more astonishing than those in the second edition," one wonders whether it was an ingrained sense of circumspection and charity or the failure to find such errors that impelled Professor Davis to select the earlier edition as his pierre de résistance?

3. Much of Professor Davis' commentary exhibits the quibbling over details, with consequent distortion or complete avoidance of the main point, that is the very epitomy of the "legalism" for which both teachers and practitioners of public administration frequently express aversion. His argument takes on the coloration of the counsel's brief, the one-sided marshalling of evidence pointing in the direction of quod erat demonstratum, and the corresponding sublimation of contrary evidence until its consideration may be forced by reason of its having been included in the brief of opposition counsel. I hope that the day is not at hand when truth will be determined in the pages of this REVIEW by grace of the litigious process.

Let me give a specific example of such quibbling combined with quotation out of context. Davis says of another text: "At page 617 Book 3 says that 'rules have the effect of law.' The law is that interpretative rules often lack the force of law." What the author actually said was: "Since rules have the effect of law, they establish the rights of parties under many circumstances, and such parties are entitled to immunity for action taken in reliance upon them." Without debating the normative admonition in the terminal clause, the fact is that interpretative rules do establish the rights of parties under many circumstances. E.g., Gibson Wine Co. v. Snyder, 194 F. (2d) 329 (1952). It is hard to understand Davis' commentary here other than as deliberate quotation out of context for the purpose of quibbling over words.

4. In his footnote 51, p. 743, Professor Davis takes the author of Book 4 to task for having committed the "especially important" error of distinguishing between "rules" and "regulations," "thereby departing from courts' usage, confusing students who may misunderstand the vocabulary of lawyers and courts, and departing from section 2(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act." I, for one, am not ready to concede that political scientists fall into "error" when they choose to conceptualize governmental processes other than in the terminology of the legal profession. If this were to be the case, stultification of intellectual activity in the field of public law would be rapid indeed.

5. Professor Leonard White is taken severely to task for having undertaken to overgeneralize about the application of the "rule of law" in the United States. The point of Davis' criticism seems to be that the section on administrative law in the introductory course in public administration should be taught by the case method. A little more reflection might have revealed to Professor Davis that such a sudden switch to the case method of instruction for a week or two in a course otherwise taught by other techniques is not very feasible: (1) suitable materials are not available, unless the class is to be asked to purchase a law school casebook in administrative law in addition to the public administration textbook; (2) most of the two weeks would have to be devoted to teaching the case method to students who would be unfamiliar with it; (3) political scientists are using the case method in the courses in administrative law that are now being taught in approximately 100 political science departments throughout the country; (4) in two weeks, one might hope to cover by the case method, thus interjected in the introductory public administration course, and working with undergraduates rather than law school students, the subjects of official and governmental liability. Period. Is the rest of administrative law to be ignored in what is admittedly a survey course, an introduction to a field of study?

Turning to the merits of the White generalization, it is true that both governmental and officer liability are necessarily bound up in any discussion of Dicey's "rule of law," but surely all wisdom on this subject is not to be found in a fifty year old case, even after Professor Davis has "somewhat altered"* the facts; and he may be surprised to discover that Lowe v. Conroy is well known to many, if not to most, political scientists. Obviously, it is known to White, since he discusses the case on p. 578 of his text.

Professor White may even have been somewhat misled, in his assumptions about the "universal accept[ance]" of the rule of law as an aspect of judicial review of administration, by contemporary statements of leading jurists and law school professors of administrative law. Surely Arthur T. Vanderbilt, formerly Dean of the New York University Law School and member of the Attorney General's [the Acheson] Committee on Administrative Procedure, qualifies as such an authority on administrative law; and one would assume that this would be particularly true when Chief Justice Vanderbilt speaks from the bench. Only a few months after Professor White's third edition went to press, we find Chief Justice Vanderbilt saying: "Neither is the grant to administrative agencies of the power to adjudicate controversies within the various fields of administrative activity a violation of Article III [of the New Jersey State Constitution of 1947], for every administrative adjudication is subject to the doctrine of the supremacy of law, or, as it has often been called, the Rule of Law. If an administrative adjudication is repugnant to the state or the federal Constitution or the law of the land as, e.g., a treaty, or is ultra vires a statute, it is subject to attack by judicial review." Mulhearn v. Federal Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co., 2 N. J. 356, 364 (1949). Are law school students taught to ignore such "abstract and erroneous generalizations [about] Dicey's rule of law?" (p. 732).

6. It is perhaps unfortunate that Professor Davis did not pay more heed to the Popian couplet. Further investigation might have revealed to him that at least faltering steps have been taken by political scientists in an attempt to provide some evidence bearing on the questions that Davis asks in his section VI, "Some Suggestions for Research." To take only the second of his questions, for example: "To what extent do the regulated groups control the regulators?" It has been well over a decade since the publication of Herring's Public Ad- ministration and the Public Interest, Fesler's The Independence of State Regulatory Agencies, and Leiserson's Administrative Regulation, all of which would seem to be relevant to the question. Since Davis cites none of these studies in the "Table of Authorities" appended to his text, one may be pardoned for assuming that he may be ignorant of their existence.

* Kenneth C. Davis, "Some Reflections of a Law Professor about Instruction and Research in Public Administration," this Review, Vol. 47, p. 731, fn. 5 (Sept., 1953).

7. Many political scientists readily will agree with Davis about the virtues of the case method of instruction, the inadequacies of existing treatment of the subject of administrative law in public administration textbooks, the desirability of more research in many areas of administrative law (unfortunately, it has little sex appeal and does not "pitch" well for foundation support), and the obligation of political scientists to develop both a conceptual framework for and materials dealing with "internal" administrative law. It is the more regrettable that he felt impelled to overstate his case; a fair-minded discussion on his part of "Misinformation about Administrative Law" in the public administration textbooks would undoubtedly have been much more influential upon his audience, who were not really on trial except in Professor Davis' own mind.

GLENDON A. SCHUBERT, JR.
Michigan State College

TO THE EDITOR:

I shall aim a few sentences at the heart of each of the first five of Professor Schubert's seven numbered points.

1. He tries to defend the palpably absurd statement that "'substantial evidence' must be found throughout the entire record to support administrative action." I repeat the question I previously asked in a footnote: If in a 1000-page record, 990 pages are devoted to unconvincing circumstantial evidence on one side, and ten pages to convincing direct evidence on the other side, should a court hold that the agency may not believe the direct evidence?

2. His entire discussion of this point proclaims that he is unaware of the distinction between judicial review involving substitution of judicial judgment and judicial review not involving substitution of judicial judgment, a distinction which is cardinal in most of the law of scope of review.

His statement that it is unfair to impeach a 1946 book on the basis of a statute passed later in 1946 and a 1951 decision would be well taken if either the statute or the case changed the law under discussion. To show that statutes sometimes preclude review, I quoted the clause of the 1946 Administrative Procedure Act that says, "Except so far as statutes preclude review . . ." The 1951 case was used for a proposition that has been the law since 1912.

He sees something sinister in my discussion of a second edition and my footnote recognition of the third edition. The simple explanation, of course, is that the third edition appeared after my article was in proof.

3. He justifies an unqualified statement that "rules have the effect of law" by arguing that "interpretative rules do establish the rights of parties under many circumstances." Yes, they do. But the point is that in many other circumstances, interpretative rules do not have the effect of law, and the unqualified statement is therefore excessive.

4. He says that if political scientists must use the terms "rules" and "regulations" in the same way these terms are used by Congress, state legislatures, courts, agencies, administrators, lawyers, and law professors, "stultification of intellectual activity in the field of public law would be rapid indeed." I cannot agree. Political scientists can influence the course of government only if they use a vocabulary that is understood by the people who make up the government. Any impairment of the means of communication is unfortunate.

5. In an effort to justify a mistaken statement that officers are liable in tort, he relies upon some vague supremacy-of-law language of Chief Justice Vanderbilt that says nothing about tort liability. The Vanderbilt position on officers' tort liability is the opposite of what Professor Schubert assumes it to be, as he could have found by examining the orthodox case of Hester v. Miller, 8 N.J. 81, 83 A.2d 773 (1951), holding the State Highway Commissioner immune from liability.

Professor Schubert's reliance upon vague and general language, instead of using a concrete holding involving a particular application, is precisely the type of thinking that seems to me so harmful in the public administration texts.

KENNETH CULP DAVIS

TO THE EDITOR:

You ask in the March issue for comment on Kenneth C. Davis's remarks in the September issue concerning "Misinformation about Administrative Law."

I have not myself examined the texts discussed in Professor Davis's article. But I have thought about his criticisms of the portions he selected for discussion. In my estimation he has accurately characterized these portions as being loaded with misinformation. Agreement with Professor Davis's analysis does not come as a surprise. He is in the highest rank of administrative lawyers in this country. His writings have brought him much merited recognition, including the Henderson Memorial Prize awarded not oftener than quinquennially by vote of the faculty of the Harvard Law School as a "recognition of outstanding excellence in the production of a critical and constructive work on Administrative Law and other problems affecting government." There is a very strong presumption indeed that Davis knows whereof he speaks when he speaks about administrative law.

The important point, however, is not whether Davis has correctly identified a number of errors in texts prepared for students of public administration. The real question is whether the texts should deal at all—correctly or incorrectly—with "legal complexities." Davis argues effectively that they should not—not because lawyers are entitled to maintain monopolistic control over "legal complexities," but because there are so many more important matters to which political scientists and their students should devote attention. Who really cares whether in formal proceedings a litigant must petition for an administrative rehearing before he can say that there is a "final order" ripe for judicial review? Who really cares whether certiorari is a procedural device used by federal courts when they want to review administrative decisions? Who really cares about the precise meaning of "res judicata" in administrative law? Well, obviously enough, somebody does and should care. But I suggest that he is not likely to be found among the governmental generalists or the administrative specialists who are being trained by teachers of public administration.

WALTER GELLHORN
Columbia University

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

CHARLES MCKINLEY
Reed College

President-Elect

HAROLD D. LASSWELL
Yale University

Vice-Presidents

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
U. S. Senate

LINDSAY ROGERS
Columbia University

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN
Northwestern University

Secretary

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Treasurer

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD
Cornell University

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1785 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor

American Political Science Review
HUGH L. ELSBREE
Library of Congress

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers *ex officio*s

MANNING J. DAUER
University of Florida

EARL LATHAM
Amherst College

ARNAUD LEAVELLE
Stanford University

DAYTON D. MCKEAN
University of Colorado

J. ROLAND PENNOCK
Swarthmore College

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago

WALLACE S. SAYRE
College of the City of New York

DWIGHT WALDO
University of California (Berkeley)

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Princeton University

STEPHEN K. BAILEY
Wesleyan University

JAMES M. BURNS
Williams College

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER
Smith College

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD
University of Michigan

AVERY LEISERSON
Vanderbilt University

LESLIE M. LIPSON
University of California (Berkeley)

NORMAN PALMER
University of Pennsylvania

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW

ALBERT SHAW

FREDERIC N. JUDSON

JAMES BRYCE

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL

WOODROW WILSON

SIMEON E. BALDWIN

ALBERT BUSHNELL HART

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

JOHN BASSETT MOORE

ERNST FREUND

JESSE MACY

MUNROE SMITH

HENRY JONES FORD

PAUL S. REINSCH

LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING

HARRY A. GARFIELD

JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD

WILLIAM B. MUNRO

JESSE S. REEVES

JOHN A. FAIRLIE

BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

EDWARD S. CORWIN

WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY

ISIDOR LOEB

WALTER J. SHEPARD

FRANCIS W. COKER

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA

CHARLES GROVE HAINES

ROBERT C. BROOKS

FREDERIC A. OGG

WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN

LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD

ARTHUR W. MACMAHON

HENRY R. SPENCER

QUINCY WRIGHT

JAMES K. POLLOCK

PETER H. ODEGARD

LUTHER H. GULICK

PENDLETON HERRING

RALPH J. BUNCHE

ALSO IN DECEMBER—

A NEW TEXTBOOK by Austin F. Macdonald

► State and Local Government in the United States

FROM THE PREFACE This new work devotes approximately equal space to state and local problems. Nine of the thirty-one chapters deal exclusively or primarily with local government, and thirteen other chapters contain substantial sections on various aspects of local government and administration.

The material on state government has been substantially compressed in order to avoid a final product of unwieldy proportions. The new book, therefore, is no longer than American State Government and Administration. But this result has been achieved without sacrificing any of the essentials of state government.

CONTENTS

Part One: Intergovernmental Relations

1. Federal-State Relations
2. Interstate Relations
3. State-Local Relations
4. Federal-Local Relations

Part Two: The Organization of State Government

5. State Constitutions
6. State Executives
7. State Legislatures
8. State Courts

Part Three: The Organization of Local Government

9. City Government: Mayor and Council
10. City Government: The Newer Forms
11. Government of Metropolitan Areas
12. County Government
13. Towns, Townships, Villages, and Special Districts

Part Four: The Political Process

14. Nominations and Elections
15. Parties and Politics
16. Direct Legislation and the Recall

Part Five: The Protective Services

17. Safety
18. Welfare
19. Health
20. Housing

Part Six: Education and Development

21. Education
22. Recreation
23. Highways
24. Natural Resources

Part Seven: Business and Labor

25. Regulation of Business
26. Regulation of Labor

Part Eight: Staff Activities

27. Personnel
28. Expenditures
29. Revenues
30. Indebtedness
31. Planning
- Table of Cases

700 PAGES (approx.)—CHARTS and TABLES—6 x 9—$5.50 (prob.)

Thomas Y. Crowell Company

432 Fourth Avenue

New York 16, New York

TOTALITARIANISM

Edited by Carl J. Friedrich. The role of totalitarianism in today's world and its challenge to freedom . . . the forces that make it possible . . . ideological and psychological aspects of the problem . . . its threat to the future. This book is the outgrowth of a conference on totalitarianism held by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences last year: From George F. Kennan to Harold D. Lasswell, nineteen notable experts here present their thoughts and analyses of one of the most perplexing problems of our time. $6.50

HOW RUSSIA IS RULED

By Merle Fainsod. The most complete book available on the structure of the Russian police state and how it operates—with reliable leads on possible future developments. "A comprehensive, scholarly, interestingly written survey of the power organization of the Soviet society."—Harry Schwartz, N.Y. Times Book Review. Russian Research Center Studies, 11.

Second printing, $7.50

Text edition, $5.75

THE FORMATION OF THE SOVIET UNION COMMUNISM AND NATIONALISM 1917-1923

By Richard Pipes. The history of the disintegration of the Russian empire and the emergence on its ruins of a multinationalist Communist state. It tells how the Communists exploited the new nationalism of the non-Russian borderland peoples—first to seize power and then to expand into these areas. It is the first book to deal comprehensively with the origins and the methods of Communist empire-building, and adds much to our knowledge of the USSR and its peoples. Russian Research Center Studies, 13.

October 15. $6.50

At your bookseller, or

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

MARXISM

THE UNITY OF THEORY AND PRACTICE

By Alfred G. Meyer. This striking presentation of major ideas, problems and contradictions inherent in Marxism discusses the philosophy, economics, sociology, and psychological attitudes involved. Mr. Meyer presents Marxism fairly in its own terms, and then he goes on to examine the weaknesses and inconsistencies, paradoxes and impossibilities of the union of the theory and practice of communism. Russian Research Center Studies, 14. November 5. $3.50

SOVIET INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION, 1928-1951

By Donald R. Hodgman. By developing a revised index of Soviet industrial production that measures Soviet industrial growth more accurately than the defective official Soviet indices, and by applying this revised index in a reassessment of Soviet achievement in industrialization, the author presents the most systematic and comprehensive analysis of the Soviet planned economy ever published. Appendices contain detailed physical output data, presentation of statistical procedures, and the latest data on 1952-1953 production. Russian Research Center Studies, 15. November. $5.00

CONTEMPORARY INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS READINGS

THIRD SERIES

By Norman J. Padelford. Provocative, up-to-date articles on major problems of contemporary affairs—published during the past two years. Topics include: geopolitics, natural resources, international relations, demography, nationalism, power politics, imperialism, United States and Soviet foreign policy, the problem of national security, international organization and world government. Paper covers. $3.00

At your bookseller, or

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

Governing Postwar Germany

"Without question the most comprehensive survey of present-day German political institutions."—Sat. Rev

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD, Cornell University, Editor. Dr. Litchfield is President of the Governmental Affairs Institute, and was formerly Executive Director of the American Political Science Association. He has also been the Director of the Civil Administration Division of the Office of Military Government for Germany and Consultant to the Secretary of the Army.

In addition to Dr. Litchfield, contributors include such experts as Taylor Cole, Harold M. Dorr, Carl J. Friedrich, Alonzo G. Grace, A. M. Hillhouse, Howard Palfrey Jones, Karl Loewenstein, Rodney L. Mott, and others.

THE government and politics of Germany after World War II are here presented in a comprehensive and authoritative volume. Local, state, and federal governments are considered from the point of view of legislative, judicial, and administrative processes. The major functions of government are specifically examined and political parties, elections, and electoral methods are appraised. The influence of the occupation powers upon the various processes of government is also treated in this book.

The American Political Science Review

said: "Among the numerous books dealing with Germany published in the United States since World War II this book is likely to be regarded generally as one of the most important. Its authors have brought to their analysis more than ordinary professional background and have also had the opportunity to observe developments from official positions in most cases. . . . Few works dealing with current problems have received as careful planning and preparation."

678 Pages, Illustrations, Tables. $7.75

124 ROBERTS PLACE

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS

ITHACA, NEW YORK

A New Publication

Capitol, Courthouse and City Hall

READINGS IN AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Edited by ROBERT L. MORLAN, University of Redlands

A stimulating collection of more than eighty current articles has been selected by Dr. Morlan from both popular magazines and specialized periodicals for Capitol, Courthouse and City Hall. The articles—many controversial, all contemporary—survey the major problem areas in state and local government.

This vital new book is designed primarily to be used as a text supplement or in conjunction with other assignments, in lieu of the traditional type of textbook.

An Important Revision

American Constitutional Development

SECOND EDITION

CARL B. SWISHER, The Johns Hopkins University

Up-to-date material. Re-evaluation of recent events. New chapters. Plus the fundamental structure of the original edition. These features insure outstanding success for the new American Constitutional Development, a text whose first edition won national acclaim.

Vital and timely are the four new chapters which cover the constitutional issues of economic control, the constitutional issues of war, crises for liberty, and the unfolding of judicial behavior in the period of the Roosevelt-Truman Supreme Court.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

European Political Systems

edited by

TAYLOR COLE, Duke University

An up-to-date survey of the changing governments of the major European powers with extensive coverage of the government of the Soviet Union and an entire section on the "people's democracies." Descriptive and interpretive, it is a compilation of the expert opinions of men well-versed in the history, development, and functioning of the countries they examine.

6 $\frac{3}{8}$ x 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches, cloth, 699 pages, \$6.00 text

The Political System

An Inquiry into the State of Political Science

DAVID EASTON, University of Chicago

No other book provides so lucid an analysis of the types of political thought, their functions, and their interrelations. Students of political science will find it indispensable for its persuasive exposition of the nature and scope of their subject. It sharply outlines the tasks challenging a new generation of political scientists.

5 $\frac{3}{4}$ x 8 $\frac{5}{8}$ inches, cloth, 320 pages, \$4.00 text

Examination copies on request

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

501 Madison Avenue College Department New York 22

The Elements of Political Science

ALFRED de GRAZIA, Stanford University

After first exploring the sociological and psychological sources of political behavior, Professor de Grazia then moves on to an analysis of pressure groups and parties, and concludes by relating problems of democracy and public policy to the goals of political science. Drawing heavily on American experience, the author thus enriches the student's knowledge of American government and at the same time uses the familiar concepts as a guide for understanding universal political problems.

6 $\frac{3}{8}$ x 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches, cloth, 624 pages, 55 diagrams, \$5.50 text

Introduction to Government

ROBERT RIENOW

New York State College for Teachers, Albany

With emphasis on principles but in a setting of concrete and meaningful institutional description, Professor Rienow has written a basic text, simple and direct in style and reflecting his long teaching experience, that will prepare the beginning student for advanced study in all phases of political science and give the student, for whom the elementary course in government is a terminal one, a basic knowledge of present governmental problems.

6 $\frac{3}{8}$ x 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches, cloth, 583 pages, 24 illus., \$5.00 text

Examination copies on request

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

501 Madison Avenue College Department New York 22

Outstanding New Books

in the McGRAW-HILL

Series in Political Science

MANAGEMENT IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

The Quest for Effective Performance

By JOHN D. MILLETT, President, Miami University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 436 pages, $5.50

A brilliantly written systematic critique of the role of management from the point of view of the operating official at all levels, with emphasis on public or governmental aspects. Primary attention is focused on the common aspects of management—the work which must be performed regardless of the peculiar nature of the substantive work performed. It features new definitions of public administration and management, and concludes with a chapter setting forth a scale of values governing the behavior of administrators in the public service of our democracy which will do much to stimulate discussion in this vitally important area.

IDEAS AND ISSUES IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

A Book of Readings

Edited by DWIGHT WALDO, University of California, Berkeley. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 462 pages, $5.50

Designed primarily for supplementary reading in an introductory course on public administration, this book includes material on as many standard subjects as space will permit. The treatment follows a lengthier, more detailed exploration of major trends, theories, and controversies, and covers representative differences in points of view on these topics to capture the intent and spirit of the authors.

POLITICS IN THE UNITED STATES

Edited by HENRY A. TURNER, University of California, Santa Barbara College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press

A realistic portrayal of this vital and dynamic field presented in a collection of timely, significant, and interesting articles written by active political participants, experienced observers, and prominent scholars. The text includes discussions of the functioning of political parties and pressure groups, the role of public opinion, electoral process, ethics in government, and reports of Congressional committees.

THE DYNAMICS OF DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT

By JOHN P. ROCHE, Haverford College, and MURRAY S. STEDMAN, Swarthmore College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 456 pages, $5.00.

Here, in a stimulating presentation, are many significant generalizations about the nature of democratic government. These points of view are documented with relevant and significant facts drawn from the operation of democratic government. Most material is from the experience of the United States, Great Britain and France, though material on other democracies is included at particularly significant points. The authors are biased in favor of democracy as a technique of government as well as a faith for living. Religious and ethical assumptions of the authors are important in the formulation of their ideas.

McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc.

330 West 42nd Street

New York 36, N.Y.

Send for copies on approval

OXFORD Texts on Political Science

Coming Early in 1955
A Completely Revised and Reset Edition of

PRINCIPLES AND PROBLEMS OF AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

By JOHN M. SWARTHOUT, Oregon State College
and ERNEST R. BARTLEY, University of Florida

A fresh and up-to-date edition of this basic text in American government is now being prepared. Careful attention is given to the changes in administration and to important legislation enacted since the earlier edition. Material on American foreign policy has been entirely rewritten and re-arranged. The first edition of this book has had more than 100 adoptions.

By the same authors:

MATERIAL ON AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

This popular book of readings was written to accompany Principles and Problems of American National Government, but is easily adaptable to any other American government text. Among the colleges which have used the book are:—Princeton University, Smith College, University of Florida, Bard College, Oregon State College, University of Hawaii, and Mary Washington College.

589 pp.

1952

$2.95

SOVIET POLICY IN THE FAR EAST, 1944-1951 (Royal Institute of International Affairs)

By MAX BELOFF. An outstanding authority on Soviet foreign policy examines all important aspects of her diplomacy in Asia. The Yalta Agreement and its implications, Russia's entry into the Japanese war and her relationships with Red China, as well as the origins of the Korean War and its diplomatic history up to the 1951 truce talks are among the topics discussed.

284 pp.

1953

$4.00

POLITICAL POWER IN THE U.S.S.R., 1917-1947

By JULIAN TOWSTER. "The best book on Soviet government I have yet seen, and it has solved the text problem in our basic courses on the political system of the U.S.S.R."—D. LINCOLN HARTER, University of Pennsylvania

460 pp.

1948

College ed. $5.00

THE PROPHET ARMED Trotsky: 1879-1921

By ISAAC DEUTSCHER. "An able, moving and fascinating portrait of one of the great makers of the history of our time, and of the story events in which he took so large and dramatic a part . . . illuminating, compassionate and fascinating."—Saturday Review

552 pp.

1954

$6.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. 11

Publishers of Fine Books for nearly Five Centuries

Princeton

UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Appeals of Communism

By GABRIEL A. ALMOND

What makes a Communist? Here is an intensely interesting study that grapples with the question of why people join the Communist Party and why some of them leave it. Based on an intensive four-year program of "depth" interviews with former American, British, French, and Italian Communists, it provides basic information necessary for an intelligent approach to the Communist problem.

432 pages. $6

The Constitution and What It Means Today

By EDWARD S. CORWIN

This new, completely revised edition of Professor Corwin's famous handbook on Constitutional Law covers decisions of the Supreme Court through June 1954 and includes the first scholarly comment on the recent historic decision outlawing racial segregation in the public schools. This eleventh edition contains about 50% more material than its predecessor and now appears in a larger format.

356 pages. $5

Order from your bookstore, or
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS,
Princeton, New Jersey

Available now in English—a penetrating study . . .

POLITICAL PARTIES

Their Organization and Activity in the Modern State

By Maurice Duverger, University of Paris. Foreword by D. W. Brogan. Here is the first full-scale work of its kind since Ostrogorski and Michels. Its aim is to supply a general Theory of Parties as a basis for examining in detail the differences in the way they function. Extensive material is offered concerning the world's chief political parties and, in particular, the factors which have produced the European multi-party system. This translation makes accessible much information not previously available in English. Fully up-to-date, the book has been revised by the author especially for this edition. 1954. 439 pages. $5.50.

Have you seen . . .

NATIONALISM and SOCIAL COMMUNICATION by Karl W. Deutsch, The Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Co-published with The Technology Press, M.I.T. 1953. 292 pages. $6.00.

Send for on-approval copies.

JOHN WILEY AND SONS, Inc.

440-4th Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

YALE BOOKS

EUROPEAN THOUGHT IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Paul Hazard. This work and its companion volume. The European Mind, 1680-1715 (Yale University Press 1952) are among the best modern accounts of the intellectual history of Europe in the decisive century which culminated in the French Revolution.

$6.00

A HISTORY OF RUSSIA 1954 Edition

George Vernadsky. Entirely reset and substantially revised. "An ideal book to recommend as an introduction to the history of Russia." H. H. Fisher, The Hoover Institute

$4.00

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE
YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
NEW HAVEN 7 CONN

Irving Bernstein

ARBITRATION OF WAGES

This useful contribution to the growing material available on labor-management disputes discusses, among other things, the part played by arbitration, the industries most interested and the times at which arbitration is most apt to be effective. $3.50

► Coming in November

Paul Seabury

THE WILHELMSTRASSE

A study of German diplomats under the Nazis, their response to a totalitarian regime, and the complex problems of "moral responsibility" of a civil servant under such conditions. $3.00

Delmer M. Brown

NATIONALISM IN JAPAN

An introductory historical analysis of the effect of nationalism on the internal and external affairs of Japan, and of the failure of Western peoples to appreciate its social force. $5.00

*Jacobus tenBroek
Edward N. Barnhart
Floyd W. Matson*

PREJUDICE, WAR, AND THE CONSTITUTION

A comprehensive study of the historical origins, political characteristics, and legal consequences of the Japanese American evacuation of World War II. The authors advance a new theory to account for the development and decisions of the unprecedented evacuation program. $5.00

at your bookstore

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS
Address: Berkeley 4, California

INTERNATIONAL STUDIES

GERMAN PROTESTANTS FACE THE SOCIAL QUESTION, by William O. Shanahan. By bringing about a massive reorganization of the traditional agrarian world the Industrial Revolution so altered man's work, his home, and his habits of thought as to place Christianity in jeopardy. The German Protestants became entangled with the national political history in attempting to deal with the social question. How their attempts entered into German history after 1815 provides the narrative of this book. And throughout, the historian's interest in depicting the ties between Christianity and western culture has not been lost to sight. In this dimension, the story of the German Protestant response to the Industrial Revolution illumines the fate of western man. $6.75

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN WORLD AFFAIRS, edited by Waldemar Gurian and M. A. Fitzsimons. Professors Gurian and Fitzsimons present a realistic analysis of the issues at stake in the relations of the Church and the modern world—a volume designed to meet the need for a medium-length, factual and readable account of the role the Church is playing in contemporary world affairs. $4.25

PAN-SLAVISM: ITS HISTORY AND IDEOLOGY, by Hans Kohn. A scholar brought up in Prague, the center of the Pan-Slavist movement of the 19th century, writes on a question so necessary to the understanding of the complex problems which the emergence of the Slav nations, above all Russia, to full political and cultural participation in the life of the 19th and 20th centuries created for them, for the other peoples, and for Western civilization. $6.25

DIPLOMACY IN A WHIRLPOOL: HUNGARY BETWEEN NAZI GERMANY AND SOVIET RUSSIA, by Stephen D. Kertesz. A concise and well written study of the Soviet penetration and domination of Hungary, presented by a man who served in the Hungarian diplomatic service during and after the war. $4.75

SOVIET IMPERIALISM: ITS ORIGINS AND TACTICS, edited by Waldemar Gurian. A basic survey of Soviet expansionism by N. Timasheff of Fordham, Michael Pap of Notre Dame, W. Weintraub of Harvard, R. Pipes of Harvard, F. Barghoorn of Yale, and Ling Nai-jui of Notre Dame. $3.75

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE BRITISH LABOUR GOVERNMENT: 1945-1951, by M. A. Fitzsimons. An analysis of Labour's policy aspirations and performance. $3.25

BOLSHEVISM: AN INTRODUCTION TO SOVIET COMMUNISM, by Waldemar Gurian. A clear and cogent treatment of the realities of Russian Communism and its appeal as a secular religion. $3.25

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRACY IN ITALY AND FRANCE, by Mario Einaudi and Francois Goguel. A study of the Christian Democratic Party in Italy and MRP, the party of the Fourth French Republic. $4.00

EUROPE BETWEEN DEMOCRACY AND ANARCHY, by F. A. Hermens. An important volume on the effects of Proportional Representation between 1918 and 1950. $4.00

UNIVERSITY OF NOTRE DAME PRESS
NOTRE DAME, INDIANA

Prentice-Hall

ANNOUNCING!

TODAY'S ISMS: COMMUNISM, FASCISM, CAPITALISM, SOCIALISM

By WILLIAM EBENSTEIN, Princeton University.

Outstanding Features:

1. Broad Approach—Each of the major issues is analyzed as a way of life, with consideration of economic, political, social and cultural factors and a clear examination of the psychological roots of each system.
2. Integration of Doctrines and Policies—The key ideas of each ism are carefully related to and illustrated by recent and current world events and are examined for their complex effect on national policies and ways of life.
3. Historical Background—Sufficient historical background is included in the text to make clear the ideas and forces out of which today's isms have evolved.

192 pages

5 $\frac{5}{8}$ " x 8 $\frac{3}{8}$ "

Publication September 1954

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: INTRODUCTORY ESSAYS AND SELECTED CASES

By ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON and WILLIAM M. BEANEY, both of Princeton University.

This new type of casebook contains over 100 selected cases plus special introductory essays that provide historical background for each case. The clash of political and social ideas characterizing leading constitutional decisions is pointed up with unique effectiveness by the representation, for every major case, of concurring and dissenting opinions. Special attention is devoted to outstanding dissenting opinions which have replaced, or exerted strong influence on, later decisions.

672 pages

6" x 9"

Publication September 1954

For approval copies write

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc. • 70 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 11, N.Y.

The American Political Science Review

VOL. XLVIII

DECEMBER, 1954

NO. 4

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

RALPH J. BUNCHE

United Nations

This, the fiftieth annual meeting of our Association, has more than ordinary significance. Certainly it can be said that the Association has attained middle-age and the intellectual as well as the physical maturity to do proper credit to our years. We may, on this special occasion at least, regard with pardonable pride our record of growth, the recognition and development of our discipline in both teaching and research, the public service it has rendered, and its contribution to the forward progress of American political democracy. American political scientists, practitioners of what Aristotle rightly or wrongly described as the "master science," have recognized, as did Plato and Aristotle, the surpassing importance of political problems in society and have experienced the difficulties which they foresaw in the effort to employ scientific methods and procedures in the solution of such problems. Beyond doubt, however, we move steadily forward. Our scientific and professional standards show constant improvement. Our store of knowledge is immense. Our almost feverish search for new data is incessant. We know almost all there is to know about the political infirmities of our patients except how to cure them. The state of domestic and world affairs keeps us humble.

All of the fifty annual meetings of this Association have been held in the twentieth century, which may claim as its most tragic distinction its almost constant addiction to warfare. Even a superficial glimpse at the past half-century leads to the conclusion that but few of these meetings have been held at a time when people somewhere in the world were not at war. Indeed, it is an unflattering commentary on the condition of our times merely to point out that this fiftieth meeting of the Association is the first in well-nigh a quarter of a century which can look upon a world free, even if most insecurely, of organized warfare anywhere on the globe.

* Delivered before the American Political Science Association at its fiftieth annual meeting in Chicago, Illinois, September 9, 1954.

This, I make bold to say, can be counted as a blessing even if one must hasten to add that while there is at this moment no war, neither is there peace, for the cold war waxes hot, tensions continue severe, provocative incidents constantly test our nerves and our forbearance, armaments pyramid, and the dark threat of atomic war ever lurks on the horizon.

Still, with the cessation of fighting in Indo-China, there is no instant war and, therefore, an opportunity is presented, slight though it may be, for governments and statesmen and peoples the world over to pursue with renewed vigor the ends of peace and bring thereby some measure of relief and hope to harassed and war-weary mankind. But, in truth, the precariousness of the times is such, the aggressive forces loose in the world are so unpredictable, and uncertainty so dominates one's thought and psychology, that even as I write these words on September 7th I grimly realize that they may not hold true at all on September 9th.

In this regard, it may be recalled that our Association came into being during an earlier lull in warfare throughout the world. The Sino-Japanese, Spanish-American, and South African wars were over and the Russo-Japanese war had not begun when the first meeting of this Association convened in New Orleans a half-century ago. There has not been much let-up in warfare since. No cause and effect relationship is implied, of course.

Only twenty-five were present at that initial meeting. At the end of the Association's first year there were two hundred and fourteen members, and of these most found their primary interest not directly in political problems but in history, economics, and other social studies having political implications. As former President John A. Fairlie pointed out in his presidential address at the 1929 meeting, "When this Association was organized, the systematic study and teaching of political problems was but slightly developed. Only a few courses in public law and government were given in some of the larger universities."

Since those early, lean days, the lustiness of the growth and the proliferation of our discipline is amply attested by the bulging program of this fiftieth annual meeting.

In many directions our Association and our discipline have made striking progress. Our membership today stands at well over 6,000, of which less than half consists of those actively engaged in the teaching of political science. This has been a development realized largely in the last quarter-century of our existence, for in 1929 President Fairlie noted that of some 1900 members at that time only a "small portion" were outside the teaching profession.

Political science is now firmly anchored in the curricula of American colleges and universities. There are today more than 300 departments of political science in American colleges and universities with many thousands teaching the subject, exclusive of the large number of those who teach civics and social studies in the secondary schools. The students of political science number in the tens of thousands and each year over three hundred colleges and universities grant degrees in the field. No doubt our most distinguished past president, Woodrow Wilson, were he with us, would be highly gratified by the increasing extent to which members of the profession, particularly in the past two decades, have emerged from the academic realm to render invaluable assistance to governments local, state, and national—and to international organizations and agencies.

In all directions—political parties; national, state, and local government; political theory; constitutional law; public administration; public opinion; political behavior; legislation; international law and relations; comparative government—there has been significant advance in the definition and development of subject-matter, in both teaching and research.

In quite recent years the Association has afforded organized public services through the assistance of the profession in response to requests from the White House and various departments of the government. Organized research efforts, involving collaboration of substantial numbers of political scientists, have been undertaken as a new and recent development; of these the study of delegations to the party conventions in 1952 is an outstandingly successful example.

It may be mentioned, in passing, that political science gains increasing stature as an international discipline. The International Political Science Association, under the initiative of UNESCO, is now well established, with active participation by American political scientists led by Professor James K. Pollock as Senior Vice President. But it remains a fact that political science, as we conceive of it, is unknown in most of the world beyond our borders—in much of Europe, the Orient, and elsewhere. At the time of the organization of the International Political Science Association in 1950, there were political science organizations in but eight countries. However, there is undoubtedly in this development an excellent opportunity to promote the interests of the profession, to widen greatly its horizon of service, and, more important, to reinforce the international bonds of democracy. Since it is estimated that more than eighty per cent of the world's political scientists are in this country, both our opportunity and our responsibility in this international venture are great.

Our collaboration in this international effort is motivated neither by intellectual imperialism nor by a missionary impulse to bring political wisdom to the "heathen." Rather, the International Association affords the opportunity for an exchange of thinking and a cross-fertilization of ideas among intellectual equals of all nationalities, colors, and creeds who have discovered, quite as we discovered, the need for a distinct discipline in the field of political phenomena.

Despite the rapid development of American political science as an independent discipline—and it could be said not altogether facetiously that in some respects there might appear to be more of independence than of discipline—and while we have made substantial contributions to the intellectual and public life of the nation, disagreement, frustration, and failure are not unknown to us.

Passing mention only need be made of such matters as the tendencies toward excessive intellectual diffusion, over-specialization, "splintering" of the discipline, and the lack of what might be called unifying roots. Nor shall I dwell upon the absence of agreement among us on methodology, techniques, and classification, or on the comparability of political science and the natural sciences. These undoubtedly are matters of vital concern to the profession and on any one of them there could be—and there has often been—discussion without end.

Partly because this is our fiftieth meeting, partly because of the extreme discretion in public expression incumbent upon an international civil servant, and in no small measure because of an acute awareness of my own limitations in the preparation of this paper, I have burrowed in the addresses of previous presidents of the Association.

It seems to me that this meeting at the half-century mark is a particularly appropriate occasion on which to reflect upon the wisdom, the hopes, and the cautions of those who may rightly be called the founding fathers of American political science, especially where they may offer wise counsel for our future course and for the challenges with which the present and the future confront us.

A review of the presidential addresses delivered before this Association in the course of the fifty years since that small band of pioneers came together in New Orleans, provides a graphic picture of the development of political science in America, its function and method, its achievements and shortcomings, as seen by some of its most distinguished disciples. In these addresses there may also be found no slight reflection of much of the nation's political history and thought of the past half-century.

Bearing in mind the virtue of brevity, note is taken here of only some of the salient points in a selected few of the addresses of the first half of the Association's existence. Rather arbitrarily, I have decided that the ex-Presidents since 1930 are still too young to be classified as "elder statesmen."

At the third annual meeting, Albert Shaw emphasized that the Association "is not partisan, or sectional or propagandist in its nature;" it "is not a body of reformers," and therefore, it "can help to bring to a hundred questions now under discussion in the affairs of the nation, of the States, or of the municipalities the spirit of calmness, of inquiry, of reasonable discussion—in short, the scientific spirit."

Without straining any point, it may be urged that it would be difficult to think of a greater service that could be rendered to our nation today as regards both national and international affairs.

Two years later, at the fifth annual meeting, Lord Bryce, after offering political scientists what he described as a "maxim of universal validity," i.e., "keep close to the facts," raised the question: "What is the use of Political Science? Can it be made to serve the practical needs of the time?" In partial answer to his questions, which are just as pertinent and timely today as when he posed them early in the century, he expressed the view that since in free countries "the chief problem of democracy is to make the citizens intellectually and morally fit to conduct their government"—this being especially so in the United States, where "the ultimate control of public affairs belongs to the mass of the people"—political scientists ought to try, through their influence on citizens in the universities and their publications, to improve civic intelligence.

There has been improvement certainly, but there are few, I imagine, who would not agree that the need in this direction continues to be great and urgent.

The next year, at the sixth annual meeting, A. Lawrence Lowell, pointing out that "politics is an observational, not an experimental science; and hence the greater need of careful observation of those phenomena which we can use," queried: "But how much do statesmen turn to professors of political science for guidance? Surely students of politics do not lead public thought as much as they ought to do . . ."

Would it not be true to say that we still do not; that in the main the impact of the political scientist on thought and leadership is by no means comparable to his knowledge and potentiality?

At the seventh annual meeting, Woodrow Wilson expressed his dislike of the term "political science," since in his view, "human relationships, whether in the family or in the state, in the counting house or in the factory, are not in any proper sense the subject-matter of science. They are stuff of insight and sympathy and spiritual comprehension." He preferred the term "politics," which in his view included both the "statesmanship of thinking" and the "statesmanship of action."

President Wilson adjured that "the statesmanship of thought" as against "the statesmanship of action" must be furnished by the political scientist out of his full store of truth, discovered by patient inquiry, dispassionate exposition, fearless analysis and frank inference. He must spread a dragnet for all the facts, and must then look upon them steadily and look upon them whole. It is only thus that he can enrich the thinking and clarify the vision of the statesman of action, who has no time for patient inquiry, who must be found in his facts before he can apply them in law and policy, who must have stuff of truth for his conscience and his resolution to rely on.

Wilson went on to say:

the statesman and the student of political science have not hitherto often been partners. The statesman has looked askance upon the student,—at any rate in America, and has too often been justified because the student did not perceive the real scope and importance of what he was set to do and overlooked much of the great field from which he should have drawn his facts,—was not a student of thought and of affairs but merely a reader of books and documents.

The weaknesses and deficiencies which Wilson saw in the equipment of the student of politics of his time have been, I would think, largely corrected by now. But despite the considerable and encouraging traffic between campus and bureaucracy, especially during war years, the gap between the realms of study and action continues more than wide enough. In my experience off the campus during almost fifteen years now, I have discovered that when I am referred to as an "academician," this is not always meant as flattery, that the habit of trying to marshall all the facts, weigh them, and think things through thoroughly as the basis for action is sometimes regarded as droll and at other times incites no little impatience.

In 1925, at the twenty-first annual meeting, Charles E. Merriam prophesied:

we are likely to see a closer integration of the social sciences themselves, which in the necessary process of differentiation have in many cases become much too isolated. In dealing with basic problems . . . it becomes evident that neither the facts and the technique of economics alone, nor of politics alone, nor of history alone, are adequate to their analysis and interpretation.

Merriam, no doubt, would be pleased with the extent to which, in quite recent years, inter-disciplinary seminars, composite courses, and inter-disciplinary research programs have developed. There is, certainly, much less exclusiveness among the social scientists than in earlier years.

Merriam concluded:

At any rate, it becomes increasingly evident that the basic problems of political organization and conduct must be resurveyed in the light of new discoveries and tendencies; that the nature of mass rule must be reexamined; that the character and range of popular interest in government and the methods of utilizing it must be reexplored; that we must call in science to help end war as well as to make war; that the mechanisms and processes of politics must be subjected to much more minute analysis than they have hitherto received at the hands of students of government, from a much broader view, and from different angles.

Merriam's suggestion that science be employed to help end as well as to help make war has not materialized, but science has certainly made the prospect of another war a tremendously frightening thought. But to view the hydrogen bomb as signalling the end of the world, as some are inclined to do, serves only to induce panic and to nourish the ambitions of reckless ones who would seek power through exploitation of fear. In the calm view, the new weapons in all their fearful destructive potential are merely the logical end of the concept of total war in this scientific age. If a minimum of reason can be brought to prevail, the atomic-hydrogen-cobalt bombs may yet prove to be the decisive deterrent to war as governments and peoples the world over increasingly realize that another world war and the survival of civilization are altogether incompatible.

Now and then, over the years, stern warnings and criticisms have been directed to the political scientists, as for example, by Charles A. Beard and my highly respected former teacher, William B. Munro.

Beard inveighed against a good many things, including our "academic sterilities" and "the peril of narrowing the vision while accumulating information."

Munro, with an eye on the changes which had occurred in the exact sciences in response to new knowledge, urged:

It is time for political science to step up into line with the new physics by turning some of its attention to the sub-atomic possibilities. We should seek to discover the true reasons for that vast differentiation between good, bad, and indifferent citizenship which is perhaps the most obvious of all the phenomena of politics. We should enquire diligently into the nature and scope of the forces which make each civic atom what he is. And we should discard our allegiance to the absolute, for nothing would seem to be more truly self-evident than the proposition that all civic rights and duties, all forms and methods of government, are relative to one another, as well as to time and place circumstance. They cannot be translated into unvarying formulas.

You will pardon me, I trust, if I say that to my untheoretical mind, the real measure of our success or failure as political scientists is to be found in the manner in which opportunity is served and responsibility discharged, in other words, in our total impact for good or ill upon the society. In this regard one may well question whether the Association and its members have met as well as we might the test of that leadership which could and should be afforded, in both research and teaching, toward the betterment of American public life, the strengthening of democracy, and the achievement of more stable international relations.

I do not know to what extent it may be true that the discipline of political science is at once a function and an expression of democratic ideology and practice, but there can be no doubt of the rich contribution which political science can make to the strength and growth of democracy, where, as among us, it is directed to the systematic teaching, analysis, and practice of democracy in government and administration.

The severest challenge to the political scientist and to the social scientist generally, it seems to me, is in the notable failure of political and social institutions and policies to keep pace with material and technical change. If in the past fifty years there has been progress in the development of institutions, in the art of governing people, in the understanding of political processes and events, domestic and international—and some are quick to deny it—there has been no progress in any way comparable to that which has accompanied the application of science and technology to industry, communication, and transportation. In this age of the weapons of fission and fusion which science has made available to war, may not the very future of civilization depend to a considerable extent upon the ability of the political scientists, who are indeed the true experts in political relationships, to find remedies for these potentially fatal defects in political conduct? If they do not, who is to do so? Are political scientists still too much attached to abstract formalism, to metaphysical and juristic concepts, to established patterns and a traditionally narrow scope, and too exclusive to be fully realistic about the political needs, motivations, and forces which stimulate and control the thoughts and actions of citizens and governments, and therefore to be of maximum usefulness to a world in dire distress?

There will nowhere be such a promised land of politics as Plato, the practical reformer, sought. But there can be societies better governed and international affairs better ordered than is now the case. There can be, certainly, a better world, and I have confidence that political scientists can help to make it so. To do so, it is not essential, to paraphrase Plato, that either philosophers or political scientists be kings, or vice versa. But it is essential that the acts of men which are, in the words of Lord Bryce, the "data of politics," in the broadest sense, be studied, analyzed, and well understood by political scientists. There is, it seems to me, very much truth in the observation recorded by Boswell in his journal for July 28, 1763, to the effect that "human experience, which was constantly contradicting theory, was the great test of truth. . . ." And, as Woodrow Wilson put it, "nothing that forms or affects human life seems to me to be properly foreign to the student of politics." The fields in which the political scientist must plow, if the yield is to be worthy of the effort, are indeed vast.

With considerable diffidence, in view of my lack of adequate knowledge of work underway in our field, I venture to suggest that there are certain problem areas which would seem to merit greater attention than is now accorded them by our profession.

There is, for example, the problem of colonialism, and more particularly of colonial Africa. This, certainly, is at once one of the most critical and the most difficult of international problems. In one form or another, colonialism commands a highly prominent position on the agenda of the forthcoming ninth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Postwar experience alone has painfully demonstrated how much of the trouble and conflict in the contemporary world flows directly or indirectly from this faucet. Our colleges and universities, however, and political scientists with few exceptions, have been regrettably slow in grasping fully the world significance of this problem. American political science, I fear, has not yet come to grips with it.

In scanning the presidential addresses of the past, for example, I noted that in only one or two of them was there any reference at all to the problem of colonialism. This subject, surely, is quite within the scope and the horizon of interest of the political scientist. If I stress this lacuna in our knowledge and effort, it is not alone because colonialism has been my major pre-occupation. It is also because the field provides such great challenge; there is in it for the diligent student so much of rich opportunity for constructive contribution; and as a present and potential source of vast trouble and danger it is today one of the world's leading problems.

Secondly, in view of the new position and responsibilities assumed by our nation in world affairs, which in our democratic system necessarily involves a new responsibility of judgment and decision for the American citizen, it may well be questioned whether our educational system has adjusted to the changed situation and demands in such manner as properly to equip the citizen for the political discharge of this still unfamiliar role and responsibility.

With respect to international affairs, for instance, there would appear to be much to be learned about the historical and entirely respectable role of negotiation, conciliation, and honorable compromise in the settlement of disputes. Expectations from policies and actions are often unrealistic to the point of being fanciful, while patience is correspondingly short. There is much to be learned about how to bear up under sustained uncertainty and danger. There is surely to be found in knowledge and understanding some measure of safeguard against frustration and cynicism.

Thirdly, the striking evidence of fear, suspicion, intolerance, and confusion in the society, providing fertile soil for demagoguery, imperil our traditional freedom, and pose a stern challenge to the political scientist. These are phenomena which surely demand our most urgent concern, on behalf of the nation at large as well as our own professional and personal interest.

In the ultimate sense, it is clear, our future professional effectiveness must depend upon the preservation of that traditional freedom of inquiry which is fundamental to the American way of life and to the very concept of self-government.

If you will permit me to make one further reference to my personal experience, I would say that in our analyses, calculations, and conclusions concerning political phenomena we should never lose sight of the human, the personal factor. I am constantly impressed with the extent to which purely individual characteristics, such as personality, temperament, disposition, integrity, humility, candor, and patience, often exert substantial influence on important matters. This I have found to be the case in administrative affairs, in negotiations, and in mediation. I suspect that it must be taken into account in other areas as well.

These are simple things but they often cause political situations and efforts to be far more complex than they would otherwise be. They may not lend themselves readily to scientific approach but they have to be reckoned with most seriously.

With no apology, I should like to conclude on the quite unscientific note of faith.

Civilization is in the grip of a moral crisis. While this, in itself, is no new experience in human history, the clear and present danger derives from the fact that our scientific knowledge far exceeds our knowledge of man; to such an extent, indeed, that man now has at his disposition a power of self-destruction never before approached. That same scientific knowledge also affords to man a greater possibility for improvement than he has ever known.

It is my conviction that it is toward the fundamental unity of man that we must look for the only means whereby civilization and mankind may survive on this earth. Our knowledge of man must begin to catch up with our mastery of science. It is only in this direction that we may usefully seek to disperse the poisonous fears and suspicions which actuate that irrational behavior of man which in turn keeps him in mortal danger, each to the other. This is a matter fundamentally and decisively of simple faith in man and in his future. Despite all manifestations of evil—and these are in abundant supply—I find in that faith all that is needed to sustain me and my hopefulness in these times of grave peril.

THE RYUKYU ISLANDS: PAWN OF THE PACIFIC*

RALPH BRAIBANTI

Duke University

The first territory to be returned to Japan by the United States since the 1945 surrender is a group of the Ryukyu Islands.¹ This fact focuses attention on this strategically important archipelago extending from southernmost Japan to Formosa, although the Ryukyus have been at least on the periphery of Western attention for two centuries.² The chief compulsions for American popular interest in the islands have been the Battle of Okinawa of World War II and, more recently, the best selling novel and Broadway hit, The Teahouse of the August Moon.

This transitory and popular interest will undoubtedly give way to wider international attention in the next few years as the Japanese become more articulate in their criticism of the questionable grounds on which these islands were stripped from Japan Proper at the end of the war.³ Of further significance to political science is the fact that Okinawa, major island of the group, is (excepting only the Bonins) the last area of the world to remain under complete American military government control. The character of this nearly ten-year rule by the United States and its impact on a million people who have continually demanded "reversion" to Japan must inevitably be the subject of study of those interested in the confluence of cultures under conditions of sustained military government.

A century ago the Ryukyus were a point of contact between the United States and Japan even as now they are an important factor in the relations between these two nations. Naha, present capital of Okinawa, was a base of operations for Commodore Perry during the entire year of his negotiations with Ja-

* The author wishes to record his indebtedness to Professors Sterling T. Takeuchi of Kwansei Gakuin University, Toshio Ueda of the University of Tokyo, Hyman Kublin of Brooklyn College, Douglas G. Haring of Syracuse University, Kazuo Kawai and Iwao Ishino of the Ohio State University, James T. Watkins IV of Stanford University, and George H. Kerr of the University of California (Berkeley), all of whom read parts of this manuscript and made valuable suggestions. The author, of course, is solely responsible for the facts and point of view expressed here.

¹ Fulfilling a promise made by Secretary of State Dulles in Tokyo August 8, 1953, the United States returned the Amami Ōshima group to Japan December 24, 1953. New York Times, December 25, 1953, pp. 1, 4. Discussion favoring immediate return of the Amami Ōshima group can be found in Douglas G. Haring, "Amami-Gunto: Forgotten Islands," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 21, pp. 170-72 (Nov. 19, 1952); and the author's "The Outlook for the Ryukyus," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 22, pp. 73-79 (June, 1953).

² See appended Bibliographical Note.

³ That it is the intention of the Japanese government to press for the return of Okinawa was made clear by Prime Minister Yoshida in an address to the Diet on January 27, 1954. Full text in Nippon Times, January 8, 1954, p. 8. Extensive criticism of United States retention of the Ryukyus characterized the Diet debate on the Peace Treaty. See below, notes 58-63.

pan. No less than a fifth of Perry's distinguished 591-page *Narrative*⁴ was devoted to a description of the government and people of these islands. Even before reaching the Ryukyus, Perry proposed their occupation by the United States because of the "strictest rules of moral law" and "laws of stern necessity."⁵ The centenary of Perry's treaty with Japan finds a curiously fortuitous fulfillment of this zealous suggestion.

I

The rationale for the separation of the Ryukyu Islands from the rest of Japan is for the most part one of official silence and astute circumvention. The assumption seems to be that the islands fall within the last of three categories of territories described in the Declaration of the Cairo Conference made on December 31, 1943:

... Japan shall be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific which she seized or occupied since the beginning of the First World War in 1914, and ... all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese such as Manchuria, Formosa and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China. Japan will also be expelled from all other territories she has taken by violence and greed. (Italics supplied.)

The agreement signed at Yalta, February 11, 1945 dealing with the cession of territories to the Soviet Union made no mention of the Ryukyus. The Potsdam Declaration of July 26, 1945 reaffirmed the Cairo policy and specifically limited the sovereignty of Japan to the four main islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu, and Shikoku and such minor islands as the Allies "may determine." It is noteworthy that the Ryukyus are nowhere mentioned in the three foregoing policy statements or in the subsequent surrender terms to which Japan agreed on September 2, 1945. At the San Francisco Peace Conference in 1951, the status of the Ryukyu group was discussed by several delegates, including those from Japan, the United States, the Soviet Union, and India,⁶ but no reason for the separation of the islands from Japan Proper was advanced. The Peace Treaty states explicitly that the United States will exercise immediate control over the islands, implying that Japan retains "residual sovereignty,"⁷ but is silent as to why the islands were treated differently from the four main islands of Japan. Nor was the silence broken in the discussion before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, where only slight mention of the Ryukyus was made at the hearings on the Peace Treaty.⁸ General Bradley, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, suggested the transcendence of military considerations in indicating that it would be difficult to ask the Congress for funds for security installations on Okinawa "unless we had a rather clear-cut right to be there and stay there for some time."⁹ Mr. Dulles, stating that the trusteeship provision of Article 3 of the Peace Treaty was an option which need not be exercised by the United States, reasserted that considerations of national defense will determine the ultimate disposition of the islands. He refused, however, to hazard a guess as to what that disposition will be.¹⁰ The questioning of General Bradley by Senator Alexander Wiley and of Mr. Dulles by Senator H. Alexander Smith, as well as the comments of Herbert Coston, a former missionary to Japan, implied some concern as to the advisability of our retention of the islands, but this concern seemed to be based solely on an awareness of adverse public opinion in Japan and the islands.¹¹ The most noteworthy feature of the discussion before the Senate committee is that no member of the committee or witness once raised the question of the right of the United States to sever the islands from Japan. There was not even a presentation of the rationale by which the decision of severance was made. Even less attention was given the Ryukyus when the Peace Treaty was discussed on the floor of the House and Senate.¹² The islands were mentioned only once when reference was made to an exchange of notes between India and the United States in which the position of the Ryukyus was discussed.

⁴ Narrative of the Expedition of an American Squadron to the China Seas and Japan, comp. Francis L. Hawks, 2 vols. (New York, 1856), Vol. 1. This is a commercial edition of the official report of the Perry expedition and includes an analysis of Ryukyuan government. Volume 2 of the report consists of miscellaneous letters, notes, and reports submitted to Perry by staff officers. Nearly 50 of the 414 pages of the second volume are concerned with the Ryukyus in the form of scientific reports. This volume also includes Perry's remarks "upon the probable future relations with Japan and Lew Chew." See Narrative of the Expedition of an American Squadron to the China Seas and Japan, Senate Ex. Doc. No. 79, 33d Cong., 2d sess., Vol. 2, pp. 15-64, 185-88. A second account of the Perry expedition is that of the official interpreter, S. Wells Williams, "A Journal of the Perry Expedition to Japan 1853-1854," Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Vol. 27, Part II, pp. 1-260 (1910).

⁵ Writing from Madeira in a dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy December 14, 1852, Perry first proposed "occupation of the principal ports of those Islands [Ryukyus]." In a dispatch from Okinawa on January 25, 1854, Perry proposed putting "Great Lew Chew" [Okinawa] under "surveillance of the American Flag upon the ground of reclamation for insults and injuries committed upon American Citizens [by Japan]." (Perry's italics.) The Commodore's zeal was quietly restrained by return dispatches sent by Secretary of State Edward Everett and Navy Secretary J. C. Dobbin. Full text of the Madeira dispatch and Dobbin's answer as well as the complete Madeira correspondence are accessible in Treaties and Other International Acts of the United States of America, ed. Hunter Miller (Washington, 1942), Vol. 6, pp. 758-59, 588-90.

Most of the territories taken from Japan at the end of the war meet one or ⁶ Conference for the Conclusion and Signature of the Treaty of Peace with Japan, Record of Proceedings (Washington, 1951), pp. 78, 93-94, 271, 277.

⁷ Although not used in the treaty itself, the term "residual sovereignty" is mentioned in the discussion by both Secretary Dulles and Prime Minister Yoshida. Record of Proceedings, pp. 78, 277.

⁸ United States Senate, Japanese Peace Treaty and other Treaties Relating to Security in the Pacific, Hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, 82d Cong., 2d sess. (Washington, 1952).

⁹ Ibid., pp. 23-24.

¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 51-52.

¹¹ Ibid., pp. 100-16.

¹² The only reason for mention of the Ryukyus at all in the Senate and House debates was the occasion of Senator Knowland's brief discussion of the Indian note protesting disposition of the islands. Congressional Record, 82d Cong., 1st sess., Vol. 97, pp. 10663-64, 10742-43 (Aug. 27, 28, 1951). Indeed the debates in Congress do not deal comprehensively or expertly with the Japanese Peace Treaty as a whole. Ibid., pp. 58, 1694, 3811, 4477, 9429-31, 10524-26, 10594, 10602, 11128, 11946, 12726-28, A5470-71.

more of the requirements specified at Cairo, Yalta, or Potsdam. The Ryukyus, the Kuriles, and the Bonins alone defy categorization with the other areas. They were not seized after 1914, nor were they "stolen" from China or the Soviet Union; neither were they taken—except in the most far-fetched sense—by "violence." In the case of the Kuriles it would appear that outright cession to the Soviet Union was premised on a gross misreading of history or on tacit acceptance of the ancient but no longer honorable practice of dividing territorial booty among the victors.¹³ It is highly doubtful that the latter premise played any substantial part in the cession of the Ryukyus to the United States, not only because territorial acquisition ran counter to American affirmations and intentions, but also because the United States has clarified its policy so that ultimate reversion of the islands to Japan appears more certain than before. Although a shroud of mystery continues to envelop the original decision to truncate them from the homeland, there is now much less doubt as to the future status of the Ryukyus.

II

The history of Japanese influence in the Ryukyus indicates that the formal integration of the islands with Japan Proper was but the natural culmination of a process of cultural, economic, and political assimilation which had extended over three centuries.¹⁴ Whatever "violence" may have occurred in the process took the form of mild coercion quite acceptable in the international politics of the time. The first coercive nudge came as early as the seventeenth century, sometime before the more predatory thrusts which characterized the imperialism of Western nations.

The origins of the Ryukyu people¹⁵ cannot be traced with a high degree of scientific precision, but it is probable that they were parts of certain tribes which migrated from the Asiatic mainland to Japan Proper.¹⁶ An ancient legend first recorded in 1605 A.D. links the ruling family of the Ryukyus with royal blood in Japan. The legend is found in one of the earliest histories, Chūzan Sekan, compiled in 1650 by Chōshu Haneji,¹⁷ and is repeated in subsequent his-

¹³ A complete examination in Japanese of the question of ownership of the Kuriles is that of Toshio Ueda, Ryōdo Kizoku Kankei-shi: Bonins, Sakhalin, Kuriles, Ryukyu [History of Territories Adjacent to Japan Proper: Bonins, Sakhalin, Kuriles, Ryukyu], Heiwa Jōyaku no sōgō Kenkyū [Peace Treaty with Japan: A Symposium], 2 vols. (Tokyo, 1952), Vol. 1, pp. 121-96.

¹⁴ For an account of this assimilation, see the chapter by Professor Nagao Ariga in Japan by the Japanese, ed. Alfred Stead (London, 1904), pp. 151-72.

¹⁵ See appended Bibliographical Note.

¹⁶ There is evidence to support the assumption that the Amabe tribe which settled in the Ryukyus was closely related to the tribes which migrated to Japan. The contemporary Okinawan historian, Kanjun Higaonna (Higaonna is the Okinawan rendition; Higa-shionna is the name by which he is now known in Tokyo) summarizes this evidence in Outline of Okinawan History (Tokyo, 1950), p. 1.

¹⁷ Higaonna, Outline of Okinawan History, pp. 5-6. The ancient work Chūzan Sekan [Mirror of the Generations of Chung Shan, i.e. Ryukyu] is said to have been compiled in 1650 by Chōshu Haneji. A copy of this work was microfilmed by the Department of State and is reported in The Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 28, p. 819 (June 8, 1953).

stories. It is said that Tametomo, a distinguished warrior of the Minamoto clan and descendant of a former emperor, after defeat by the Taira clan in 1165, escaped to the Ryukyus. Here he married the sister of an official of Naha and became father of a gifted son who later became Shunten, first king of a new and able line of Ryukyuan rulers. The story, even though unsubstantiated by clear historical evidence, has nevertheless been regarded as history. Among people placing great value on lineage and unbroken imperial rule, this story has powerful emotional force in establishing cultural bonds between the Ryukyus and Japan Proper.¹⁸

Japanese interest in the Ryukyus has been complicated by a maze of relations between the islands and China. The Chinese had tried, without success, to subject the Ryukyus to their control as early as 610 A.D. and again in 1291.¹⁹ They were more successful after the Ryukyus were internally weakened by division into three separate kingdoms, and in 1373 an envoy was sent to pay tribute to China.²⁰ Chinese families began to arrive in 1391 and settled at Kume-mura at the outskirts of Naha. These immigrants were a bridge for the infusion of Chinese culture, although they seem to have become assimilated into the indigenous society after a few generations.²¹ For the next two centuries the Ryukyus existed as a nominally independent kingdom paying tribute to China. While this tributary relationship had some outward appearance of formal subordination to Chinese sovereignty, the actual relationship was quite different. The tributary concept in ancient Chinese international relations was unlike the modern concepts of imperialism, protectorates, or spheres of influence. Ancient ¹⁸ The Tametomo story can be neither substantiated nor disproved. Western as well as Japanese histories retell the story with no indication of the possibility of its legendary character. Among the standard Western historical works which do not distinguish it from more authenticated historical data are: James Murdoch, A History of Japan, 3 vols. (London, 1925), Vol. 1, pp. 311-12; Leavenworth, cited in appended Bibliographical Note, p. 107; Roy Hidemachi Akagi, Japan's Foreign Relations (Tokyo, 1936), p. 59. Commodore Perry repeats that "the race of kings reigning in Lew Chew is related to the imperial family of Japan. . . ." Narrative, Vol. 1, p. 253. Among those expressing doubt as to the authenticity of the story are: Higaonna, Outline of Okinawan History, p. 8, and Basil Hall Chamberlain, "The Luchu Islands and their inhabitants" Geographical Journal, Vol. 5, p. 316 (April, 1895). Professor Haring maintains that the Tametomo story is probably a deliberate fabrication by the Japanese to support their control over the islands. See Douglas G. Haring, The Island of Amami Ōshima in the Northern Ryūkyūs, pp. 74-75, (cited in appended Bibliographical Note).

¹⁹ Henri Cordier, Histoire Générale de la Chine, 4 vols. (Paris, 1920), Vol. 1, pp. 398-99; Vol. 2, p. 315.

²⁰ S. Wells Williams, "Political Intercourse between China and Lewchew," Journal of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, Vol. 3 (new series), p. 83 (1866).

²¹ In Western histories it is generally stated that "36 families" arrived from China. For example, Cordier, citing Leavenworth, states that ". . . l'empereur envoya 36 familles chinoises dans les fles." Histoire Générale de la Chine, Vol. 3, p. 8. Professor Higaonna, however, asserts that the term "36 family surnames" was metaphorical, and referred to the inhabitants of the lower reaches of the Min River in Fukien province. Moreover, he continues, they came over a period of years rather than as one group. Higaonna, Outline of Okinawan History, pp. 15-18.

China viewed the world as a unified brotherhood rather than as a group of warring, competing, independent states. When smaller kingdoms paid tribute to the Heavenly Kingdom, it was in acknowledgment of China's superior status as teacher rather than as legal sovereign.²² The Chinese exerted no control over Ryukyuan government and maintained only infrequent contact with it. The looseness of the tribute relationship is indicated by the manner in which the investiture requirements were met. The Ryukyus were required to inform China of each new accession to the Ryukyuan throne so that the formality of a Chinese investiture could follow. But Ryukyans often waited from three to twenty years before reporting to China a new accession, and sometimes the ruler died before China was informed he had ascended the throne.²³ As for the payment of tribute itself, this practice carried with it valuable trade privileges which were economically advantageous to the Ryukyus. Indeed, when China reduced the tribute payments to once every ten years, the anxious Ryukyans succeeded in getting the Chinese to increase them to once every three years.²⁴ From this and other substantial evidence there is general agreement that tribute-payment was really a conveniently agreeable guise for profitable trade with China.²⁵

During the time the Ryukyus paid tribute to China, they also did obeisance to Japan, regarding China as mother and Japan as father.²⁶ Although Japan's control of the islands varied—Okinawa being held chiefly by economic ties, Amami Oshima by rather heavy-handed political techniques—she exerted more effective sway over the islands than did China. The Satsuma clan of Kyushu sent an expedition to Okinawa in 1609 and took the Ryukyuan king and other officials to Japan. The reason for this expedition was presumably to force the resumption of tribute payments which had become too great for the Ryukyans to meet during Japan's invasion of Korea (1592-98). The more important reason, however, was to recover profitable trade relations with China which the Celestial Empire had stopped in the middle of the sixteenth century.²⁷ The Ryukyuan king, Sho-nei, was allowed to return to Okinawa after a two-year sojourn in Japan, but he returned only after signing a statement clearly indicating that the Ryukyus were to be a dependency of Satsuma.²⁸ China, impressed by the recent display of Japanese strength in Korea, sent no military assistance to ²² See especially an excellent statement on tribute-bearing by the American diplomatic representative in Japan in 1875 in Foreign Relations of the United States, 1875, Vol. 1, p. 313. For a general study on tribute-bearing during the Ch'ing dynasty (1644-1838), see J. K. Fairbank and S. Y. Teng, "On the Ch'ing Tributary System," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies, Vol. 6, pp. 135-246 (June, 1941).

²³ Kanjun Higaonna, History of Foreign Relations of Okinawa (Tokyo, 1951), p. 11.

²⁴ Ibid., p. 14.

²⁵ See documents as quoted in Yoshio S. Kuno, Japanese Expansion on the Asiatic Continent, 2 vols. (Berkeley, 1940), Vol. 2, pp. 288-93. For a general analysis of trade relations between Japan and China during this period, see Wang Yi-t'ung, Official Relations Between China and Japan 1368-1549 (Cambridge, 1953).

²⁶ Higaonna, History of Foreign Relations of Okinawa, p. 52.

²⁷ Translations of documents showing the desire for trade can be found in Kuno, op. cit., pp. 290-93.

²⁸ See Kuno., pp. 288-89, for text of this signed statement.

the Ryukyuan people and did not protest the Japanese conquest of the islands.

The formal suzerainty exercised by Japan after 1609 accentuated the comic-opera position of the Ryukyus paying allegiance to its two Asian neighbors, regarding them metaphorically, at least, as parents. The Satsuma fief, anxious to tap trade relations between China and the Ryukyus, encouraged the Ryukyuan to continue their tribute relationship with China and to deny any formal relationship with Japan. The extreme to which this duplicity went is illustrated by an extract from an official notice posted by the Japanese on Okinawa at the time of the arrival of a coronation ship from China:

In case ships arrive from Satsuma while the coronation ship is at anchor, the Okinawan authorities are required to hide from the Chinese the names of the Japanese era, names of the Japanese aboard the ships, Japanese books and any other things which it is undesirable to allow to come under the notice of the Chinese.

You should refrain from singing Japanese songs or using the Japanese language. In case the Chinese speak to you in Japanese you should pretend not to understand.

You should avoid Japanese-like customs.²⁹

It is probable that this behavior was followed in dealing with Perry's expedition when it first arrived in 1853. That this may be so is suggested by the uncertainty which members of the expedition felt with respect to the status of the Ryukyus vis-à-vis Japan and China. Dr. Bettelheim assured Perry upon his arrival that the Ryukyus were "to all ends and purposes, an integral part of Japan." He supported this conclusion with five observations: (1) a Japanese garrison was stationed at Naha; (2) trade was entirely with Japan; (3) Japanese were numerous on Okinawa, had intermarried, and seemed completely at home; (4) Japanese officials were always present when he (Bettelheim) conferred with Okinawans; and (5) language, customs, "virtues and vices" corresponded to those of Japan.³⁰ The official interpreter, S. Wells Williams, seemed to share this view at first. He wrote on June 8, 1853: "I look upon Lewchew as a dependency of Satsuma [sic]. . . That principality monopolizes the trade and manages the relations and policy of the island . . ." ³¹ Earlier Perry had described the islands as " . . . said to be dependencies of Japan . . . [They come] . . . within the jurisdiction of the Prince of Satsuma, the most powerful of the Princes of the Empire . . ." ³² In a dispatch on January 25, 1854, he again described them as a "dependency of the Empire [Japan]." ³³ Assuming as he did that the Japanese were dominant if not sovereign on the islands, it is easy to imagine his surprise when the Ryukyuan objected to being called an independent nation for fear of offending the emperor of China. Their objection arose from the preamble of a treaty draft in which Perry referred to the United States and Lew Chew as though they were two independent states. Describing this objection Williams

²⁹ As quoted in Higaonna, History of Foreign Relations of Okinawa, p. 33.

³⁰ Narrative, Vol. 1, pp. 254-55.

³¹ Williams, "Political Intercourse between China and Lewchew" (cited in note 20), p. 26.

³² As quoted in Treaties and Other International Acts, Vol. 6, p. 554.

³³ Ibid., p. 588.

states: "The admission of being tributary to China seemed to please them, rather than be a humiliation, and the real fealty they are in to Satsuma must be a sore subject and a grievous burden, or it would hardly be so mortifying to them to say aught respecting it."³⁴ Perry appeared to be less certain of the status of the Ryukyus than he was when he made his earlier statements. In his final expression of opinion on July 18, 1854, he stated:

Lew Chew, it appears, is in a measure an independent sovereignty, holding only slight allegiance either to Japan or China, but preferring rather its relationship to the latter Empire; that the Islands stretching from Formosa to Kiusiu are all under its sovereignty, and are in such intercourse with the parent Island Great Lew Chew, as the imperfect character of their means of navigation will allow.³⁵

Neither Perry nor Williams, astute observers though they were, could be expected to see through the remarkable "doublefaced allegiance" which Ryukyuan rulers had been compelled to perfect in their every attitude and action. Their initial observations supported by Bettelheim's experience of eight years' residence on Okinawa were more accurate than their later conclusions. Power, in fact, was exercised by a Resident appointed by the Satsuma daimyo in Japan, and the statement signed by King Sho-nei, pledging allegiance to Satsuma, was enforced.³⁶

The complete reorganization of government which marked the beginning of the Meiji Era in Japan profoundly affected the status of the Ryukyus. The Ryukyuan ruler, summoned as early as 1872, finally appeared in Tokyo in 1879 and his kingdom was given fief (han) status. In keeping with the treatment of other fief heads (daimyo), he was made a peer and given a residence in Tokyo and a sum of 30,000 Yen. The United States, mindful of the compact Perry had negotiated with the Ryukyuan rulers in 1854, inquired if Japan would assume responsibility for carrying out its provisions. An exchange of diplomatic notes indicated that Japan would assume the Ryukyuan rulers' obligations. In accepting this transfer of treaty obligations, the United States did not question the new status of the islands as an integral part of Japan Proper.³⁷ France and Holland, having concluded commercial treaties with the Ryukyus in October, 1855, and July, 1858, respectively,³⁸ similarly accepted Japan's assumption of these international obligations. Germany and Italy, shortly after March, 1873, asked Japan for the same commercial privileges in the Ryukyus which had been accorded other nations and the Japanese government assented.³⁹ Thus there was wide acceptance among Western powers of what was generally regarded as a consolidation and integration of a dependency of long standing. Indeed, this integration does not seem to differ much from the wholesale conversion of feudal ³⁴ Williams, p. 240.

³⁵ As quoted in Treaties and Other International Acts, Vol. 6, p. 753.

³⁶ Murdoch, A History of Japan (cited in note 18), Vol. 3, p. 534.

³⁷ Foreign Relations of the United States, 1873-4, Vol. 1, pp. 554-55, 564.

³⁸ Higaonna, History of Foreign Relations of Okinawa, pp. 46-47.

³⁹ For exchange of correspondence between Italy and Japan, see British and Foreign State Papers, 1873-4, Vol. 65, p. 740.

states within Japan Proper to the status of prefectures under a strong central government and a restored Meiji Emperor.

The problem of China's official recognition of the new status of the Ryukyus was more troublesome. Fortunately for Japan, a convenient incident provided an opportunity to raise the issue with China. In December, 1871 a junk had been stranded on the eastern coast of Formosa and 54 of the 66 Ryukyans composing the crew had been killed by Formosan savages. Count Taneomi Soyejima went to Peking and in 1873 discussed the matter with the Chinese, asking how China planned to redress the wrong done to the Ryukyans, who were Japanese subjects. China entered no objection when Sakimitsu Yanagiwara, representing Soyejima, referred to the Ryukyuan sailors as "Japanese subjects." This however, was unofficial, tacit recognition of their nationality rather than positive assurance.⁴⁰ Japan sent an expeditionary force to Formosa in May, 1874, and the result was an agreement signed at Peking on October 31, 1874, giving official documentary character to Japan's claims on the Ryukyus. The Tientsin Agreement acknowledged the Ryukyuan crew to be "Japanese subjects," committed China to recompense their families, and made no reference to the Ryukyus as dependencies of China.⁴¹ Japan moved quickly further to consolidate this diplomatic advantage, objecting now even to a routine tribute mission which the Ryukyus sent to Peking early in 1875.⁴² In May, 1875 Japan announced that it would assume complete control over the islands and integrate them into Japan Proper.⁴³ Finally, in 1879 King Sho-tai surrendered all rights to Japan and retired to Tokyo. Okinawa was made a prefecture in the same year and the long process of integration was complete.

⁴⁰ The discussion between Yanagiwara and the Chinese foreign ministers is reported verbatim by Ariga in Japan by the Japanese (cited in note 14), pp. 161-63. The Japanese view of this discussion is that China tacitly assented to calling the Ryukyans Japanese subjects. The Chinese view held that silence did not necessarily imply assent. See Shuhsi Hsü, China and Her Political Entity (New York, 1926), pp. 88-90 and Payson J. Treat, Diplomatic Relations between the United States and Japan, 2 vols. (Stanford, 1932), Vol. 1, pp. 497-98.

⁴¹ This was the Japanese interpretation of the Tientsin Agreement. Although signed at Peking, this agreement is usually referred to as the Tientsin Agreement, named after the place where it was negotiated. For English and Chinese texts of the agreement see China, The Maritime Customs, Treaties, Conventions, etc., between China and Foreign States, 2d ed., 2 vols. (Shanghai, 1917), Vol. 2, pp. 585-86. This treaty series refers to the 1874 agreement as the Peking (rather than Tientsin) agreement. Japanese text accessible in Nihon Gaikō Bunsho [Japanese Diplomatic Documents] (Tokyo), Vol. 7, p. 317. For detailed historical analysis of the Japanese position see Toshio Ueda, "Ryukyu no Kizoku o Meguru Nisshin Kōshō [Sino-Japanese Dispute over Sovereignty of the Ryukyu Islands]," Tōyō Bunka Kenkyū Shō Kiyō [Journal of the Institute for Oriental Culture], University of Tokyo, No. 2, pp. 151-201 (Sept., 1951). The Chinese interpretation of the agreement makes no such concession of Japanese sovereignty. Hsü, op. cit., pp. 92-101; and Treat, op. cit., Vol. 1, pp. 568-69.

⁴² An interesting exchange of Chinese and Japanese views on the presence of a Ryukyuan tribute mission in Peking can be found in Foreign Relations of the United States, 1875-6, Vol. 1, pp. 314-16.

⁴³ Ibid., p. 313.

The complete annexation of the islands by Japan was not accomplished, however, without considerable diplomatic resistance by both China and the Ryukyuan monarch. An uncle of the deposed Ryukyuan king went to Peking and appealed for help.⁴⁴ Ryukyuan envoys went to Tokyo and asked the ministers of the United States, France, and Holland to intervene.⁴⁵ John A. Bingham, American minister to Japan, was disposed to take the Ryukyuan and Chinese side against the Japanese, but was cautioned by the State Department to regard this as a matter between China and Japan alone.⁴⁶ As tension between these two nations increased, the services of ex-President Grant, who was then in Japan, were sought. Grant had studied the matter earlier and after hearing both sides sent identical letters to Japan and China in which he made no proposals for direct solution of the Ryukyuan question but suggested that commissioners be appointed by both governments to resolve the question.⁴⁷ A plan for partitioning the islands, reputedly drawn up by Bingham, was rejected by China and the Ryukyuan envoys and in January, 1881 Tamaka Shishido, the Japanese member of the negotiating conference, left Peking, thus closing the efforts to prevent annexation.

The foregoing summary of diplomatic relations between the Ryukyus and Japan is hardly suggestive of territorial aggrandizement of the same character as Japanese actions in Korea and Manchuria. That the islands were taken after 1914 is, of course, manifestly untrue. That Japan used force in 1609, coerced the integration of the islands, and finally annexed them in 1879 is clear. In view of the character of the Chinese tribute relationship, the many Ryukyuan ties with Japan, and China's acknowledgement of the Tientsin Agreement of 1874, it cannot be said that they were taken from China.⁴⁸ That the United States would have based its action on the "violence and greed" concept of the Cairo Declaration is hardly credible in view of our own overseas expansion following the Spanish-American War. Such a rationale would be simply a disguise for the spoils of victory. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that seizure of the Ryukyus was based either on a misreading of history (as in the case of the Kuriles) or on a singularly prophetic wisdom, which, calculating the Soviet threat, provided us with a Pacific bastion of protection.

⁴⁴ A translation of the Ryukyuan appeal to China can be found in Hsü, op. cit., pp. 95-97.

⁴⁵ Foreign Relations of the United States, 1879, pp. 606-8, 637-38.

⁴⁶ Treat, op. cit., Vol. 2, p. 73.

⁴⁷ See Treat, Vol. 2, pp. 101-3.

⁴⁸ This statement is made from the point of view of political and juridical concepts of Western international relations. Considering traditional Chinese diplomacy, however, the Japanese absorption of the islands was improper. Although China was too late in awakening to the concepts and realities of the Western power system, Japan learned and practiced Western diplomacy quickly. Professor Kublin asserts that the Ryukyuan problem was a case study in which ancient Chinese diplomacy and the new Western brand practiced by Japan came to grips and led to the collapse of the Chinese tributary system. See Hyman Kublin, "The Attitude of China during the Liu-ch'iu Controversy, 1871-1881," Pacific Historical Review, Vol. 18, pp. 213-31 (May, 1949).

III

While the decision to separate the Ryukyus from the rest of Japan may have been either error or prophesy, it cannot now be rectified or modified by a belated reversal. As the aspirations of the Soviet Union in the Pacific become more evident, restoration of the Ryukyus to Japan in the immediate future appears increasingly unwise. The problem of how best to resolve the dilemma of the status of the Ryukyus has been a formidable one. American administration of the islands was unguided by top-level policy regarding their ultimate disposition until the San Francisco Peace Conference discussions revealed that the Ryukyus were to be treated differently from Japan Proper. The terms of the Peace Treaty pointed to the possibility of trust status under the United Nations with the United States as the administering power.⁴⁹ This proposal, widely discussed in Japan particularly, seems to have been abandoned as early as April, 1953, for at that time the United States had not yet submitted a proposal for trusteeship to the United Nations.⁵⁰ In fact, no such proposal had been made as late as February, 1954.⁵¹ The Dulles statement announcing the restitution of Amami Ōshima to Japan and discussing the future of the remaining islands makes no mention of trusteeship.⁵² This silence is in marked contrast to the considerable discussion of trusteeship at the San Francisco Peace Conference two years earlier.

The Dulles statement of 1953 asserts a disposition on the part of the United States to continue "to exercise its present powers and rights in the remaining Ryukyu Islands . . . so long as conditions of threat and tension exist in the Far East."⁵³ This is not a positive reaffirmation of the notion that Japan has "residual sovereignty" over the islands but it does not repudiate that assumption. The Dulles statement further asserts that the United States will "remain as custodian of these islands for the foreseeable future." Custodianship connotes considerably less than ownership and implies that sovereignty rests with other than the custodial power. This silence on the question of trusteeship and the description of our authority as being custodial and temporary constitute a substantial clarification of our policy in the Ryukyus. In the writer's opinion, this is the best policy which can be developed under existing circumstances in Asia and throughout the world.⁵⁴

The principal alternative policy which has captured the attention of responsible Far Eastern analysts is that which would provide for immediate return

⁴⁹ Treaty of Peace with Japan, Chapter II, Article 3.

⁵⁰ Correspondence between the writer and the United Nations Trusteeship Division, April 13, 1953, and between the writer and the United States Mission to the United Nations, April 24, 1953.

⁵¹ Correspondence between the writer and the United Nations Trusteeship Division, February 8, 1954, and between the writer and the United States Mission to the United Nations, February 9, 1954.

⁵² New York Times, December 25, 1953, p. 4.

⁵³ Ibid., par. 3 of Dulles statement.

⁵⁴ For further elaboration see the author's article cited in note 1.

of the entire Ryukyu chain of Japan.⁵⁵ A condition of the return would be provision for the maintenance of American military, naval, and air bases on Okinawa. Such a policy would resolve two factors in the Ryukyuan situation which have been troublesome. The first of these is the very serious concern of the United States in maintaining friendly relations with a newly sovereign and sensitive Japan. Since Japan has made abundantly clear her dissatisfaction with the disposition of the Ryukyus, Bonins, and Kuriles,⁵⁶ it seems appropriate to redress whatever grievances lie within our capacity for action. The second factor of tension is the growing strength of the "reversionist" movement among Ryukyuans, concomitant open resentment of American control, and manipulation of this situation by Communist elements both at home and abroad.

The Dulles policy, however, resolves these problems almost as well as would immediate restitution of all the islands to Japan. The return of Amami Ōshima gives evidence to Japan of American good faith and the abandonment of the trusteeship proposal suggests a much more temporary form of control by the United States. The dangers of an eruptive reversionist movement are met in large measure by the return of Amami Ōshima, for it was on this island that reversionist sentiment was strongest and most troublesome. Amamians have always identified themselves more closely with Japan than with the other islands of the Ryukyus.⁵⁷ Public opinion polls revealed that the desire to revert to Japan was much more intense among Amamians than among the inhabitants of Okinawa, Miyako, and Yaeyama. It was in Amami that the reversionist sentiment was whipped up by the People's party (allegedly Communist) and was so successfully manipulated that Amami elected one of the two People's party members to the Ryukyuan legislature on Okinawa. With the return of Amami to Japan, the reversionist movement has lost some of its propulsive force. The United States has now only to cope with the less intense and less organized reversionist sentiment on Okinawa and the other island groups.

If the alternative policy of returning immediately the entire Ryukyu chain to Japan were followed, it would raise problems more serious than those it would resolve. To maintain bases on Okinawa by agreement with a sovereign Japan would be to subject the security of our principal Pacific base to the uncertainties of our relations with Japan. Although official data relating to our military strength on Okinawa are not accessible, it is evident to careful observers that Okinawa has become our most important strategic base in the Pacific. Okinawa-based bombers played an important role in the Korean conflict with their daily "cocktail hour" sorties. It is possible that headquarters of the Far East Command located in Tokyo since the Japanese surrender may be moved to Okinawa. Indeed such a move might be a welcome solution to the embarrassing problem raised by Japan's growing resentment of the presence of American troops in the main islands. Certainly the extensive construction of concrete quarters, hospitals, and other installations on the southern third of Okinawa indicates a military base of first importance. At the moment, Okinawa is the locus of Western military, naval, and air might in the Pacific; if the Far East Command were moved there, it would become the strategic brain center as well. If the geography of Okinawa were like that of Japan Proper, joint control of this important base might be feasible. In reality however, the entire southern third of Okinawa is a vast network of American military installations intertwined with Okinawan economy and vitally affecting every aspect of Okinawa's life. To cut through this maze of relationships and isolate those elements which are essentially military and those which are civilian would be exceedingly difficult. If this network of administrative-civil-military relations were administered by Japanese, Okinawans, and Americans, the difficulties of language, differing cultural values, and clashing political and economic objectives would tend to make for a disarticulation which might spell the end of orderly, responsible government. Such a condition would constitute a grave threat to the strategic military power, the maintenance of which is really our sole purpose in retaining the Ryukyus. The situation would be even more precarious if the Japanese administrators and Ryukyans were to combine in an anti-American obstructionism—an obstructionism which might be merely an involuntary reaction to the tensions of nearly a decade of military occupation by a Western power, or might be calculated. The motivations for such obstructionism would depend on many political factors, but the net result would be the same.

⁵⁵ This point of view is cogently developed by Joseph W. Ballantine, "The Future of the Ryukyus," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 33, pp. 663-74 (July, 1953).

⁵⁶ See above, note 13, and below, notes 58-63.

⁵⁷ An explanation of this phenomenon is given in Douglas G. Haring, "Amami-Gunto: Forgotten Islands," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 21, pp. 170-72 (Nov. 19, 1952).

A final advantage of the Dulles policy should not be overlooked. The policy now provides a fair degree of predictability as to the future status of the islands. In the final analysis, the principal factor behind reversionist sentiment and anti-Americanism has been the uneasiness arising from uncertainty. The Ryukyus were, after all, severed from Japan, the fountainhead of their culture. They seemed to be permanently suspended in a cultureless vacuum, and the deep discontent arising from the sense of this void projected itself in the form of anti-American and reversionist sentiment. The Dulles policy, providing as much certainty to the Ryukyuan future as it is within our power to provide, is likely to give an assurance as to their national destiny that will give some satisfaction and encouragement to Ryukyans. Certainly it will provide a central objective toward which American rehabilitation efforts can be directed.

Although Dulles' refinement of policy may clear the air in Japan and the Ryukyus, more energetic measures are needed to convince the peoples of both areas of our intentions. The anxieties of the Japanese with respect to our objectives in the Ryukyus is indicated by the extended discussion in 1951 of Article 3 of the Peace Treaty by the special committees appointed by both the Japanese House of Representatives and the House of Councillors to study the treaty provisions. Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida, questioned carefully by Hitoshi Ashida, formerly Prime Minister, asserted that he had no substantial evidence to prove that the Ryukyus would eventually be restored to Japan, but that he was convinced that this was the American intention.⁵⁸ Dr. Ashida indicated that the Ryukyus were not important as military bases, since the United States already had important bases in Japan and the Philippines, and that the real reason for their retention by the United States might be to keep watch over Japan.⁵⁹ A similar view was expressed by Representative Hanji Ogawa.⁶⁰ Apprehension concerning our purpose in keeping the islands was expressed also in a meeting of the Special Committee on the Peace Treaty of the House of Councillors by Councillor Goro Hani,⁶¹ and at a plenary session of the House of Councillors by Councillor Eki Soné.⁶²

In evaluating the comments made by Japanese members of the Diet, some discount must be made for a politically motivated desire to embarrass the Yoshida government. Yet it is not unreasonable to assume that sincere misunderstanding and apprehension existed at the time of the treaty ratification. The apparent elimination of the notion of trusteeship and the return of the Amami group may clarify our position; to bring our position into sharper focus, however, is exceedingly difficult. The Japanese interpretation that our reluctance to return Okinawa and retain military bases by administrative agreement is an indication of our lack of confidence and trust in Japan may, indeed, be valid. If we could be certain that our relations with Japan would always be without serious friction, all the Ryukyus could be returned immediately. But this is an assumption we cannot safely make. Yet in the face of a peace treaty predicated on mutual trust, we cannot officially articulate distrust. Certainly if Japan were to shift its allegiance to the Soviet sphere, the implications of "residual sovereignty" would be changed, and should open conflict break out within that changed pattern, Okinawa might indeed be used as a bastion against a hostile Japan. The threat of such developments dictates the need for greatest caution in formulating our policy toward the Ryukyus. Japanese sovereignty over the islands by implication is residual, but it seems also to be contingent upon continued Japanese friendship with the United States. It is doubtful if a wiser policy could be formulated at the moment, but perhaps more effective explanation of this policy would reduce Japanese fears.

⁵⁸ Dai 12-kai Kokkai Shūgin Heiwa Jōyaku oyobi Nichi-bei Anzen Hoshō Jōyaku Tokubetsu In Kaigi-roku [Twelfth National Diet, House of Representatives, Special Committee on the Peace Treaty and the Japanese-American Security Treaty], Record of Proceedings, No. 3, October 18, 1951, p. 14.

⁵⁹ Idem.

⁶⁰ Dai 12-kai Kokkai Shūgin Heiwa Jōyaku oyobi Nichi-bei Anzen Hoshō Jōyaku Tokubetsu In Kaigi-roku [Twelfth National Diet, House of Representatives Special Committee on the Peace Treaty with the Japanese-American Security Treaty], Record of Proceedings, No. 9, October 25, 1951, p. 6.

⁶¹ Dai 12-kai Kokkai Sangiin Heiwa Jōyaku oyobi Nichi-bei Anzen Hoshō Jōyaku Tokubetsu In Kaigi-roku, [Twelfth National Diet, House of Councillors, Special Committee on the Peace Treaty and the Japanese-American Security Treaty], Record of Proceedings, No. 12, November 7, 1951, p. 17.

⁶² Dai 12-kai Kokkai Sangiin Kaigi-roku [Twelfth National Diet, House of Councillors], Record of Proceedings, No. 20, November 18, 1951, p. 247.

The Dulles statement promised also that the United States would "do all in its power to improve the welfare and well-being of the inhabitants of the Ryukyus." In concrete terms this means (1) that the ground should be prepared for future restitution of the islands to Japan and (2) that our own administration of the islands should be perfected so that discontent among Ryukyuans remains minimal. It would seem appropriate, therefore, to direct attention to some of the problems which face the United States Civil Administration of the Ryukyu Islands.

IV

A policy vacuum in which the American occupation of the Ryukyus was carried on during the formative period from 1945 to 1953 resulted in the ambivalence of an administration without purpose. The failure to establish clear objectives was aggravated by the relative lack of attention given military government of the Ryukyus by the Far Eastern Command in Tokyo. From the invasion until July 1, 1946 the United States Navy governed the islands. Naval personnel in charge during this period were trained specifically for military government work. After July 1, 1946 the area was placed under Army control and the Far Eastern Commander was charged with responsibility for administration of the islands.⁶³ The importance of this obligation was eclipsed by the spectacular quality of the occupation of Japan Proper and, after 1950, by the pressing demands of the Korean conflict. After July 1, 1946 the Ryukyus seemed to be regarded as a kind of "Siberian outpost" of Japan. The net results were a generally lower competence of the people assigned there and the absence of the rigid command controls which distinguished the occupation of Japan.⁶⁴

Under these circumstances it is surprising that the occupation progressed as well as it did. For the first five years the herculean task of physical rehabilitation of the islands commanded the attention and energies of American administration; hence the absence of long-range policy was not acutely felt. In public health and welfare, for example, the safety of our own troops dictated a policy of epidemic control and public health measures which moved on their own momentum without regard for ultimate objectives. Similarly in education the demands of physical rehabilitation overshadowed speculation as to the ultimate status of Ryukyuan schools. In developing a pattern for government, it was impossible to satisfy future needs since the future was unknown. Ryukyuan society itself was in trauma and this did not encourage abstractions as to the ultimate destiny of the islands. As the problems of physical rehabilitation were resolved, both Ryukyuan and American attention were directed to the need for adjusting further developments to a determination of the islands' status. The government which was developed in the Ryukyus under American guidance followed the general outlines of occupation policy in Japan. There were some important differences, however, which will have a bearing on the problem of restoring the islands to Japan. The opportunity for experimentation and indulgence in fads was greater in the Ryukyus than in Japan, since there was no well-established, sophisticated Ryukyuan government to temper the enthusiasm for reform with the natural restraints of tradition, culture, and experience.

⁶³ The Far Eastern Commander in Tokyo also bears the title Military Governor of the Ryukyu Islands. The senior military commander present on the islands is designated as Deputy Military Governor and acts in the name of the Military Governor. The actual administration of the islands is delegated to a subordinate organization called United States Civil Administration of the Ryukyu Islands (USCAR). In this article the general term "military government" is used to designate the American occupation administration carried on by the United States Army through the Military Governor, Deputy Military Governor, and USCAR. The term "military government" is used despite awareness that there was once a distinction between this term and "civil affairs." In contemporary usage these terms have lost precision, as is indicated by the use of both "military governor" and "civil affairs" in official titles for occupation officials in the Ryukyus.

⁶⁴ The early period of American military government of the Ryukyus has been almost untouched by extended analysis. For two brief but suggestive studies see Daniel D. Karasik, "Okinawa: A Problem in Administration and Reconstruction," Far Eastern Quarterly Vol. 7, pp. 254-68 (May, 1948) and Clellan S. Ford, "Occupation Experiences on Okinawa," The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 267, pp. 175-83 (Jan., 1950).

A more important difference lies in the fact that the Ryukyuan occupation looked to changes in Japan's national rather than prefectural government. This departed sharply from the past, for Okinawa had been merely one of 47 prefectures subordinate to a highly centralized unitary government whose control center was in Tokyo. In the absence of any indication that the Ryukyus were ever again to have prefectural status in Japan, this overdevelopment of Ryukyuan government was inevitable. Indeed, had the Ryukyus become a trust territory (and before 1953 this seemed to be the most likely possibility), this development of the government would have been highly desirable, since it would have given the Ryukyus the quality of independence and experience suitable for a trust territory under United States administration.

Another factor which led to the establishment of a government of large dimensions was the incorporation of Amami-Ōshima into the all-Ryukyuan government. Since the restitution of Amami could not be foreseen, this could hardly be avoided. Yet it was a wedlock fraught with difficulties. It flew in the face of tradition, for Amami had no ties with Okinawa and had been a part of Kagoshima prefecture for some time. Amamians distrusted Okinawans and resented being placed under their domination. The reversion of Amami required an adjustment in Ryukyuan government. Even so, in the face of reversion of the remaining islands to Japan, the Ryukyuan government still seems somewhat out of scale. Yet it is unreasonable to expect American administration to have developed a prefectural type of government, for this would have required a network of relations with the Japanese government which would be possible only if the islands were part of Japan.

This dimensional expansion of Ryukyuan government is likely to make difficult the reabsorption of the islands by Japan. The experience gained by Ryukyuan government and its close and long contact with American officials have developed a sense of responsibility and a competence surpassing anything the Ryukyuans knew under pre-occupation Japanese rule. It will probably be difficult for Ryukyuan leaders to submit again to the subordinate position of a kind of country-cousin prefecture under Japanese domination. Unless the Japanese government understands that the Ryukyus have developed in governmental competence to a position equalling at least a middle-rank prefecture in Japan Proper, the reintegration of the Ryukyus is likely to be marked by unnecessary tensions. There is very little that American administration of the islands can do to remedy this aspect of the predicament, and it is likely that some of our efforts will aggravate the situation. We must improve the character of Ryukyuan government simply to reduce the expense of the occupation; yet, paradoxically, as the government improves, the hiatus between the Ryukyuan government and Japan is widened.

There is much that can be done otherwise to prepare for the return of the islands to Japan. The pattern of government should be modified so that it resembles prefectural government in Japan as closely as possible. This would mean changing the parliamentary type of government which has been developed (and which resembles the National government of Japan) to a presidential type as in Japanese prefectures. Some changes cannot be made until Japan actually assumes responsibility for the islands. The tax structure, for example, would have to continue as a national tax structure until Japan assumed responsibility for the extensive pattern of grants-in-aid which gives fiscal sustenance to Japanese national-local relations. Similarly, the chief executive of the Ryukyus would not be able to exercise the national powers which are part of the responsibility of Japanese prefectural governors.⁶⁵ On the other hand, such a feature as the separate school tax found in the Ryukyus, but not in Japan, could probably be modified to correspond to the Japanese system without excessive stress. Adjustment of Ryukyuan government to the Japanese prefectural pattern would be complicated further by the changes which will probably occur in Japanese government during the next few years. For example, there are strong indications that the police system of Japan will again become nationalized, and that the decentralized government evolved under the occupation is reverting to prewar centralization. These changes in Japan may be viewed by many as dangerous retrogressive steps, and there may be a tendency among officials in American military government in the Ryukyus to preserve the "purer type" of government uncontaminated by post-treaty retrogressions in Japan. Such an attitude would aggravate the differences between Ryukyuan and Japanese government and would impede a smooth and uneventful restitution.

Another obstacle to redesigning the contours of Ryukyuan government is the natural tendency of American occupation officials to exaggerate in their own minds the importance of the islands. If this exaggeration found its expression exclusively in quiet devotion to the task, it could not be criticized. Its tendency, however, is to bloat the organization of government and to distort the perspective in which the whole task should be viewed. Ryukyuan society is essentially village society, as an occasional excursion within a mile of Naha should convince the most ambitious administrator. Of the 86 entities of government, 69 were classified as villages in 1952.⁶⁶ This fact alone is a rather telling indication that the islands are more comparable to a prefecture than to a major nation. Failure to study societal patterns of villages even more primitive than Japanese villages leads to American actions and patterns of control based on erroneous sociological assumptions and delusions of metropolitan grandeur. Distortion of the proportions of native government and of the character of native society produces a needlessly complex and overgrown Ryukyuan government and a correspondingly proliferate military government. Since salaries, civil service rank, and prestige of both Americans and Ryukyuans are involved in this expansive administration, uncommon courage and candor will be required if the dimensions of either organization are to be reduced.

⁶⁵ See the author's "Executive Power in Japanese Prefectural Government," The Far Eastern Quarterly, Vol. 9, pp. 231-45 (May, 1950).

One of the most effective ways of reorienting Ryukyuan affairs to Japan would be to clarify the citizenship of Ryukyuans and lift the restrictions on travel between the two areas. The present "statelessness" of Ryukyuans is bewildering and degrading. Citizens of neither Japan nor the United States, nor even of a Ryukyuan nation, Ryukyuans are subject to stringent travel restrictions. Japanese contractors and laborers working on Okinawa have been regarded as friendly nationals since the ratification of the Japanese Peace Treaty and have enjoyed various benefits, including higher wages and American Army post exchange privileges. It is disquieting to Ryukyuans to see the Japanese treated in this way while Ryukyuans are still regarded as enemy nationals. In the present circumstances it is unlikely that Japanese citizenship can be restored to Ryukyuans, but some interim status should be devised which will place them on exactly the same level with Japanese. This interim status should carry with it the right of unrestricted travel (except for permanent migration) to Japan and other nations. Improvement in the status of Ryukyuans would not only promote cultural relations with Japan but would also remove a source of serious dissatisfaction with American rule.

The exchange-of-persons program which has sponsored visits of Ryukyuans to the United States should be focused on Japan. The character of the program might also be improved. Formerly many students, teachers, government officials, and other leaders were sent to the United States, and while the results may have been statistically impressive, the actual effects on Ryukyuan conditions are somewhat doubtful.⁶⁷ The emphasis on numbers of people sent rather than quality of those selected seems to have made the program less successful than spectacular. It would be more effective to send a few able Ryukyuan to Japanese schools or universities for four or five years than to send many mediocre people for shorter periods. If this shift from quantitative mediocrity to the cultivation of an elite leadership is to be made, American administrators in the Ryukyus, as elsewhere, will have to disentangle themselves from the quantitative egalitarian bias which infects much of American public education.

⁶⁶ The dimensions of Ryukyuan government can be even more clearly seen when this fact is compared to the organization of prefectures in Japan. The smallest (in terms of administrative divisions) prefecture in Japan in 1945 was Tokushima, which had one city, 42 towns, and 91 villages. Administrative Subdivisions of Japan (Department of State, 1946), p. 473.

⁶⁷ The Office of the Chief of Civil Affairs and Military Government, Department of the Army, has been publishing in January and July the Semi-Annual Report of Stateside Activities Supporting the Reorientation Program in Japan and the Ryukyu Islands. The last report was changed to an Annual Report and appeared for the period ending July, 1951. These reports indicate the extent of the exchange-of-persons program for the Ryukyus.

The extensive use of Japanese experts in public administration would also facilitate the development of Ryukyuan government in a Japanese mold. This kind of help should be sought particularly in those activities which have departed excessively from the Japanese norm (as in the organization of the executive branch of the Ryukyuan government) and in other activities which urgently need strengthening (such as tax administration).

No single plan or technique thus far suggested is the real key to the problem of rendering Ryukyuan and Japanese government compatible. The crucial factor is wholehearted acceptance of a clearly-defined policy which asserts the inevitability of restoration of the islands to Japan.

V

One of the principal criticisms of American administration of the Ryukyus is that it continues to be of a military character. This allegation assumes that military organization, being authoritarian, cannot stimulate the growth of constitutional democratic forms. Yet since democratization was never more than a secondary objective in the Ryukyus, this theoretical problem of "democratization by force"⁶⁸ is not the point which exercises critics of the occupation. The military character of our control of the Ryukyus is attacked chiefly on the ground that civil Ryukyuan problems are subordinate to American military considerations. This trampling on Ryukyuan rights is injurious to Ryukyuan pride and dignity and, to the Ryukyuan at least, seems to be proof of the essentially selfish interest of the American occupation. Responsible Ryukyuan officials regard this as one of the chief sources of dissatisfaction with American control. The replacement of a uniformed general by a civilian commissioner in mufti, the argument continues, would rectify this deficiency in American administration.

To lay the problem of defective administration at the door of military brass is naively to oversimplify; yet this very quality of simplicity makes it an inviting panacea. Some Ryukyuan have cited as a model the eminently successful American administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific under the civilian leadership of the late ex-Senator Elbert D. Thomas.⁶⁹ Others have noted that ⁶⁸ Elsewhere an effort was made to analyze the "paradox of democratization by force." In both Japan and the Ryukyus the character of occupation administration was considerably less military and much more civilian than is generally supposed. See the author's "The Role of Administration in the Occupation of Japan," The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 267, pp. 154-63 (Jan., 1950).

⁶⁹ Conversations between the author and Ryukyuan government officials at Naha, Okinawa, in June, 1952.

even Japan used civilian administration in the control of annexed Korea after 1919.⁷⁰ Neither comparison is fair. The administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific, a responsibility of the Department of the Interior since its transfer from Navy control in 1951, is simpler than that of the Ryukyus. It embraces none of the military problems which derive from the strategic objectives of our control of Okinawa as our primary Pacific base.⁷¹ Japan's use of a civilian governor-general after the 1919 reforms in Korean administration is deceptive, for the Japanese government itself was dominated by the military and the supremacy of the civilian governor-general over military forces in Korea was more illusory than real.

Ryukyuans are not alone in advocating civilian control of their islands; responsible American officials in military government and in the Department of State, as well as private citizens, share this point of view.⁷² Evoking latent American distrust of uniformed military rule, such criticism finds ready acceptance. Yet it is a criticism highly overgeneralized. Substitution of civilian for military rule is not necessarily the answer to the problem of improving our administration; indeed the advisability of civilian rule is open to serious question. The four factors discussed below bear on this criticism and deserve further exploration.

1. However sympathetic one may be to Ryukyuan problems, a simple, unpopular truth must be faced: our primary mission in the islands is strategic. Accordingly, military necessity must often trample over Ryukyuan interests. This happened in the appropriation of land for military and air bases, in the construction of highways, and in other activities. Indeed, our very presence in the islands is in violation of the wishes of the Ryukyuans. So long as our mission remains primarily that of Pacific security, the character of our administration must reflect the ascendancy of military considerations. It is possible that civilian control might be too sympathetic to native interests and would thereby jeopardize the internal military strength of the islands. To those deeply concerned with problems of national self-determination, and with personal rights and dignity, this will be a difficult fact to face. Yet it owes its derivation neither to a greedy military establishment nor to a national policy of aggrandizement, but rather to the grim dilemma posed by cold war.

The case for clear-cut military domination of the islands has greater cogency when it is linked to our total Pacific defense strategy. The importance of the Ryukyus as a military base increases with each successive crisis in Indochina, Quemoy, and elsewhere in Asia. It is important, therefore, that the command of the Ryukyus be lodged in military hands integrated closely with and subordinate to the Far East Command in Tokyo. To place the Ryukyus under civilian control at this juncture might loosen Pacific military organization by introducing elements of conflicting and overlapping responsibilities and muddled channels of command. In any event, whatever proposals are made to civilianize our control of the islands should be made in the context of our security mission there and of our total defense strategy for the Pacific.

⁷⁰ Idem.

⁷¹ Conversations between the author and the late Elbert D. Thomas, High Commissioner of the Trust Territory of the Pacific, Honolulu, T. H., September, 1952.

⁷² See, for example, a statement by a missionary on Okinawa: "It is the general opinion that the fault lies in the fact that our occupation is still of a military character. Let the army run its bases, but let a civilian administration be appointed to deal with the people." Otis W. Bell, "Play Fair with Okinawans!", The Christian Century, Vol. 71, pp. 76-77 (Jan. 20, 1954).

2. The assumption that an organization commanded by men in uniform is necessarily unsympathetic to native, civil problems must be suspect. There has been real and significant concern for Ryukyuan problems within the organization (United States Administration of the Ryukyu Islands—USCAR) specifically charged with responsibility for Ryukyuan affairs. This organization, though commanded by a military official, is staffed at such key policy posts as those in economics, education, finance, government, and public services by civilian officials. They tend, quite naturally, to be partisans (if not crusaders) for their clientele—the Ryukyuans. To the extent that this attitude is shared by the military officers of the organization, it becomes generalized as an institutional point of view. Despite frequent changes in commanding generals, USCAR had identified itself quite clearly with Ryukyuan interests. In this respect it has been all too frequently at loggerheads with its superior headquarters, the Ryukyus Command (RYCOM), whose commanding general is responsible for both military troop affairs and civilian Ryukyuan affairs. Most Ryukyuan and many American critics of American administration of the islands are unaware that USCAR's concern for Ryukyuan affairs has often led to considerable stress and bitterness between USCAR and RYCOM. The USCAR attitude shows the possibility of a military organization becoming infused with an essentially civilian point of view—a phenomenon earlier noticed in the conduct of the occupation of Japan.⁷³ The crucial factor is not whether American organization is essentially military or civilian, but rather whether the organization whose primary responsibility is civilian affairs is in a relationship equal or superior to the organization administering military affairs. While this juxtaposition of military and civilian considerations is not recommended by the present writer, it should be cited as a means of accomplishing ascendancy of civilian interests within a military occupation organization. Critics of our military control of the Ryukyus should note that the subordination of native interests is due less to the military character of our organization than to the status of USCAR as the echelon administering Ryukyuan affairs.

3. A weighing of the alternatives to military control may dampen the ardor of those who would propose drastic shift of responsibility to civilian authorities. Assume that a civil commissioner were appointed and military forces on Okinawa were subordinate to him. To what unit of government would the civil commissioner be responsible? If he were responsible to the Department of the Army, would he be subordinate to the Far East Command in Tokyo or would he answer directly to either the Chief of Staff or Secretary of the Army in Washington? Certainly he could not be within the Department of the Army yet independent of the Far East Command without raising grave problems of lateral coordination and jeopardizing the unity of our over-all command of the Pacific. Such an alternative would raise problems greater than those which it purports to solve—the only advantage would be the specious one of having a commissioner in mufti rather than a general in khaki.

⁷³ See note 68.

It is equally doubtful that any real improvement would result from appointment of a civil commissioner responsible to a civilian branch of government. This would require that the American military establishment in the Ryukyus be answerable to an authority different from that to which the civil commissioner would report. Coordination of military and civil affairs would be precarious at best. What civilian branch of government would be prepared to administer such an activity? In the face of established policy limiting its activities (quite rightly) to those of a diplomatic staff arm of the Chief Executive, the Department of State would not attempt to operate such a government. Nor is adequate guiding precedent to be found in the fact that the State Department has been directly involved in the occupation of Germany with John J. McCloy and James B. Conant as Commissioners. The German situation had complex elements of quadripartite administration and international diplomacy calling for the greatest diplomatic finesse. Moreover, the construction of a democratic Bonn government and the industrial rehabilitation of a major European industrial power within a quadrilateral context were tasks highly charged with diplomatic content. While elements of a diplomatic situation are found in the Ryukyus, the occupation is much simpler and much more military.

The only remaining branch of government with a legitimate historical interest in governing overseas areas is the Division of Territories and Island Possessions of the Department of the Interior. But if responsibility for the Ryukyus were lodged here, civilian and military responsibilities would again be divided in a manner potentially injurious to Pacific security.

Nor would the administration of the Ryukyus by a civilian agency assure a higher quality of personnel assigned to the islands. Lacking systematic experience in overseas administration, we have no cadre of dedicated civil servants trained in dealing with Asians who could be called upon to devote their professional talents to the rectification of Ryukyuan affairs. As careful as recruiting might be, well-established, successful, able men are difficult to attract. Many of those finally recruited are likely to be motivated by adventure, higher salary, or desire to escape some problem in American society. The net result of such a selection would probably not be an improvement over military personnel assigned arbitrarily to duty in the Ryukyus. In the face of such serious inadequacies in our own governmental capacity to deal with problems of overseas administration, it is difficult to find an alternative to army control so clearly superior as to outweigh the strategic considerations which, in this writer's opinion, require continued, unified military direction.

4. Advocates of conversion from military to civilian control should consider that military government on the islands is already nearly ten years old. A substantial body of knowledge and experience has been developed. Such experience is best transmitted through a slowly evolving administration rather than one which would undergo radical reorganization. Some value should be placed on the merits of unbroken continuity as a means of insuring maximum security in the Pacific.

The foregoing arguments against the development of civilian control are merely suggestive of problems to be assessed; they are by no means conclusive. On the other side, it must be admitted that civilian control would have pleasant symbolic meaning to Ryukyuans and would probably make our administration somewhat more palatable. Certainly it is essential that some significant change in the conduct of our military government take place. While the return of Amami has apparently somewhat blunted native antagonism, there are indications that considerable dissatisfaction with American rule remains. A demonstration by Okinawans against the further appropriation of land for military use occurred on December 5, 1953. The demonstrating crowd of Okinawans⁷⁴ dispersed only after the intervention of American troops. This incident, although generally unreported in the United States press,⁷⁵ is of significance as an index of unrest. Villagers of Gushi-ku, Oroko-son assembled around construction operations which were to start the conversion of important cultivable lands to a new American air installation and housing for dependents. About 300 American troops were dispatched to the scene. After unsuccessfully urging the crowd to disperse, troops moved toward the Ryukyuans (without, however, establishing body contact). Only then did the crowd break up.

The immediate cause of the demonstration was the additional expropriation of land at inadequate rental prices. Gushi-ku, stated the Ryukyu Shimpō,⁷⁶ had 320,000 tsubo of land before the war. Expansion of American airfields reduced this to the present 60,000 tsubo. The villagers maintain that construction of the new airfield will reduce their land-holdings to 4,000 tsubo. Failure adequately to compensate Okinawans for their land continues to be a source of bitterness easily exploited by the allegedly Communist People's party. Its ultimate solution requires the appropriation of substantial sums of money for reimbursement of the owners at equitable rates.⁷⁷ Yet the usually cursory attention given by ⁷⁴ Estimates of the size of the crowd vary. The official American publication, The Ryukyu Review, published in English jointly by the Ryukyus Command and the Twentieth Air Force and used as a medium for disseminating information to United States Forces personnel, estimates the size as 250 persons. The Ryukyu Review, December 6, 1953. An Okinawan paper, however, states both in its news account and in its editorial that at least 1,000 demonstrators were on hand. Ryukyu Shimpō, December 6, 1953.

⁷⁵ The only reference to this incident in the American press (to this author's knowledge) is in the article by the Rev. Otis W. Bell (cited in note 72) in which he discusses the land expropriation problem as the immediate cause of the demonstration.

⁷⁶ December 6, 1953.

⁷⁷ An editorial in the Okinawa Times, Japanese language paper published by Okinawans, December 8, 1953, states: "The land problem, at first, seems to be a difficult one, but it is not so complicated. The problem could be settled if the United States government congressional committee review of Department of the Army appropriations for the Ryukyus is not likely to produce adequate analysis of this shameful condition. Indeed, in the 1953 hearings, not only was there no mention of this problem, but an impression was left with the committee that Ryukyuan are satisfied with American administration.⁷⁸

The seriousness of the real discontent which Okinawans feel toward the land problem is glossed over by many American officials who attribute the situation to Communist agitation. Thus the English language publication, The Ryukyu Review, in its news article on December 6, 1953 referred to the incident in these terms: "A small band of Communist-inspired demonstrators were peacefully ejected . . ."; "the Communist-led demonstration"; "Farmers refused to harvest their crops at the incessant urging of the Senaga-led Communists"; and "the village people, duped by Communist promises." Granted that the Communists have probably exploited the circumstances, the causes are rooted not in Communist antics but in legitimate dissatisfaction with an inequitable process of land seizure. The head of Gushi-ku stated: "The military is anxious about the interference of the People's party, but there is no such thing. If we lose this area, we have only 4,000 tsubo of land left for cultivation. The trouble was a natural explosion for the sake of living. I wish the work could have been suspended. I wonder if the military has ever cared for our future livelihood. We didn't rebel against the military, but it is regrettable that the military sent armed soldiers."⁷⁹

A further symptom of dissatisfaction among Ryukyuan is the success of the allegedly Communist Ryukyu People's party in the elections held early in 1954. Despite military government's clearly expressed dislike of the People's party,⁸⁰ that party succeeded in electing two of its candidates to the Ryukyuan legislature in the 1954 spring election. This represents an increase in the strength of would consent to disburse from 10 to 15 million dollars for rental fees from her abundant budget. This is far easier for the United States than it is for the Ryukyuan government to disburse ¥100,000. The United States government and not Okinawan landowners makes the problem difficult to solve."

⁷⁸ Hearings Before Subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations, The Supplemental Appropriation Bill, 1954, House of Representatives, 83d Cong., 1st sess. (1953), Pt. I, pp. 1-37, especially p. 25.

⁷⁹ Ryukyu Shimpō, December 6, 1953, news account. See also Okinawa Times, December 8, 1953 for similar expression of regret that troops were used in a situation that could have been handled by Okinawan police.

⁸⁰ For example, Major General Robert S. Beightler in an address to the first session of the Ryukyuan legislature in 1952 forcefully and directly condemned the Ryukyus People's party as a party "which, if allowed to continue unchecked, can lead to the establishment of a communist dominated regime in these islands." Cautioning the people of the Ryukyus, he continued, "I hope that you will recognize the leaders of the Ryukyus People's party for what they are and do everything within your power to prevent the spread of the dread scourge which they are sowing and which they trust will reach into every mura of the Ryukyus." Public Relations Office, Ryukyus Command, Address by Major General Robert S. Beightler to Members of the Legislature, GRI, 10 a.m., Tuesday, 19 August 1952 (Mimeographed, 13 pp.).

the People's party, because in the previous election one of the two candidates elected was from Amami-Ōshima. The 1954 election, held after the return of Amami to Japan, resulted in the election of two People's party candidates from Okinawa alone. The composition of the new Ryukyuan legislature gives the People's party a strategic advantage. The 12 members of the Socialist Masses party, the two People's party members, and somewhat less frequently the three Independents, often vote in a block against the 12 members of the Democratic party. Their position is strengthened by the fact that the Speaker and Vice-Speaker of this unicameral legislature are also members of the Socialist Masses party. The current legislature, thus composed, is likely to become a focal point for the expression of embarrassing anti-American sentiments. It appears, therefore, that the military government of the Ryukyus will continue to be faced with political problems not usually found within the province of the military establishment. Some change in organization is needed, but the change should not depart from the requirement of exclusive military control of the situation.

The changes required are subtle rather than spectacular and should probably occur at the policy levels in Washington rather than in the Ryukyus. Army administration of the islands should be subject to some measure of extraordinary scrutiny, since the situation in this last major area under American military control can easily be placed under the spotlight of Communist publicity. Some special recognition, both by the Congress and by the executive branch, seems indicated. Perhaps through congressional action, or at least by executive order, the unusual nature of the Army's mission in the Ryukyus should be acknowledged. Assignment of military personnel to the islands should be reviewed by an agency higher than the Department of the Army and should be exempt from the usual limitations of length of tour and rotation which Army personnel policy ordinarily requires. Only mature officers of demonstrated administrative capacity, with excellent records, unusual education, and temperamental qualifications for political work should be assigned. Commanding generals should be selected for experience and skill in civil government administration and for intellectual capacity to deal with complex social and political problems. They should not necessarily be limited to short tours of duty, which have averaged less than two years.

Top-level guidance of the occupation should be given by an inter-departmental committee which includes the Defense, State, and Army Departments and other members to be appointed by the President. Adequate review of budgetary requirements should be made both by the Bureau of the Budget and by appropriate committees of the Congress. Where deficiencies in our administration of the islands can be remedied by fiscal action (as in the case of reimbursing Okinawan landowners for compulsory "rental" of their lands), appropriate weight should be given to the increasingly sensitive nature of our position in the islands and to the corresponding need for scrupulously correct behavior in administering the islands' affairs. The interdepartmental committee should be served by a permanent secretariat adequate to conduct necessary research and to systematize historical experience so that continuity of policy can be facilitated. The committee should exert positive rather than nominal guidance and should constantly impress upon the Department of the Army the need for adequate attention to native Ryukyuan affairs. It should lend the weight of its support to Army requests of an extraordinary nature requiring congressional sanction. A plan such as this would preserve the integrity, cohesion, and exclusiveness of control by the military; yet inter-departmental supervision would increase the possibility that civilian Ryukyuan affairs would be adequately considered. Some such recognition of the Ryukyuan situation should be given. The integrity of American constitutional government as exported to the Ryukyus is resisted by Ryukyuans, challenged by Japanese, flouted by less favorably disposed Asians. Carefully considered action by the policy levels of government is required if we are to salvage our perilous ten-year adventure.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Extensive accounts of the Ryukyus appeared in scholarly publications as early as the first part of the 18th century. The bibliographical comments which follow, while not comprehensive, attempt to survey the principal contributions which have been made.

I. General and Historical Works

Although nearly a hundred items concerning the Ryukyus are recorded in standard bibliographies, almost all are technical studies in such subjects as botany, biology, and topography. See Friedrich Von Wenckstern, Bibliography of the Japanese Empire, 2 vols. (Tokyo, 1907) and succeeding volumes of the same series: Oskar Nachod, Bibliography of the Japanese Empire, Vols. 1-2 (London, 1928), pp. 651-52; Bibliographie von Japan, Vol. 3 (Leipzig, 1931), pp. 349-50, Vol. 4 (Leipzig, 1935), p. 294, Praesent and Haenisch, Bibliographie von Japan, Vol. 5 (Leipzig, 1937), p. 361. See also Henri Cordier, Bibliotheca Sinica, 2d ed. (Paris, 1906-7), Vols. 3-4, pp. 3007-18, and Bibliotheca Sinica, Supplement and Index, 2d ed. (Paris, 1924), p. 4427. George H. Kerr, of the staff of the University of California's Institute of East Asiatic Studies, has compiled a bibliography of some 3000 items on the Ryukyus which is being prepared for publication.

Englebert Kaempfer had mentioned the Ryukyus several times in the first edition of his classic work published in 1727. Kaempfer, History of Japan, 3 vols. (Glasgow, 1906), Vol. 2, p. 257; Vol. 3, p. 336. Probably the earliest lengthy description of the Ryukyus first available to Western scholarship was an account by Supoa-kouang (transliteration by Gaubil), a Chinese scholar sent as an emissary to the Ryukyus in 1719. A translation of this account by the French Jesuit missionary, Père Antoine Gaubil, appeared under the title "Memoire sur les Isles que les Chinois appellent isles de Lieou-kieou," which constituted part (pp. 182-245) of the 23rd volume of a long series of letters from missionaries published under the title Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses Écrites des Missions Étrangères, nouvelle edition (Paris, 1781). Early British explorers relied heavily on this account and one, John McLeod, included an English translation of part of the Gaubil memoir in his own book, Voyage of His Majesty's Ship Alceste, along the Coast of Corea, to the Island of Lew Chew, 2d ed. (London, 1818), pp. 79-97.

The attention of the British was directed to the Islands in 1797 by the shipwreck of H.M.S. Providence under command of Captain William R. Broughton, who later wrote an account of his voyage. Other seafaring accounts appeared, but few devoted much attention to the political and social institutions of the Ryukyus.

The earliest lengthy account in English was that of Captain Basil Hall, whose Account of a Voyage of Discovery to the West Coast of Corea, and the Great Loo-Choo Island (London, 1818) remains a fascinating narrative. Another British naval officer, Captain Beechey, prepared an account of the islands and included in his study an historical summary based on the earlier works of Kaempfer, Gaubil, Hall, and Klaproth. F. W. Beechey, Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific, 2 vols. (London, 1831), Vol. 2, pp. 143-227.

The British medical missionary, Dr. B. J. Bettelheim, who had been on Okinawa from 1846 until he sailed away with Perry in 1854, also wrote valuable commentaries. See "Letter from B. J. Bettelheim, M.D.," Chinese Repository (Canton, 1852), Vol. 19, pp. 17-49, 57-90. For additional materials on Bettelheim see William Leonard Schwartz, "Commodore Perry at Okinawa, from the Unpublished Diary of a British Missionary," The American Historical Review, Vol. 51, pp. 262-76 (Jan., 1946). See also W. G. Beasley, Great Britain and the Opening of Japan 1834-1858 (London, 1951), pp. 77-82.

Professor Basil Hall Chamberlain added substantially to his grandfather's contribution by further exploration and by bibliographical and linguistic studies. He listed and described Japanese and Ryukyuan sources in his "Contributions to a Bibliography of Luchu" Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Vol. 24, pp. 1-12 (1896). His longer account, "The Luchu Islands and Their Inhabitants," appeared in the Geographical Journal, Vol. 5, pp. 289-319, 446-62, 534-45 (April, May, June, 1895). Another early British study was that of George Smith, Lewchew and the Lewchewans; Being a Narrative of a Visit to Lewchew, or Loo Choo, in October, 1850 (London, 1853). A brief but competent history is that of Charles S. Leavenworth, "The History of the Loochoo Islands," Journal of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society of Japan for the Year 1905, Vol. 36 (new series), pp. 103-20 (1905).

II. Anthropological Studies

Several studies conducted under terms of a United States Army contract administered by the Pacific Science Board of the National Research Council and designated as Scientific Investigation in the Ryukyu Islands (SIRI) have been prepared in mimeographed form. See especially Clarence J. Glacken, Studies in Okinawan Village Life (Washington, D. C.: Pacific Science Board, National Research Council, 1950, 382 pp., mimeo.). Dr. Glacken also has in preparation a study entitled The Great Loochoo Life in Three Okinawan Villages. See also Douglas G. Haring, The Island of Amami Ōshima in the Northern Ryūkyūs (Washington, D. C.: Pacific Science Board, National Research Council, October 1952, 85 pp., mimeographed). George H. Kerr's historical summary, Ryūkyū, Kingdom and Province before 1945 (Washington, D. C.: Pacific Science Board, National Research Council, June, 1952, 240 pp., mimeo.) will probably soon be published in a shortened English edition.

Since Basil Hall Chamberlain's 1895 study cited above deals with cultural characteristics of the people as well as the geography of the islands, it serves as a valuable source of information pertinent to anthropology. Among more recent studies are the following: Marshall T. Newman and Ransom L. Eng, The Ryūkyū People: A Cultural Appraisal (Washington, D. C., The Smithsonian Institution, 1948), and "The Ryūkyū People: A Biological Appraisal," American Journal of Physical Anthropology, Vol. 5 (new series), pp. 112-57 (June, 1947); Harold Fink, "The Distribution of Blood Groups in Ryūkyuans," ibid., pp. 159-63. Douglas G. Haring presents some provocative hypotheses on the relationship between the culture of Amami Ōshima and that of Tokugawa Japan in "Japanese National Character," The Yale Review, pp. 388-92 (Spring, 1953). The studies in English of indigenous religious practices are: Robert Stewart Spencer, "The Noro, or Priestesses of Loo Choo," Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Vol. 8 (second series), pp. 94-112 (Dec., 1931); and Douglas G. Haring, "The Noro Cult of Amami Ōshima: Divine Priestesses of the Ryūkyū Islands," Sociologus (Berlin), Vol. 3 (new series), pp. 108-21 (1953).

HUME AND CONSERVATISM

SHELDON S. WOLIN

University of California (Berkeley)

Although David Hume's stature as a philosopher has rarely been questioned, his claims as a political theorist have fared less well. Jefferson showed deep hostility towards Hume's ideas, while John Adams could find agreement with only a few points.¹ Later opinion has been less vehement but still reserved. Thomas Huxley thought Hume's political writings suggestive, but on the whole marred by an unabashed desire for literary success.² In Sir Leslie Stephen's judgment Hume was guilty of a "cynical conservatism" that was at once superficial and unhistorical.³

More recent studies, such as those of Sabine and Halévy, have established more securely Hume's place in political thought but have left certain ambiguities. Sabine has coupled Hume with Burke as an opponent of eighteenth-century rationalism, while Halévy viewed him as a forerunner of the "philosophical radicalism" of Bentham, Adam Smith, James Mill, and Ricardo.⁴ To have fathered squabbling children is always something of an embarrassment, but particularly so when one is, like Hume, temperamentally averse to taking sides. It is true, nonetheless, that if a temporary distinction is made between Hume's doctrine and his influence, it is possible to maintain that his influence worked in two quite different directions. His inquiries into causation, the role of reason, and the nature of moral judgments helped eventually to undermine the natural law structure of eighteenth-century liberalism, while his emphasis on utility as the test of institutions contributed an important ingredient to Benthamite liberalism. On the other hand, his attack on reason and its claims to universal truths helped to relieve eighteenth-century conservatives of a potent enemy and prepared the way for the authority of sentiment and feeling. Hume's labors, then, worked to alter the future course of both liberalism and conservatism.

This double aspect of Hume's influence, however, has served to obscure his

¹ The Works of John Adams, ed. Charles Francis Adams, 10 vols. (Boston, 1865), Vol. 4, pp. 466-68; Adrienne Koch and William Peden, Selected Writings of John and John Quincy Adams (New York, 1946), p. 120; The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, ed. Andrew A. Lipscomb and Albert E. Bergh, 20 vols. (Washington, 1903), Vol. 11, p. 223; Vol. 12, pp. 405-7; Vol. 16, pp. 44, 125-26. John Stuart Mill declared Hume to be "the profoundest negative thinker on record," Mill on Bentham and Coleridge, ed. F. R. Leavis (New York, 1950), p. 43.

² Thomas Huxley, Hume (New York, n.d.), pp. 10-11.

³ Leslie Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, 3rd ed. (New York, 1949), Vol. 2, p. 181.

⁴ George H. Sabine, A History of Political Theory, 2nd ed. (New York, 1950), pp. 597-606; Elie Halévy, Growth of Philosophic Radicalism (London, 1934), pp. 9-13, 42-45, 131-33; John Plamenatz, The English Utilitarians (Oxford, 1949), pp. 22-44; Hume's Moral and Political Philosophy, ed. Henry D. Aiken (New York, 1948), Introduction; David Hume, Theory of Politics, ed. Frederick M. Watkins (Edinburgh, 1951), Introduction.

own political doctrines. The latter warrant some attention because in doctrine, as well as in personal inclination, he was a conservative, but of a distinctive kind. While the character of his conservatism was somewhat colored by its being formulated in the more placid era which preceded the French Revolution, its distinctiveness had its roots in Hume's peculiar relationship to the Enlightenment. Later conservatives tended to lump together the Enlightenment with the Revolution and to damn the former because of its presumed relation to the latter. Rationalism and sans-culottism were viewed as two sides of the same coin. "The eighteenth century," declared De Maistre, "which distrusted itself in nothing, hesitated at nothing."

The so-called "crisis of the eighteenth century," when the full impact of seventeenth-century rationalist and scientific modes of thought was felt, constituted a watershed for modern political thought. And the attack on the authority of accepted ideas was soon accompanied by an attack on the legitimacy of accepted institutions. "Rude establishments," wrote Bentham, must be brought "to the test of polished reason." Under the impress of revolutionary events set in motion in America and Europe, modern conservatism was formed. In its origins, conservatism was not so much a defense of the existing order, which had been breached by the establishment of revolutionary regimes, as a sustained attack on the rationalist currents which had come to dominate much of European thinking since the days of Hobbes, Descartes, and Newton. Whatever else may be said of the conservative response, it cannot be held to have disagreed about the identity of its enemy. Burke's strictures against "men of theory," Hegel's condemnation of the "abstract reason" of the French revolutionaries, and Metternich's sarcasms about the "presumptuous man" were all testimony to an almost unanimous rejection of the claims of reason to be the ultimate arbiter in political questions. According to the conservative indictment, the Enlightenment, inspired by a destructive rationalism, had succeeded in loosening the cohesive ties of society; it had insisted that slumbering beliefs and institutions, which men had unthinkingly and naturally "accepted," be made to undergo the ordeal of conscious, rational acceptance.

Given this view of the Enlightenment as a kind of extended orgy of rationalism, conservatives were irresistibly drawn to some form of political supernaturalism. For, as De Maistre put it, the rationalist has engaged in "an insurrection against God" whereby "the trowel believes himself the architect." The political community, according to the conservatives, was part of the time dimension of history to which "political geometry" could never do justice. History, in turn, was "the great drama of an ever-unfolding Providence,"⁵ or, in Burke's phrase, an expression of the "divine tactic" which men could only faintly comprehend. Of the political community, men could only know that it was part of a providential pattern; they could not know its ultimate basis. The last resort of conservatism, then, was to invoke a veil of mystery and to warn that men plumb the origins of society at their peril; the "natural" forces of society, in response to a divine imperative, worked in a wondrous fashion beside which the cleverest political contrivances stood as pale imitations.

⁵ The Political Thought of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, ed. R. J. White (London, 1938), p. 93.

I

These constitute some of the main elements in the conservative tradition as it developed near the end of the eighteenth century. It is against this background that the earlier conservatism of Hume assumes some significance. The first fundamental respect in which his position differed from that outlined above was that his was a conservatism without benefit of mystery. There was no recourse to a "divine tactic," a Weltgeist; nor any disposition, such as displayed by Coleridge, to revive Scripture as a "statesman's manual." Hume's conclusions were stubbornly rooted in a strictly secular analysis with experience as the final court of appeal. Secondly, Hume's conservatism was constructed from the very materials of the Enlightenment: its quest for objective analysis, its distrust of obscurantism, its faith in empirical data, its disdain for the a priori, and its strong emphasis on the criterion of utility. He employed the Enlightenment methods of analysis to probe the roots of established pieties and institutions, and he carried it out with the sort of dispassion that Coleridge was to call "cold-blooded." Thirdly, his was a conservatism which owed no inspiration to catastrophe, impending or past, but rather reflected the "peace of the Augustans." Consequently, Hume exhibited none of the heightened sensitivity of later conservatives to the necessity for strong authority as the main guarantor of unity. Where later De Bonald was to assert that "outside religious and political unity man can find no truth and society no salvation," Hume was content with the matter-of-fact judgment that society was a product of human interests whose satisfaction provided the requisite amount of social cohesion.

Nevertheless, Hume was something more than the Enlightenment incarnate, for his significance is that he turned against the Enlightenment its own weapons. And herein lies his importance as a conservative thinker. His starting-point is to be found in A Treatise of Human Nature (1739-40) which bears the subtitle "An attempt to introduce the experimental method of reasoning into moral subjects." The first book illustrates Hume's tactic: to whittle down the claims of reason by the use of rational analysis. Reason, he contended, was admittedly an instrument for advancing our knowledge, but it was an instrument with a circumscribed sphere of activity:

Reason is the discovery of truth or falsehood. Truth or falsehood consists in an agreement or disagreement either to the real relations of ideas, or to real existence and matter of fact. Whatever, therefore, is not susceptible of this agreement or disagreement is incapable of being true or false, and can never be an object of reason.⁶

The consequence of this conclusion was to stake off an important realm either impervious to reason or within which reason played only a derivative role. Thus what men described as cause-and-effect was not a deductive conclusion of reason but the product of experience: we have become accustomed to seeing a certain effect follow from a given cause, but, strictly speaking, there existed no logically necessary connection between the two. Facts were derived from observation, not from reason; hence reason could not be employed to prove or disprove the existence of a fact. Human behavior, in turn, was governed largely by unanalyzed experience or habits. "Custom," Hume concluded, "is the great guide of human life."⁷

⁶ A Treatise of Human Nature, Bk. III, Pt. I, sec. 1. Hereafter this will be cited as Human Nature.

The significance of Hume's argument was not merely that it greatly extended the reign of custom at the expense of reason, but that it undercut the whole idea of an underlying rational harmony in nature, a harmony from which eighteenth-century rationalists had deduced the existence of universal moral imperatives. Hume destroyed this assumption, not by a frontal assault, but by the contention that the external order was not a discovery of reason but was rooted in "the principles of human nature." The 'order' that we attribute to the phenomenal world rests really on a conviction and not on a process of logical validation; it is the "force and vivacity" which the idea of an 'order' exerts on our imagination that explains its hold.⁸

Equally modest was the role assigned reason by Hume in matters of morals. Reason functioned as a calculator, an instrument of analysis. It was "perfectly inert" in the sense that it provided neither the springs of human action nor the final judgment in questions of moral controversy. In Hume's view, human actions were stimulated initially by the passions, which were a response to a direct emotional experience. The passions, in short, were the active, generating factor in human behavior. Consequently, they could not be yoked or restrained by reason, as the rationalists maintained, because this would be to argue that an inert principle could control an active one. Hence the famous conclusion: "Reason is, and ought only to be, the slave of the passions, and can never pretend to any other office than to serve and obey them."⁹ Passions were thus outside the range of rational criticism, except as they might be based on a false supposition about objects which had no existence, or as the passions selected inadequate means for the fulfillment of their ends. Reason could indicate the tendencies and consequences of certain actions, but sentiment or feeling alone could actively stimulate us to follow one choice rather than another. Again, reason dealt with facts and relations, but moral concepts, such as 'crime' or 'ingratitude,' were not analyzable as facts or relations except by ignoring the original source of the concept itself in our sentiments or feelings. For example, certain elements of a 'crime' could be analyzed by the understanding into components, but the totality of these did not equal a 'crime'; it was only as our feelings affixed such a designation that certain actions took on a moral meaning. "The approbation or blame which then ensues cannot be the work of judgment, but of the heart. . . ."¹⁰ Thus, since morals were linked to the passions or feelings, and since reason was unable to master the latter, it followed that morals could never be designated true or false, reasonable or unreasonable.

⁷ An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, sec. 5. Hereafter this will be cited as Human Understanding.

⁸ Human Nature, Bk. I, Pt. III, secs. 7-8.

⁹ Human Nature, Bk. II, Pt. III, sec. 3.

The net effect of this argument was, of course, to undermine the whole theory of natural law with its immutable values discoverable by rational inquiry. Having withdrawn morals from the jurisdiction of reason, Hume was prepared to maintain that morality was "more properly felt than judged of."¹¹ Morality derived from a moral sense which received impressions; these might be either pleasing or displeasing. Actions or situations which cause pleasing impressions men have identified as good or virtuous, their contraries as bad. When it is asked, what is it that renders some impressions pleasurable and others painful, Hume's reply was that in some instances it was "natural" for men to feel delight or aversion; in other cases the response was due to habit or conditioning. Morals were, then, a product of nature or convention, but, as Hume pointed out in his discussion of justice:

Mankind is an inventive species; and where an invention is obvious and absolutely necessary, it may as properly be said to be natural as anything that proceeds immediately from original principles, without the intervention of thought and reflection. Though the rules of justice be artificial, they are not arbitrary.¹²

Thus art could be fused with nature, and when innovation became overlain with habit the distinction between the artificial and the natural vanished.

There existed, in this line of argument, a subtle difference between Hume and later conservatives. Some conservatives, Sir William Blackstone for example, were to maintain that a rational institution or law could be declared "natural" on the grounds that its long existence demonstrated its rationality and naturalness. Hume, however, in denying the relationship between the rational and the natural, was asserting quite another basis for the validity of institutions: an arrangement might, through usage, become habitual and therefore "natural," but this had nothing to do with its rationality and rationality had nothing to do with it.

The full implications of Hume's analysis were not to be realized until after the revolutionary events in America and France had made their mark. Prior to that time little difference existed between conservative and radical theorists in the approach taken to political problems. The points of disagreement between John Adams and Jefferson in America, Blackstone and Priestley in England, or D'Argenson and Diderot in France were less striking than the degree to which they shared a common premise that the test of a political system or a particular policy was a matter of rational demonstration. The influence of Hume's iconoclasm, however, was to dissolve this area of agreement by showing that ultimate truths could not be proven by rational methods. And after 1789 both sides were to become increasingly preoccupied with ultimate truths. By restricting reason to a narrow zone between experience and the passions, Hume cleared the way for political romanticism. "Nothing is freer," he wrote, "than the imagination of man. . . . The difference between fiction and belief lies in some sentiment or feeling, which is annexed to the latter, not to the former, and which depends not on the will, nor can be commanded at pleasure."¹³

¹⁰ An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals, Open Court ed. (La Salle, Ill., n.d.), Appendix I, p. 131.

¹¹ Human Nature, Bk. III, Pt. I, sec. 2. See also the discussion in D. G. C. MacNabb, David Hume, His Theory of Knowledge and Morality (London, 1951), pp. 159 ff.

¹² Human Nature, Bk. III, Pt. II, sec. 1.

In fairness to Hume it should be noted that his remarks cannot be turned into a justification for some of the later extravagances of the romantics. Habit, emotion, and imagination did not constitute political values in his system, but belonged to the catalog of descriptive facts concerning human behavior. They might, and often did, have valuable consequences, yet they were not values in themselves. It was true that on occasion Hume might casually remark that in philosophy, as in music and poetry, "we must follow our taste and sentiment,"¹⁴ but he was aware that this might prove too much. After all, he cautioned, there was a clear difference between "a poetical enthusiasm" and "a serious conviction" resting on "reflexion and general rules."¹⁵ Negatively, however, Hume's labors worked towards the alteration of the future course of conservatism. With reason discredited, new premises could be fashioned from custom and sentiment.

II

The quest for a science of politics was one of the great intellectual adventures of the Enlightenment.¹⁶ It was believed, perhaps not logically, that a science of this kind would be a natural ally of reform and progress. It was almost inevitable, given the cautious disposition of conservatives towards political and social change, that a deep hostility towards a science of politics should color conservative thought of the late eighteenth century. Here again Hume took a different tack. While sharing the conservative distrust of reform, he was still convinced that the study of politics could achieve the status of a science. At the same time, he demonstrated that there was no inherent necessity that such a science led to radical conclusions.

Although Hume remarked in one place that "the world is still too young to fix many general truths in politics which will remain true to the latest posterity,"¹⁷ his works were studded with references to "causes and principles eternal and immutable" and to "universal axioms." While he admitted that social sciences, dealing as they did with matters of fact, could not aspire to the same degree of certitude as mathematics, dealing as it did with relations between ¹³ Human Understanding, sec. V, pts. I-II.

¹⁴ Human Nature, Bk. I, Pt. III, sec. 8.

¹⁵ John Arthur Passmore, Hume's Intentions (Cambridge, 1952), p. 10.

¹⁶ On this point see John H. Randall, The Making of the Modern Mind, 2nd ed. (Boston, 1940), pp. 334 ff.; Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment (Princeton, 1951), pp. 253 ff.

¹⁷ "Of Civil Liberty," The Philosophical Works of David Hume, ed. T. H. Green and T. H. Grose, 4 vols. (London, 1875), Vol. 3, p. 156. Hereafter this will be cited as Works.

ideas, Hume did go so far as to assert that the social sciences were capable of the same degree of certitude as the physical sciences. He further maintained that "politics, natural philosophy, physics, chemistry, etc.," which employ "moral reasoning," were more securely grounded than the study of morals or aesthetics; the latter were "not so properly objects of the understanding as of taste and sentiment." This was not to imply that politics, any more than the other sciences, could transcend experience or explain "ultimate principles."¹⁸ Nor was it meant to deny that "irregular and extraordinary appearances" might defy attempts to reduce political phenomena to near-mathematical axioms.¹⁹

Despite these qualifications, Hume's conviction remained unshaken that, as the title of one of his essays suggested, "politics may be reduced to a science" if it adheres to "experimental" procedures rather than the methods of traditional logic. Logic, which relied on demonstrations founded on the understanding, was useless for dealing with the probabilities which were of the essence of man's actual life in society. A science of politics, therefore, must be grounded in experience supplied by historical inquiry and observation of existing societies. Essentially, it was to be an investigation into the interaction between institutions and human nature. From an historical point of view, the function of political institutions had been to channel and control human behavior. Institutions were, in short, artificial contrivances which exerted an independent force and were not merely a reflex or simple reaction to human drives. "So great is the force of laws and particular forms of government, and so little dependence have they on the humours and tempers of men, that consequences almost as general and certain may sometimes be deduced from them as any which the mathematical sciences afford us."²⁰

Hume's method of political analysis, as noted earlier, was grounded in the typical Enlightenment technique of "analytic dissection," which, to borrow Cassirer's description, "dissolves everything merely factual . . . and everything believed on the evidence of revelation, tradition and authority" as preliminary to the ultimate goal of "synthetic reconstruction."²¹ Hume pressed this approach with devastating effect against the state-of-nature hypothesis present in some social contract theorizing. He pointed out the slippery logic which sought to justify rebellion against authority on the basis of a "mere philosophical fiction" like the state of nature; he denied that society was simply the product of a voluntary agreement aimed at eliminating certain "inconveniences" present in the pre-social condition. The arrangement called society represented an accumulated set of responses to human needs and drives: to the "natural appetite betwixt the sexes" and to man's oscillation between altruism—which diminishes in force as it is extended through the concentric circles of self, family, friends, and strangers—and selfishness—which increases as socie-

¹⁸ Human Nature, Introduction.

¹⁹ "Of Some Remarkable Customs," Works, Vol. 3, p. 374.

²⁰ "That Politics may be reduced to a Science," Works, Vol. 3, p. 99.

²¹ Cassirer, Philosophy of the Enlightenment, pp. 13-16.

tal demands become more abstract and remote. Furthermore, as man found himself situated amidst circumstances of material scarcity his insecurity deepened, leading him to invade the material possessions of his fellows. This "natural" condition could be overcome by artificial arrangements which would restrain man's "heedless and impetuous passion" and gratify his instinct for self-interest.²² "After that interest is once established and acknowledged, the sense of morality in the observance of these rules follows naturally and of itself."²³

In his explanation Hume made no sharp distinction between government and society. Government was viewed as the instrument whereby society's arrangements were protected and society's purposes executed. Consequently, when Hume came to discuss the problem of political obligation his argument paralleled to a large extent his explanation of society. His aim, in both cases, was to demonstrate that neither society nor government had emerged full-blown from a sudden agreement. The basis of government was traceable to consent only in the sense that every government required that its subjects agree to its existence. To label this obvious truism a contractual agreement only worked to distort the element of truth contained in the idea of contract, namely, that "it is on opinion only . . . that government is founded. . . ."²⁴ "Opinion," in turn, was composed of several aspects. First, there was "opinion of interest" which referred to the "sense of the general advantage which is reaped from government, together with the persuasion that the particular government which is established is equally advantageous with any other that could easily be settled." Second, there was "opinion of right" which comprehended (a) the "right to power" or the prevalent disposition of men to believe that governments which have endured over a long period of time were legitimate governments; and (b) the "right to property" or the general desire of men to secure their possessions.

Such were the "principles" which supported government. Viewed from this perspective, the "ought" element in political obligation was reduced to a secondary consequence following from certain naturalistic considerations. Men obeyed because the interests which they sought to protect and promote necessitated obedience to authority. "Society could not otherwise subsist."²⁵

According to Hume's view, all of the rules of society were "artificial" in that they represented conscious contrivances designed to meet human needs and problems. As rules of convenience they could not be expected to satisfy the demands of morality or strict logic. For example, the rules of justice might result in a wicked miser winning a legal judgment against a virtuous peasant, yet the necessity and value of a general rule excludes consideration of the "fitness or unfitness of objects to particular persons."²⁶ The essential point was that there was no sharp contrast between an "artificial" rule and a "natural" one.

²² Human Nature, Bk. III, Pt. II, sec. 2.

²³ Ibid., sec. 6.

²⁴ "Of the First Principles of Government," Works, Vol. 3, pp. 110 ff.

²⁵ "Of the Original Contract," Works, Vol. 3, p. 456.

²⁶ Human Nature, Bk. III, Pt. II, sec. 3.

Through the passage of time men became accustomed to social expedients, and what was once artificial soon became natural. It followed that the "natural" was not necessarily the primitive or the original condition. Hume strongly inferred that the opposite was more likely: that the truly unnatural situation was to be found in the state of nature.

The significant element in Hume's political ideas lies not so much in the particular arguments employed, but rather in the sensitivity displayed towards the workings of actual institutions. Like his contemporaries, he appeared to use the analytical method to dissect institutions, to peel off layer after layer of historical accretion. Yet, unlike that of many of his contemporaries, Hume's method proceeded on the belief that a particular institution was to be viewed as a whole possessing subtle interconnections with other institutional wholes.

Implicit in this approach were two ideas which were to play a central role in later conservative thinking in England. Institutions were to be understood in terms of human needs, but institutions were not merely the product of human needs. The two elements became intertwined and inseparable by virtue of their common root in historical time. It followed that there was no necessary opposition between what was useful and what existed; the desirable and the factual were not out of joint. In this way Hume indicated to later conservatives that the strongest arguments for the existing order were to be found within the facts of that order; that under an empirical approach utility could be located as an immanent value dwelling within the interstices of actual social arrangements, not as a grim measuring rod contrived to reveal the shortcomings of institutions.

Moreover, institutions were developments over a period of time. Their purpose and nature could not be correctly understood without a sense of time. The concept of time, then, was closely associated with the blending of fact and utility. Historical time imparted to social arrangements a qualitative element. Time implied experience, and experience in turn provided the motive for gradual adjustment. Conversely, the greatest calamity was violent change, which worked to snap the close union which history had fashioned between an institution, its utility, and its duration. In contradicting the nature of time and experience, sweeping change could not adapt institutions according to utility; for utility, in political matters, was inseparable from time and experience.

Students of political theory have, as yet, paid insufficient attention to the concept of time and the part that it has played in the shaping of political theory. To the eighteenth-century liberal reformer, time appeared as a kind of quantitative duration, a series of succeeding points without any particular value, except of a negative character. Future time alone held the promise of a qualitative character. To the conservatives who followed Burke, however, time lent an essentially qualitative element to existing arrangements. Past time had not really been superseded, but merged into the present in the form of institutions and values. Drastic change, in the same way that it had contradicted utility, contradicted time. In seeking to sever past time from present and future time, in order to impute a negative value to the past and a positive value only to the present or future, drastic change stood condemned of being unhistorical and therefore unavailing.

While it would be claiming too much to attribute the whole of the conservative conceptions of time and utility to Hume, it is important to recognize that, within the limits imposed by his own methods and temper, he had glimpsed something of the conservative case.

III

Hume's conservatism was given more concrete expression when he turned from his philosophical writings to his informal essays on society, government, and economics. His detachment was, if anything, reenforced by the complexities which he pronounced present in any political question.²⁷

Although his temperament made him unwilling to join in the party battles of the period, it did not prevent him from making thrusts at both sides, at Tory sentiments about divine right and the royal prerogative, as well as at the precious tenets of Whiggism. But in common with the conservatives of the period Hume had a hearty disdain for that type of radical reformer who thought that every morning the world was an open question:

Did one generation of men go off the stage at once, and another succeed, as in the case with silkworms and butterflies, the new race, if they had sense enough to choose their government, which surely is never the case with men, might voluntarily and by general consent, establish their own form of civil polity, without any regard to the laws or precedents which prevailed among their ancestors. But as human society is in perpetual flux, one man every hour going out of the world, another coming into it, it is necessary, in order to preserve stability in government, that the new brood should conform themselves to the established constitution, and nearly follow the path which their fathers, treading in the footsteps of theirs, had marked out to them. Some innovations must necessarily have place in every human institution . . . but violent innovations no individual is entitled to make.²⁸

Hume's scorn of "novelties" also rested on the conviction that settled forms and institutions carried a momentum which often nullified the efforts of evil men and happily compensated for the meager talents of others:

In the smallest court or office, the stated forms and methods by which business must be conducted are found to be a considerable check on the natural depravity of mankind. . . . And so little dependence has this affair on the humours and education of particular men that one part of the same republic may be wisely conducted and another weakly by the same men, merely on account of the differences of the forms and institutions by which these parts are regulated. . . . Good laws may beget order and moderation in the government where the manners and customs have instilled little humanity or justice into the tempers of men.²⁹

But where Burke would have looked for some divine cunning to account for these phenomena, Hume was content to point out the utilitarian basis of institutions and the strong support which they found in human habits. He was at one with Burke in being sceptical of man's ability to effect reforms that would be both wide-sweeping and beneficial, but where Burke, at the time of the French Revolution, inveighed against "men of theory" who sought political solutions by "geometrical demonstration,"³⁰ Hume, writing during the calm of the Augustan age, reserved his contempt for what the age called "enthusiasm." In his eyes religious "enthusiasm" or fanaticism had split seventeenth-century England into warring sects and had paved the way for rebellion, a state of affairs which Hume abhorred even more than tyranny.³¹

²⁷ For a statement about the detached observer, see "Of the Protestant Succession," Works, Vol. 3, pp. 474-75.

²⁸ "Of the Original Contract," Works, Vol. 3, p. 452.

²⁹ "That Politics may be reduced to a Science," Works, Vol. 3, pp. 105-6.

This fear and distrust of violent antagonisms underlay Hume's analysis of party politics, for this analysis was motivated by a practical purpose: to prevent in his time the recrudescence of the seventeenth-century struggles by showing the many points of agreement between Tories and Whigs, or, as he more accurately called them, the "court" and "country" parties. Although the method which he adopted, which was to apportion praise and blame impartially to both sides, rested on the hope that sweet reasonableness would prevent both parties from adopting mutually exclusive positions, this was of less significance than the realistic analysis of the nature of parties which preceded his conclusions. To be sure, earlier political writers, like Halifax, Bolingbroke, Swift, and Defoe, had all been aware of the increasingly important role played by "factions" or parties in the constitutional system. Yet among these writers there remained a lingering reluctance to accept "party" as anything but a distasteful necessity. "The best Party," wrote Halifax, "is but a kind of Conspiracy against the rest of the Nation."³²

In his discussion of parties or factions—the terms were used interchangeably—Hume began from a position similar to that of James Madison in Number 10 of the Federalist Papers: since it was not possible to eliminate parties under a free government, some means must be found of limiting their disruptive and predatory tendencies. It was necessary, then, to draw a distinction between those parties which posed a threat to the very existence of a political system and those whose activities, while not always salutary, were confined within reasonable bounds. In the former category Hume placed the fanatical group with uncompromising tenets, a type which had been spawned in abundance during the bitter religious controversies of the last century. Extremist groups, reflecting the dogmatic tempers of their members, were perfectly willing to sacrifice peace and order for the achievement of their objectives: fiat justitia, ruat caelum. Furthermore, the tendency to exaggerate principles into unyielding absolutes was a peculiarly modern phenomenon: "Parties from principle, especially abstract speculative principle, are known only to modern times, and are, perhaps, the most extraordinary and unaccountable phenomenon that has yet appeared in human affairs."³³ Although such parties constituted the exception, ³⁰ Edmund Burke, Reflections on the French Revolution, Everyman ed. (London, 1910), pp. 38, 170.

³¹ "Whether the British Government inclines more to Absolute Monarchy, or to a Republic?", Works, Vol. 3, pp. 124–26.

³² The Complete Works of George Savile, First Marquis of Halifax, ed. Walter Raleigh (Oxford, 1912), p. 225.

³³ "Of Parties in General," Works, Vol. 3, p. 130.

they represented a pathological condition to which all parties were susceptible. Traces of these symptoms could be found in both the Whigs and Tories. Hume, writing in a period when the uproar over the Hanoverian succession had not completely died down and when Jacobite memories and hopes were still strong, repeatedly warned of the consequences that would follow if party distinctions were allowed to harden. That this eventuality need not come about was the whole lesson of Hume's analysis of parties.

In his dissection of the anatomy of party, Hume found a compound of interests, principles, and sentimental attachment to certain leaders. Two broad types of parties existed: those founded on the personal attraction of a particular leader or group of leaders, and those founded on "real" differences of opinions or of interests.³⁴ Most parties were a compound of the two and this was fortunate, for it meant that principles, interests, and personal ambitions tended to offset each other. In particular, the tugs of personal rivalry and economic interests lessened the possibility of conflicts over questions of political or religious principles. To a sceptic and a moderate like Hume, the disputes over principle were largely meaningless, because the historic quarrels which had given birth to the conflicting ideas had long since been settled. The Whigs, Hume noted, regarded themselves as the sole heirs of the revolutionary traditions of 1688 and their arguments implied that the revolutionary settlement stood in constant danger of being overthrown. The Tories, on the other side, responded in the opposite vein: they represented the sole defenders of a monarchy that had been temporarily abolished by the forerunners of the Whigs; it was the Tory mission to insist on the primacy of the allegiance owed by subject to sovereign. In actuality, Hume commented, these antics were largely absurd because of the fundamental similarity between both parties. Both had accepted the results of 1688; neither wanted to abolish the monarchy. The division between them rested on a matter of emphasis. It lay in the shades of meaning which each side attached to certain accepted fundamentals. "A TORY, therefore, since the revolution . . . [is] a lover of monarchy, though without abandoning liberty; and a partisan of the family of Stuart. A WHIG may be defined to be a lover of liberty without renouncing monarchy, and a friend to the settlement in the Protestant line."³⁵ His advice to both parties was to be moderate, accept the present situation, and pursue the public good. There were, he remarked dryly, "enough zealots on both sides."³⁶

In emphasizing that a substantial area of agreement existed between the two parties Hume put his finger on the most singular aspect of the modern British party system. From it he drew the conclusion that it was both desirable and possible to create "a coalition of parties" which would govern England with a minimum of discord. "The transition from a moderate opposition against an establishment, to an entire acquiescence in it, is easy and insensible."³⁷ "Coali-

³⁴ Ibid., pp. 128-30.

³⁵ "Of the Parties of Great Britain," Works, Vol. 3, p. 139.

³⁶ "That Politics may be reduced to a Science," Works, Vol. 3, p. 107.

³⁷ "Of the Coalition of Parties," Works, Vol. 3, pp. 469-70.

tion" thus implied an agreement between the parties to exclude the fundamentals of the system from the range of controversy. As Hume acutely noted, "the only dangerous parties are such as entertain opposite views with regard to the essentials of government."³⁸ His hope was that the area of friction between the parties could be reduced once they had recognized their agreement on fundamentals. When this actually became the case in Britain a century and a half later, Hume would have welcomed Balfour's remark that the nation "is so at one that we can safely afford to bicker."

IV

From the death of Queen Anne in 1714 until the outbreak of the American Revolution, England enjoyed a period of comparative harmony unruffled by any deep antagonisms or sharp controversies. The Jacobite uprisings were the only major exceptions. The stability of England had become one of the wonders of Europe, for such had not been her reputation in the preceding century, when the turmoil of revolutionary events had made her name a by-word for political instability. The era of good feeling prevalent at this time received its intellectual expression in the admiration for balance and proportion. The classic lines with which Newton had sketched in his picture of an harmonious universe were duplicated in the ordered couplets of Pope. English political writers, not unmindful of the almost universal praise for their institutions, explained that the key to the riddle of stability was in the balanced nature of the system. The idea of balance became the central starting point, the key concept in British constitutional thought until the appearance of Bentham's Fragment on Government in 1776.³⁹ Its classic formulation was to be found in Blackstone's Commentaries:

And herein indeed consists the true excellence of the English government, that all the parts of it form a mutual check upon each other. In the Legislature the people are a check upon the nobility, and the nobility a check upon the people; by the mutual privilege of rejecting what the other has resolved: while the king is a check upon both, which preserves the executive power from encroachments. . . . Thus every branch of our civil polity supports and is supported, regulates and is regulated, by the rest: for the two houses naturally drawing in two directions of opposite interest, and the prerogative in another still different from them both, they mutually keep each other from exceeding their proper limits; while the whole is prevented from separation, and artificially connected together by the mixed nature of the Crown, which is a part of the legislative, and the sole executive magistrate. Like three distinct powers in mechanics, they jointly impel the machinery of government in a direction different from what either, acting by itself, would have done; but at the same time in a direction partaking of each, and formed out of all; a direction which constitutes the true line of the liberty and happiness of the community.⁴⁰

³⁸ Ibid., p. 464.

³⁹ Examples of this concept can be found in the following: The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift, ed. Temple Scott, 12 vols. (London, 1898), Vol. 1, pp. 231-235; Chancellor Hardwicke in Lord John Campbell's, Lives of the Lord Chancellors, 7 vols., 2nd ed. (Philadelphia, 1851), Vol. 5, p. 127; Parliamentary History of England, ed. William Cobbett (London, 1813-20), Vol. 15, cols. 481-82, 506; Vol. 66, cols. 43-44.

⁴⁰ William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, ed. Christian, 4 vols., 12th ed. (London, 1793), Vol. 1, Bk. I, ch. 2, pp. 154-55.

Although the importance of the concept of balance might be admitted for the realm of constitutional theory, the query arises: how much was this idea a creation existing solely in the minds of closet philosophers and how closely did it correspond to the actual workings of the constitution of the time? Although the dominant theme of parliamentary supremacy was obtrusive at certain times,⁴¹ there was, by and large, an implicit cooperation between the various branches of government. Hence, there is no paradox in the statement by Sir William Holdsworth that during the period of Whig supremacy from roughly 1720 until 1760 the constitutional system resembled a partnership, but not on equal terms, of King, Lords, and Commons.⁴²

When it is asked, by what means was this semblance of balance maintained, the answer is to be found largely in the conventions interwoven in the general constitutional fabric.⁴³ As contemporary British historians, under the inspiration of Sir Lewis Namier, have demonstrated, the nucleus about which these conventions clustered was the system of "influence," that is, the ties of family, patronage, contracts, bribes, and corruption through which the King and his ministers managed the parliamentary machinery.⁴⁴ This system, developed by Walpole and Newcastle and perfected later by George III, was not incidental to the politics of the period, but was a crucial element. Without it, the British constitution would have too closely resembled the nicely compartmented separation of powers that Montesquieu imagined in his Esprit des Lois. The conventions of the period, including the system of "influence," supplied the lubrication necessary to insure that the machinery of government would work in coordinated fashion and with a degree of central direction provided by the Crown.

Although many writers and politicians were aware of the part played by "influence" in preserving an area of royal initiative, Hume, perhaps alone, had grasped the tactical role of this system in preserving the constitutional balance.⁴⁵ He began by raising doubts about the validity of Harrington's widely-accepted thesis that political stability depended upon a coincidence between ⁴¹ E.g., the Act of Settlement, the Regency Bill (1788-89), and the dispute over parliamentary privileges during the Wilkes affair.

⁴² William Holdsworth, A History of English Law, 12 vols., 3rd ed. (London, 1922-38), Vol. 10, p. 55; Sir David Keir, The Constitutional History of Modern Britain, 3rd ed. (London, 1948), pp. 293-99.

⁴³ Holdsworth, p. 464.

⁴⁴ Sir Lewis B. Namier, The Structure of Politics at the Accession of George III, 2 vols. (London, 1922); England in the Age of the American Revolution (London, 1930); The Parliamentary Papers of John Robinson, 1774-1784, ed. William T. Laprade (London, 1922); Richard Pares, King George III and the Politicians (Oxford, 1953); George H. Guttridge, English Whiggism and the American Revolution (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1942).

⁴⁵ In this connection it should be noted that Burke, for all of his concern for the "nice equipoise" of the Constitution, was unaware of the degree to which the system of "influence" contributed towards that result. See his proposals for "economical reform" designed to implement Dunning's resolution of 1780 which warned against the Crown's system of "influence." Works, 12 vols. (London, 1815), Vol. 2, pp. 69-70.

property and political power.⁴⁶ The paradox of the British system, Hume contended, was that although property and power had gravitated from the King to the House of Commons, there was no evident disposition on the part of the House to usurp all the powers of government so as to leave the King helpless. It was apparent that the House could not be considered as a kind of passive funnel through which the propertied interests exerted overwhelming mastery. The question then became: what were the means by which the dominant partner of the constitution was confined within its proper limits? His answer was that the interest of the body is here restrained by that of the individuals, and that of the house of commons stretches not its power, because such an usurpation would be contrary to the interest of the majority of its members. The crown has so many offices at its disposal, that, when assisted by the honest and disinterested part of the house, it will always command the resolutions of the whole, so far, at least, as to preserve the ancient constitution from danger.⁴⁷

Rail as men may at the "invidious appellations of corruption and dependence," it must not be forgotten, as men are apt to do in the heat of party strife, that "some degree and some kind of it are inseparable from the very nature of the constitution, and necessary to the preservation of our mixed government."⁴⁸ The proper course for the zealots of liberty and parliamentary independence was not one of demanding a root-and-branch extirpation of patronage and its attendant evils, but of exercising prudent vigilance over "the proper degree of this dependence, beyond which it became dangerous to liberty."⁴⁹

More than any other observer, Hume saw that whatever balance there was in the constitution resembled less the mechanical equipoise of Newtonian forces than a restless equilibrium whose components were hidden from the prevailing formal and legalistic types of analysis. It followed that it was unrealistic to define rigidly the boundaries of power between the three main participants of the constitutional system.⁵⁰ Custom and expediency, not speculative reason, had shaped the constitution. Accordingly, these highly artificial political arrangements could not be measured by the rigors of abstract theory. Furthermore, as the system had demonstrated its ability to combine both liberty and order and had behind it the inertia of the settled habits of a nation, it was folly "to tamper . . . or try experiments upon the credit of supposed argument and philosophy. . . ." The "wise magistrate . . . though he may attempt some improvements for the public good, yet will he adjust his innovations as much as possible to the ancient fabric, and preserve entire the chief pillars and supports of the constitution."⁵¹

⁴⁶ Hume's criticisms of Harrington are scattered throughout the following essays: "Idea of a Perfect Commonwealth," "On the Independence of Parliament," and "Whether the British Monarchy inclines more to Absolute Monarchy, or to a Republic?"

⁴⁷ "Of the Independence of Parliament," Works, Vol. 3, p. 120.

⁴⁸ Ibid., p. 121.

⁴⁹ Ibid.

⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 121-22.

⁵¹ "Idea of a Perfect Commonwealth," Works, Vol. 3, p. 480. Hume was careful to preface this admittedly utopian essay with several remarks intended to underline his own affection for an established system which worked tolerably well.

V

Hume's "analytical conservatism" prepared the way for Burke in many respects. Although the latter possessed a conviction and passion which Hume lacked, many of the same materials had been worked over in Hume's writings. The emphasis on traditionalism, the importance of habit and sentiment, a disdain for "political projectors" (as Hume called them), and a fine feeling for the complexities of government were all to be found in Hume. Yet Hume's true uniqueness rested on his analysis of parties and the hidden conventions of the constitution. It was by far the keenest discussion of the century and far overshadowed in insight the partisan tracts of Bolingbroke and Burke. At the same time, his critique struck a note of realism that contributed in an important way to the decline of Locke's influence. Hume saw clearly, as the later philosophic radicals did not, that the arena of practical politics was not peopled by individuals pursuing their own aims in the splendid isolation of self-interest. Rather, the basic elements were political groups held together by individual leaders and by the cement of common interests and professed principles. This approach, reminiscent of the sociological methods of Montesquieu, also differed significantly from the legalism which pervaded the political thought of England at that time. The dominant tendency was to argue issues like electoral reform, representation, and colonial matters on the basis of law and precedent. The influence of Hardwicke, Mansfield, and Blackstone symbolized the alliance that had sprung up between law and politics.

Although Hume's appreciation of existing institutions and his realization of the long, painful, and largely unconscious process by which society is shaped led him in the same general direction as the lawyers, the journey was accomplished by his effecting a minor revolution in political thought. Politics was now to be conceived in psychological rather than juridical categories. Earlier writers, like Locke and Hobbes, while emphasizing the importance of human nature for the understanding of politics, had nevertheless approached this element as preliminary to the central juridical concept of contract. In this way, the political categories of allegiance, obligation, and justice assumed the status of logical derivatives from the basic concept of sovereignty (or as Locke preferred to call it, "supreme power") established by the contract. Hume, on the other hand, turned the procedure around: justice, obligation, and authority were consequences of human attitudes and expectations. These concepts were to be explained on psychological, not juridical grounds.

The psychologism of Hume was part of his general legacy to later conservatism, a legacy of empiricism in which the useful and the factual were made to cohere in subtle fashion. Yet it was also a legacy which later events superseded. Hume, appropriately enough, died in 1776, and from this point on revolutionary events worked to make a mockery of Hume's comfortable conclusions. The realm of fact provided cold comfort for conservatives; it was now controlled by the revolutionaries. The central fact of revolution could not be explained away, although a Burke might attribute it to intellectual perversity and a De Maistre to an avenging Deity. But if it could not be ignored, it could be transcended. So it was that conservatives began to turn to transcendental norms in order to combat the revolutionary appeal to reason; to weave from the diverse elements of irrationalism, romanticism, religion, and history a new vision of an older order; to replace an analytical conservatism by a metaphysical conservatism. In so doing they rejected much of Hume's naturalistic approach and substituted in its stead a philosophy of history, the idea that history had a "course" whose main outlines were determined by a divine hand operating from outside the confines of human time.

The final assessment of Hume raises certain difficulties. In some respects he typified conservatism, in others liberalism, and in still others he belonged to no school but his own. His conclusions in political matters carried strong overtones of conservatism, yet most conservatives of the period felt too uncomfortable with Hume's scepticism to welcome him as one of their own. Nevertheless, his conclusions were conservative for the reason that Hume never probed past a certain point nor carried his scepticism to its ultimate conclusions. He held too much respect for custom and tradition, and for their importance as social cements, to subject them to the kind of devastating critique which Voltaire and his allies were employing in France. With later conservatives he shared a distrust of reform, an hostility toward abstractions, and a scepticism of the claims of reason.

On the other hand, Hume stood close to the liberals of the century in the respect he accorded to liberty and property, and in his decided coolness toward religion and anything bordering on obscurantism. Above all, his political thought contained no traces of the particularist bent which was to play such an important role in later conservative thought. National history, national peculiarities and values had not yet replaced the universalist or European assumptions of seventeenth- and eighteenth-century rationalism.⁵²

It would be easy to conclude from these remarks that the categories of "liberal" and "conservative" were irrelevant when applied to Hume. This, however, would be misleading. The significant point is that Hume's position was symptomatic of the change that was taking place in English liberalism around the middle of the eighteenth century. Liberalism was becoming conservatized. Seventeenth-century liberalism, which had been compounded from the criticisms and protests of the Civil War period and then reshaped in more moderate fashion by the Glorious Revolution, had been transformed. It had lost its status as a challenge to the established order and had become the order itself. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, England was commit-

⁵² The exception to this point was Hume's interest in "national character." Although he suggested that certain common traits, such as similar manners and habits, could be discovered in a people who had been associated over a long period of time, this idea was not employed to prove any qualitative differences among peoples. Note also the statement in Human Understanding, sec. 8, pt. 1: "Would you know the sentiments, inclinations, and course of life of the Greeks and Romans? Study well the temper and actions of the French and English: You cannot be much mistaken in transferring to the former most of the observations which you have made with regard to the latter. Mankind are so much the same in all times and places, that history informs us of nothing new or strange in this particular."

ted to the idea of government under law, the superiority of Parliament, and the rights of Englishmen. The incorporation of liberal elements into the political structure worked to rid liberal thought of one of its central themes: its revolt against the idea of the organic community. The idea of a corporate society—compact, graded, deeply-niched by place and privilege—had been a commonplace in Tudor thought, as well as in the royalist doctrines of the seventeenth century.⁵³ The reaction to this belief in a close community, with all that it implied in social and political policies, can be traced not only in the radical doctrines of the Civil War, but also in such diverse thinkers as Hobbes and Locke. The systems of Hobbes and Locke began with abstractions which cut through the communal bonds of class, status, and hierarchy, leaving only unattached and undifferentiated individuals. In neither system was there a "sense of community."

Once English society was modified by the revolutionary changes of the seventeenth century, the theme of revolt was gradually replaced by a growing "sense of society," a quickening appreciation of the extent to which the values established by protest and revolt had become deeply dependent on communal arrangements of an unwritten and informal nature. Hume was representative of this changing temper, which prized the gains made possible by the upheavals of the previous century, and sought to preserve both the institutional achievements and their social undergirding. In this way, the assumption of an organic community, which had been cast aside during the seventeenth century, was being recaptured.

These developments form a background for Hume, as well as for English conservatism. For the uniqueness of this form of conservatism lies in the extent to which it had incorporated the results of the revolutionary experience of the seventeenth century. The master example here was Burke's pamphlet, An Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs; in it he conservatized the revolution of 1688, while at the same time liberalizing conservatism.

⁵³ John W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century, 2nd ed. (London, 1940), pp. 134ff; Christopher Morris, Political Thought in England: Tyndale to Hooker (London, 1953), pp. 68-126; Sheldon S. Wolin, "Richard Hooker and English Conservatism," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 6, pp. 28-47 (March, 1953); Francis D. Wormuth, The Royal Prerogative, 1603-1649 (Ithaca, 1939), pp. 83 ff.

THE CONSERVATIVE DILEMMA: REFLECTIONS ON THE POLITICAL THOUGHT OF METTERNICH

HENRY A. KISSINGER

Harvard University

I

The conservative in a revolutionary period always represents somewhat of an anomaly. Were society still cohesive, it would occur to no one to be a conservative for a serious alternative to the existing structure would be inconceivable. But a revolutionary period is a symptom precisely of the fact that the self-evidence of the goals of the social effort has disintegrated, that a significant segment of society holds values which either cannot or will not be assimilated. What had been taken for granted must now be defended and the act of defense introduces rigidity. The deeper the fissure, the more inflexible the contending positions and the greater the temptation to dogmatism. Were the "legitimate" structure still universally accepted, it would not be necessary to demonstrate its validity; but the act of defense exhibits the possibility of an alternative.

Once the existing legitimacy has been challenged, no real discourse between the contenders is possible any longer, for they cease to speak the same language. It is not the adjustment of differences within a political system which is now at issue, but the political system itself. Henceforth stability and reform, liberty and authority, come to appear as antithetical, and political contests turn doctrinal instead of empirical. When there is no consensus on what is considered "legitimate," no basis for agreement exists. Adjustments may occur but they will be conceived as tactical in order to consolidate positions for the inevitable showdown or as tools in the primary task of undermining the pattern of legitimacy of the antagonist.

This has nothing to do with the label of political parties. There have been societies, such as the United States or Britain in the nineteenth century, which have been basically conservative, so that existing parties could be considered at once conservative and progressive. There have been others, such as France for over a century, where all issues have been basically revolutionary, however the parties consider themselves, because of the existence of a fundamental social schism. The motivation of a stable social order is a concept of duty—the assertion of the self-evidence of the social maxims—where an alternative to the existing order is not rejected, but inconceivable. The motivation of a revolutionary period is a concept of loyalty, where the act of submitting the will acquires a symbolic and even ritualistic significance because alternatives seem ever present. An ethic of duty involves a notion of responsibility which judges actions by the orientation of the will. It is for this reason an ethic of motivation, striving for an identification of the individual code with a standard of morality which, no matter how rigid, must become individually accepted in order to be meaningful. An ethic of loyalty involves a notion of orthodoxy, because it is a means to achieve a group identity. It is therefore an ethic of relation to group standards which may be validated in any number of ways: by rationality, tradition, charisma, etc. It does not exclude the identity of the individual with the social code, but it does not require it. "My country right or wrong"—this is the language of loyalty. "So act that your actions could become by your will universal laws of nature"—this is the language of duty. Duty expresses the aspect of universality, loyalty that of contingency.

But what is the conservative to do in a revolutionary situation? A stable social order lives with an intuition of permanence and opposition to it is either ignored or attempted to be assimilated. The fundamental conservative position, therefore, involves a denial of the validity of the revolutionary's question regarding the legitimacy of authority, but the question if capable of exacting a reply has indicated a kind of validity. Thus conservatism, whenever it ceases to be a way of life and emerges as a political movement, runs the risk of becoming the symbol of a revolutionary period. For what does it profit a conservative to emerge victorious in a battle of wills, in a struggle which only deepens the fissures and accelerates the revolutionary development? It is no accident that in revolutionary contests the conservative position comes to be dominated by its reactionary—that is, counterrevolutionary—wing, the group which fights in terms of will and with an ethic of loyalty. For the true conservative is not at home in social struggle. He will attempt to avoid an unbridgeable schism, because he knows that a stable social structure thrives not on triumphs but on reconciliations.

How then can the conservative rescue his position from the contingency of conflicting claims? How can that which is persuade when its self-evidence has disintegrated? By fighting as anonymously as possible, has been the classic conservative reply, so that if the answer must be given it will transcend the will, so that the contest occurs at least on a plane beyond the individual, so that obligation can become duty and not loyalty. To fight for conservatism in the name of history, to reject the validity of the revolutionary challenge because of its denial of the temporal aspect of society and the social contract—this was the answer of Burke. To fight for conservatism in the name of reason, to deny the validity of the revolutionary question on epistemological grounds, as contrary to the structure of the universe—this was the answer of Metternich.

The difference between the two conservative positions, although in many respects a question of emphasis, proved fundamental in application. To Burke the ultimate standard of social obligation was history; to Metternich it was reason. To Burke history was the expression of the "ethos" of a people; to Metternich it was a force to be dealt with, more important than most social forces but of no greater moral validity. Burke denied the revolutionaries' premise that reason supplied the sufficient basis for social obligation and his challenge was therefore destined to have no immediate effect. Metternich fought his battles in the name of the very Enlightenment that had produced his opponents and his was therefore a mortal challenge. To Burke, a revolution was an offense against social morality, the violation of the sacred contract of a nation's historical constitution. To Metternich, it was a violation of the dictates of reason, to be combatted not because it was immoral, but because it was disastrous. Historical conservatism abhors revolution as undermining the individual expression of a nation's tradition; rationalist conservatism fights it as preventing the implementation of universal social maxims.

It was this rationalist conception of conservatism which imparted the rigidity to Metternich's policy and to his interpretation of the complementary issues of the nature of freedom and the meaning of authority which shape all political thought. The West has produced two basic replies: freedom as the absence of restraint and freedom as the voluntary acceptance of authority. The former position considers freedom to reside outside of the sphere of authority; the latter conceives freedom as a quality of authority. The negative version of freedom is the expression of a society transcending its political structure, a society which, as in Locke, exists prior to the state and whose political organization becomes like a company of limited liability organized for the achievement of determinate goals. In such a society the issue of conservatism against reform tends to appear as a question of emphasis, of greater or lesser change on problems of determinate form and content. Since the significant field of activity occurs outside the governmental sphere, politics has a utilitarian, but not an ethical function; it is useful, not moral. A society implementing Locke's concept of freedom is always conservative, whatever form its political contests take. Were it not, it could not operate a system whose strength resides in its social cohesiveness, in the things which are "taken for granted." Burke's defense of conservatism had for this reason no applicability to the British domestic scene, but was directed against its misapprehension by foreigners.

But the Continent has never been able to accept the Anglo-Saxon version of freedom. Before the French Revolution, this was because Locke's became the philosophy of an accomplished revolution, a doctrine of reconciliation which lacked the logical rigor of a call to action. Afterwards it was because the French Revolution, unlike the British, had produced a fundamental social schism. Cohesive societies can regulate themselves through custom which reveals that disputes are peripheral. Societies which contain fundamental schisms must rely on law, the definition of a compulsory relationship. Thus Kant and Rousseau, not Locke, were the representatives of the Continental version of liberty which sought freedom in the identification of the will with the general interest and considered government freest not when it governed least, but when it governed justly. To the British conservative, the social problem was one of adjustment, to protect the social sphere by timely political concession. But to his Continental counterpart, the problem was one of conservation in the literal sense, because to him political concession was equivalent to social surrender. For one can make concessions only to something. When state and society are two different entities, this is no problem. But when they are identical, a concession is a confession of failure, an avowal of the end of the conservative structure, a recognition of an unbridgeable social schism. Thus even at the end of his life, after his era had long ended, Metternich could still object to a speech by a British Peelite, Sir James Graham, that the statesman's wisdom consisted of recognizing the proper moment for making concessions: "My conception of statesmanship differs completely. The true merit of a statesman . . . consists of governing so as to avoid a situation in which concessions become necessary."¹ Therefore, too, Metternich's characteristic pose of the philosopher-king who stood above the plane where personal feelings rule, cool, composed, superior.

Had Metternich been born fifty years earlier, he would still have been a conservative, but there would have been no need to write pedantic disquisitions about the nature of his conservatism. He would have moved through the salons of the fashionable world with his undeniable charm and grace, subtly conducting his diplomacy with the fine indirection which is itself the symbol of certainty, of a world in which everybody understands intangibles in the same manner. He would still have played at philosophy, for this was the vogue of the 18th century, but he would not have considered it a tool of policy. But in a period of permanent revolution, philosophy was the only means of rescuing universality from contingent claims. It was for this reason that Metternich fought so insistently against the identification of his name with his period, an attitude seemingly so inconsistent with his vanity. If there was a "Metternich system" his achievements would be personal, his battle meaningless. "My 'system,' " he maintained, "is nothing but the dictates of right reason."² And at the end of his life, he still could write:

For thirty-nine years I played the role of rock from which the waves recoil . . . until finally they succeed in engulfing it. They did not become calm however, afterwards, for what caused their turmoil was not the rock but their inherent unrest. The removal of the obstacle did not alter the situation, nor could it have. . . . I would like to call out to the representatives of social upheaval: "Citizen of a world that exists but in your dreams, nothing is altered. On March 14³ nothing happened save the elimination of a single man."⁴

It was thus that the Enlightenment retained deep into the nineteenth century its last champion, who judged actions by their "truth," not by their success, an advocate of reason in an age of philosophical materialism, who never surrendered his belief that morality could be known and that virtue was teachable. "These maxims have been proved true," he maintained in 1822. "Policy is based not on novels, but on history; not on faith, but on knowledge."⁵ "The world," he wrote to the Tsar in 1817, "is suffering from a very special disease, which, as all epidemics, will pass away, that of mysticism. . . . It would be easier today to renew the sermons of Peter the Hermit than to make clear to the afflicted that God demands another service than the shedding of blood and that no man can judge the conscience of his fellows."⁶ When another Napoleon appeared on the scene, thirty-five years after the defeat of his great predecessor, Metternich considered this not a personal failure but the illustration of a philo-

¹ Metternich, Aus Metternich's Nachgelassenen Papieren, 8 vols. (Vienna, 1881), Vol. 8, p. 562. This collection will be hereinafter cited as NP.

² NP, Vol. 8, p. 235.

³ March 14, 1848, the day of Metternich's resignation as Staatskanzler.

⁴ NP, Vol. 8, p. 232.

⁵ NP, Vol. 3, p. 542.

⁶ NP, Vol. 3, pp. 52ff.

sophical insight: "The millions of votes for Louis Napole  n are only the expression of an instinctive feeling that without order there can exist no social life and without authority no order. Today this truth calls itself Napoleon; so old has the world become that truth must assume a personal name, because all other roads have been closed to it."⁷ Truth must assume a personal name—this is the tragedy of the rationalist conservative, just as history with a personal name is that of the historical conservative. And the anonymity of the truth was also the paradox of the Enlightenment. When truth is strong, its foundation is faith, if only in a theory of knowledge. When truth is challenged, it becomes a dogma.

So it came about that Metternich in his never-ending battle against revolution went back to the doctrines of the age in which he had been brought up, but interpreted them with an inflexibility totally unnecessary when they were still taken for granted and which distorted their essence in application. He was still of the generation to whom the "great clockwork" or the "golden age" was more than an idle dream. There was a fitness in the universe which corresponded to man's noblest aspirations, a well-ordered mechanism the understanding of which ensured success and whose laws could not be violated with impunity: "States, just as human beings, often transgress laws; the only difference is the severity of their penalty."⁸ "Society has its laws just as nature and man. It is with old institutions as with old men: they can never be young again. . . . This is the way of the social order and it cannot be different because it is the law of nature . . . the moral world has its storms just like the material one."⁹ Metternich used these truisms of eighteenth-century philosophy to oppose revolution and liberalism not because they were wicked, but because they were wrong; not only because he did not wish to live in the world his opponents attempted to create, but also because this world was doomed to failure. Revolution was an assertion of will and of power, but the essence of existence was proportion, its expression law, and its mechanism an equilibrium.

For these reasons the conservative statesman was the supreme realist and his opponents the "visionaries." "I am a man of prose," Metternich insisted in his political testament, "and not of poetry." "My point of departure is the quiet contemplation of the affairs of this world, not those of the other of which I know nothing and which are the object of faith, which is in strict opposition to knowledge. . . . In the social world . . . one must act cold-bloodedly, based on careful observation and without hatred or prejudice. . . . I was born to make history, not to write novels, and if I guess correctly this is because I know. Invention is the enemy of history, which knows only discoveries, and only that which exists can be discovered."¹⁰ Statesmanship was the science of the interests of states¹¹ subject to laws entirely analogous to the laws of the physical world. The statesman was a philosopher who understood these maxims, who performed his tasks but reluctantly, for they deflected him from the source of the only real enjoy-

⁷ NP, Vol. 8, p. 197.

⁸ NP, Vol. 1, p. 35.

⁹ NP, Vol. 3, p. 322.

¹⁰ NP, Vol. 8, p. 184.

¹¹ NP, Vol. 1, p. 33.

ment, the contemplation of truth,¹² who was responsible only to his conscience and to history—to the former because it contained his vision of truth, to the latter because it provided the only test of its validity.¹³

II

What then were the insights which Metternich's maxims revealed to him? They showed a universe governed by law, not in the modern sense of an interpretation of events but as their attribute. To disregard the law and its dictates of harmony and equilibrium was not so much morally wrong as physically disastrous:

Isolated states exist only as the abstractions of so-called philosophers. In the society of states each state has interests . . . which connect it with the others. The great axioms of political science derive from the recognition of the true interests of all states; it is in the general interest that the guarantee of existence is to be found, while particular interests—the cultivation of which is considered political wisdom by restless and short-sighted men—have only a secondary importance. Modern history demonstrates the application of the principle of solidarity and equilibrium . . . and of the united efforts of states . . . to force a return to the common law.¹⁴

And just as in the political world the equilibrium reflected a balance between the forces of aggression and the forces of resistance, so the social order revealed an uneasy tension between the conserving and the destructive tendencies inherent in any body social. It was the task of statesmanship to distinguish the form and the substance of this contest and to create the moral foundation of an order on which only time could confer spontaneity. This led to another distinction, so often considered by the rationalist as the solution and not the definition of a problem: Man can only create Chartes, which have the value of programmatic announcements; it is time which makes constitutions.¹⁵

¹² NP, Vol. 3, p. 242, or p. 357, among many examples.

¹³ That Catholic Austria should have as its First Minister an intellectual contemporary of Kant and Voltaire may appear a paradox. But the relationship of the Holy Roman Empire to the Pope was not uninfluenced by the memory of five hundred years of struggle. Nor had the reforms of Joseph II, who had expelled the Jesuits and broken the political influence of the Church, ever been repealed. Moreover, the Pope was to Metternich not only a spiritual ruler but a second-class Italian prince and Metternich was determined that Austria dominate the Italian peninsula. At the Congress of Vienna his treatment of the Papal Secretary of State was peremptory and in 1817 he even toyed with the idea of making an Austrian archduke a Cardinal, the better to cement his position at the Vatican. Not religious ties but philosophical and political agreement characterizes Metternich's correspondence with the Papal Secretary of State when the Church and Austria marched hand in hand. See Metternich et Consalvi, Correspondence, ed. Charles van Duerem (Louvain, 1899). The following letter by Metternich to Nesselrode, the Russian Foreign Minister, makes clear his attitude towards the Church: ". . . No Catholic power is more independent, . . . of the views of the Court of Rome than we. The heir of so many Holy Roman Emperors and the nephew of Joseph II knows what he owes God and what to his honor: our ecclesiastical departments may extend their dogma regarding the rights of the Crown too far, and if it is too far it is surely not in favor of the Court of Rome that they tip the scale." NP, Vol. 3, p. 57. Metternich was not irreligious, but he admired the Church more for its utility and its civilizing influence than for its "truth."

¹⁴ NP, Vol. 1, p. 334.

¹⁵ NP, Vol. 7, p. 636, Vol. 8, p. 525.

Metternich therefore opposed the efforts of his contemporaries to construct ideal constitutions for two reasons. They overlooked the factor of time, not in Burke's sense of an almost hallowed entity, but as one of the most potent social forces. And they were unrealistic because they took no account of the differing requirements of the national character:

That constitution is best which most completely corresponds to the material and moral requirements of the national character. . . . There is no universal recipe for constitutions, any more than for the advancement of health. . . . That constitutions influence national character is undeniable truth, but its counterpart is no less true, that lasting constitutions must be a product of this character, and not of an excited, and therefore fleeting, public opinion.¹⁶

The whole discussion about constitutions was in any case beside the point. Anything that existed was subject to law and the expression of law in the political world is a constitution: "A state without a constitution is an abstraction just as an individual without a corresponding psyche."¹⁷

It was for this reason contradictory to attempt to achieve freedom by means of constitutional guarantees: "Rights," according to Metternich, could not be created, they existed. Whether they were affirmed or not was an incidental, essentially technical, question and had nothing to do with freedom. Nobody could transgress laws, not even kings—reminiscent of Grotius' classic phrase that not even God could make two plus two equal five. To guarantee rights was therefore a paradox; it was to clothe in the language of power what can only be a statement of fact, to endow with an arbitrary existence what has eternal validity:

Things which ought to be taken for granted lose their force when they emerge in the form of arbitrary pronouncements. . . . The mania of law-making is a symptom of the disease which has ravaged the world for sixty-two years. . . . Natural, moral or material forces are not fit subjects of human regulation. What would one say of a Charte which side by side with the Rights of Man exhibited the laws of gravitation? . . . If there is no God, He will not be created by pronouncements; if He exists, He will not require human recognition to achieve divinity. . . . Objects mistakenly made subject to legislation result only in the limitation, if not the complete annulment, of that which is attempted to be safeguarded.¹⁸

Here, then, was the rationalist belief in rights as an attribute of the universe, the aristocrat's vision of the inseparability of power and responsibility, the Enlightenment's faith in the connection between order and freedom. While it asserted the existence of "rights" transcending any human construction, indeed from which human construction could only detract, it emphasized a fundamental contradiction of democratic theory: the view of human nature which insisted on man's capacity for self-government was combined in the same theory with another view of human nature which limited the scope of this government. Why, if man is conscious of arbitrary oppression, should he wish to oppress others? Why should universal rights be guaranteed? This has, of course, never been a problem in Anglo-Saxon countries where the relation between state and society has had a juristic, not an ethical foundation. In such cases constitutional guarantees have had the value of the differences between explicit and implicit limitations on a government in any case understood as limited. But in an "ethical state" an explicit limitation on government is meaningless. If the state justifies itself not by its utility but by its morality, there exists no tribunal before which to appeal its measures. If the sanction is not juridic but ethical, limitation can come about only by self-restraint, not by constitutional guarantees.

¹⁶ NP, Vol. 7, p. 637.

¹⁷ NP, Vol. 7, p. 635.

¹⁸ NP, Vol. 8, p. 557f.

This was the challenge of the conservative statesman to his liberal opponents: if the conservative became an unwilling symbol of a revolutionary period by being forced into a definition of the nature of authority, the liberal contradicted himself by identifying freedom with constitutional guarantees. To be sure, Metternich did not have a solution of his own to the query regarding the nature of freedom, because he thought it inseparable from the notion of authority. But, equally, his opponents had not really dealt with the problem of authority which they thought exhausted in the definition of freedom. And yet they were closer than they realized, for had one asked Metternich as to the limits of authority and his opponents as to the limits of freedom, both would have answered with one word which indicated that to them the question was essentially meaningless: reason, self-evident and sovereign, which contained its applicability in its very conception, would trace the boundary of freedom as well as of necessity. That the categorical imperative was capable of contingent interpretation was inconceivable to Kant. That a sovereign should substitute force for law was not inconceivable to Metternich, but he considered it suicidal and therefore unlikely. It is this which gave the dispute between Metternich and the liberals the bitterness of a civil war, at least on the "democratic" side. For Metternich was an opponent who fought liberalism in the name of the very universality it claimed for itself, whose mode of argument represented as much of a challenge to his opponents as their existence did to him. It is difficult, indeed, for a rationalistic philosophy to survive the demonstration that the same premise can lead to two diametrically opposed conclusions.

III

If Metternich considered the quest for formal constitutions chimerical, he saw in revolutions a physical disaster. In a universe characterized by the balance between the forces of conservation and those of destruction, revolution was due to a disturbance of the equilibrium in favor of the latter. But since the equilibrium was the "natural" condition, a revolution could achieve no more than a dislocation straining towards a new integration. The disorders attendant on revolutions were therefore symptoms of a transitional period and their violence a reflection of the ignorance of their advocates: "Revolutions are temporary disturbances in the life of states . . . Order always ends up by reclaiming its own: states do not die like individuals, they transform themselves. It is the task of statesmanship . . . to guide this transformation and to supervise its direction."¹⁹ The difference between a conservative and a revolutionary order was not the fact of change but its mode:

¹⁹ NP, Vol. 8, p. 468.

A consideration the liberal spirit usually ignores . . . is the difference in the life of states, as of individuals, between progress by measured steps or by leaps. In the first case, conditions develop with the consequence of natural law; while the latter disrupts this connection. . . . Nature is development, the ordered succession of appearances; only such a course can eliminate the evil and foster the good. But leaping transitions wind up by requiring entirely new creations—and it is not given to man to create out of nothingness.²⁰

Civilization, then, was the degree to which change could come about “naturally,” to which the tension between the forces of destruction and of conservation was submerged in a spontaneous pattern of obligation. Thus true civilization had come only with the advent of Christianity, which made authority inviolable, obedience sacrosanct, and self-abnegation divine²¹—the rationalist’s functional interpretation of religion.

It is expressive of the conservative dilemma that Metternich’s pronouncements on the nature of authority are truistic—because a conservative takes it for granted; and that those on the meaning of freedom are skimpy—because he considered the question meaningless. But his analysis of the nature of revolutions is lucid and powerful. In 1820, while arranging the series of congresses designed to defeat revolutions in Germany and Italy, Metternich wrote a “profession of faith” which coupled an analysis of the nature of revolution with a philosophy of history.²² Up to the sixteenth century, Metternich maintained, the forces of conservation and of destruction had been in an increasingly spontaneous balance. But then there occurred three events which, in time, caused civilization to be supplanted by violence and order by chaos: the invention of printing, the development of gun powder, and the discovery of America. Printing facilitated the exchange of ideas which thereby became vulgarized; the invention of gun powder changed the balance between offensive and defensive weapons; and the discovery of America transformed the situation both materially and psychologically. By the influx of precious metals it produced a sudden change in the value of landed property, which is the foundation of a conservative order, and by the prospect of rapid fortunes it brought about a spirit of adventure and a dissatisfaction with existing conditions. And then the reformation completed the process by overturning the moral world and exalting man above the forces of history.

All this gave rise to a type of individual who symbolized the revolutionary era: the presumptuous man, the natural product of a too-rapid march of the human spirit towards seeming perfection:

Religion, morality, legislation, economics, politics, administration, all seem to have become a common good and accessible to everyone. Science appears intuitive, experience has no value for the presumptuous; faith means nothing to him and he substitutes for it the pretense of a personal conviction, to arrive at which, however, he dispenses with analysis or study, for these seem too subordinate activities to a mind which believes itself capable of embracing at one blow the whole ensemble of issues. Laws have no value for him because he did not contribute to their preparation and it is below the dignity of a man of his quality to recognize limits traced by ignorant and brute generations. Power resides in himself; why submit to what can have use only to men deprived . . . of insight? That which was appropriate for an age of weakness is no longer adequate for that of reason . . . [All this] tends to an order of things which individualizes all the elements which compose society. . . .²³

²⁰ NP, Vol. 7, p. 638.

²¹ NP, Vol. 8, p. 242.

²² NP, Vol. 3, pp. 400 ff.

It would be difficult to find a more tragic statement or one more symbolic of the nature of revolutions. For its significance lay not in its content but in the fact that it was beside the point. What was intended as sarcasm—the exhibition of an incommensurability between pretense and reality—amounted to no more than the description of the objectives of his opponents. That which Metternich believed he merely needed to exhibit to reduce to absurdity, his opponents thought required only an affirmation in order to be validated. It was the inevitable revolutionary misunderstanding, the reluctance to admit that “truth” may not be self-evident. While Metternich desperately attempted to protect “reality” against its enemies, the issue became increasingly a debate about its nature and the nature of “truth.” Had “reality” still proved unambiguous, he would not have needed to affirm it. By the increasing insistence of his affirmation, he testified to its disintegration.

Metternich next distinguished the presumptuous by type and by origin. They were composed of levellers and theoreticians: the former, men of powerful wills and strong determination; the latter, theoreticians living in a world of their own. But whatever guise presumption assumed, its place of origin was the middle class. The revolutionary aristocrat was a lost soul, destined to become the victim of the Revolution or to be degraded by being forced to play the role of courtier to his inferiors. And the mass of the population always distrusted change and craved only the equal protection of laws in order to pursue their hard calling. But the middle class—the lawyers, the writers, the bureaucrats, the half-educated, owning the means of communication, ambitious but without goal, dissatisfied but unable to offer an alternative—this was the real organ of revolution. It was no accident, concluded Metternich, that the revolution occurred not in the poorest, but in the richest country of Europe, not in the most backward but in the most advanced state, so demoralized that “the revolution had already triumphed in the palace of the kings and in the boudoirs of the towns before it even began to prepare itself in the mass of the people.”

The Revolution could not have triumphed then but for the weakness of the government and for having at its disposal a myth whose literal application proved ruinous: the attempt to transplant British institutions to the continent. “Among the causes of the tremendous confusion characterizing present-day Europe,” wrote Metternich in later life, paralleling his “profession of faith,” “is the transplantation of British institutions to the Continent, where they are in complete contradiction to existing conditions, so that their application becomes either illusory or distorted. The so-called ‘British school’ has been the cause of the French Revolution and the consequences of this revolution, so anti-British in tendency, devastate Europe today. The concepts of freedom and order are so inseparable in the British mind that the last stable-boy would laugh in the face of the reformers if they appeared by preaching his freedom. . . . This is because the English are only concerned with the substance, never with the form."²⁴ The wars of the French Revolution had spread these principles across Europe and only the hatred of Bonaparte delayed, for a little while, their baneful impact, largely through a misunderstanding. For the war, fought by the kings against Napoleon, was fought by the people in part against their own masters in the hope of obtaining from them the realization of the promises of the French Revolution. The wise peace concluded in 1814 might have inaugurated a period of tranquility, but Napoleon's return from Elba undid in one hundred days his work of fourteen years of power. By unleashing the revolution in France, he exposed Europe to unending social strife.²⁵

²³ NP, Vol. 3, p. 405.

IV

This was a powerful analysis of the cause of the unrest sweeping across Europe. But its power was at the same time its bane. For if the revolutionary spirit was so widespread, how could it be combatted? If the causes of the revolution were so fundamental, dating so far back in history, what possible remedy could exist? If the middle class was so potent, how could it be dealt with? By gradual integration, by learning moderation and the need for adaptation, a Burke might have answered. Even Castlereagh could still advise Louis XVIII that revolutionaries "are nowhere so little to be dreaded as in office, mixed up with other material. Tyrants may poison an obnoxious character but the only means a constitutional monarch has to restrain him is to employ him."²⁶ But to Metternich, the rationalist conservative, this solution was a dangerous evasion. To the product of the Enlightenment, political problems had to assume the precision of logical antinomies and he therefore sharpened the differences instead of smoothing them over. If the forces of destruction were rampant, it was the task of the conservative to strengthen those of order. If the cry for reform was universal, it was all the more imperative to resist in the name of authority.

In this manner the equation, freedom = voluntary submission to order, became in practice a definition of sterility and unexceptional maxims, justifications for inaction. So it happened that Metternich never tired of comparing concessions to popular clamor to squandering capital; therefore the basic maxim "that in the middle of agitated passions one can not think of reforming; wisdom in such situations confines itself to maintaining."²⁷ Therefore the increasingly rigid opposition to any change, for change symbolized the possibility of yielding to pressure: "Where everything is tottering, it is above all necessary that something, no matter what, remain steadfast, so that the lost can find a connection and the strayed a refuge."²⁸ This accounted for the preference for Napoleon over the

²⁴ NP, Vol. 8, p. 218 ²⁵ NP, Vol. 3, p. 409.

²⁶ Charles K. Webster, The Foreign Policy of Castlereagh, 2 vols. (London, 1931), Vol. 1, p. 547.

²⁷ NP, Vol. 3, p. 415.

²⁸ Heinrich Srbik, Metternich, der Staatsmann und der Mensch, 2 vols. (Munich, 1925), Vol. 1, p. 354.

Bourbons, despite the "legitimacy" of the latter; to Metternich, legitimacy was not an end but a tool, and when it conflicted with the requirements of stability, it had to yield. Therefore, paradoxically, Metternich became a defender of existing institutions, however much he might deplore them, because their overthrow would be an even more dangerous symbol. When in the panic of 1820 the Grand-Duke of Baden offered to abolish his constitution, Metternich replied: "Every order lawfully established bears within itself the principle of a better system. . . A Charte, in any case, is not a constitution. It is up to the government to separate good and evil, to strengthen public authority and to protect the repose and the happiness of nations against hostile attack."²⁹

It was a futile contest, a tour de force leading to self-destruction, this effort to bring about change through order and to identify order with tranquility in the middle of a revolutionary period. It was really, despite its protestations to the contrary, an effort to recapture a lost innocence, a quest for a period when obligation was spontaneous, an aristocratic notion of government as the reciprocal execution of duties. The "Metternich system" answered the question of the cause of the revolution, but gave no indication of a solution once the revolution had occurred. It spoke abstractly of its readiness to reform, but never discussed what specific measures it would consider appropriate. As late as 1851, Metternich could give no better advice to the then Minister, Schwarzenberg, than to strengthen the landed aristocracy, as if the middle class could still be crushed. The assertion that revolutions were always the fault of governments, that only action could conserve, was unexceptionable. But in practice it led to a vicious circle because Metternich, although not opposed to reform in principle, wanted it as an emanation of order, while his opponents desired the same thing in the name of change. The result was a stalemate, a triumph of form over substance.

Metternich's thus became a never-ending quest for a moment of tranquility, for a suspension, if only for an instant, of the flux of life, so that what happened, perhaps inevitably, could be represented as a universal principle instead of an assertion of will and of indeterminacy. It was as if a physicist, unable to measure both position and velocity of the electron accurately, bent all his energies to making the electron hold still, if only a fraction of a second, because this would enable him to chart its course for eternity. Or like the driver of a car heading out of control in an unknown direction down a precipitate mountain road, too narrow for turning around; if he could but capture the wheel, he would still have to descend the mountain, but it would represent will and not chance. So it happened that Metternich's insights, however powerful, became increasingly dogmatic. While he might have been right in asserting that those who have never had a past cannot own the future, one must add that those who have had a past may doom themselves by seeking it in the future.

And still in all this obtuseness there was an element of grandeur. For Metternich had no illusions about the probable developments; he saw his task in ameliorating their inevitable consequences:

²⁹ NP, Vol. 3, p. 375.

The existing society is on the decline. Nothing ever stands still . . . and society has reached its zenith. Under such conditions to advance means to descend. . . . Such periods appear interminable to contemporaries, but what are two to three hundred years in the annals of history? . . . My life has fallen into a terrible period. I was born either too soon or too late. . . . Formerly I would have enjoyed life, later I could have helped in the reconstruction. Now I spend my time shoring up decaying buildings.³⁰

He fought the revolution not because it was impossible but because it was "unnatural." And he combatted democracy because "authority is an expression of the power of permanence; while in [parliamentary government] power appears under the aspect of transitoriness . . . I understand that little minds like to think of themselves as the expression of power, but it is equally without doubt that the opponents of all authority like to see it reduced to personal terms, because it will facilitate their effort to eliminate it . . ."³¹ Because he considered order the expression of the equilibrium and equilibrium the reflection of the structure of the universe, he was certain that the "basic interests" of states would reassert themselves in the end. But he predicted that the revolutionaries would be horrified by the world they were bringing about.³² The greater the dislocation, the more violent the interregnum of chaos. Despotism, to Metternich, was not the absence of guaranteed rights, but government without universal maxims. Tyranny was not the cause of revolutions, but their likely result. And the more the forces of destruction succeeded in undermining the social order, the more authority—the inevitable expression of society—would have to assume personal shape, the conservative's vision of arbitrariness: "The word freedom," Metternich wrote in his political testament, "has for me never had the character of a point of departure but of a goal. The point of departure is order, which alone can produce freedom. Without order the appeal to freedom is no more than the quest of some specific party for its special objectives and will in practice always lead to tyranny. Because I have been a man of order, my efforts were directed towards the attainment of a real, not a deceptive freedom. . . . I have always considered despotism of any kind a symptom of weakness. Where it appears it condemns itself; most intolerably where it appears behind the mask of advancing the cause of liberty."³³

It was thus that Metternich posed the conservative challenge as the need to transcend the assertion of exclusive validity of the will and as the requirement to limit the claims of power. It was a redefinition of the classic theological version of humility, "Thy will be done," with reason taking the place of God. It represented an effort to deal with the most fundamental problem of politics, which is not the control of wickedness but the limitation of righteousness. To "punish" the wicked is a relatively easy matter because it is a simple expression of public morality. To restrain the exercise of righteous power is more difficult because it asserts that right exists in time as well as in space; that voli-

³⁰ NP, Vol. 3, pp. 347 ff.

³¹ NP, Vol. 8, p. 467. He did not apply this to Great Britain, where he saw the permanence of authority expressed in the phrase "His Majesty's Government."

³² NP, Vol. 8, p. 235.

³³ NP, Vol. 7, pp. 633 ff.

tion, however noble, is limited by forces transcending the will; that the achievement of self-restraint is the ultimate challenge of the social order. Metternich dealt with this problem by asserting that excess in any direction was disruptive of society. The individual will was contingent because man was an aspect of forces transcending him, of society and its historical expression, the state, which were products of nature as surely as man himself, for they reflected his basic needs for justice and order. Because they were "natural," states had a life cycle just as human beings, only they were incapable of the ultimate human solace: they could not die, they had to pay the price of all their transgressions.³⁴

It was only appropriate, therefore, that the last act of the conservative statesman was of a symbolic nature, a plea for the anonymity which alone could justify his maxims. When, in 1848, a deputation of the victorious revolution called his resignation "generous," the aged Metternich replied: "I protest solemnly against this term. Only a Sovereign can be generous; my action is the result of my sense of right and my concept of duty." Thus the final gesture of the "doctor of Revolutions" was a last desperate assertion of order, of the precedence of right over will even in defeat after half a century of struggle. And when one of the deputies insisted on using the term "generous" Metternich replied: "In resigning I anticipate another claim, that I have carried the monarchy away with me. But this is not the case. No individual has shoulders strong enough to carry an Empire; if states disappear, it is because they lose faith in themselves."³⁵ This was Metternich's personal tragedy: history can illustrate logic but not prove it and although it teaches its lessons surely, it does not do so in a single lifetime. And it was also the final symbolization of the conservative dilemma: that it is the task of the conservative not to defeat but to forestall revolutions, that a society which cannot prevent a revolution, the disintegration of whose values has been demonstrated by the fact of revolution, will not be able to defeat it by conservative means, that order once shattered can be restored only by the experience of chaos.

³⁴ NP, Vol. 1, p. 334.

³⁵ NP, Vol. 7, p. 626; Vol. 8, p. 212.

THE CONTEMPORARY DOCTRINE OF THE SOVIET STATE AND ITS PHILOSOPHICAL FOUNDATIONS

VERNON V. ASPATURIAN
The Pennsylvania State University

I. THE REPUDIATION OF THE MARXIST THEORY OF THE STATE IN THE SOVIET UNION

"The problem of the 'dying away' of the state," observed A. Y. Vyshinsky rather sarcastically in a recent monograph, "is a purely theoretical problem."¹ Within the context of contemporary Soviet political theory, the accuracy of this observation is beyond question, although Vyshinsky would have been the first to admit that a "theoretical problem," no matter how pristine, always reflects a practical quandary within the methodological precepts of Marxist-Leninist ideology. This particular theoretical problem conceals an important chapter in the profound transmutation of Marxist political theory and its philosophical substructure in the Soviet Union, for it was the failure to cope adequately with this utopian legacy which led to the abandonment of the eschatological categories of the Marxist doctrine and the erection of a totally new theoretical edifice supported by new philosophical foundations.

Contrary to widespread impression, the theoretical problem of the Soviet state was not satisfactorily resolved at the 18th Party Congress in 1939, although the view is prevalent that Stalin was able to provide an adequate rationalization for the existence of the state in Soviet society. It was on this occasion that the late Soviet leader explained that the state was a necessary institution because of "capitalist encirclement" and that it would persist in socialist and communist society until this encirclement was finally liquidated.² Pragmatic expedients, unconnected with basic philosophical premises, however, do not constitute an exegesis of Marxist political doctrine, for Stalin's pontifications constituted not a new theory of the state—nor even a revised theory—but nothing more than a formal and open repudiation of Marxist political theory.

One of the outstanding facts of this Congress was Stalin's candid confession that Soviet political theory had reached a nadir in its evolution. The case could hardly have been otherwise, since Stalin in 1930 had embarked on a steady course of systematically rejecting Marxist political formulae and of purging his associates who differed with him on the theory of the state, notably Bukharin.³ Utter confusion reigned in the minds of the surviving party intelligentsia concerning the question of the state. The Soviet state was a psychological burden that weighed upon them like a bad dream. Engels had said that "the state is the admission that this society . . . is cleft into irreconcilable antagonisms, which it is powerless to exorcise,"⁴ and Lenin taught that "the existence of the state proves that class antagonisms are irreconcilable."⁵ These views contrasted violently with Stalin's commentary on the new Constitution, wherein he stated that all class antagonisms had disappeared in Soviet society, yet promised "The transformation of the dictatorship into . . . a more powerful system of guidance of society by the state."⁶ Clearly the Soviet intelligentsia had good reason to suffer from creative inadequacies in the field of political theory, as charged by Stalin, who cavalierly accused them of refusing to recognize that certain of the general propositions of the Marxist doctrine of the state were incompletely worked out and were inadequate.⁷

¹ A. Y. Vyshinsky, The Teachings of Lenin and Stalin on the Proletarian Revolution and the State (London, 1948), pp. 115-16.

² J. V. Stalin, Leninism: Selected Writings (New York, 1942), p. 474.

³ See Stalin, Political Report to the Sixteenth Congress (London, 1930), pp. 171-72; Leninism: Selected Writings, pp. 77-133 (for Stalin's attacks on Bukharin's views on the withering away of the state), and pp. 267, 340-41, 395 (for the various reservations introduced into the withering away theory between the years 1930 and 1939).

Stalin explicitly abandoned traditional Marxist theory by proclaiming the Soviet state a state de novo, completely unforeseen by Marx, Engels, or Lenin; consequently, it could not be analyzed in accordance with traditional Marxist categories. Unlike historical states, the Soviet state was unencumbered with functions of exploitation; it was engaged in purely benevolent activities such as protecting the new society, devoid of class conflict, from capitalist aggression abroad and resurgence at home, and preparing the economic and ideological foundations for the transition to the promised land of communism.⁸ Thus the state was transformed from the Marxist image of a class-cleft society into a symbol of class harmony; from an institution representing the interests of a specific ruling class to one representing the interests of society as a whole, even in an epoch of admitted class distinctions;⁹ and from a symbol of social immorality and oppression into one of high ethical value. With this transformation, the entire question of the state's abolition was indeed "purely academic," and in fact irrelevant, since the original impulse for its eradication—its oppressive and malevolent character—evaporated with Stalin's conversion of the state into the incarnation of social progress and benevolence.

Neither Stalin's tendentious arguments at this Congress, nor his bombast, too familiar to bear repetition here, nor his pragmatic rationalizations, based on existing international tensions, nor his succulent observations on the coercive apparatus of the state, constituted either an innovation in Marxist theory or a new theory.¹⁰ This qualitative transformation of the Soviet state implicitly

⁴ Friedrich Engels, The Origin of the Family, State and Private Property (New York, 1942), p. 155.

⁵ V. I. Lenin, Selected Works, 12 vols. (New York, various dates), Vol. 7, p. 8.

⁶ Stalin, Leninism: Selected Writings, p. 395.

⁷ Ibid., p. 470.

⁸ Ibid., pp. 473-74.

⁹ It will be recalled that Soviet society was not purged of class distinctions, but of class antagonisms. Two classes, peasants and workers, and one "stratum," the intelligentsia, are officially recognized. See Stalin, Leninism: Selected Writings, pp. 382-84.

¹⁰ Ibid., pp. 468-74. See Hans Kelsen, The Political Theory of Bolshevism (Berkeley, 1949), and Calvin B. Hoover, "The Soviet State Fails to Wither," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 31, pp. 114-27 (Oct., 1952), for extended discussions of Stalin's pronouncements on the theory of the state before the 18th Party Congress.

required equally fundamental alterations in the basic dogma of Marxism, dialectical and historical materialism, upon which rested the now-repudiated Marxist theory of the state. Since the interconnection of Marxist social, economic, and political categories is one of absolute, but dynamic, interdependence, the repudiation of the political categories moved Stalin's new state clearly out of focus with the basic philosophy of Marxism. The new state required not only a new theory, but a new philosophical and epistemological foundation as well.

Three fundamental questions, vital to the canons of dialectical and historical materialism, remained unanswered as a consequence of Stalin's pontifications in 1939. These were: (1) What replaces the class struggle as the motive force of historical progress in the dialectical movement in Soviet society? (2) What interests does the Soviet state represent, if not that of a ruling class, and how are these interests manifested? (3) How does the state accord with the pattern of dialectical progress within the context of contradictory forces?

These questions were eventually resolved, allegedly in accordance with the internal self-regulating characteristic of the Marxist system, which dictates its own inner transmutation under the impact of qualitatively changing historical circumstances. A complete shift of emphasis in the original equilibrium established by Marx between the voluntaristic and deterministic factors in the dialectical process was clearly involved. The reconstruction of Soviet political theory and Soviet philosophy, substantially performed between 1948 and 1952, rests, in effect, upon a re-inversion of the Marxist epistemological formula, which establishes the relationship between social consciousness and social existence.

II. FROM STALIN TO HEGEL

The failure of the Soviet state to dissolve into the dialectical limbo of history once the material conditions for its existence had vanished, forced the dialectic out of its materialistic shell back towards its Hegelian origins. Stalin's conversion of the Soviet state from an institution spawned by irreconcilable class conflict into one representing total class harmony and monolithic collective unity can be fully understood only by examining the basic incompatibilities inherent in the Marxist system and their Hegelian inheritance. These inconsistencies are responsible for the enormous gulf between reality and philosophy which developed in contemporary Soviet life once the doctrine went beyond the phase of a mere untried hypothesis.

The fundamental antinomy originated in Marx's attempt to unite the dynamic activism of Hegel's idealism with the passive perception of Feuerbach's materialism. This union of voluntarism and determinism was accomplished, so Marx thought, by striking a dynamic equilibrium between man's will (social consciousness) and nature's implacability (social existence) in which the latter would assume epistemological priority under the conditions of capitalism, whereas the formula would be reversed once the state had "withered away."¹¹

¹¹ Engels, The Anti-Duehring (New York, 1939), pp. 309-10. Bukharin writes that "some bourgeois scholars inferred that Engels meant that determinism would lose its validity in communist society," but he maintains that "this view is based on a crude distortion of Marxism," Historical Materialism (New York, 1925), p. 42.

The imperative of a deterministic nature was necessary to allow scientific prediction of the future, whereas the imperative of voluntaristic man was required to guarantee that this future would be an optimistic one. The relationship between these two forces was relative, but the unifying element was to be the single absolute and independent abstraction—the inscrutable dialectical movement, which Marx felt could take care of its own internal contradictions in triadic simplicity.

By uniting voluntarism and determinism, Marx thought he had established an absolute logical interconnection between reality and utopia—between the world of fact and the world of value. Undoubtedly this claim is one of the most attractive features of the Marxist philosophy, for it pretends to support social purpose with scientific analysis, thus satisfying two basic yearnings of the 19th and 20th centuries. Marxism, as a system compounded of both perceptive and active categories, was never more boldly stated than in Marx's critique of Feuerbach, wherein he boasted that the function of his system was not merely to explain the world, but more importantly, to change it.¹² This duality of Marxism was first reflected in a causal-analytical system which analyzed capitalist society (contemporary reality), dissecting it into its antagonistic components, and thereby exposing the basis upon which to predict its doom. Secondly, Marxism consisted of a pragmatic-normative system which purported to predict the evolution of society through successive stages in accordance with the inexorable operation of "laws," which were supposed to be objective and scientifically determinable, but which were, in fact, normative categories to be achieved by an active process disguised as man working in concert with the objective historical laws of the dialectical process.

Unlike Hegel, Marx did not purport to rationalize an existing social order, since he was interested essentially in rationalizing revolution. The absence of an ideological function (in the Mannheim sense) distinguished Marx from both Hegel and Stalin, but the system was potentially ideological by its very structure. The social function of Hegel's dialectic was to provide an articulate rationalization for the status quo as the expression of Divine Will on earth working its way to sublime perfection, whereas Marx used the identical dialectic, with inverted categories, to expose the inequities of the same social order and as a basis for predicting its violent demise. Stalin's theory embraced both functions. With respect to Soviet society, it serves the same integrative function as Hegel's—to rationalize the Soviet social order and provide for an orderly transition to the communist utopia. But outside the Soviet Union Stalin accepts the essentially disintegrative social function of Marx in his attitude to the non-Soviet world. In Stalin's case, the latter function serves to reinforce the first.

Hegel's philosophy served to establish the eternity of the state as a divine organism symbolizing the apotheosis of societal harmony and divine ethic, while the same philosophy, inverted by Marx, declared the state to be the ephemeral repository of social misery and oppression—a wicked machine to be destroyed. These diametrically opposed conceptions required diametrically opposed attitudes toward the state—for Hegel, exaltation; for Marx, denunciation. The failure of the Soviet state to wither forced Stalin to embrace both conceptions, for if the state resists abolition in accordance with the Marxist dictate, the subtle distinctions between Marx and Hegel vanish, and the state survives in accordance with the re-inverted dialectic—an absolute process driving to absolute order. However, Stalin retains the Marxist conception of the state insofar as the bourgeois world is concerned. Even if Hans Kelsen's remark¹³ that "nothing can show more clearly the futility of the dialectical method than the fact that it enables Hegel to praise the state . . . and Marx to curse it," is true, it does not refute Stalin's eloquent demonstration of its utility, for he employs the identical dialectic simultaneously to exalt the Soviet state and damn the bourgeois.

¹² Karl Marx, "Theses on Feuerbach," Selected Works, 2 vols. (New York, n.d.), Vol. 1, p. 473. This work also contains selections from the writings of Engels.

III. FROM DETERMINISM TO VOLUNTARISM: THE TRANSMUTATION OF DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL MATERIALISM

The Voluntarism of Lenin: Revolution from Below. During Marx's lifetime, and throughout all of his writings, the deterministic factor in his philosophy was everywhere emphasized in an endeavor to stress its scientific character. One of the consequences of this disproportionate emphasis was the apparent deprecation of the role of political power and its subordination to the economic forces operating in human history. Although Engels, in later years,¹⁴ tried to re-establish an equilibrium between politics and economics by denying that either he or Marx asserted that political power was supinely dependent upon the protean economic forces operating in society, it remains incontestable that the Marxist doctrine as a whole was understood by protagonists and antagonists alike as teaching not only the deprecation of political power, but its ultimate superfluity as well. Actually, Engels so vigorously denied the purely subsidiary role of political power as to elevate it to a significance which virtually emasculated the materialistic basis of the Marxist system.¹⁵

This shift of emphasis to the voluntaristic aspect of Marxism was accelerated by Marx's Russian admirers, especially George Plekhanov and Lenin, because the facts of revolutionary life in Russia put a premium on human action. Actually, the antipodal elements of voluntarism and determinism were at the basis of the split of the Russian Marxists into Bolsheviks and Mensheviks. This is attested to by no less an authority than Lenin, who wrote that "the disagreement concerning the estimation of the relative importance of the spontaneous and the consciously 'methodical' elements" is "the quintessence of the present-day theoretical and political differences that exist among the Russian Social Democrats."¹⁶

¹³ Kelsen, The Political Theory of Bolshevism, p. 19 (cited in note 10).

¹⁴ See Engels' letter to J. Bloch in Selected Correspondence of Marx and Engels (New York, 1942), p. 477.

¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 475-76 (Engels to Bloch); pp. 483-84 (Engels to C. Schmidt); pp. 516-19 (Engels to Starkenburg).

¹⁶ Lenin, What Is To Be Done? (New York, 1929), p. 31.

Lenin, of course, received his initial and most profound introduction to Marx via George Plekhanov, and although Lenin and his master eventually split over the determinism-voluntarism dilemma, it was Plekhanov who, in a series of brilliant expositions, amplified the active side of Marxism in order to refute the charge of "fatal determinism" levelled against it by critics. "Men make history," Plekhanov wrote, "and, therefore, the activities of individuals cannot help being important in history."¹⁷ In another work, Plekhanov wrote:

If I know in what direction social relations are changing . . . I am able to influence it . . . Hence in a sense I can make history and there is no need for me to wait while "it is being made." . . . The change never takes place "by itself"; it always needs the intervention of men.¹⁸

Marx admitted that man could discover the dialectical laws governing social development; Engels and Plekhanov preached the idea that men could influence the acceleration of these laws; Lenin maintained that their direction could be guided. It was in his What Is To Be Done? that Lenin clearly embraced "consciousness" as against what he called "subservience to spontaneity" and "belittling of the conscious element."¹⁹ Rejecting the view that "politics always obediently follow economics," he boasted: "Give me an organization of revolutionists and we shall overturn the whole of Russia."²⁰

"Politics," said Lenin after the Bolshevik Revolution, "cannot but have precedence over economics. To argue differently means forgetting the ABC of Marxism."²¹ This was an affirmation of the supremacy of voluntaristic man over deterministic nature, yet Lenin's writings would seem to restrict this relationship to the revolutionary process itself. It did, however, provide a convenient methodological springboard for his pupil Stalin. For if it was Lenin who decreed the primacy of politics and consciousness over economics and spontaneity in the revolutionary struggle, it was Stalin who developed the doctrine that Russia was a mound of clay, waiting to be molded into a communist society with political instruments at the disposal of men with the necessary will and persistence to dictate the course of history in the illusion that they were following its objective and implacable mandate! Although some evidence suggests that Lenin was also partial to this view, his writings on the subject remain fairly ambiguous and implicit at best. Whether Lenin would have embarked on a program of socialism and communism in one country is highly debatable.²²

¹⁷ George Plekhanov, The Role of the Individual in History (New York, 1940), p. 23.

¹⁸ Ibid., p. 61. See also his Materialist Conception of History, in which he draws a distinction between "economic materialists" and "dialectical materialists," the chief distinguishing factor being the denial of the "conscious" element by the former; and his In Defense of Materialism (London, 1947). Plekhanov constitutes a "voluntaristic bridge" between the later views of Engels and those of Lenin.

¹⁹ See especially pp. 31-44; 105-6; 117-19.

²⁰ What Is To Be Done? pp. 43, 119.

²¹ Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. 9, p. 54.

²² Stalin, of course, ascribed the "theory of socialism in one country" to Lenin, but as his opponents were to point out, Lenin's position was ambiguous on this point. Cf. Stalin's Problems of Leninism (Moscow, 1947), pp. 156-66 and Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. 5, p. 141; Vol. 9, p. 403.

Stalin's Voluntarism: "Revolution from Above." "In order to transform the world," Stalin told an incredulous H. G. Wells in 1934, "it is necessary to have political power . . . as a lever of change." When Wells retorted that "perhaps I believe more strongly in the economic interpretation of politics than you do," Stalin accused him of "greatly underestimating the question of political power."²³ Certainly this is a sin to which Stalin could never plead guilty.

The first systematic articulation of Stalin's voluntarist views made its appearance in a short philosophical précis, Dialectical and Historical Materialism, written for inclusion in the new official History of the Communist Party, published in 1938.²⁴ Thus, a full year before his formal repudiation of the Marxist theory of the state, Stalin had already forged the first link in the chain of philosophical transmutations that were to support his new political formulae. This initial step took the form of placing greater emphasis on the role of ideas in shaping the historical process, that is, placing a greater emphasis on the voluntaristic factors in the Marxist-Leninist dogma, and conceptualizing this voluntaristic formula into a specific theory of controlled change, called "revolution from above."²⁵

In this work, Stalin still quoted with approval Marx's famous dictum on consciousness and existence, but this apparently was one of the "examples in the history of revisionism pretending agreement with the fundamental tenets of the teaching that is being revised," that Zhdanov was to warn the philosophers against a decade later.²⁶ Lip service was still accorded to the theme that the significance of social ideas does not lie in the ideas per se, "but in the conditions of the material life of society . . . of which these . . . are the reflections," although ideas are now elevated to a position clearly superior to that of mere catalytic agents.²⁷ "As regards the significance of social ideas, theories, views and political institutions," Stalin wrote, "historical materialism, far from denying them, stresses the role and importance of these factors in the life of society, in its history."²⁸ These social ideas arise, however, he continued:

only after the development of the material life of society has set new tasks for society. But once they have arisen they become a most potent force which facilitates the carrying out of the new tasks set by the material life of society, a force which facilitates the progress of society . . . because it is impossible to carry out the urgent tasks of development of the material life of society without their organizing, mobilizing, and transforming action.²⁹

²³ Stalin and H. G. Wells, Marxism vs. Liberalism (New York, 1934), pp. 14, 20.

²⁴ History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (New York, 1939). Hereinafter cited as History. This particular edition notes that it was "edited by a commission of the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U. (B)," whereas since 1946, with the inclusion of the entire book in Stalin's collected works [Sochineniya], complete authorship has been ascribed to Stalin. The section on Dialectical and Historical Materialism was from the beginning attributed to Stalin personally. However, the idea of "revolution from above" does not appear in this section. Since what was at first considered to be the work of collective anonymity has been converted, mutatis mutandis, into Holy Writ, the effort must be viewed as the integrated work of a single mind and is so treated here.

²⁵ History, p. 305.

²⁶ History, p. 115.

²⁷ A. Zhdanov, Essays on Literature, Philosophy and Music (New York, 1950), p. 82. Hereinafter cited as Essays.

²⁸ History, p. 116.

²⁹ History, pp. 116-17.

Human consciousness, however, takes a long leap forward during periods of revolutionary upheaval, when it actually, for a brief moment of history, assumes primacy over the objective laws of social existence; the conscious efforts of man replace the blind and inexorable laws of nature:

Out of the conflict between the new productive forces and the old relations of production . . . there arise new social ideas; these new ideas organize and mobilize the masses; the masses become welded into a new political army, and make use of it to abolish the old system of relations of production and finally establish the new system. The spontaneous process of development yields place to the conscious activity of man, peaceful development to violent upheaval, evolution to revolution.³⁰

These social ideas, theories, and political institutions, Stalin continued, "having arisen on the basis of the urgent tasks of the development of society, the development of social being, themselves react upon social being, upon the material life of society . . . rendering its further development possible."³¹ These conceptions were not mere abstractions for Stalin, but rather a rationalization for the socio-economic changes wrought by conscious political design during the preceding decade, a process which he captioned "revolution from above."

According to Stalinist dogma, the period of the so-called "second revolution" took place in 1930-1935, but at the time of the "revolution" itself there appeared no coherent theoretical justification, but merely the pragmatic insistence that the collectivization of agriculture and the liquidation of the kulaks were objective material prerequisites for a socialist society. In 1938, with the appearance of the History, it was determined ex post facto that what transpired was in essence a second revolution carried out "from above" and supported "from below."

This was a profound revolution, a leap from an old qualitative state of society to a new qualitative state, equivalent in its consequences to the revolution of October 1917. The distinguishing feature of this revolution is that it was accomplished from above, on the initiative of the state, and directly supported from below by the millions of peasants who were fighting to throw off kulak bondage and to live in freedom in the collective farms.³²

To assert the fact of a "revolution from above" is to confess that the external world can be forcibly adjusted to the ideas conceived in the brain of man. The fundamental nature of such a process can be comprehended only within the context of the social norms dominating those who exercise political power in the community and are in control of its organs of coercion and persuasion, and not by examining the alleged objective demands of the material forces of history. A revolution of this type cannot be analyzed within Marxist categories, because the Marxist conception of a revolution is rather precisely defined in terms of the shift of political power from one class to another.³³ No such shift

³⁰ History, p. 130.

³¹ History, p. 117.

³² History, p. 305.

³³ The impossibility of defining "revolutions from above" within Marxist categories is demonstrated by the following rationalization by Rudolph Schlesinger: "Action may be taken with the intention of changing the social framework (or, if some 'gradual' change in the existing framework has taken place, to adapt the institutional framework to the changed needs). Such action is usually described as a 'revolution' only if it originates from took place in this instance, because the revolution was not an upheaval directed against the existing political power or the ruling class. It was, in fact, an act of the ruling class against a class already deprived of participation in political rule. It is true that ruling groups would hardly initiate "revolutions" of the classical Marxist vintage, since this would be a suicidal act leading to their own destruction as the dominant class in society.

For over twelve years, this so-called revolution remained only a quaint descriptive phrase, accepted perhaps largely in an allegorical sense without consideration of its profound philosophical implications. If the "revolution" referred merely to the action of the state in making its final assault against the last remnants of the old order as a prelude to its own disappearance, the idea would certainly conform to the Marxist-Leninist pattern. But, apparently, this was not the case. Not only did the state survive the final destruction of the exploiters, but it emerged in a qualitatively different form. Stalin clearly recognized this anomalous situation in 1950, when he amplified the theory of "revolution from above." It emerged as a system of "controlled revolution," something like controlled fission, because it is described as a revolution "without explosions," a phenomenon which can occur only in a society devoid of class antagonisms—a sociological application of the Hegelian-Marxist "law of the transformation of quantity into quality."

groups other than the ruling one, so that its success results in a change not only of institutions, but also of that ruling group. Marxism argues that ruling groups are characterized by their very place in economic structure and therefore are unlikely to initiate changes in the structure from which they profit. However, we must allow ample space for possibilities of 'revolution from above' where such procedure provides the only chance for the ruling group to survive as such." (My italics.) Marx, His Times and Ours (New York, 1950), p. 6. Schlesinger's conception of 'revolution' becomes a tool for preserving the political status quo, rather than overturning it. This line of argument compels him to accept any reform taken by the existing political system to preserve itself, such as the "reforms from the top" carried out by the Tsars, and the overthrow of the Japanese Shogunate, to be "revolutions from above." While this conception may have validity, it is a non-Marxist one, and certainly is not the type of "revolution from above" defined by Soviet theorists, who maintain that revolutions of this nature can materialize only in a society divested of all class antagonisms. Furthermore, it should be noted that the Stalinist conception of "revolution from above" is not a mere amplification of the theories of "permanent" and "uninterrupted" revolution advanced by Trotsky and Lenin. Both revolutions visualized the state as an instrument of class rule and as a weapon in the hands of the masses against the exploiters. For Lenin, revolution was a sort of continuum, whereby "bourgeois-democratic" and "national-colonial" revolutions could be converted into proletarian upheavals, if the revolutionary momentum were maintained. Trotsky's theory of "permanent" revolution pertains to the use of the proletarian state to support revolutions in other countries. In both cases, the revolutions referred to are proletarian in nature and do not constitute a point of departure from which to rationalize fundamental socio-economic changes wrought by a state which does not represent class interests. The theories of Lenin and Trotsky are not incompatible with the view that it is the function of the new proletarian state to continue the economic revolution by eliminating the old classes and laying the foundations for a socialist society, but by doing this, the state prepares the conditions for its automatic abolition, whereas for Stalin, once socialism is achieved the state enters into a higher phase of development.

The law of transition from the old to the new quality by way of explosion does not . . . always apply to . . . social phenomena related to the foundation or the superstructure. It is obligatory for a society divided into antagonistic classes. But it is not at all obligatory for a society which has no antagonistic classes. In the course of 8-10 years we effected in the agriculture of our country a transition from the bourgeois individual peasant system to the socialist collective farm system. . . . However, this upheaval took place not by way of explosion, that is, not by the overthrow of the existing power and the establishment of a new power, but by means of gradual transition from the old bourgeois system . . . And it was possible to do so because this was a revolution from above, an upheaval carried out on the initiative of the existing power with the support of the bulk of the peasantry.³⁴

The full significance of this dialectical excursus is discussed below,³⁵ but a few words are in order here. According to this idea of revolution, the economic substructure of society can be overturned without demolishing the political superstructure which is its mere reflection. The superstructure, therefore, is controlled by man, not by objective history, for it can alter its own foundation without threatening its own immediate survival and that of its ruling element. Hence the state is emancipated from its dependence upon the economic system and its existence is no longer at the mercy of external objective laws. The theory is logically inconsistent, since this so-called "revolution from above" can take place only in a society bereft of class antagonisms; yet it is incontestable that the first "revolution" of this type was undertaken to eliminate class distinctions and antagonisms and hence preceded their eradication. Thus what Stalin lays down as a conditio sine qua non for this "revolution" was, in fact, a consequence of it. This is blandly admitted by the Soviet ideologist, B. Kedrov, in his commentary on Stalin's "brilliant thesis." "Through the collectivization of agriculture," he writes, "the kulaks were also eliminated as a class, that is, the antagonistic contradictions within society were overcome."³⁶ The question of why no "explosion" occurred, if the theory is applicable only in a society unencumbered with class struggles, is conveniently ignored.

Although the theory of "controlled revolution" is an inaccurate conceptualization of the past action, resting as it does upon distorted, falsified, or fabricated history, it is designed as a philosophical rationalization not so much of the past as of the future. The revolution from above is the concrete manifestation of the voluntaristic nature of modern Soviet philosophy and represents the supremacy of will over fact, consciousness over existence, and politics over economics. This theory is designed to rationalize all future changes in Soviet society and justifies the imposition of social norms conceived by the ruling elite upon society and its members as a means for solidifying its power structure, perpetuating its rule in the face of internal and external adversities, and maintaining the necessary autocratic centralization and ideological infallibility which the self-imposed universal messianic purpose of the Soviet Union makes mandatory. The dialectic is thus employed to put a halt to all further revolutions in the Soviet Union, except those officially inspired, by declaring them "scientifically" impossible, or ideologically illegitimate.

³⁴ Stalin, "Concerning Marxism in Linguistics," Pravda, June 20, 1950. For an English translation, see the booklet of the same title published in London by Soviet News in 1950. All citations will refer to the booklet, although the translations in this article may deviate in some particulars, since the rendering in the booklet appears to the author to be awkward and irregular in some instances.

³⁵ See infra, pp. 1047-51.

³⁶ B. Kedrov, "On Forms of Leaps in the Development of Nature and Society," Bolshevik (No. 15), pp. 8-20 (Aug., 1951).

From Necessity to Freedom: Motive Forces in a Socialist-Communist Society. Stalin's theory of the "revolution from above" and his assertion that the Soviet state functioned to preserve the harmonious social order and guarantee its evolution to communism signified the first stages in the final abdication of objective determinism in favor of subjective voluntarism. Actually, as pointed out earlier, Marx's dynamic equilibrium between these two aspects of his system permitted this transition to be made, but only within the context of a millennial society in which man leaps from the clutches of necessity into the sphere of freedom; where man transforms nature from stubborn master into willing slave. For Marx and Engels what impeded man's progress to the promised land was the state, which would first have to be expunged from society;³⁷ for Stalin on the other hand, the state becomes the key to the earthly paradise.

Progress in the evolution of systematic theoretical reconstruction was impeded after 1939 due to the war, when the international situation forced Stalin to dispense with the luxury of theorizing in favor of more pressing practical problems. After the war, the tremendous lacunae in Soviet theory again became an object of serious attention. The task of systematizing Stalin's crude theoretical statements into a coherent body of philosophy, free from logical inconsistencies and unprofessional crudities, was assigned to the philosophers. Since Marxism is conspicuous for the gap that it registers in the realm of normative political theory, its political categories constituting a critical analysis of historical states in general and bourgeois states in particular, Soviet philosophers were afforded only a minimum of guidance. Marx did not provide a theory of the socialist or communist state, and neither did Lenin, precisely because they were political nihilists in their ultimate teleology, repudiating the state as a morally incompatible and superfluous, if not objectively impossible, institution in their apocalyptic vision of a classless society. Freedom was possible only without the state. This is why Soviet ideology registered a vacuum in the area of political theory while the mightiest leviathan in all history was bearing down upon society like a nightmare.

³⁷ Engels' view is stated with unambiguous clarity in The Anti-Duehring (pp. 309-10): "The conditions of existence forming man's environment, which up to now have dominated man, at this point [i.e., after the state withers away] pass under the dominion and control of man, who now for the first time becomes the real conscious master of Nature, because and in so far as his own social activity, which has hitherto confronted him as external, dominating laws of Nature, will then be applied by man with complete understanding and hence will be dominated by man. . . . The objective, external forces which have hitherto dominated history, will then pass under the control of men themselves. It is only from this point that men, with full consciousness, will fashion their own history; it is only from this point that men will have, predominantly and in constantly increasing measure, the effects willed by men. It is humanity's leap from the realm of necessity into the realm of freedom."

The failure of the state to wither away left the philosophers the single alternative of justifying it as the central institution of progress and freedom. Engels' idyllic stateless society was to be symbolized by the Soviet state. In effect, it was their task to unravel the three dialectical riddles bequeathed to them by Stalin as a result of his pronouncements on the state at the 18th Party Congress.

The reluctance of the philosophers to demonstrate initiative in this direction prompted Andrei Zhdanov to excoriate them for their intellectual cowardice at the famous Party Conference on Philosophy convened in June, 1947. He called on them "to advance more courageously the theory of Soviet society, of the Soviet state,"³⁸ specifically commissioning the philosophers to discover the elusive dialectical law motivating progress in Soviet society:

Since, as the dialectic teaches us, the inner content of the process of development is the struggle of opposites, the struggle between the old and the new, between the dying and the rising, between the decaying and the developing, our Soviet philosophy must show how that law of dialectics operates in socialist society and what are the specific characteristics of its operation. We know that in a society divided into classes that law operates otherwise than in our Soviet society. Here is a broad field for investigation and none of our philosophers have cultivated that field.³⁹

The philosophers were confronted with no ordinary challenge. The nature of the motive force that was to replace the class struggle in human history constitutes one of the most enigmatic omissions in the Marxist philosophy. Since the logic of the dialectic dictates that it must constantly derive its propulsive force from the contradictory impulses inherently operating in nature, the expiration of the class struggle, contrary to widespread impression, does not signify that the Marxist dialectic spins its final contradiction. The dialectic is conceived as an eternal movement, an absolute abstraction independent of substance, whose inner laws dictate that contradictions are transmuted into higher forms once the class struggle ends.⁴⁰ Marx was consistent in deliberately refusing to predict future forms of contradiction since it would be undialectical and in direct opposition to his materialistic epistemology to conceptualize historical laws before their material foundations had become manifest.

The cautious Soviet philosophers—perhaps well aware of the fundamental nature of the revisionism involved—were content to dig out of their libraries old and faded slogans uttered by Stalin in the past in the desperate hope that they could accidentally trip upon some forgotten platitude and consecrate it into a new dialectical law. This, at any rate, was the impression they received from Zhdanov, who pompously told them that the motive force of Soviet society was the shopworn cliché, criticism and self-criticism:

Our Party long ago discovered . . . that particular form of revealing and overcoming the contradictions of socialist society (such contradictions of socialist society exist and philosophy cannot avoid dealing with them). . . . In our Soviet society, where antagonistic classes have been liquidated, the struggle between the old and the new, and consequently the development from the lower to the higher, proceeds not in the form of struggle between antagonistic classes and cataclysms, as is the case under capitalism, but in the form of criticism and self-criticism, which is the real motive force of our development. . . . This is incontestably a new aspect of movement, a new type of development, a new dialectical law.⁴¹

³⁸ Zhdanov, Essays, p. 71.

³⁹ Ibid.

⁴⁰ See Marx, Poverty of Philosophy (New York, n.d.), p. 93 and Selected Works, Vol. 1, pp. 421-22.

The philosophers unearthed such startling motive forces as socialist competition, unity, amity of nations, Soviet patriotism, public interest, and peace. These substitutes, however, appeared to be clearly inadequate, since most of them did not even meet the canon of contradiction. What was mandatory was a single great motive force, as transcendent in its cosmic simplicity as the class struggle, but as harmonious and integrative in its exfoliation as the class struggle is cataclysmic and disintegrative. The character of its operation necessitated that it be grand enough in its conception to establish the relationship between state and society; analytic enough to rationalize the existing status quo, and yet sufficiently dynamic in its normative aspects to allow future alterations in policy; and pragmatic and flexible enough in its application to be adaptable to all tactical situations.

From Utopia to Ideology: The Supremacy of Social Consciousness over Social Being. One immediate result of Zhdanov's criticism was the publication, in the following year, of the symposium, O Sovetskom Sotsialisticheskom Obshchestve [On Soviet Socialist Society], edited by philosophers Konstantinov, Kammari, and Glezerman.⁴² Containing contributions by the leading philosophical lights ⁴¹ Zhdanov, Essays, pp. 71-72. All Soviet writers now stress the dichotomy between "antagonistic" contradictions and "non-antagonistic." It is claimed that under Socialism contradictions are of the latter variety because the state is able to foresee developing contradictions and intervene so as to mitigate them and bring them into harmonious synthesis. "The Marxist dialectic recognizes two fundamental types of contradictions: antagonistic and non-antagonistic contradictions. Antagonistic contradictions are by their nature insoluble within the framework of the existing old quality; they can be solved only by the annihilation (overthrow, destruction) of the old, which is the foundation of one of the elements of the contradiction. Here the annihilation of the old begins with an explosion. Consequently, the explosion is the peculiar and typical form of the solution of antagonistic contradictions. . . . Non-antagonistic contradictions are of a fundamentally different character; they are perfectly soluble within the framework of the existing quality, and the solution can take place in a planned and organized manner by the gradual replacing of elements of the old quality with elements of the new. . . . In such cases there is no necessity whatsoever for an explosion." Kedrov, op. cit., pp. 8-20. "Contradictions of capitalism are contradictions leading to its doom, are catastrophic contradictions. . . . All contradictions . . . in Soviet society are contradictions of growth, of progress." P. F. Yudin, The Prime Source of the Development of Soviet Society (Moscow, 1949), pp. 30-33; see also pp. 34-41.

⁴² Published in Moscow, 1948. The more significant and relevant of the contributions are the following: F. V. Konstantinov, The Role of Socialist Consciousness in the Development of Soviet Society; P. F. Yudin, The Prime Source of the Development of Soviet Society; M. B. Mitin, Soviet Democracy and Bourgeois Democracy; M. D. Kammari, Socialism and the Individual; Ts. Stepanyan, On the Conditions and the Ways of the Transition from Socialism to Communism. Some of these works are available in English translation as pamphlets. Wherever possible, citations will be made to the translations.

of the Soviet Union, this collection of panegyrics painted Soviet society in such succulent fashion that its editors were later reprimanded for conveniently glossing over the contradictions in the Soviet Union instead of discovering and unraveling them.

Perhaps the most germane and seminal contribution to this symposium was that made by Konstantinov, entitled The Role of Socialist Consciousness in the Development of Soviet Society. His contribution is especially relevant because it not only represents a further development of Stalin's views in the History, but also adumbrates some of the central themes that Stalin was to pronounce ex cathedra two years later. In this work, four pertinent points are made: (1) Marxism-Leninism in the Soviet Union has been converted from a revolutionary-disintegrative doctrine into a rationalizing-integrative system, or, to use the special terminology of Karl Mannheim, has made the transition from utopia to ideology; (2) this transmutation of Marxism-Leninism has made it into the highest form of social consciousness in Soviet society, where the forces of nature have been completely subordinated to the will of man; (3) dialectical progress is motivated by the continuous interaction between mass social consciousness and the economic structure of society; and (4) in a society without class antagonisms, the social consciousness of the masses is monolithically expressed in its collective capacity by the Communist party and its leadership.

The conversion of Marxism-Leninism from utopian to ideological categories is possible because of the dual characteristic of Marxism as a theory of both analysis and action:

From the very outset, Marxism-Leninism set itself the task of not simply interpreting the world . . . but of showing how, by means of these laws, it is possible to abolish capitalism and build a new, communist society. . . . In the course of applying this theory to the revolutionary transformation of society, its role changes with the changes in the character of the social system. . . . Under capitalism, Marxism-Leninism is the ideology of the oppressed, exploited class, the class that is spiritually down-trodden by the bourgeoisie. . . . In socialist society, the ideas of Marxism-Leninism are the ruling ideas; Marxism-Leninism is the theoretical weapon of the Party that guides the Soviet state, the whole of socialist society. . . . Hence Marxism-Leninism directly influences the whole course of social life, because under socialism, the ideas of Marxism-Leninism are backed by the entire might . . . of the Socialist state and of the Communist Party. . . . Embodied in life, materialized in the new social system, the ideas of Marxism-Leninism, of Socialism, become a still more mighty motive force of social development.⁴³

From a transcendental social theory which seeks to overturn the bourgeois social order, Marxism-Leninism passes to a social theory which explains and justifies the new social system, yet sedulously provides for its own future retransmutation as the existing order (socialism) gives way to a still higher one (communism) by means of orderly evolutionary development along a path illuminated by the Communist party and the state.

The orderly progression to communism is possible because in a society devoid of class conflict the consciousness of the masses is a monolithic whole in its comprehension of the laws of the dialectic. Under capitalism, society is governed by blindly operating objective social laws which are oblivious to the will of man except for short and spectacular periods of revolutionary upheaval, when for brief moments in the eternity of history the social consciousness of the masses asserts itself and supplants the objective laws of history in the dialectical movement. Under socialism, however, social consciousness becomes solidified under the leadership of the Communist party and emerges as the dominant force in the historical movement:

⁴³ Konstantinov, The Role of Socialist Consciousness in the Development of Soviet Society (Moscow, 1949), pp. 7-9.

In the development of socialist society, however, consciousness plays a different role from that which it played in all the forms of society that preceded Socialism. Under Socialism, the role of consciousness in social life not only grows quantitatively; it also acquires a different quality; the very relation between spontaneity and consciousness in historical development undergoes a radical change. . . . In the past, it was only for short periods, i.e., in periods of revolution, that the spontaneous development of society gave way to the conscious action of the masses who were making their own history. It was only with the victory of the socialist revolution that the conscious actions of millions of working people acquired decisive importance in social life, in the development of society. . . . Under Socialism, for the first time in history, the most progressive consciousness, i.e., socialist consciousness . . . achieved a decisive victory over spontaneity in social life, subordinated the operation of social laws to their power. This was a great leap out of the realm of blind necessity into the realm of freedom. The history of mankind has no record of anything more magnificent.⁴⁴

Although Konstantinov attempts to remain consistent with the sociological determinism of Marx by insisting that social consciousness in the Soviet Union is a reflection of its socialist environment, he also asserts that this same environment was brought about by the social will of the masses, apparently at a time when it reflected a pre-socialist society. This dilemma is never satisfactorily resolved and the basic conundrum as to what comes first, social will or social fact, is subsumed in a cloud of dialectical obfuscation.⁴⁵

Thus, according to this conception of the dialectical movement, there exists at any particular time in Soviet society a harmonious contradiction between the economic productive forces and the needs and requirements of the Soviet masses. The latter spawn a consciousness on the basis of these needs which reacts upon the economic structure of society, causing it to change and thereby altering the entire superstructure, including Marxist-Leninist doctrine. Dialectical interaction between the economic forces of Soviet society and its superstructure of social and political ideas is sufficient to propel society along the ⁴⁴ Ibid., pp. 27-28.

⁴⁵ "In order fundamentally to change the old views, ethics, habits and customs . . . it was necessary to change the material conditions of life of the masses . . . to remold them on the basis of socialism, because the material conditions of life mold social consciousness. And in order fundamentally to change the material conditions of life on a socialist basis it was necessary that the masses should display . . . a high level of socialist consciousness. It looked as though an insoluble contradiction, a vicious circle had arisen. Various phillistines and utopians did actually think that it was an insoluble contradiction. . . . Historically, the contradiction . . . was solved in the course of the socialist revolution." Ibid., pp. 48-49. This is hardly an explanation, much less a solution, but merely an assertion.

road of everlasting progress, but not explosive enough to rip society asunder with every qualitative change. This interaction becomes the mainspring of the dialectical movement and emerges as Konstantinov's implicit surrogate for the class struggle in the Soviet Union. The dialectical duel between these two forces constitutes an unending process of mutual transformation in the crucible of dialectical fission and fusion.

"The socialist consciousness of the Soviet people," Konstantinov informs us, is not spontaneous, but "is moulded under the guidance of the Communist Party on the basis of its scientific world outlook."⁴⁶ The relationship between the party and the masses is one not of rule, but of leadership; as the advanced detachment of the masses, the party, because of its scientific competence, manifests the will of the masses in its monolithic purity with cerebral precision:

The political and ideological inspirer, the organizer and leader of the conscious building of the new society is the Communist Party, which is armed with the theory of Marxism-Leninism. . . . Socialism . . . requires the wills of millions to be united into a single, conscious will directed towards the achievement of a single great aim—communism. And this singleness of will for the building of socialism can be achieved only on the basis of the great socialist consciousness of the masses. . . . This singleness of will of millions can be and is being secured only under the authoritative and tried leadership of the Communist Party . . . by virtue of its knowledge of the laws governing the building of Communism.⁴⁷

Konstantinov, however, carefully avoided a full integration of the state in Soviet social theory, substituting for it the collective anonymity of the party, and assigning to the state primarily indoctrination functions. His version of a conscious unified and distinct collective will, superior to the will of the individual, is reminiscent of Rousseau and Hegel, although the theory of the "general will" was repudiated at one time by Vyshinsky.⁴⁸ Apparently, the full integration of the Soviet state in the basic philosophy of Marxism-Leninism required the personal intervention of the Georgian oracle.

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 67.

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 35. The Communist party is described as "being the most advanced and most politically conscious section of the Soviet people." Ibid., p. 95. See also M. B. Mitin, op. cit., pp. 43, 45-56; M. D. Kammari, op. cit., p. 44. According to Yudin: "The Soviet state is the principal instrument through which the Communist Party . . . directs society's entire development. . . . The planned guidance of the country's entire economic development by the Soviet State is an historical necessity. . . . This is a fully objective law of the development of Soviet society." The Prime Source, pp. 20-22.

⁴⁸ See A. Y. Vyshinsky, The Law of the Soviet State (New York, 1948), p. 169, where he expostulates: "In conditions of capitalism the so-called 'general will,' which Rousseau advanced as the basic motive power of the democratic state, remains and cannot but remain—a fiction." On the other hand, "The victory of socialism . . . signalizes . . . the will of the entire Soviet people. Speaking of will in the social or political sense, we have in view neither the mechanical 'sum total of wills' of separate persons, nor the mythical 'national will.' . . . Following the Marx-Lenin doctrine, we have in mind the will of social classes. . . . In the Soviet Socialist state the single will of the people is the single will of all the peoples of the U.S.S.R. . . . Soviet authority in the U.S.S.R. . . . expresses and realizes the will of the entire multinational single people." Ibid., pp. 171-72.

IV. THE RECONSTRUCTION OF SOVIET POLITICAL THEORY:
THE EPOCH OF STATE WORSHIP

"The Soviet concept," writes John Somerville, "far from representing the state as the locus of all human and spiritual values, actually regards it as a kind of necessary evil."⁴⁹ The idea that the Soviet state is an evil of any variety, eternal or ephemeral, was already unfashionable in 1930, when the leader of the cult of state hatred in the Soviet Union, Nicolai Bukharin, was ideologically decapitated by Stalin.⁵⁰ Since then, Vyshinsky has branded all state haters as "unprincipled traitors and doubledealers."⁵¹ The Soviet state in contemporary Soviet thought is venerated as a positive and constructive force whose creative mission it is to produce the environmental influences which will spawn and preserve the human and spiritual values of future Soviet man. "The Soviet state," according to Uchitelskaya Gazeta, "is the force which engenders in the masses the standards of Communist morality."⁵² Since the ethical purpose of the state is to fulfill the scientific prediction of a communist society, the state has become the hub around which revolve all human and spiritual values in the Soviet land.

In the Soviet Union, professional philosophers, no matter how articulate, are not important enough to alter the basic scriptures of the Marxist-Leninist dogma. Only the High Priest of Soviet communism can perform this function, although he is free to appropriate and adapt for his own purposes the intellectual ruminations of his scholastic minions and convert them into Holy Writ. By 1950, the philosophers had performed their task of preliminary exploration and Stalin felt that the time had come to tie together the loose threads of his pontifical utterances on the state and on dialectical and historical materialism. An opportunity was provided by a so-called "crisis" in linguistics, when the difficulties that plagued philologists in their scholastic endeavors to adjust the theory of language to Marxist epistemology gave rise to awkward irregularities.

Is language part of the "base" or "superstructure" of society? This was the worldshaking question that Stalin was called upon to answer. In the process of answering it, he delivered a series of obiter dicta on the state and the more basic ⁴⁹ John Somerville, Soviet Philosophy (New York, 1947), p. 79.

⁵⁰ Bukharin was the ideological leader of an important group of Soviet intellectuals and jurists, who in the years immediately preceding the 16th Party Congress (1930) were preparing for the imminent "withering away" of the state. It was Bukharin's contention that in order to guarantee the state's oblivion, the working class should cultivate an attitude of hostility against all states, in principle, including the Soviet, because of the "wholesale exaltation of the bourgeois state by the Social Democrats" had insinuated itself into the psychology of the proletariat. It was apparently Bukharin's fear that exaltation of even the Soviet state might be enough to perpetuate it. Cf. Stalin, Leninism: Selected Writings, pp. 115-22.

⁵¹ Vyshinsky, The Teachings of Lenin and Stalin (cited in note 1), p. 115.

⁵² "Bourgeois Morality and Communist Morality," Uchitelskaya Gazeta (No. 43), p. 4 (Sept. 14, 1946). See also "The Role of Soviet Law in the Education of Communist Consciousness," Bolshevik (No. 4), 1947, p. 4.

aspects of Marxist philosophy. In his collected Socratisms, entitled Concerning Marxism in Linguistics, Stalin proceeded to demolish the materialistic pillar supporting Marxism and unleashed an avalanche of voluntaristic ideas into Soviet philosophy. Three basic revisions were made in Marxist philosophy: (1) the Marxist epistemological formula was formally inverted, so that social existence was subordinated to social consciousness and the economic "base" was left at the mercy of its political "superstructure"; (2) the state was re-defined outside orthodox Marxist categories, and the Hegelian concept of the state as the expression of the coordinated interests of society as a whole, rather than of a single class, was resurrected; and (3) the dialectical process was reformulated as expressing harmonious conflict between the base and superstructure of society and as manifested through a series of "revolutions from above." In effect, Stalin removed thesis and antithesis from the famous triad, leaving Soviet philosophy in a condition of permanent synthesis.

Base and Superstructure: The Triumph of Voluntarism. Language, Stalin told his philologists, is part of neither the "base," "superstructure," nor any mythical "intermediate" category of society, but is a tool which "serves society as a means of intercourse between people . . . as a means of enabling people to understand each other."⁵³ It is independent of class distinctions and transcends them. Up to this time it had been accepted by Soviet philosophers that all social phenomena represented either base or superstructure. Stalin thus abandoned Marx's sociological epistemology by recognizing elements in society which cut across classes, uniting rather than dividing them. Aside from providing a convenient rationale for justifying Russian as the language of socialism, this observation was significant in that the new Soviet state was also viewed as independent of class distinctions, representing society in its integrated capacity rather than manifesting the rule of a single class.

The base, according to Stalin in this theoretical statement, "is the economic system of society at a given stage in its development," whereas "the superstructure is the political, legal, religious, artistic, philosophical views of society and the corresponding political, legal, and other institutions."⁵⁴ Each economic foundation has its corresponding superstructure, and both are ephemeral in nature in any particular form, varying in their content in accordance with the dialectical rhythm. "The superstructure," he declared, "is the product of a single epoch, in the course of which a given economic foundation lives and functions" and "consequently, the superstructure is not of long duration; it is destroyed and vanishes with the destruction and disappearance of that given foundation."⁵⁵ To support this canon of the historical dialectic, Stalin cited the Russian Revolution as an example of how a political superstructure crumbled in ruins upon the destruction of the old capitalist mode of production. By rewriting history and re-shuffling the actual sequence of events, adjusting facts to theory, Stalin was able to say:

⁵³ Stalin, Marxism and Linguistics, p. 5. "Language . . . was created not by any one class, but by the whole of society, by all the classes of society, by the efforts of hundreds of generations. It was created for the satisfaction of the needs not of one class, but of the whole of society, of all classes of society." Ibid.

⁵⁴ Ibid., p. 3.

⁵⁵ Ibid.

During the past thirty years in Russia, the old capitalist foundation was abolished and a new socialist foundation erected. Accordingly, the superstructure of the capitalist base was abolished and a new superstructure corresponding to the socialist base was created.⁵⁶

Orthodox Marxism teaches—and presumably the old categories are still considered valid for the pre-socialist Soviet society—that the internal contradictions of capitalism lead inevitably to its doom, but only after the social relations of production come into collision with the imperatives of technological change and productive efficiency. This did not happen in Russia; rather, the elevation of a new political power preceded the new economic complex, destroying it and replacing it with a new one. As a matter of fact, this was at one time Stalin's principal justification for arbitrary state power. Only after the consolidation of a new political superstructure (the dictatorship of the proletariat), was the economic base altered from the old forms to socialism. This observation is pertinent because the Stalinist conception of a superstructure with the capacity to reconstruct its own foundations, without bringing about its collapse, applies only in a society without class antagonisms. Stalin's entire dialectical scheme hinges on this qualitative transformation of the state, since this type of state presumably is dialectically impossible under capitalism.

Thus Stalin is reluctant to admit the supremacy of politics over economics in bourgeois societies, but asserts it as a dominant phenomenon in socialist society. The new socialist superstructure, a species de novo, plays a positive and creative role in societal development, and, in fact, determines its direction and growth. Unlike the bourgeois superstructure, which becomes the prison of its own economic system, because the interests of the ruling class conflict with the imperative of maximum productive efficiency, the new socialist superstructure cannot come into antagonistic conflict with its foundation because the expiration of the class struggle has removed all constrictive social relationships dedicated to the perpetuation of the old order:

The superstructure in a socialist society differs radically from all others. Whereas in an exploitative society the superstructure serves the interests of the exploiting classes, the superstructure in a socialist society serves the interests of the working people by means of entirely new political, legal, philosophic and other ideas and theories and correspondingly creates for society completely new political, legal and other institutions.⁵⁷

It is unnecessary to outline in detail Stalin's differences with Marx and Lenin on the conception of the superstructure, since Stalin claims to be analyzing a state sui generis. At the risk of being dogmatic, it should be pointed out that Marx and Lenin held that all superstructures, including the dictatorship of the proletariat, reflected class interests and not the interests of all society. Lenin visualized the proletarian state as the supreme coercive instrument of the masses in their struggle to extirpate the exploiters and as a tool for laying the foundations of socialism. The state was necessary as long as even a small residual element of the old ruling class was still thriving. But Stalin's superstructure reflects the interests of all classes in Soviet society because "in socialist society, where public ownership is the basic form, these relationships become relationships of friendly cooperation of all strata of society, workers, peasants and intelligentsia."⁵⁸ No ruling class exists, no class antagonisms flourish, although distinctions persist. Since the state is preserved, it cannot but represent society as an integrated entity. Lenin, however, was never confronted with the theoretical problem of a state surviving in a society bereft of class conflict, and standing as an institution expressing the total will of society, because he considered this to be an impossibility. Like Engels, Lenin adhered to the orthodox view that "when ultimately it [the state] becomes really representative of society as a whole, it makes itself superfluous."⁵⁹

⁵⁶ Ibid.

⁵⁷ "Concerning Base and Superstructure," an unsigned commentary in Pravda, Oct. 5, 1950.

"The Superstructure," writes Stalin, "having emerged . . . becomes a great active force, actively helping its foundation to take shape and gain strength, takes all measures in order to help the new system finish off and destroy the old foundation and the old classes."⁶⁰ Here enters the process of "revolution from above," which is explained by the Soviet dialectician, B. Kedrov:

The question of the relationship of the existing state regime to the revolutionary upheaval taking place in the country is a question of whether this regime is an obstacle to the birth of the new order (as is the case in the rule of the bourgeoisie) or whether, on the contrary, this regime itself carries out the upheaval from above with the support of the masses (as is the case in the Soviet order). . . . The socialist revolution begins with an explosion, with the overthrow of the old regime. But when the new revolutionary regime, the dictatorship of the proletariat, has been established, it prepares further revolutionary changes in a planned manner. . . . It is thus that in our country there were prepared and carried out such revolutionary leaps as the industrialization of the country and the collectivization of agriculture.⁶¹

Future progress, according to Kedrov, will continue to take place in the form of a series of "revolutions from above," carried out by the state:

The gradual transition from socialism to communism represents a gigantic historical leap in the development of society which occurs gradually and contains a whole series of leaps in different spheres of social life. . . . All these leaps . . . take place gradually because they are put through from above . . . by the Soviet power with the support and initiative of the whole people from below.⁶²

The mainspring of dialectical progress in the Soviet Union, according to Stalin, is the mutual interaction between the political superstructure and the economic base. The state manifests the collective consciousness of society as a whole in its impact upon the base. As it transforms the economic foundations of society in conformity with the will of the masses, it undergoes a transformation itself, and is again ready to introduce new economic changes in response to further needs of society. This interaction is continuous:

⁵⁸ Ibid. ⁵⁹ Engels, Anti-Duehring, p. 306.

⁶⁰ Marxism and Linguistics, p. 4.

⁶¹ Kedrov, "On Leaps" (cited in note 36), pp. 8-20.

⁶² Ibid.

Comrade Stalin has pointed out that in our country a new base and superstructure have replaced the old. The superstructure which corresponds to the socialist base is primarily the mighty Soviet state in its final form. The Soviet state helps destroy the old base; in doing so, the state itself undergoes substantial changes and becomes a constantly improved tool for building communist society. This dialectic of the development of the state has found expression in the Stalin constitution and Stalin's teaching concerning the stage of development and the functions of the Soviet state.⁶³

Thus it was that Stalin's discourses on linguistics closed the principal gaps in contemporary Soviet political theory. The dependence of the Soviet state for its existence on capitalist encirclement gave way to a more philosophical rationale. The moral problem of the state, i.e., as the supreme embodiment of repression, was solved by shearing away its oppressive qualities and assigning to it purely creative and constructive functions, transforming it into a summum bonum.

Stalin's new theory of the state resulted in the abdication of the materialistic conception of history and Soviet theoreticians interpreted it as such. Commentaries on Stalin's "brilliant thesis" flooded newspapers and periodicals. For all Soviet philosophers, the epoch of state-worship was officially given holy sanction. The state became the prime mover, the guide, the inspirer, the agent of dialectical progress; it was "all powerful"; it could "do anything." It had to be protected like the apple of one's eye, constantly strengthened and allowed greater freedom for expansion. Thus, Stepanyan wrote that "as the economic foundation of a communist society develops, the activity of the Soviet state in economic organization and cultural indoctrination will constantly expand."⁶⁴

Retreat from Voluntarism? Commentaries on Stalin's disquisition on linguistics apparently got out of control, for, in October, 1952, Stalin issued his Economic Problems of Socialism, in which he charged Soviet intellectuals with perverting his conception of the role and capabilities of the Soviet state and drawing unwarranted inferences concerning dialectical and historical materialism. Especially did he denounce those who held that the Soviet state was capable of "creating," "shaping," or "abolishing" the objective laws of political economy:

Certain comrades deny the objective character of the laws of science, especially laws of political economy under socialism. They deny that the laws of political economy express conformity with the laws of processes carried out independently of the will of the people. They consider that, in view of the special role granted by history to the Soviet state, the Soviet state and its leaders can repeal existing laws of political economy, can "shape" new laws, "create" new laws. These comrades are deeply mistaken.⁶⁵

Although the formula "on reforming laws has long been in circulation here," he ⁶³ Ts. Stepanyan, "On the Organization of the Soviet State in Economic Organization and in Cultural Education," Izvestiya, Aug. 3, 1950. Cf. G. Glezerman, "Base and Superstructure," Bolshevik (No. 18), Sept., 1950. An English translation can be found in Communist Review (theoretical journal of the British Communist party), Jan., 1951.

⁶⁴ Stepanyan, op. cit.; cf. also Stepanyan, "From Socialism to Communism," Komsomolskaya Pravda, Oct. 16, 1952 and G. Glezerman, "The Socialist State—Mighty Instrumentality for Building Communism," Izvestiya, Oct. 12, 1952.

⁶⁵ Stalin, Economic Problems of Socialism in the U.S.S.R. Citations are from the translation published in the New York Times, Oct. 4, 1952.

admitted, "we must renounce it in the interests of exactitude." It was possible, he said, to "limit the sphere of action of some or another economic laws," and one can even prevent "their ruinous action," but it is impossible to destroy them.⁶⁶ Some writers, pursuing Stalin's logic, concluded that the possibility of conflict between productive forces and productive relations in Soviet society did not exist. This view Stalin condemned:

Comrade Yaroshenko is mistaken in affirming that under socialism there is no conflict between productive relations and productive forces in society. Of course, our present productive relations are going through that period when they, in full correspondence to the growth of productive forces, are moving forward in seven-league strides. But it would be incorrect to grow complacent about this and think that there do not exist any conflicts between our productive forces and productive relations. Conflicts unconditionally do exist, and will, in as much as the development of productive relations is behind and will be behind the development of productive forces. . . . Therefore the task of the leading organs consists in noting in good time growing contradictions and taking measures in time to overcome them by means of adoption of productive relations to the growth of productive forces.⁶⁷

Stalin's assertion that the Soviet state can neither create nor destroy objective laws of political economy or historical development is not a fundamental change from the position he adopted in 1950, although, on the surface, the two positions appear contradictory. Nor are the views expressed by Soviet philosophers, whom he condemned for distorting his views, essentially in conflict with his. Stalin's insistence that the state cannot create or abolish laws at will is a pure technicality, for he does not deny that the state can abolish and create the economic conditions which give rise or decay to these laws. Thus, by direction and manipulation of the economic foundations of society, the state, in effect, does create and abolish laws of political economy, for these "laws" are nothing but the abstract generalizations of the handiwork of the state. Stalin's distinction is without substantial difference; it appears mainly as a formal attempt to remain within the Marxist materialistic philosophy.

His attack, however, served an important policy function, for it was really aimed at those writers who had so vulgarized his propositions as to commit the Soviet state to satisfying the immediate and voracious economic needs of the people, and at the notion that the entire economic system could be operated on a "push-button" basis and be converted into a cornucopia overnight. His theory was meant to be viewed in long range perspective, as meaning only that eventually the state could freely direct and manipulate the economy of the country so as to meet the demands of the people. What Stalin laid down as a theory, the propagandists tried to convert into an immediate policy. His intellectual myrmidons were portraying the capabilities of the Soviet state in such rosy terms that the vast difference between promise and actuality could prove embarrassing, and even threatening, to the regime. Stalin remains the chief culprit in this drama, however, for his transmutation of Soviet ideology into a voluntaristic system will continue to breed unwarranted optimism, and periodical attempts will continue to be made to stem the tide.

⁶⁶ Ibid.

⁶⁷ Ibid.

As a result of Stalin's criticisms, writers heaped abuse upon one another and fingers of accusation were pointed all around. Writers who preached the supremacy of social consciousness over social existence were accused of perverting materialism into an idealist system. Thus P. F. Yudin, himself a sinner, indignantly denounced his colleagues for their mistakes:

These scientific workers began to argue thus: since the anarchy of production and competition have disappeared as laws of social development, since the spontaneous character of social life was replaced by the planned development of the economy while the role of the organs leading society—the Party, the state—increased in great extent, society in the person of the state is, therefore, capable of organizing the economic life according to its will, without considering the objective laws of economic development. The strengthening of the opposite reaction of the superstructure on the base in the conditions of socialism, served many of the scholars as an excuse to regard the economic-organizational activity of the state as the source, as the primary reason for economic development; and they started considering the economic development of society, i.e., the primary, material basis of the life of society, as secondary, as completely dependent upon the will of the state. Comrade Stalin inflicted a crushing blow to these idealistic views.⁶⁸

Even Voznesensky, who had long vanished from the councils of the Politbureau, was condemned for offering "a potpourri of voluntarist views on the role of the state," and Pravda gravely warned writers who "ignore the Marxist premise of the determining role of economics in social development."⁶⁹

Stalin's caveat in the Economic Problems appeared on cursory observation to have arrested the trend from determinism to voluntarism. Actually, these vociferous declamations were in the nature of an admission that the transition was all but complete. These basic modifications are so rooted in Soviet ideology that to repudiate them de facto would mean the repudiation of the entire Soviet system. They cannot be abjured by mere verbal fiat. Stalin did not vitiate his theory of the "revolution from above" as the central concept of dialectical change, and as long as this concept remains established, it is an admission of the "idealistic" and voluntaristic character of Soviet ideology, for as long as "revolutions" are conducted by the state, Soviet ideology cannot be deterministic in its conception.

Need the State Withers Away? "As soon as there is no longer any class of society to be held in subjection," wrote Engels, "there is nothing more to be suppressed which would make . . . a state necessary."⁷⁰ Thus Engels presents the moral imperative for the state's abolition. According to Lenin, the state is not merely morally objectionable in a society without class conflict; its existence in such a society is physically impossible:

⁶⁸ P. F. Yudin, "J. V. Stalin's Work 'The Economic Problems of Socialism in the U.S.S.R.,'" Kommunist (No. 3), 1953, pp. 44–45.

⁶⁹ A. Sobolev, "Completely Overcome Subjectivistic Errors in Economics," Pravda, Jan. 12, 1953. It was Voznesensky's thesis that Soviet war economy "was marked by the operation of specific economic laws" and that "the theory of the war economy of socialism has been created by the work of our leader, the great Stalin." Soviet Economy during the Second World War (New York, 1949), p. 13. Cf. his "voluntarist" views, pp. 118–24.

⁷⁰ Engels, The Anti-Duehring, pp. 306–7.

The bourgeois, and particularly the petty bourgeois, ideologists . . . "correct" Marx in such a way as to make it appear that the state is an organ for reconciling the classes. According to Marx, the state could neither arise nor maintain itself if a reconciliation of classes was possible. But with the petty-bourgeois and philistine professors and publicists, the state . . . becomes a conciliation of classes.⁷¹

Obviously the root problem of contemporary Soviet political theory is Stalin's insistence that it must be constructed on the basis of the non-existence of class conflict in Soviet society. Upon this social abstraction are erected still further abstractions, but it becomes abundantly clear that the validity of the Soviet doctrine of the state can never rise above the validity of the premise upon which it is constructed. The new theory of the Soviet state naturally brings up the question of the state's ultimate superfluity. Soviet doctrine is extremely ambiguous on this point. Although the "withering away" theory has never been explicitly disavowed, it is difficult to find any extended discussion of it in recent Soviet literature. In 1939, Stalin explained that the abolition of the state was postponed until the termination of capitalist encirclement and in his discourse on linguistics he still accepted the validity of Engel's dictum that "after the victory of the socialist revolution, the state is bound to wither away" provided that it applies "for the period when the consecutive victory of Socialism. . . in most countries" is a reality.⁷² Most Soviet writers are content to observe vaguely that the state will persist in Soviet society until the liquidation of capitalist encirclement, but almost total emphasis is on the need for constantly strengthening the power of the existing state. The tendency for Soviet writers to steer clear of the problem is understandable in view of the fact that Vyshinsky and members of the highest Party councils issue thinly veiled warnings to Soviet intellectuals that exaggerated emphasis of the "withering away" theory is misplaced and apt to constitute prima facie evidence of "objective" treason. The statement of Malenkov in his address to the 19th Party Congress that "the enemies and vulgarizers of Marxism advocated the theory. . . of the weakening and withering away of the Soviet state," is rather typical.⁷³ Even when Soviet writers do venture to deal with the question, their observations are frequently qualified by ambiguities. Thus, Stepanyan writes that "even if capitalist encirclement is liquidated and the state withers away, a perfected machinery for administering economic and cultural life will remain," and Yudin holds that with the final world-wide victory of communism, "the administration of society will lose its political character."⁷⁴

The "withering away" thesis in Soviet ideology is conspicuous for its irrelevance. It no longer even serves as an important utopian category, the emphasis being on communist society. The vitality of this idea has been sapped

⁷¹ Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. 7, p. 9.

⁷² Stalin, Marxism and Linguistics, pp. 36-37.

⁷³ The complete text of Malenkov's address to the 19th Party Congress is reprinted in Martin Ebon, Malenkov, Stalin's Successor (New York, 1953). The quotation cited is at p. 229. Cf. Vyshinsky, Teachings, pp. 114-16.

⁷⁴ Stepanyan, "From Socialism to Communism," Komsomolskaya Pravda, Oct. 16, 1952; Yudin, The Prime Source, pp. 22-23.

principally because it is really unnecessary for the state to disappear. With Stalin's conversion of the state into an ethical instrument of progress and as the institutionalized expression of society's will, the original impulses for its abolition have vanished, and the thesis that the state will wither away once capitalist encirclement is liquidated cannot be taken seriously. On the contrary, if precedent is any criterion, the liquidation of capitalist encirclement, on the basis of Stalin's earlier views, could require the greater strengthening of the state, since it would now be confronted with the Herculean task of cleansing the entire world of the exploiting classes. This is in conformity with Stalin's theory that the resistance of the residual exploiters intensifies as their end approaches, and hence the power of the state must reach its zenith in order to deliver the final coup de grace, as a prelude to its mythical disappearance. This has been eloquently demonstrated on a restricted international scale in the areas of Eastern Europe and the Far East, where a socialist periphery supplanted a bourgeois one.⁷⁵ This doctrine is essentially an aggressive one, for it dictates the progressive strengthening of the state as long as capitalism exists, and at the same time insists that the progressive weakening of international capitalism automatically accelerates the power of the state.

V. THE CRISIS IN CONTEMPORARY SOVIET IDEOLOGY

From Ideology to "False Consciousness." "Dialectics," Lenin warned, "is not reducible to relativism," for "to make relativism the basis of the theory of knowledge is inevitably to condemn oneself either to absolute scepticism, agnosticism and sophistry, or to subjectivism," enabling one to "justify any sophistry."⁷⁶

The relativism of contemporary Soviet ideology, in its abstract conception, has compelled it to outrun its "material foundations," that is, it is no longer even in remote focus with Soviet reality. It represents a completed metamorphosis from utopia to "false consciousness."⁷⁷ A substantial part of Soviet doctrine consists of abstract categories drawn from what are officially decreed "facts of existence," through a process which can only be described as institutionalized self-delusion. Since fictions like the "monolithic will" of society, and the doctrine of "no class antagonisms" must be accepted as reality, any theory based on these "facts" merely compounds the delusion by raising it to a higher level. With the periodic revisions of history, a corpus of official mythology recorded in Stalin's History has been erected, from which a scientific theory is abstracted. As long as Soviet philosophy is postulated on this basis, its epistemological categories can offer only a distorted image of the Soviet world. This rigor mortis has not intruded to any serious degree into the ideological prism used to view the outside world (except for the satellite states, in which case ideological distortion has assumed alarming proportions). Once this transpires, the consequences of distorted analysis in international politics can be catastrophic, since myths in this arena cannot be fully controlled or manipulated. The capacity of Soviet ideology to comprehend its own world adequately has been seriously impaired, for as long as it is constructed in this manner, Soviet philosophers will have no other function but to pontificate on official myths, not as myths or utopias, but as reality. This process has been pungently described by Milovan Djilas, Yugoslavia's fallen theoretician:

⁷⁵ Cf. Stalin, Leninism, 2 vols. (New York, 1933), Vol. 1, p. 50 and Mastering Bolshevism (New York, 1946), pp. 21-22.

⁷⁶ Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. 11, p. 199.

⁷⁷ The terms "utopia" and "false consciousness" are here used in the special sense in which Karl Mannheim employs them. "Only those orientations transcending reality will be referred to by us as utopian which, when they pass over into conduct, tend to shatter, either partially or wholly, the order of things prevailing at the time." Ideology and Utopia (New York, 1949), p. 173. "False consciousness" or "ideological distortion" occurs when "persons try to cover up their 'real' relations to themselves and to the world, and falsify to themselves the elementary facts of human existence by deifying, romanticizing, or idealizing them . . . and thereby conjuring up false interpretations of experience. . . . Knowledge is distorted when it fails to take account of new realities applying to a situation, and when it attempts to conceal them by thinking of them in categories which are inappropriate." Ibid., pp. 85-86.

Thence subjective idealism—despite its materialistic and dialectical methodology—in the philosophy and science of the U.S.S.R. which is unfolding on the basis of untrue and undialectical proclamations that there are no more internal contradictions there. . . . The principle of this methodology is as follows: since we have no social contradictions, the consciousness of the leaders accurately reflects reality, and, accordingly, what they say is not only accurate and infallible but also a law of the development of society, that is, the material world.⁷⁸

Since "material reality" in the Soviet Union is not perceived through the sense organs, but is manufactured by decree, Soviet ideologists will continually find themselves in the same "idealistic" cul de sac. As long as the mythmakers are in power, the dangers of distorted analysis are minimized, but the future ruling hierarchy in the Soviet Union, weaned on a steady diet of myths, may well be victimized by the false images of Soviet society bequeathed them by their predecessors, for Soviet philosophy, then as now, rationalizes not an existing social order, but a non-existent one.

The Crisis in Soviet Leadership Theory. One area in which the gulf between image and reality is seriously affecting the Soviet system is that of leadership theory. For more than two decades, Soviet leadership theory has been based on the collective principle, whereas one-man control has been the practice. "Junta rule" has always collapsed in the Soviet Union, because the idea of an inflexible party line was never in tune with the conception of collective leadership. With the metamorphosis of the party line into "a monolithic collective will of society," as expressed through the state, the problem of adjusting to collective rule is made almost impossible. A political theory which relies for its implementation on a discoverable concept of general will or monolithic collective consciousness must personalize this expression in a single identifiable personality who has the power and responsibility, without challenge, to coordinate this will authoritatively and infallibly with the inscrutable immanent laws of the dialectic.

⁷⁸ Milovan Djilas, New Roads to Socialism (Belgrade, 1950), p. 18. See also p. 11.

Just prior to Stalin's death, evidence was mounting that indicated a revision of Marxist leadership formulas. The appearance of writings reformulating the Marxist-Leninist views on the role of the "great personality" in history, together with the synthetic charisma which was being spun around the figure of Stalin, indicated a trend in the direction of a possible Soviet Fuehrerprinzip theory.⁷⁹ This trend was arrested by Stalin's death and was supplanted with denunciations of the "cult of the leader," and "one-man rule."⁸⁰ These conspicuous disavowals served to demonstrate vividly the failure of the collective principle to work, for, theoretically, collective rule was always the only recognized principle of leadership.

The lack of a systematic theory of leadership which accords with the realities of Soviet politics and is consistent with its ideology represents a serious deficiency. The monolithic will of society is one; there exist nine possible wills at the party summit and only one can be identical to that of society. Each major policy question requiring a subtle ideological interpretation or an infinitely precise decision will accelerate the breakdown of collective rule. One-man rule simplifies the decision-making problem in a system where only a single authoritative interpretation of the Marxist-Leninist doctrine and of the policies that flow therefrom is permissible at any particular time. Historical precedent makes this a tempting situation for leaders raised in the Stalinist tradition. The "great personality" remains a potent symbol, but his identity is temporarily obscured by the fig leaf of collective rule.

⁷⁹ See "Pravda Articles," (London, 1950), which contains panegyrics delivered on the occasion of Stalin's 70th birthday by Malenkov, Beriia, Molotov, Voroshilov, and Mikoyan, for representative illustrations of the "cult of Stalin." For more fundamental trends in the revision of Marxist theory on the role of the individual in history, see I. S. Kron's praise of Kammari's book, Marxism-Leninism on the Role of the Individual in History, in Voprosy Istorii (No. 2), Feb., 1953. After Stalin's death, the book was severely criticized for "un-Marxist" treatment of the individual. Kammari's views were repudiated in F. V. Konstantinov's article, "The People—Makers of History," in Pravda, June 28, 1953, with the denunciation of the "great personality" theory of history which Kammari was disseminating.

⁸⁰ See "Fifty Years of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, 1903–1953," Pravda, July 26, 1953; L. Slepov, "Collectivity Is the Highest Principle of Party Leadership," Izvestiya, April 16, 1953; "The Collegium Principle in Soviet Executive Committee Work," Izvestiya, June 7, 1953.

THE LOGICAL AND THE REAL IN POLITICAL THEORY: PLATO, ARISTOTLE, AND MARX

CHARLES N. R. McCOY

Catholic University

An immediate and important insight into the significance of Greek political philosophy may be gained by examining an observation made upon it by Karl Marx. The fact that Marx's observation is fundamentally erroneous does not prevent it from being profoundly suggestive (Marx observed) in the course of his doctoral dissertation, On the Differences between the Natural Philosophy of Democritus and Epicurus, (that the character of the philosophical world after the death of Aristotle in the Fourth Century B.C. was similar to that of the philosophical world after the death of Hegel in the Nineteenth Century.¹ What was this similarity of which Marx speaks? We may best understand it if we know that Marx had considered that his own achievement had been to break through the "completed, total world" of Hegel's "pure theory, theology, philosophy, ethics etc.," and to have resolved the "absolute metaphysical spirit into the real man standing on the foundation of nature."² Evidently, then, (Hegel's system of philosophy had separated human thought from the "real man," and had gone off into "pure theory," unconnected with the real world. Aristotle, too,) Marx contended, (had, by the same kind of misconception, freed the theoretical mind from mundane reality. But there was an extremely important difference between Hegel and Aristotle,) a difference of which Marx had to avail himself by a special indebtedness to each. The difference was this: In Aristotle's "pure theory, theology, philosophy, ethics etc.," the material world had a real existence independent of man; in Hegel's "pure theory, theology, philosophy, ethics etc.," the material world did not exist independently of man's thought, and hence it existed in "pure thought and in abstraction."³ In Hegel's philosophy, the material world is "reclaimed" for man, but it is at the same time negated in its material existence. Now if Marx wished to convert this Hegelian speculative conquest of the world of nature into a real, practical conquest, it was necessary that he make some return to the Aristotelian conception of a theoretical mind that recognized the reality of the material world. This he did) as we shall see when we consider Marx's political theory.

¹ It has been pointed out that Marx expressly mentions the fact that the subject for his doctoral dissertation was suggested by his awareness of the parallel between the post-Aristotelian philosophy and the post-Hegelian philosophy. See Eric Voegelin, "The Formation of the Marxian Revolutionary Idea," Review of Politics, Vol. 12, pp. 275-302 (July, 1950). Marx's observation may be found in Über die Differenzen der demokratischen und epikureischen Naturphilosophie, in Marx-Engels, Gesamtausgabe, Sec. II, Vol. 1, Pt. I, p. 131.

² Quoted by Otto Rühle, Karl Marx, His Life and Work (London, 1929), p. 33. Marx is here acknowledging his indebtedness to Ludwig Feuerbach. See my "Ludwig Feuerbach and the Formation of the Marxian Revolutionary Idea," Laval Théologique et Philosophique, Vol. 7, pp. 218-48 (No. 2, 1951).

³ Oekonomische-philosophische Manuskript 1844, Marx-Engels, Gesamtausgabe Sec. I, Vol. 3, p. 155.

Now the curious thing, and a thing of utmost importance to observe, is that (it was precisely by having shown that the order of reality and the order of logic (the order of the human mind) are not identical, that Aristotle was able to assure, against Plato, the real, independent existence of the material world. For Plato) as we shall see, (differed from both Aristotle and Hegel: he thought that the material world existed independently of the human mind, but that its real existence was an essentially immaterial one. Aristotle's achievement was, indeed, the very foundation of his philosophy, including his political philosophy; it is the ultimate explanation of the realist, natural, and non-totalitarian character of his political science.)

We can understand this basic contribution of Aristotle only by seeing it in relation to the earlier speculations of Greek thinkers on the nature of the physical universe. It is not necessary to relate here the history of the early Greek cosmological speculations. It is enough if we try to understand the state of thought at the conclusion of the cosmological period in the Fifth Century B.C.

The efforts of the Greek thinkers in the realm of physics had culminated in a condition of intellectual paralysis. This condition was perhaps best reflected in the conflicting theories of two of the greatest of the early thinkers, Heraclitus and Parmenides. It was the teaching of Heraclitus that the only reality is change; there is no underlying substratum that may be said to undergo change, and therefore Heraclitus was saying that science is impossible, for science ought to be certain and necessary, at least in part. Parmenides of Elea had succeeded in transcending the world of physical bodies and even that of mathematical forms, and had attained the notion of being as such. But since, according to Parmenides, that which is is, and that which is not is not, there is only one science possible: the science of being. The distinction of things is an illusion because the only difference between two beings must necessarily be non-being, and non-being is not; hence all things are one, without distinction and without change. The philosophy of Parmenides found its most brilliant apologist in Zeno, and the arguments of Zeno appeared to his opponents to be unanswerable. The paradoxes of Zeno became famous; they were designed to show the impossibility of change and plurality. He argued, for example, that motion cannot possibly begin because a body in motion cannot arrive at another place until it has passed half the distance between its point of departure and its goal; but the number of intermediate places is not just one but is infinite; therefore, since an infinite space cannot be traversed in a finite time, motion is obviously an illusion of the senses.

This impasse in Greek philosophy ushered in a period of crisis in Greek thought. The man who was to initiate the rescue of philosophy from its parlous state was Socrates. Socrates committed none of his teachings to writing; our knowledge of him is chiefly had from the accounts of Xenophon, one of his students, and above all from Plato, his great disciple. It is from Aristotle, however, that we have the most valuable information on the teaching of Socrates, and in the Thirteenth Book of his Metaphysics he tells us that Socrates was the first of the Greek thinkers to raise the problem of universal definition. "For of the physicists," Aristotle writes, "Democritus only touched on the subject to a small extent. . . ." ⁴ "But it was natural," continues Aristotle, "that Socrates should be seeking the essence, for he was seeking to syllogize, and 'what a thing is' is the starting point of syllogisms; . . . for two things may be fairly ascribed to Socrates—inductive argument and universal definition, both of which are concerned with the starting point of science." ⁵ The method which Socrates employed, called "maieutic," the art of intellectual midwifery, sought to aid the intellect in bringing forth its proper object by seeking the essences of things and expressing them in definitions. Philosophy had advanced beyond the stage where it had sought some one universal nature—water, air, fire, numbers, or even absolute being—as the ultimate substance of everything. Socrates had, on the contrary, engaged it in the task of determining and defining the essence of each thing by genus and difference, by a concept proper to itself alone. If we wish to see the Socratic method in operation we have only to study the masterly use of it in the great Dialogues of Plato.

It was the very merit and value of the Socratic discovery that contained a latent danger: the discovery of definition involved the possibility of identifying the real order with the logical order, of identifying the real existence of things defined with their existence in the mind. It was to this error that Plato, by an understandable inadvertence, succumbed. Having observed that knowledge takes place through some kind of similitude, and that the things understood in the mind are understood under conditions of immateriality and immobility, Plato was led to suppose that things existed in themselves under such conditions. Plato's theory that the essences of things were necessarily immaterial was further determined by his Heraclitean discipleship. As Aristotle tells us:

For having in his youth first become familiar with . . . the Heraclitean doctrines [that all sensible things are ever in a state of flux and there is no knowledge about them], these views Plato held even in later years. Socrates, however, was busying himself about ethical matters and neglecting the world of nature as a whole, but seeking the universal in these ethical matters, and fixed thought for the first time on definitions; Plato accepted his teaching, but held that the problem applied not to sensible things but to entities of another kind—for this reason, that the common definition could not be a definition of any sensible thing, as they were always changing. Things of this other sort, then, he called Ideas, and sensible things, he said, were all named after these, and in virtue of a relation to these; for the many existed by participation in the Ideas that have the same name as they. ⁶

The philosophy of Plato, including his political philosophy, was formed, then, by the confluence of two streams of thought: the speculations of Heraclitus on the problem of being and becoming, and the discovery by Socrates of inductive argument and definition. The solution which Plato worked out, known as the Doctrine of Ideas, enabled him to account for the nature of science in a better way, however inadequate, than had hitherto been possible. Its inadequacy lay exactly in its achievement: it had found the possibility of defining and classifying things—a task initial and indispensable to science—but it could not distinguish the real existence of things from the mode of their existence in the logical order. The logical universal, insofar as it is predicable of many—as, for example, “man” is predicable of John, James, and Paul—is neither a principle of existence nor a substance. “Man” is not something apart from John, James, and Paul who are men. But (Plato supposed this universal to be a principle of existence; he gave to this universal a separate existence. For Plato the universal “man” exists, and the individual men whom we know through our senses are merely weak participations in the idea Man) We must observe that in the logical order the more universal concept is imposed on the less universal as if it were a form determining matter; thus, in “man is an animal,” and “dog is an animal,” the terms “man” and “dog” are as variable matter with respect to the imposition of the determining form “animal.” But actually, in the real order, “animal” is not the determining form of “man” and “dog”; in the real order, “animal” is an indeterminate and confused concept compared with “man” and “dog.” For there is no animal in general: there is no animal except dog which is an animal and man who is an animal, etc. St. Thomas Aquinas, the clearest and greatest of the commentators on the philosophy of Aristotle, explains this point as follows:

⁴ Metaphysics, Bk. XIII, ch. 3, 1078^b, 20.

⁵ Ibid., 1078^b, 24.

⁶ Metaphysics, Bk. I, ch. 6, 987^a, 31–987^b, 10.

That which is common to many is not something besides those many except . . . logically: thus animal is not something besides Socrates and Plato and other animals except as considered by the mind, which apprehends the form of animal as divested of all that specifies and individualizes it: for man is that which is truly animal, else it would follow that in Socrates and Plato there are several animals, namely animal in general, man in general, and Plato himself.⁷

(For Plato) on the contrary, (the more universal concept in the logical order was looked upon as more real, more determinate, more “rich,” and it was thought by him to contain actually, and not merely potentially, its subjective parts.) If this were the case, (if the subjective parts “man” and “dog” were in the genus “animal” actually and not merely potentially, it would follow that these parts would have no determinate, specific existence; they would be absorbed in the genus.) Thus it was that Plato supposed John Smith and Paul Jones to be almost nothing, nothing but weak participations in the idea Man.

(It was this identification of the logical order with the real order that was responsible for the absorption, in Plato’s political philosophy, of the real parts of political society in the whole.⁸ “But what?” he asks, “the nature of a large house and that of a small city, are they different with regard to government? Not at all.”⁹ Indeed, (he tells us that the state is nothing but the individual writ large. The mistake of identifying the logical order with the real order accounts for the extreme unity that Plato seeks to achieve for the ideal Republic. This effort at the greatest possible unity is manifest in all the striking features of the Republic. The "parts" or classes of the Republic—rulers, warriors, and artisans—are conceived quite independently of the natural parts of society, especially of the family.) These latter have as much reality, in Plato's view, as John Smith has in relation to "Man." (With Plato the individual, the family, and the quasi-natural associations are absorbed as much as possible in the state. That their activity is considered to be principally that of the whole state is evident from what he has to say on the abolition of private property and the family among the guardians. Loyalty to the common good is hindered by loyalty to one's family and by interest in one's property. Plato supposes that family affection is incompatible with the affection that should obtain in that larger "family" which is the whole society of the state,) where all children are sons of all, and all men are brothers, "all men saying mine and not mine at the same instant of time." But as Aristotle will point out:

⁷ Contra Gentiles, I, ch. 26.

⁸ See Jacques de Monleon, “Petites notes autour de la famille et de la cité,” Laval Théologique et Philosophique, Vol. 3, pp. 262–89 (No. 2, 1947).

⁹ The Statesman, 258E–259D.

This is not the way in which people would speak who had their wives and children in common; they would say "all" but not "each." In like manner their property would be described as belonging to them, not severally but collectively. . . . That all persons call the same thing mine in the sense in which each does so may be a fine thing, but it is an impracticable one; or if the words are taken in the other sense, such a unity in no way conduces to harmony.¹⁰

(The observation of Marx on the outcome of Greek philosophy) to which we alluded at the beginning of this paper, (is sufficiently verified in the case of Plato: Plato separated human thought from the "real man" and had gone off into "pure theory" unconnected with the real world. But Marx's target was not Plato; the object of his comment was the condition of philosophy after Aristotle had completed his correction of Plato's thought.) Now we must not suppose that Marx had any deep sympathy for the communism of Plato, because (for Marx "the real life is no more the reality of man based on the suppression of private property" than it is the reality of man based on any negation: "Communism poses the negation as a negation; . . . but communism is not in itself the goal of human education, . . . the form of human society."¹¹ No, the fundamental affinity between Marx and Plato, as the disaffinity between Plato and Aristotle, is found in the Platonic assumption that the individual is nothing if not the species.) Of course Plato maintained that the individual was not the species, and therefore he reduced the individual to mere "shadow." (Marx will maintain,) as we shall point out more fully later, (that the individual is the species because the species is nothing if it is not the individual. It is precisely the confusion between the logical order and the real order that allows Marx to identify the material individual,) John Smith, (with the species man, just as it allowed Plato to give separate existence to the universal "man." It is exactly in this way that Marx claims to have resolved "the absolute metaphysical spirit into the real man standing on the foundation of nature."¹² The "antagonism between . . . the individual and the species" is resolved by the "generic natural relation," in which man is seen as a "conscious generic being) a being which relates itself to the species as to his own proper being, or which relates itself to itself as a generic being."¹³

¹⁰ Politics, Bk. 2, 1261^b, 23-33.

¹¹ Oekonomische-philosophische Manuskript (cited in note 3), Vol. 3, pp. 125-26.

(In distinguishing the real order from the logical order, Aristotle makes it clear that the universal "man," insofar as it is predicable of many, has no being outside the reason. No man identifies himself with human nature itself; what he may well know is that he is a man, but not that he is man.) It is true that the species has no existence except in John Smith, in Paul Jones, etc. But John Smith is not the species; he is of the species and belongs to it. It is only when we consider the abstract species that we have a "one toward many": man can be said of John Smith, of Paul Jones, etc. But we cannot say that man is John Smith, nor that man is Paul Jones. Insofar as Aristotle makes clear that this "universal of predication" has no being outside of the reason, he may be said to have separated human thought from the "real man"; this was to guarantee the "real man" in the real order. (Insofar) on the other hand, (as he denied, against Plato, that this logical universal has a separate existence, he did not separate human thought from the real man: "man" is not something besides John Smith and Paul Jones.)

(When Aristotle says that the logical universal has no being outside of the reason, he does not mean that it is not essential to our knowledge of the real nature of things. The logical universal does not) it is true, (exist as such, outside of the reason; but it is a universal verity rooted in material individual things, as is clear from the fact that what we say of "animal" in general is true of every animal in particular.) It is, for example, true that every man has sense knowledge, but that is true of cat and dog and every other animal as well. The general definition of "animal" expresses at least that which the different species of animal have in common. In speaking of the general definition of "soul," Aristotle makes the matter clear:

It is now evident that a general notion can be given of soul only in the same sense as one can be given of figure. For, as in that case there is no figure distinguishable and apart from triangle, etc., so here there is no soul apart from the forms of soul just enumerated. It is true that a highly general definition can be given for figure which will fit all figures without expressing the peculiar nature of any figure. So here in the case of soul and its specific forms. Hence it is absurd in this and similar cases to seek a common definition which will fail to express the peculiar nature of anything that is. . . . The cases of figure and soul are exactly parallel; for the particulars subsumed under the common name in both cases—figures and living beings—constitute a series, each successive term of which potentially contains its predecessor, e.g. the square the triangle, and the sensory power the self-nutritive. Hence we must ask in the case of each class of living things, What is its soul, i.e. What is the soul of plant, animal, man?¹⁴

¹² Quoted by Rühle, Karl Marx, His Life and Work (cited in note 2), p. 33.

¹³ Manuscript economico-philosophique, XXIV. Cited in De Marx au Marxisme, ed. Robert Aron et al., (Paris, 1948), p. 95.

¹⁴ De Anima, II. ch. 3, 414^b-415^a.

(It is in this same vein that Aristotle begins the consideration of political matters. He introduces the subject by observing that "every state is a community of some kind."¹⁵) It is the real order that Aristotle investigates, using logic as an instrument only. Just as there is little profit in seeking a common definition of soul, so there is little profit in attempting to find a general definition of community which will fail to express the peculiar nature of any community that is.) But some people—and he refers to Plato—think that there is no difference between a great household and a small state. "But all this is a mistake; for governments differ in kind, as will be evident to any one who considers the matter according to the method which has hitherto guided us. As in other departments of science, so in politics, the compound should always be resolved into the simple elements or least parts of the whole."¹⁶)

For our present purpose we need observe only that (Aristotle proceeds, in accordance with the intention of the method he has announced, to distinguish the natural parts of political society and the different kinds of rule that they imply.) (We are made to see at once that the family and property are natural to man in a much more primordial way than is political society: the family and private property are designed primarily to safeguard the very being of men, and property is an instrument of the household.) The naturalness of the relationship between man and woman is found in the intention of nature to generate the species, thus making this relationship of persons primary in the sense precisely that it is found also among other animals and in plants. After the natural difference between man and woman, Aristotle speaks of a natural difference founded upon the nature which is proper to man, namely, the rational. And here the primary distinction is not in terms of any ability of the reason, but in terms of the minimum of the reason's ability with respect to the ordering of human acts to the whole end of human life: that is, the distinction is in terms of the practical reason or prudence. Finally, (the naturalness of political society is distinguished from that of the family in terms of the final intention of human nature to perfection in the virtues and the arts.) Although Aristotle finds in the relationships of persons in the household certain analogues of civil rule, (it must not be imagined that the government of a king over his subjects is natural in the same sense that a father's government over his children is natural.) The father's rule over his children is like royal rule in civil society because the father rules over his children by love and for their own good; but the rule in political society is over freemen, that is, over men who by their knowledge and will choose their form of government. (The nature of a large household and that of a small state are different in regard to government.)

(It is now possible to see why, from Marx's point of view, Aristotle even more than Plato is guilty of separating human thought from the real man. For with Aristotle, the universal of predication, although¹⁷ having no real existence as a universal, does say something true about all the particulars subsumed under it: community in general does not exist, but of the kinds of community that do exist, the notion of common good is applicable. Hence according to Aristotle the individual man participates in a good which, while it is indeed his own good, is one of which he himself is not the absolute measure.) he participates in a common good which is essentially communicable to many, whether it is the common good of that kind of community known as the family, or the common good of that kind of community known as the state. (Aristotle indeed affirms the real individual man; it is precisely because he does so that Marx will complain that the good of the individual is alienated by Aristotle allowing that there is a series of common good of which the individual man as such is not the absolute measure. Plato, on the contrary, by holding that the universal of predication has real existence—man in general exists, society in general exists—makes more easily possible the conclusion that Marx will draw: not that the universal of predication does not exist as such, but that it exists as such—in every individual man—that every individual man is conscious of himself as being both individual and species.¹⁷) It is in this way that Marx understands the necessity of not separating human thought (which knows the universal) from the real man (the material, sensible individual). Marx is ready to declare that the difference between man and brute animal is precisely that man is conscious of himself as being both individual and species. By the same line of reasoning he declares, at the other extreme from Plato, that it is the individual man who is the whole of society:

¹⁵ Politics, I, ch. 1, 1252^a, 1.

¹⁶ Ibid., 1252^a, 7.

Man—to whatever degree . . . that he may be a particular individual . . . is as much at the same time the totality, the ideal totality, the subjective existence of society thought and felt for itself.¹⁸

(What Aristotle suggests by way of irony in criticizing Plato—that if he wants the simplest possible unity he ought to reduce the state to the family and the family to the individual—is true of Marx without irony. Indeed, the individual man becomes the totality of being.) “Socialism . . . takes its departure from the theoretically and practically sensible conscience of man in nature, considered as being.” It is because of this premise that “it becomes impossible practically to ask if there exists a being outside of man. . . .”¹⁹ It follows too from this obverse-Platonic confusion of the logical with the real order, (that any and all forms of social life that do not find and receive their absolute measure in the individual as such, are alienations of his “generic being,” and must all be destroyed before man can recover his “initial independence”—that independence which purports to resolve “the antagonisms between man and nature, origin and being, liberty and necessity, individual and species.”²⁰) It becomes evident how the “new man” will be created—the man for whom “the necessity of observing the simple and fundamental rules of human society will pass very rapidly into a state of habitude.”²¹ (The phase of totalitarian suppression of every ¹⁷ Manuscript economico-philosophique (cited in note 13), XXIV, p. 95.

¹⁸ Oekonomische-philosophische Manuskript, p. 117.

¹⁹ Ibid., p. 125.

²⁰ Ibid., p. 114.

²¹ V. Lenin, The State and Revolution (Detroit, Michigan), p. 108.

natural social form will give way to the "higher phase" of communism in which the suppression itself will have become wholly "natural":

Communism poses the negation as a negation: it is consequently the real element, and indispensable to the historic development of the future, to human emancipation, and the recovery of human dignity. Communism is the necessary form and organic principle of the immediate future, but communism is not itself the goal of human education,—the form of human society.²²)

(It should now be clear how this basic matter of the relation of the logical order to the real order affects the whole structure of political theory. Plato's confusion was understandable,) for it came at the very beginning of Western speculative efforts. But to confuse the logical order with the real order after Greek philosophy had carefully distinguished them, seems rather an error on the part of man's will than on the part of his mind. Marx simply completed a modern trend—that of transposing the whole order of nature to the domination of man: its accomplishment by revolutionary "practise" is preceded by a speculative conquest in identifying the order of things in nature with the order which reason puts in its own acts. To do this is to destroy science and to replace it with myth—the myth of Plato's philosopher-king or the myth of the dictatorship of the proletariat. For Aristotle logic is indeed the art of arts, but it is not a magic art; it is employed as an instrument to guide man in an orderly way, with ease and without error; in the construction of true science.

²² Oekonomische-philosophische Manuskript, p. 125.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT AND FOREIGN SERVICE

JAMES L. McCAMY AND ALESSANDRO CORRADINI

University of Wisconsin

Who handles American foreign relations?

The question has been answered and discussed in terms of the Executive and the Congress in several recent books.¹ We shall attempt here to answer the question in terms of the people who occupy the higher, or policy-making, positions in the Department of State and Foreign Service. Biographical data is published for individuals in this group in the Biographic Register of the Department of State and its supplements.

This type of "Who's Who" sketch is limited, of course, to the bare skeletons of men's lives and is worthless as a test of faith and gumption. One of the tragedies, indeed, in the public service since the loyalty program began in 1947 is the fact that loyalty and security risk cannot be proved by social analysis in a time when loyalty and safeness in matters of security are the great questions that overshadow other concerns in any consideration of public personnel. Of the main reasons for finding an employee a poor security risk—wrong political association, bad character, sexual deviation, excessive drinking, or talking too much—none can be measured by any objective standard. Guilt is a matter of degree, and the degree is a matter of opinion among security officers and others who are urged by their climate to be as suspicious as possible.

Skeleton biographies can, nevertheless, answer some questions about the people who handle American foreign affairs. They can tell us the regions of birth, the ages of officials, the types of schools attended, the types of experience prior to government service, and the duration of experience in government.² All such answers are relevant to an objective analysis of where we stand for personnel in at least the Department of State and the Foreign Service. We need ¹ For review articles dealing with the recent literature in this field see Arthur W. Macmahon, "The Administration of Foreign Affairs," this REVIEW, Vol. 45, pp. 836-66 (Sept., 1951); Royden Dangerfield, "Studies in the Administration of United States Foreign Affairs," Public Administration Review, Vol. 40, pp. 275-82 (Autumn, 1951). Two important books that have appeared since these review articles were written are Professor Macmahon's Administration in Foreign Affairs (University, Ala., 1953); and William Yandell Elliot, United States Foreign Policy, Its Organization and Control (New York, 1952).

² An analysis similar to the one to follow appears in James L. McCamy, The Administration of American Foreign Affairs (New York, 1950), chs. 4 and 8, based upon data of 1948. The main differences between the present study and the earlier one are: (a) The new data are for April, 1952; (b) the new analysis of the Foreign Service covers all Foreign Service Officers and Reserve and all higher officials of the Foreign Service Staff, while the earlier study was based upon a sample of one-third of Foreign Service Officers only. The Foreign Service Staff and Reserve, created by the Foreign Service Act of 1946, were not sufficiently settled in 1948 to permit fruitful analysis.

The work was supported by a grant from the Research Committee of the Graduate School, University of Wisconsin.

the same type of analysis, of course, for other parts of the government, particularly the military, but the data is not easily available.

In the following pages we shall present the analysis of biographical sketches of 7,302 persons as they appeared in the Biographic Register of the Department of State, April 1, 1951, and its Supplement, April 1, 1952.

The 7,302 persons are divided thus: Foreign Service Officers (career), 1,475; Foreign Service Staff Officers (above Class 9), 2,893; Foreign Service Reserve Officers, 512; Technical Cooperation Administration staff, 100; and Departmental officers, General Schedule Grade 12 and above, 2,322. Included in the total for the Department of State, on duty in Washington, are 179 Foreign Service Officers, 70 Foreign Service Staff Officers, and eight Foreign Service Reserve Officers who are counted twice, in effect, because they also appear under their respective Foreign Service categories. These few individuals do not, we feel, distort the evidence enough to matter. We have not anywhere included 58 non-career or political appointees and 31 officers of the Institute for Inter-American Affairs who do not fall into any of the above categories.

Obviously we are assuming here that persons holding ranks above certain grades and all persons in the career Foreign Service are influential in policy-making. This is defensible. These people do occupy the higher posts and receive the higher salaries. From experience and observation we know that, with the usual few exceptions, persons in the upper half of the federal service and in all the Foreign Service are in positions where they can influence policy.

One common error, for example, is to assume that administrative management officers, such as accountants, budget officers, personnel officers, and those who handle purchases and services, are outside "policy-making." No policy can be executed without their help. Their discretion is broad within their own areas of work. If they want to thwart a program, they can do so easily; and if they want to make one succeed, they can do that too. The wise executive who wants to see his policies reach practice remembers this and consults the management officials at all stages. Similarly the young vice-consul in the Foreign Service, eager-eyed but far from the distant middle age when he will begin to be in charge of some of the work abroad, may in his tender years be placed in charge of immigration cases, at least in their first development. Immigration is delicate foreign policy.

Finally, in introduction, we should define the categories of personnel employed in the Department of State and Foreign Service in 1952.³

¹ Foreign Service Officers (career) are a tight inner elite of rigidly selected men (and 20 women) who occupy the key posts in most embassies, legations, and consulates. Ordinarily entering the service just after finishing college, they may, if they rise steadily, end as Career Ministers, eligible to head missions or to hold high posts in the Department of State.

Foreign Service Staff Officers (above Class 9) are for the most part specialists, in contrast to Foreign Service Officers, who are expected to be able to handle any kind of work in a mission. Clerks, stenographers, and other non-policy makers are also in the Staff but are usually below Class 9. Above Class 9, within the group counted here, are the administrative management officials and numerous specialists in labor, agriculture, trade, culture, and other subjects of relevance to the work of a mission. In many cases Staff Officers do the same work as career Foreign Service Officers, although they are not chosen by the same examination and may never reach the peak of rank of Career Minister unless they are admitted to the career service.

³ The groups of the Foreign Service were established in the Foreign Service Act of 1946, Public Law 724, Chap. 957, 79th Cong., 2nd sess.

Foreign Service Reserve Officers are appointed for temporary tenure. The original purpose was to borrow specialists from other government agencies and from private institutions and to place them in the Reserve for non-career appointments in missions abroad. The chief distinction between this group and the Foreign Service Staff is that appointment to the Reserve is limited to a maximum of four years, although after an interval another appointment is possible. Ranks in the Reserve are the same as in the Foreign Service, except that a Reserve Officer may not become a Career Minister. Only a Foreign Service Officer may become a Career Minister.

Technical Cooperation Administration staff is distinguished here because it was set apart in the missions abroad. Since 1953 it has been a part of the Foreign Operations Administration, not under the Department of State.

Departmental Officers, General Schedule Grade 12 and above is the category that includes those who work in the Department of State in Washington. At the time the data for this analysis was collected, anyone in Grade 12 was paid at least $7,040. The lowest salary in the General Schedule then was $2,500; the highest was $14,800 in Grade 18. An employee in Grade 12 or above was in the upper ranks.

I. REGION OF BIRTH

Is the handling of foreign affairs dominated by persons from the isolationist Midwest, the internationalist South, or any other region? In Table I we compare by region of birth the percentages of personnel in each of the categories with the percentage of white population for the region in the census of 1920, the census year closest to the time when most present higher officials were born. White population alone is chosen because of the insignificant number of Ne-

TABLE I. REGION OF BIRTH: PERCENTAGE OF OFFICIALS BORN IN VARIOUS REGIONS

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.	Region's White Popul. in 1920 as % of Total U.S. White Population
Northeastern States	37.4	36.5	40.3	28.2	40.3	30.5
North Central States	29.1	29.7	29.3	31.0	28.4	35.0
South	22.5	22.9	19.4	28.2	23.1	25.5
West	11.0	10.9	11.0	12.6	8.2	9.0

groes in these positions. The regions used here are combinations of smaller census regions: the Northeast includes the Middle Atlantic and New England; the North Central, the East and West North Central states; the South, the West and East South Central states and the South Atlantic; and the West includes the Mountain and Pacific states.

Clearly the Northeast has contributed more to the group of permanent officials in foreign affairs than its share of population. For all categories save the Technical Cooperation group, it has contributed an average of 8.1 percentage points more permanent officials than its share of the 1920 white population. The West too has sent a few more people—an average of 1.7 percentage points—into foreign affairs than its share of white population. The North Central Region has contributed an average of 4.0 percentage points lower than its share of white population. The South, including the District of Columbia, has sent to this work an average of 3.5 percentage points less than its share of white population in all categories save Technical Cooperation work, where it showed 2.7 percentage points above its share of white population. Some correction is necessary in the case of the South, however, since the District of Columbia is not typically a part of the South, being more a home of government employees from many regions. If we remove the District of Columbia from the South, the South's deficit rises to an average of 6.3 percentage points except for Technical Cooperation personnel where there is a surplus unchanged of 2.7 percentage points.

Relatively more people from the Northeastern United States and from the West have reached the higher positions in foreign affairs. These two regions, by Ralph Smuckler's analysis, have tended to be more internationalist than isolationist.⁴ Proportionately fewer people have entered this work from the North Central region and from the South. Of these regions, the North Central has tended to be isolationist; the South has tended to be internationalist.

Certainly no cause and effect can be established from such evidence. Probably no conclusion is warranted. The data, shall we say, simply show that, with the exception of the South, persons born in the more internationalist regions have tended more than those in the North Central region to occupy the higher posts in the Department of State and Foreign Service. No one region is so dominant that it need cause alarm.

II. AGE

Are our policy-makers in foreign relations too young to have good judgment? Or too old to have imagination and initiative? Table II shows the percentage of higher officials in each of five age groups.

Young men of age 20–30 form a larger percentage of the career Foreign Service Officer group because all Foreign Service Officers are counted here as pol-

⁴ Ralph Smuckler, "The Region of Isolationism," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 386–401 (June, 1953). While the nation is not divided as neatly as most conversation has it, Professor Smuckler does find that according to votes in Congress the North Central region is more isolationist than other regions. See also George L. Grassmuck, Sectional Biases in Congress on Foreign Policy (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, Vol. 78, 1951).

TABLE II. AGE: PERCENTAGE OF POLICY-MAKING OFFICIALS IN EACH GROUP

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
20-30 years	16.8	7.6	3.0	2.0	1.9
31-40	42.0	44.0	36.7	31.3	43.7
41-50	24.1	30.5	39.0	41.4	37.0
51-60	15.8	14.3	17.5	19.2	13.9
61 or more	1.3	3.6	3.8	6.1	3.5

icy-makers. Younger men in the other categories have not yet reached the higher ranks where policy-makers reside in this analysis. Relatively few young men, below the age of 30, occupy higher posts in the Department of State and Foreign Service, with the exception of the group of career Foreign Service Officers. Most officials bunch in the two decades of 31 to 50 years. For whatever reasons (death, illness, early retirement, resignation), there is a sharp drop in the percentage of ages above 51. Only small, insignificant percentages are above 61 years of age.

If the executives of the rank of division chief and higher in the Department of State are analyzed separately, they are somewhat older than the whole group. Thus 45.5 per cent of these top executives are 41-50 years old compared to 37.0 per cent of all the Department's officials, and 17.3 per cent are 51-60 years old compared to 13.9 per cent for the whole group. There is no difference in the age group of 61 and more; 3.6 per cent of the top executives and 3.5 per cent of the whole group are 61 years old or older.

Older men and women in many societies are considered to have learned more and to be wiser than middle-aged or younger people. In our own society we often use older people as leaders in Congress and in business. We use very few above 61 years of age in the Department of State and Foreign Service.

III. THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN

As one might expect in our culture, few women are admitted to the Foreign Service or the higher posts of the Department of State. The lowest percentage is found in the group of career Foreign Service Officers, where only 1.3 per cent of all officers are women. The highest percentage is found in the Foreign Service Staff, where 13.5 per cent of the higher employees are women. The Department of State has 11.8 per cent women among its officials; the Foreign Service Reserve 5.1 per cent, and Technical Cooperation Administration 3.0 per cent. For all groups together 9.8 per cent are women.

IV. EDUCATION

Preparatory School. We now reach the delicate question of whether the people who handle foreign relations are typical of the whole population in the type of schooling they received. It is delicate because some would argue that atypical education is better than public, or typical, education and hence produces better trained public officials. Others argue that private schooling encourages snobbism and is removed from the democratic elbow-rubbing of public high schools. First, the facts: 39.8 per cent of Foreign Service Officers, 34.2 per cent of Foreign Service staff, 35.7 per cent of the Foreign Service Reserve, and 34.3 per cent of Department of State Officials went to private preparatory schools. Comparable data were not available for Technical Cooperation Administration.

Private schools in the United States were identified in Porter Sargent's A Handbook of Private Schools, 1951-1952. All training in schools abroad was assumed to be private. If the individuals educated abroad are removed from the total, however, some considerable differences appear for all groups except the career Foreign Service Officers. Omitting foreign schools the percentages are: Foreign Service Officers, 36.0; Foreign Service Staff, 19.5; Foreign Service Reserve, 22.6; Technical Cooperation Administration, no data; and Department of State, 26.6. We believe that, regardless of these differences, the percentages based upon the inclusion of individuals trained abroad is the more descriptive. Those who went to high school abroad, whether public or private, were trained in a different manner and different climate than were those educated in American public high schools. If we are seeking light on the type of schooling, the foreign schools are distinct.

In 1938, when a person born in 1920 would have been ready to leave high school, only 7.08 per cent of the total of all high school graduates in the nation came from private schools. In that year enrollment in private high schools was divided 69.4 per cent in Catholic schools, 11.9 per cent in other denominational schools, and 18.7 per cent in non-sectarian schools.⁵ It is not within our present resources to say how many officials came from Catholic, other denominational, or non-sectarian private high schools.

Without question the heavy weight of private schooling is significant. This tendency toward the employment of private school graduates has a long history in the Foreign Service, at least, and shows no sign of changing. When we compare the various classes, or by inference age groups, from the youngest recruits in the beginning class to the older officers at the top, we find that the percentages are fairly evenly distributed from youngest to oldest officials in all three branches of the Foreign Service: Officers, Staff, and Reserve.

One can only speculate concerning why private school graduates are more prevalent in this work than in the population. Perhaps private school graduates are more travelled and more interested in work abroad. Perhaps they come from families where diplomatic work carries more prestige than work in the vineyards of business or professions or government agencies not equally concerned with foreign relations. Perhaps private schools create more interest in careers in diplomacy. Whatever the reason, the fact is that private schools are represented in the Foreign Service and in the Department of State in a much higher proportion than in the total population.

Colleges and Universities Attended. As is shown in Table III, many colleges and universities have contributed graduates and former students to the ranks of officials who handle foreign affairs. (In this sense a college gives only the first degree; a university gives the first and also advanced degrees.)

⁵ U. S. Office of Education, Biennial Survey of Education, 1937-38 (Washington, G.P.O. 1940).

TABLE III. NUMBER OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES IN WHICH POLICY-MAKING OFFICIALS TOOK UNDERGRADUATE AND GRADUATE WORK

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
American Colleges	125	298	79	36	229
American Universities	121	179	90	48	142
Foreign Colleges	21	23	8	—	20
Foreign Universities	57	109	48	3	113
Totals	324	609	225	87	504

The next question is whether the greater number of these officials come from a relatively small number of institutions. To answer this—except in the case of the Department of State officials, for whom the data was certain only for college attendance in general—we have chosen undergraduate training as the most typical. It can be taken in more institutions. Graduate work and professional training are available in fewer places, and the circumstance of studying while working at a job often dictates the choice of a school.

One way to show the distribution is to list those institutions which have contributed half of the total of policy-making officials (Tables IV–VII). Technical Cooperation can be eliminated from this consideration. Only six institutions were represented by more than one graduate among its officials, and none by more than four officials. For all other groups, the percentage contributed declines steadily once the schools at the top have been passed: Harvard, Princeton, and Yale for the Foreign Service Officers; California and Harvard for the Foreign Service Staff; Harvard for the Foreign Service Reserve; and Columbia, Harvard, and George Washington for Department of State officials.

TABLE IV. PERCENTAGE OF FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS WHO RECEIVED UNDERGRADUATE TRAINING IN INSTITUTIONS THAT TRAINED ONE-HALF OF ALL OFFICERS IN THIS GROUP

(Total Who Received Bachelor's Degree or Equivalent=1,306)

Number Per Cent			Number Per Cent
Harvard	128	9.8	Columbia	25	1.9
Princeton	101	7.7	Dartmouth	25	1.9
Yale	96	7.3	Chicago	20	1.5
Georgetown	61	4.7	Wisconsin	20	1.5
California	56	4.3	Virginia	19	1.5
Stanford	38	2.9	U. of Washington	17	1.3
George Washington	32	2.4	City College, N.Y.	16	1.3
Totals			654	50.0

TABLE V. PERCENTAGE OF FOREIGN SERVICE STAFF OFFICERS WHO RECEIVED
UNDERGRADUATE TRAINING IN INSTITUTIONS THAT TRAINED
ONE-HALF OF ALL OFFICERS IN THIS GROUP

(Total Who Received Bachelor's Degree or Equivalent=1,282)

	Number	Per Cent		Number	Per Cent
California	54	4.2	Cornell	21	1.6
Harvard	49	3.9	Illinois	21	1.6
Yale	34	2.7	Texas	19	1.5
Georgetown	33	2.6	Stanford	17	1.3
George Washington	31	2.4	U. of Washington	16	1.2
Michigan	31	2.4	City College, N.Y.	14	1.0
Princeton	28	2.2	Ohio State	14	1.0
Columbia	24	1.9	Pennsylvania	14	1.0
Chicago	23	1.8	Dartmouth	13	1.0
Minnesota	23	1.8	Other*	148	11.5
Wisconsin	22	1.7
			Totals	649	50.3

* Includes 26 institutions, none of which contributed more than .9 per cent of the total.

TABLE VI. PERCENTAGE OF FOREIGN SERVICE RESERVE OFFICERS WHO RECEIVED
UNDERGRADUATE TRAINING IN INSTITUTIONS THAT TRAINED
ONE-HALF OF ALL OFFICERS IN THIS GROUP

(Total Who Received Bachelor's Degree or Equivalent=293)

	Number	Per Cent		Number	Per Cent
Harvard	21	7.2	Columbia	5	1.7
Princeton	14	4.8	Georgetown	5	1.7
California	12	4.0	Illinois	5	1.7
Stanford	10	3.4	Pennsylvania	5	1.7
Wisconsin	10	3.4	Michigan	4	1.3
Dartmouth	9	3.0	North Carolina	4	1.3
Yale	9	3.0	Virginia	4	1.3
Chicago	7	2.4	U. of Washington	4	1.3
George Washington	7	2.4	Other*	12	4.1
			Totals	147	50.0

* Includes five institutions, none of which contributed more than 1.0 per cent.

The first conclusion to be drawn from these tables is that the education of Foreign Service Officers is more concentrated in a few institutions than is that of the Foreign Service Staff, Foreign Service Reserve, or Department of State higher officials. Fourteen institutions trained half of the 1,306 career Foreign Service Officers, while 46 institutions trained half of the 1,282 Foreign Service Staff, 22 institutions half of the 293 Foreign Service Reserve officers, and 24 institutions half of the 3,451 higher officials of the Department of State.

TABLE VII. PERCENTAGE OF DEPARTMENT OF STATE OFFICIALS WHO ATTENDED INSTITUTIONS REPORTED BY HALF OF THIS GROUP

(Total Attendances at Institutions=3,451)*

Number Per Cent			Number Per Cent
Columbia	254	7.4	Wisconsin	51	1.5
Harvard	236	6.8	Michigan	49	1.4
George Washington	180	5.2	Stanford	45	1.3
Yale	101	2.9	City College, N.Y.	44	1.3
Georgetown	99	2.9	Pennsylvania	42	1.2
American Univ.	98	2.8	Cornell	38	1.1
Chicago	89	2.6	Fletcher School	36	1.0
New York Univ.	75	2.2	Minnesota	34	1.0
Princeton	68	2.0	Other†	176	5.1
California	64	1.9
			Totals	1,779	51.6

* Note that this list differs from the others. It represents attendance at institutions for any kind of degree or sometimes for no degree at all, while the other lists reflect receipt of the bachelor's degree or its equivalent.

† Includes six institutions, none of which contributed more than .9 per cent.

A second conclusion is that the same institutions recur in all the lists with striking regularity. Of the 14 that trained half of the career Foreign Service Officers, 10 appear in all the other lists. They are Harvard, California, Stanford, Yale, Princeton, Georgetown, George Washington, Columbia, Chicago, and Wisconsin. Dartmouth and City College of New York appear in all the lists save one.

The third conclusion is that no easy generalization can be made about the types of institutions that stand out, if that term can be applied to those which appear near the top of the lists although they do not contribute percentages large enough to be dominant. Location means little. Some of the Northeastern institutions draw students from all over the nation. In any case, of the 10 institutions that appear in all the lists, four are in the Northeast, two in the North Central region, and two in the West. Two are in the District of Columbia and their location may attract students who are already at work in government or who want to be near government while they attend college. Enrollment has no relevance. Perhaps two generalizations can be suggested. First, most of these institutions have reputations for strong social studies departments and especially for strong political science and international relations departments. Second, the training in most of them is broad in the liberal arts rather than narrowly vocational in the field of social studies, although Georgetown is known for a curriculum designed to prepare students especially for foreign affairs.

Degrees and College Attendance. Finally, under the heading of education, the biographies reveal the types of degrees received and attendance at college or university even though no degrees were received. Table VIII shows the percentage of officials in each category holding various degrees or attending college without receiving degrees. Since the same individual may hold more than one degree or may hold a degree and still attend a college without taking further degrees, the percentages do not add up to 100.0.

TABLE VIII. PERCENTAGE OF OFFICIALS WITH COLLEGE OR UNIVERSITY TRAINING

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
B.A. or Equivalent	88.5	72.3	83.2	82.6	81.7
Law Degrees	5.3	13.8	13.1	2.9	14.8
Other Degrees	2.5	2.0	2.3	10.1	3.6
Attended College, No Degree	7.7	22.5	11.4	13.0	13.8
M.A. or Equivalent	28.8	23.3	37.7	43.5	35.8
Ph.D. Degree	4.6	6.5	17.6	13.0	13.7
Graduate Work, No Degree	25.1	17.1	20.5	21.7	23.9

The striking conclusion from Table VIII is that graduate work is so prevalent. The master's degree is held by 28.8 per cent of career Foreign Service Officers, by 23.3 per cent of Staff Officers, and by a much higher percentage of Reserve and Technical Cooperation officers and of officials of the Department of State. Ph.D. degrees are held by 17.6 per cent of the Foreign Service Reserve Officers. Probably this higher showing of graduate degrees in the Foreign Service Reserve and Technical Cooperation Administration is the result of specialization in commodities, techniques, or fields to be expected of these branches of the Foreign Service.

On the whole, one can conclude that insofar as schooling and degrees represent education, these officials are highly educated.

V. EXPERIENCE OUTSIDE THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Equally significant with education is the type of experience foreign affairs officials have had. From the data available we can tell, for example, what proportion have known no other trade; what proportion have had more experience outside government than in it; how many have had only a few and how many a variety of experiences outside government; how many have had experience in other types of government work; and how many have lived abroad in one area long enough to become expert in the area.

First, in Table IX, we can see grossly the percentages of employees in the various categories who have had experience outside the federal government of more than five years, less than five years, or none at all. Five years is used not only to simplify the presentation but also because it perhaps represents on the average the length of time necessary to acquire the experience that counts in so many professions. Less than five years in professional work is almost transient labor; more than five is more maturing; five years is just about the time necessary to gain assurance in the knowledge and the practices of a professional vocation. At least we have so assumed in these calculations.

Education, i.e. school and college teaching or administration, stands out for

TABLE IX. PERCENTAGES OF OFFICIALS WITH EXPERIENCE OUTSIDE THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, BY YEARS OF EXPERIENCE

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
More than 5 yrs.	20.8	25.3	31.7	62.0	32.3
Less than 5 yrs.	44.7	37.3	32.9	15.0	33.7
No Experience	34.5	37.4	35.4	23.0	34.0

Table X shows how varied are the fields in which officials have had experience outside the federal government.

TABLE X. FIELDS OF EXPERIENCE OUTSIDE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT: PERCENTAGE DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIALS WITH ANY EXPERIENCE

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
Education	26.4	19.4	27.5	18.0	26.7
Films, Press, Radio	11.0	15.1	21.5	.7	21.9
Business	16.8	14.2	13.7	13.7	9.7
Professions	10.0	11.2	10.2	18.7	16.4
Clerical Work	13.3	18.5	7.3	12.2	17.9
Banking	5.5	5.0	4.2	.7	3.9
Research	2.9	1.8	5.1	1.5	*
Foreign Governments & International Organization	4.3	2.0	4.2	7.2	*
State & Local Governments	2.8	5.6	3.3	17.3	*
Agriculture, Mining, Lumber	1.7	2.0	.5	4.3	*
Social Work	2.9	3.3	1.8	5.0	*
Other	2.4	1.9	.7	.7	3.5

* Included in "Other" category because too small to be significant.

all of the groups of officials, so much so that it is perhaps the only single field that can be said to be a main source of experience outside the federal government. Film, press, and radio work, second on the list, appears here because at the time the analysis was made the United States Information Agency, which administered the overseas information program, was a part of the Department of State. It became an independent agency in 1953. The significance of this experience remains as true for this new agency as when it was in the Department. Officials directing propaganda work might be expected to be drawn from work with the mass media.

Except in the case of these two fields, foreign affairs officials who have had any experience outside of government come from such a variety of experience that it is impossible to say that they are predominantly from any one field. Not even education can be said to be dominant. Only about a fourth of the officials have had experience in education. On the whole our officials do not come mainly from business, banking, law, or any other field.

Add to the variety of outside experience the fact that a majority have had either no experience or less than five years experience in any of the fields, as shown in Table IX, and it becomes clear that no one vocational group dominates the handling of American foreign affairs. We have instead a group of public officials experienced mainly in government but some with experience in a variety of nongovernmental fields.

VI. EXPERIENCE IN OTHER FEDERAL AGENCIES

Also relevant to the kind of experience officials have had is the extent of their work in federal agencies other than the Department of State and the Foreign Service. Foreign affairs are to some degree a concern of all federal agencies. The Department of State and the Foreign Service are expected to represent the whole federal executive when they conduct foreign relations. If they draw their higher officials from other agencies, more inter-agency understanding might be expected or, on the contrary, the use of people from other agencies might dilute the expertness of long-experienced and trained specialists in foreign affairs.

TABLE XI. DISTRIBUTION OF POSITIONS IN FEDERAL AGENCIES OTHER THAN DEPARTMENT OF STATE OR FOREIGN SERVICE

	FSO	FSS	FSR	TCA	Dept.
Number of Positions	537	1,835	357	81	2,042
Number of Officials	1,475	2,893	512	100	2,322
Number of Positions per 100 Officials	36.4	63.4	69.7	81.0	87.8

The data in Table XI show that Foreign Service Officers have had relatively less experience in other federal agencies than have the Staff, Reserve, Technical Cooperation, or Department of State officials.

The duration of experience is also relevant. Without going into detail, we can say that in most cases experience in federal agencies other than the Department of State and Foreign Service was for periods of less than five years.

In the case of Foreign Service Officers, we should point out that in addition to the work in other federal agencies shown above, 61 officers, or 4.1 per cent of the officers for whom data on this point were available, had been detailed to the National War College or other service schools; and 103, or 7.0 per cent, had been assigned to the Foreign Service Institute or to universities for training.

Military service is a special kind of experience. Usually it has little relevance to work in civilian life, but sometimes it does. In any case it is experience in the lives of men and women and has its lessons. We should record it without comment or conclusion concerning what it means. The percentages of veterans, the majority from World War II, are: Foreign Service Officers 50.7; Foreign Service Staff 40.8; Foreign Service Reserve 38.0; and Department of State 36.8. Sufficient data were not available for Technical Cooperation Administration.

VII. EXPERIENCE IN AREAS

One reason for having a career foreign service is that its officers can become expert in the cultures, politics, and economies of other areas. In Table XII we examine the duration of assignment of Foreign Service Officers in the various regions of the world. This analysis is limited to the career Foreign Service Officers because the other branches of the Foreign Service have not yet been in existence long enough to permit analysis. For a similar reason the analysis is confined to career officers of Class IV and above. Officers in Classes V and VI have not been in the service long enough to become expert. Note that again a five-year term in one region is assumed to be the reasonable time required to become a specialist. This can be argued with added conviction when we are speaking, as here, mainly about areas, or regions that include usually more than one nation. They are the areas by which the Department of State's work in political relations is organized. Only in a few instances, for geographical or political reasons, is there a division in Washington devoted to relations with a single nation.

TABLE XII. NUMBER OF ASSIGNMENTS ABROAD OF FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS, CLASS IV AND ABOVE, BY REGION

Region	0-5 Yrs.	6-10 Yrs.	11 or More Yrs.
Eastern Europe	113	12	2
Central Europe	137	22	6
Southern Europe	159	18	4
Northern Europe	151	11	4
Western Europe	287	77	20
China	80	28	27
Northeast Asia	61	25	2
Southeast Asia	95	9	1
Philippines	38	2	1
Greece, Turkey, Iran	86	7	1
Near East	78	13	3
Southern Asia	92	7	1
Africa	137	21	9
Mexico	125	20	3
Caribbean	153	14	1
Central America	146	16	1
Brazil	84	10	2
River Plate	103	12	1
North & West Coast, South America	162	17	4
Australia & New Zealand	58	11	1
Canada	167	23	2
Total Assignments	2,512	375	96

We are dealing in Table XII, to repeat, with assignments and not men. In other words, the number of assignments received by all Foreign Service Officers of Class IV and above is distributed in the above table according to the duration of time spent in each area. The result is a reflection of the relatively few area specialists developed by more than five years spent consecutively in an area. In percentages, 84.2 per cent of all the assignments in the careers of these officers of Class IV and above has been for less than six years in any area; 12.6 per cent for 6-10 years; and 3.2 per cent for 11 years or more.

At best only those officers who have received assignments of six, or more years' duration in an area can be called specialists in that area. Such officers made up just about 15 per cent of the total at work in April, 1952. All officers may have acquired skills in the routine work of a mission, in the writing of reports, or in the administration of immigration laws, but they are not skilled in knowledge of the sort that comes from prolonged observation or study of an area.

VIII. YEARS OF EXPERIENCE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

A final clue which the skeleton biographies afford as to the kind of foreign officials we have is the amount of experience these officials have had in this kind of work. Some of them have had experience in foreign relations, no doubt, in their work outside government or in their work with federal agencies other than the Department of State or the Foreign Service. We cannot identify these individuals, however, from their biographies. One group we can say with assurance is devoted to work in foreign relations: the one enfolded by the Department of State and the Foreign Service. In Table XII we presented data on the duration of area assignments of Foreign Service Officers. In Table XIII we report the length of service within the Department of State of those for whom the information is available. This can be called the measure of experience in foreign affairs for those in Washington rather than abroad.⁶

TABLE XIII. YEARS OF SERVICE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Years	Number Reported	Percentage of Total	Cumulative Percentage
0-1	412	17.8	—
2	344	14.8	32.6
3	289	12.4	45.0
4	176	7.6	52.6
5	139	6.0	58.6
6-10	754	32.5	91.1
11-15	67	2.9	94.0
16-20	46	2.0	96.0
21-25	37	1.6	97.6
26-30	27	1.1	98.7
31 or more	31	1.3	100.0
Totals	2,322	100.0

⁶ The United States is one of the few nations that still separates its "foreign office" personnel from its foreign service. Surveyors in recent years, the Hoover Commission, the Rowe Committee, the Wriston Committee, have recommended a merger. By the time this appears, a merger may have been started. On the other hand, it may not. Much can happen, as it has happened, between the issuance of a report with recommendations and the final outcome. For the recommendations, see Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, Foreign Affairs, A Report to the Congress (Washington,

The most striking revelation in Table XIII is that 58.6 per cent of the policy-making officials of the Department of State have been working in this department only five years or less. Even so, this is fewer than the 80 per cent who were found in the similar computation of officials listed in 1948.

We might ask whether the topmost among these officials are not long experienced; for if they are, then as leaders they may supply the knowledge and poise that comes from long experience in foreign relations. Top executives for this purpose are defined as chiefs of divisions or higher in the hierarchy. These top executives do tend to have more experience than all policy-making officials as a group, but it is still true that many do not have much experience in the Department. Almost half of the top executives have had 6-10 years experience in the Department, compared to about one-third of all the officials. Still 41.3 per cent of the top executives have had five years or less of total service in the Department of State. While this is a smaller percentage than the 58.6 per cent of all officials who have had the same brief experience, it indicates nonetheless that a considerable number of the top executives have had relatively slight experience in the Department.

IX. CONCLUSION

The people who handle American foreign affairs in the Department of State and Foreign Service may be characterized as follows:

1. They come from a variety of regional and educational backgrounds, with the exception that the private preparatory school is represented among them in larger proportion than in the total population. The wide distribution of their college training tones down any emphasis that might be given to the rather high percentage of officials trained in private preparatory schools. The facts do not support the assumption that our officials in this work are predominantly the products of "finishing schools" and a few Ivy League colleges.

2. Very few women have reached higher levels in this field.

3. Generally speaking these officials are relatively young or middle-aged. Only about 15 per cent are between 50 and 60 years of age and only about 3 per cent are above age 60. This work is handled neither by older men who might have become tired, infirm, or too set in their ways, nor by elder statesmen who might have gained in acquaintance, poise, and wisdom.

4. One-third of these officials have had no experience at all outside the Department of State and Foreign Service. Of the two-thirds who have had some experience, somewhat more than one-half have had less than five years of such experience. The fields in which these officials have had experience are widely varied, from education to banking, from professions to clerical work, from press, radio, and films to international organizations and foreign governments. Experience in other federal agencies is about the same in amount and variety as in non-governmental fields. We can conclude, therefore, that American officials in foreign affairs bring to their present work a variety of experience from other fields. This fact is an asset when we consider the great variety of subjects that make up present-day foreign relations. Officials who have had varied experiences may well be more resourceful in their work in foreign affairs than those who have not.

G.P.O., Feb., 1949), pp. 61-68; James H. Rowe et al., An Improved Personnel System for the Conduct of Foreign Affairs (Washington, Dept. of State, 1950); U.S. Dept. of State Publication 5458, Toward A Stronger Foreign Service (Washington, G.P.O., June, 1954), pp. 25-35.

5. At the same time, as an offset to the variety of background, it must be concluded that we have no long-experienced, highly skilled group of professional diplomats in charge of American foreign relations. We have instead in the Department of State and Foreign Service (in a majority of the policy-making positions) officials who are new in this kind of work; who must learn as much as possible while rushing headlong in the job, making decisions as they run; and who do not have many elder statesmen to guide them.

For the Department of State, brief experience in the Department is conspicuous. For the Foreign Service Staff and Reserve, both new since 1946, brief experience might be expected, although some of these officers were in the Foreign Service Auxiliary or in other federal agencies abroad during World War II.

If we turn to the career Foreign Service Officers to discover expertness, we find that their terms of service in particular world areas are usually too short to allow them to become area specialists in any true definition of the term. Career officers may know the practices of diplomatic and consular work, but with few exceptions they can hardly claim to be experts in areas or in the large politics of general international relations. A mere knowledge of techniques is not enough to justify calling most Foreign Service Officers skilled professional diplomats; or at any rate they are not experts in the same sense as are specialists in internal medicine, professors of science or letters, or lawyers, all of whom, to be qualified, must go far beyond an understanding of the techniques of diagnosis, research, or the preparation of briefs to an understanding of both the details and the totality of their subjects. Perhaps the strongest reason for merging domestic and overseas personnel and for wiping out the present distinctions in the foreign service is the fact that, except for a knowledge of routine techniques, not enough difference exists between Foreign Service Officers and other people in foreign affairs to justify keeping the groups separate.

One can argue on both sides as to the desirability of having inexperienced people in charge of our foreign affairs. In a large sense, the amateur may be more reflective of popular will and thus more democratic. He may be more adaptable to new needs. He may also, on the other hand, make repeated errors of judgment because he has not learned his work in the depth required for sound decisions. But no matter what position one takes on the merits, it is pointless to argue at present that the experts in foreign relations should be given much more voice than they have in the making of policy decisions. The evidence shows that we really have only a minority of officials who can be called experts in foreign affairs.

CHARISMA IN THE 1952 CAMPAIGN*

JAMES C. DAVIES

California Institute of Technology

I

The term charisma—miraculously-given power—was transferred by Max Weber from its original religious meaning to politics. He described it as “the absolutely personal devotion and personal confidence in revelation, heroism, or other qualities of individual leadership.”¹ He contrasts charisma with leadership based on custom and tradition or on competence related to “rationally created rules” of law. The charismatic leader is thus the one whose claim to rule is neither as a perpetuator of traditional values nor as one who resolves conflicting interests by reasonable and just means but as one endowed with superhuman powers to solve political problems. In the abstract, pure case he is seen by his followers as being all-powerful, all-wise, and morally perfect.

One of the outstanding characteristics of charismatic rule is its mass base. Unlike the palace revolutionary or the condottiere, the charismatic ruler is not content with gaining and maintaining control merely over the machinery of government—the police, administrative offices, legislature, and courts. He consciously seeks to gain control over the individual citizen, not just by the threat of force but perhaps more significantly by appealing for affirmative and enthusiastic devotion. The leader seeks not passive acceptance of his rule but an active identification of the citizens’ needs and expectations with his own and those of the nation. The political demands of individuals become uniform, at least on the manifest level, and are absorbed in and merged with the economic, social, and ethnic demands of the nation, as these are expressed by the leader. A greater portion of the individual’s life finds its expression in politics. The charismatic follower becomes an undifferentiated, cancerous cell in the body politic.

Charisma is therefore not a characteristic of leaders as such but a relationship between leader and followers. It depends both on the construction by a leader and his associates of an image of him as infallible, omniscient, and incorruptible and on a positive, active response to this kind of image-building by those who are predisposed toward such leadership. The “complete” charismatic follower is oriented in politics toward candidates in a particular way, rather than toward parties or issues. He tends to divide political figures on the basis of strength or weakness, omnicompetence or utter incompetence, righteousness or iniquity. He is unable to see any but good qualities in the leader he accepts or to see any good qualities in the one he rejects. Although strong liking for a candidate is not in itself evidential, for charismatics the emotional attraction of a candidate is predominant and is coupled with the feeling that the leader is the incarnation of all virtues.

* This analysis is derived from data gathered in the study of the 1952 presidential campaign and election that was made by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan. The general study was under the sponsorship of the Committee on Political Behavior of the Social Science Research Council under a grant from the Carnegie Corporation. The study is published as The Voter Decides, by Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren H. Miller (Evanston, Ill., 1954). I wish simultaneously to thank very warmly these three people and others who advised on and facilitated this analysis and to free them, the SSRC Committee on Political Behavior, and the Carnegie Corporation of any responsibility for the data and conclusions herein presented.

¹ From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology, ed. H. H. Gerth and C. W. Mills (New York, 1946), p. 79.

In contrast, the non-charismatic person who is nevertheless oriented toward leader rather than party or issues tends to evaluate candidates quantitatively, saying that one is generally better than the other—rather than that one is good, the other bad—and assessing them in terms of specific characteristics indicative of relative competence, skill, experience, or integrity.

Pure charismatic leaders and followers are ideal types unlikely to be found in actual situations. There are doubtless some charismatic tendencies in all candidates for popularly elected office above the level of sanitation supervisor. The well-known panegyrics of those who introduce candidates at public gatherings as often as not are full of hackneyed phrases suggesting the power of their men to move mountains, stop the tides, and gain or regain Utopia within two weeks of taking office. There are doubtless some tendencies in all voters to believe that the candidate of their choice is superhuman and that his opponent is infrahuman. For, campaign hyperbole aside, the phenomenon of strong leadership is perhaps only rarely divorced completely from the will to be or to follow a leader who will make no mistakes and suffer no defeat at the hands of malignant, real enemies and hostile, shadowy forces. In politics, neither St. George nor the dragon is ever quite dead.

Charisma in a nation becomes crucial when it is the dominant characteristic of leaders and a "substantial" number of followers. It is hard to say how large a proportion of followers "substantial" is. Without the interposition of other political forces, a majority of the voting population would be needed to establish government by charisma. The tendency of strongly charismatic leaders to seek power by the use of violence, intimidation, and fraud indicates their deep-seated reluctance to rely even primarily on persuasion and their recognition, perhaps, that in no society at any time can enough people be trusted to believe in the infallibility of any one man.

The political institutions, the degree of territorial integration, and the facilities for communication are also related to the incidence of charisma. Thus, in periods of the Middle Ages when vast numbers of people were in despair because of depredations of famine and disease, the absence of the basis for mass political mobilization of the populace effectively precluded the emergence of charismatic political leaders on more than an immediate, essentially face-to-face level in towns and cities. In those modern Western states where both political traditions of orderly solution of problems and the institutionalized patterns of limited government are strong and effective, again the emergence of charisma is made difficult despite the fact that a mass base is available.

Because of the great variability of leaders, followers, and the situations in which they interact, the same leader may be seen by particular individuals as charismatic or non-charismatic. During crisis, when more individuals are more uncertain of what should be done in politics, the number of individuals searching for charismatic leaders will increase. A charismatic leader in non-critical times will have relatively less chance to gain political power because of the dearth of individuals who will respond to his clarion call. The failure of charismatic leaders to appear during a crisis period will also frustrate the spread of charisma.

The charismatic phenomenon in a large modern state may therefore be regarded as a function of the interaction of at least these five determinants: (1) the existence of leaders predisposed to make a charismatic appeal; (2) the prevalence of followers predisposed to respond to this appeal; (3) the weakness or strength of political traditions and institutions that inhibit the solution of problems through supermen; (4) a degree of political integration that causes people to turn to the government rather than other institutions (such as family, church, union, service club, or local government) for problem solution; and (5) the existence of crisis.

This last determinant, which has already been mentioned, merits further elaboration. Crisis that has political relevance may arise from at least three different kinds of source. It may result from a feeling of insecurity or anxiety with respect to basic human needs such as food, shelter, health, and physical survival. Chronic failure to satisfy these needs may result in such complete individual preoccupation with staying alive and well as to preclude effective joint political action. The situation in which these needs are satisfied to the extent that time and energy are available for political action, but in which there is persistent fear of the failure to meet these needs, is much more portentous of crisis.

Crisis may also result from a sense of frustration of demands on a level different from that related to the support of life. Despite relative prosperity and health, there may, for example, arise a situation in which there is widespread dissatisfaction with the control structure of the society. Even though there may be basic physical security for most individuals, if a substantial portion of them feel that they are deprived of a fair share of the goods produced in the economy by those who control goods distribution, they may unite politically for the overthrow of the governors. They may unite primarily to overthrow political domination by foreigners, as in the case of colonies rebelling against the mother country—even though economic hegemony by foreigners may continue to be tolerated or ignored.

A third source of crisis is the persistence of unresolved conflict between forces seeking dominance intra- or internationally. This source, which is distinguishable from but perhaps ordinarily associated with one or both of the others mentioned, produces crisis to the extent that people and leaders feel no longer able or willing to tolerate political irresolution. A prolonged internal revolutionary situation or one in which a reform government fails to end deeply divisive conflict within the country may create a crisis. A prolonged conflict between governments, with or without intermittent periods of peace, may have like effect.

One feature of crisis—particularly of the third sort mentioned—that merits emphasis is that it need not involve conflict which divides the society into two warring camps on an economic, class, or other basis. The conflict may not be between capital and labor, tenant farmers and landlords, one region and another but between two small factions struggling for control of the government—factions operating outside the accustomed or the legal techniques of seeking such control. Or the conflict may be a quiet one within individuals themselves who, regardless of class or religious or traditional party differences, are united in their growing intolerance of perceived incompetence or inadequacy of established rulers and established political rules. These individuals are torn within themselves as to whether to turn to new leaders operating in accord with traditional or rational patterns of political action or new leaders whose appeal is: follow me and turn over to me irrevocably the responsibility for making the decisions on those problems which I say are problems and on which I shall establish and administer policy through control of the government, for I am strong and through me you will get strength.

The political phenomenon of charisma is new only in name. Its demagogic and irrational basis was described by Plato in the discussion of rhetoric in the Gorgias. The tyrants in the Greek city-states, Alexander the Great and the succession of Roman Emperors starting with Augustus, were to some extent dependent on charisma for their rule. Augustus appears to have tolerated and unofficially encouraged the building of his popular image as a superhuman. Three centuries later the Emperor Aurelian had medals of himself struck with the inscriptions "Lord" and "God." More recent charismatic rulers, like Napoleon I, Hitler, Stalin, and Huey Long have avoided the label "god," being content with possessing, in the minds of their followers, more than mortal but perhaps only demigodly powers.

Charisma seems most likely to occur during periods when the force of neither tradition nor reason appears to be adequate to cope with mounting political crisis. In the course of the French Revolution, when ancient monarchical tradition had failed and its successor, Reason, brought only evident anarchy, a superman was able to unite France in the pursuit of its supposed destiny to rule all of Europe. Similarly, in Germany, after the breakdown of Imperial rule and even pre-Bismarckian tradition, came the seemingly impotent Republic with its rule of law through the Weimar constitution and parliament. Again a superman gained control, in the pursuit of a similar, even more ambitious destiny.

II

The domestic and international situation during the 1952 national election campaign was a crisis of the sort resulting from persistent, unresolved conflict. There was relatively little insecurity about basic needs of food, shelter, and health—and only the memory of the depression. There was no great outcry to put down malefactors or even accumulators of great wealth. But war, the threat of war, and the memory of two wars which was reinforced by the ongoing Korean conflict, were all factors gnawing at individuals' peace of mind like an eagle plucking daily the liver of Prometheus, the Titan who stole fire from the gods to benefit mankind. A comparison of this crisis period with others in the United States and elsewhere is impossible in terms of its psychic impact on the general public. One can hazard the guess that as a crisis the years after World War II and the Korean conflict do not seem so capable of producing a sense of individual insecurity as the shock of the depression years. Nevertheless the vagueness and pervasiveness of the current conflict, involving as it does the fear of all-out war, the fear of Communist encirclement, the real and—even worse—the imaginable danger of domestic subversion, and the socio-economic threat implicit in the term communism itself, are strong enough to elicit more than the minimum number of charismatic responses that normalcy would entail.

The 1952 candidates for the presidency offered considerable opportunity for charismatic response. Unlike Truman and Dewey in 1948, Stevenson and Eisenhower were dramatic candidates, both expressing a sense of destiny and both successful—as the size of the vote indicates—in evoking widespread and enthusiastic support. Eisenhower in particular had characteristics which made it possible for those in search of an infallible leader to find comfort in attaching themselves to him. His record as supreme commander of allied forces during World War II, after a swift rise from relative military obscurity; his prestigious presidency of Columbia University; and his successful inauguration of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization—all indicated a capacity for leadership in such diverse fields as military command, educational administration, and diplomacy. For those who so chose to regard his record, these and other achievements could be the evidence for gifts of leadership far beyond those of any mere mortal.

The study of the 1952 election undertaken by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan provided an opportunity for analysis of charisma as a factor influencing the way people voted for president. On the basis of a sample drawn by area probability techniques, 1799 adults² living in private dwellings were interviewed between mid-September and the election on November 4. Of these 1799 individuals, 1644 were successfully reinterviewed after the election. Among the many questions asked in the pre-election interview was a battery of four on the candidates. These four questions asked what there was about Stevenson and Eisenhower that might make the respondent want to vote for or against each of the candidates. When combined with responses to several other questions, it was possible by a process outlined below to select those cases³ in which the factor of charismatic perception of one candidate or the other was evidently predominant over other grounds for evaluating the candidates.⁴

² An additional 222 in the Far West were interviewed before the election but were deliberately dropped from the post-election sample. These 222 are not here considered because of the need for information available only in the post-election questionnaire.

³ The selection procedure is described in the Note on Method at the end of this article.

⁴ The interview questions used to derive evidence of charismatic responses toward the

Out of this sample of 1799 respondents, who within the limits of sampling error constitute a representative national cross-section of the adult population living in private dwellings, there were only 32 cases in which three judges agreed unanimously that charisma was predominant in the candidate perceptions.

The fact that less than two per cent of even a carefully chosen national sample gave clear evidence of a charismatic orientation is of only tentative significance. Latent charisma may be considerably more widespread among the general public. The responses available in the interviews may have for various reasons failed adequately to report the phenomenon. For one thing, analysis of charisma was not a primary objective of the election study undertaken by the Survey Research Center. For another, there is considerable variation in the fullness of the recorded responses, reflecting presumably some variation in the proportion of the spoken answers that were put down on paper and some variation in the degree of rapport between interviewer and respondent. It is also possible that some respondents felt strongly a charismatic attachment to one or the other of the candidates but were unable or unwilling to express such feeling.

Nevertheless, the predicted relationships that are described below in most instances proved to be considerably closer, considerably more significant statistically, on the basis of the 32 cases finally selected for analysis than on the basis of a preliminary analysis using 252 cases chosen solely because respondents used such expressions as "he is a real leader," or "he is strong and candidates were:

- a. "I'd like to ask you what you think are the good and bad points about the two parties. Is there anything in particular that you like (don't like) about the Democratic (Republican) party?" If necessary: "What is that?" (This is a condensed version of the four actual questions.)
- b. "Do you think it will make a good deal of difference to the country whether the Democrats or the Republicans win the elections this November or that it won't make much difference which side wins?" If the answer was "Yes": "Why is that?" If "No": "Why do you feel it won't make much difference?"
- c. "Now I'd like to ask you about the good and bad points of the two candidates for president. Is there anything in particular about Stevenson (Eisenhower) that might make you want to vote for (against) him?" If necessary: "What is it?" (This version is similarly condensed from the actual.)
- d. "Now, adding up the good points and the bad points about the two candidates, and forgetting for a minute the parties they belong to, which one do you think would make the best president?"
- e. "Some people say that Eisenhower is not a real Republican. What do you think about this? Is he the kind of man that you think of as being a real Republican?"
- f. "What about Eisenhower's ideas and the things he stands for? Do you think that he is pretty much the same as most other Republicans or is he different from them?" If necessary: "Why do you say that?"
- g. (After asking for whom the respondent planned to vote:) "What would you say is the most important reason why you are going to vote for Stevenson (Eisenhower)?"
- h. (If the respondent has said he was not going to vote:) "What would you say is the most important reason why you would vote for Stevenson (Eisenhower)?"

decisive," or "I have confidence in him." The 32 cases, in other words, gave evidence of being a much more homogeneous category on the charisma dimension than a category eight times as large chosen because of the use of words and phrases that could have—but in fact did not have—clearly charismatic connotation. The evidence is strong that charisma, at least in a manifest form, was not a major factor determining the candidate choice of the very large majority of the respondents interviewed.

All 32 of the cases involved charismatic perceptions of Eisenhower. No clear-cut cases of Stevenson-oriented charisma were found. Of these 32 cases, 26 voted for Eisenhower, four said they would have voted for him but failed to vote. One of the 32 voted for Stevenson.⁵ (And one was not reinterviewed after the election.) For those who were charisma-prone, it is therefore evident on two scores that Eisenhower and not Stevenson was overwhelmingly the candidate to whom they turned. By no means all of these 32 individuals were traditional Republicans. Nine reported voting Democratic in 1948, 14 said they voted Republican, and nine either didn't vote in 1948 or their vote was not ascertained.

It is possible that additional charisma-oriented people would have been found on the basis of responses to the interview question about vice-presidential candidates. This was not attempted because probably few people see the vice-presidential nominee as a potential president and there was only one question in the interview on the basis of which perceptions of Nixon could be assessed.⁶ It would thus be difficult to determine whether Nixon's popularity among a fourth of the sample was charismatic or was of the relatively apolitical sort that might be accorded any national hero.

III

To explain why some individuals have a relatively stronger need than others for infallible political leaders, we must hypothesize differences in individual personality structure and environment that will produce differential reactions to aspects of politics other than leadership as such. Being exposed by and large to substantially the same political phenomena—the same threat of war, the same threat of Communist encirclement and subversion, the same issues of inflation, taxes, corruption, etc.—those who react charismatically to leaders must do so because they differ from others in relatively basic needs and in ways of structuring the external world.

The determinants of these differences are doubtless numerous. Among the ⁵ Eleven additional borderline cases (nine pro-Eisenhower and two pro-Stevenson) were rejected because the evidence satisfied only two of the three judges that charisma was the chief factor in the respondent's perception of the candidates. Thirty more cases (all pro-Eisenhower) were rejected because only one judge regarded the evidence of charisma to be adequate. See the Note on Method for further explanation. The Stevenson voter is discussed in note 10 below.

⁶ The question was: "How about the candidates for vice-president: aside from their parties, do you have any strong opinions about either of them?" If necessary: "How is that?"

causal factors may be a deep-seated sense of insecurity because of a particular kind of upbringing or other formative experiences with parents and others during childhood and adolescence, unusual upward social mobility aggravated by a failure to achieve actual status corresponding to aspirations, or even traumatic experiences such as prolonged unemployment or the loss of son or spouse in consequence of war or automobile accident. Determinants such as these, or actual socio-economic status (including income, education, and occupation), could not be examined because of the complete absence of such data in the interviews or the quite meaningless distribution of these variables among the 32 cases analyzed.

But it is unnecessary to find the causes for a particular aspect of personality structure which results in charisma in order to recognize that the pattern exists and has manifestations in politics other than in the reaction to leaders. The following hypotheses as to the charismatic aspect of personality structure are suggested.

1. The individual with charismatic tendencies is less able to tolerate indecision and crisis.
2. He is less able to maintain ambiguous perceptions—the phenomena he observes must be classified. He is, in other words, more likely to make categoric judgments.⁷
3. He is more likely to believe that other people share his opinions and act as he acts.
4. He is less likely, because of his preoccupation with leaders, to have strong ties to political parties.

These are hypotheses on which data are available from the election study.

The relative intolerance of the charismatic follower for indecision and crisis is posited on the assumption that he is an exceptionally insecure, anxious, or frustrated individual and in consequence incapable of tolerating political conditions which aggravate his sense of insecurity or frustration. There is a sort of restlessness about uncertain situations, a relatively strong demand that something be done to alleviate the uncertainty. The demand is in part for action as such rather than for a particular kind of action. This is not to say that the charismatic person is unconcerned with the kind of action taken, but that his tensions will be more relieved if any action is taken and that he will be less concerned with appraising the possible consequences of alternative kinds of action than will non-charismatic individuals.

The most striking evidence of this phenomenon appears in comparing the attitude of charismatic and non-charismatic people on the question of what should be our current policy in Korea. In contrast to the 44 per cent of the Republican non-charismatics who said we should take a stronger stand and bomb Manchuria and China and the 38 per cent of these who said we should keep on trying to get a peaceful settlement, 63 per cent of the Republican charismatics said we should take a stronger stand and 17 per cent favored

⁷ See Else Frenkel-Brunswik, "Intolerance of Ambiguity as an Emotional and Perceptual Personality Variable," Journal of Personality, Vol. 18, pp. 108-43 (Sept., 1949).

continued efforts toward a peaceful settlement.⁸ Table I presents the total picture.⁹

TABLE I. RESPONDENT'S PREFERENCE FOR U.S. POLICY IN KOREA*

	Republican Charismatics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charismatics (N = 544)
Pull out	7%	10%
Keep trying for peaceful settlement	17	38
Take stronger stand	63	44
Either pull out or take stronger stand, respondent refusing to make choice	7	1
Don't know	0	4
Not ascertained	7	3

* The question asked was: "Which of the following things do you think it would be best for us to do now in Korea? Should we: (1) Pull out of Korea entirely? (2) Keep on trying to get a peaceful settlement? (3) Take a stronger stand and bomb Manchuria and China?"

Note: Because of rounding, percentages do not always add to 100.

Further evidence of intolerance for indecision among the charismatic respondents comes from an examination of the relative promptness with which they made up their minds on the candidates. The promptness is apparent and highly significant whether one considers only Republican charismatics or the entire category. Four out of five of the charismatics after the election reported having decided to vote for Eisenhower before or during the Chicago conventions; only about half of the non-charismatics had decided by then.

Similarly, far fewer of the charismatics reported that they had considered voting for the candidate they rejected at the election. Although one out of five non-charismatic Republican voters said he had considered Stevenson, only one charismatic Republican respondent out of 26 who voted for Eisenhower said he had considered Stevenson. The difference is again highly significant.

⁸ Despite the small number of cases, these differences are highly significant statistically; significant, that is, at the one per cent level of confidence using a Chi-square test. This means that there is only one chance in a hundred that the differences between the two categories of individuals are due to chance. The Chi-square formula used here and elsewhere in this article, except where another formula is given, is the basic one of $\chi^2 = (o - e)^2 / e$. Since both difference between the two categories and the direction of difference were predicted here, the level of significance is doubled here and elsewhere in the article where direction was predicted.

⁹ Respondents who voted or would have voted Republican tended more often than Democrats either to say we should pull out of Korea or to say we should take a stronger stand. Since being Republican in terms of the 1952 vote is thus related to this policy issue, this factor was controlled in Table I by eliminating Democrats and comparing only Republican charismatics and non-charismatics. This practice is followed in all comparisons where there is evidence that voting or intending to vote Republican is related to the response given to a particular question. In such cases, the charismatics and non-charismatics are labeled Republican in the tables.

TABLE II. TIME OF VOTING DECISION*

	Republican Charismatics (N=30)	Republican Non- charismatics (N=544)	All Charismatics (N=31)	All Non- charismatics (N=830)
Before or during the Chi- cago conventions	80%	53%	77%	51%
After the convention	7	22	10	24
Didn't vote	13	21	13	23
Don't know	0	†	0	†
Not ascertained	0	3	0	2

* The question was: "How long before the election did you decide that you were going to vote the way you did?"

† Less than one-half of 1 per cent.

Note: Because of rounding, percentages do not always add to 100.

cant and the proportions are about the same for all charismatic and non-charismatic voters.¹⁰

The second hypothesis concerns the intolerance of the charismatic follower for ambiguity of perception, just as the first concerns his intolerance for am-

TABLE III. CONSIDERATION OF OTHER CANDIDATES*

	Republican Charis- matics (N=30)	Republican Non-charis- matics (N=544)	All Charis- matics (N=31)	All Non-charis- matics (N=830)
Voted for Eisenhower, considered Stevenson	3%	15%	3%	10%
Voted for Eisenhower, did not consider Stevenson	83	63	81	42
Voted for Stevenson, considered Eisenhower	0	0	0	9
Voted for Stevenson, did not con- sider Eisenhower	0	0	3	15
Other voting possibilities	0	1	0	1
Didn't vote	13	21	13	23
Don't know or not ascertained	0	†	0	†

* The question was: "Did you ever think during the campaign that you might vote for (opposite candidate)?"

† Less than one-half of 1 per cent.

Note: Because of rounding, percentages do not always add to 100.

¹⁰ Curiously, but consistently with this hypothesis, the one charismatic respondent who voted for Stevenson said after the election that he had never considered voting for Eisenhower and that he had decided to vote as he did "three months at least" before the election. When he was first interviewed on September 25, just six weeks before the election, he said he was going to vote Republican, had only favorable things to say about Eisenhower, and unfavorable things about Stevenson.

biguity of action or for what he regards as inaction or indecision. The two hypotheses are as related to and as separate from each other as are action and perception in the individual. Table III, discussed above, represents the borderline between perception and action and is relevant to both hypotheses. The second hypothesis relates more strictly to the way the charismatic follower goes about forming his judgments. It says that he tends to see the world in blacks-and-whites, to fit persons and ideas into compartments, and generally to regard the withholding of judgment as being as unpleasant as the withholding of action.

The general tendency to view the political world in blacks-and-whites was measurable in the election study by a comparison of the pattern of responses on the general party and candidate questions in which the respondent was asked to state what he regarded as the good and bad points about each party and candidate.¹¹ As might be expected, some respondents had favorable and unfavorable things to say about both parties and both candidates. Others had only favorable things to say about one candidate or one party. Others had only unfavorable things to say about one candidate or party. The different patterns are presumably related to several things, including level of political interest and information, political involvement, party preference and voting preference for example. The patterns are related also to charisma.

For present purposes, those charismatic and non-charismatic respondents (labelled least black-and-white in the tables to follow) who had both good and bad things to say about both Stevenson and Eisenhower were compared with those (labelled most black-and-white) who had only good things to say about one candidate and bad about the other. A similar comparison is presented on

TABLE IV. PATTERN OF RESPONSE ON CANDIDATES

	Republican Charismatics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charismatics (N = 544)
Least black-and-white	3%	13%
Most black-and-white	50	27
Other response patterns	47	60

TABLE V. PATTERN OF RESPONSE ON PARTIES

	Republican Charismatics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charismatics (N = 544)
Least black-and-white	10%	18%
Most black-and-white	47	29
Other response patterns	43	53

¹¹ The wording of these questions is given in footnote 4, items a and c.

the parties. In both comparisons, only those who voted or would have voted Republican are considered, to eliminate the distorting influence of the relationship between vote and pattern of response.

The charismatics are clearly much more inclined to judge both candidates and parties on a cops-and-robbers basis.¹² On candidates, the charismatic Republicans are 16 to 1 most black-and-white, as contrasted with a 2 to 1 ratio among non-charismatics. On parties, the corresponding ratios are 4½ to 1 and 1½ to 1.

Another indication of the charismatic person's relative inability to sustain perceptual uncertainty appears in the forecast respondents made before the election on how close the national race for the presidency would be. As the following table indicates, charismatics were about evenly divided as to whether the race would be close or would approach a landslide. The non-charismatics were about 3 to 1 inclined to think the election would be close. The difference is highly significant.

TABLE VI. PREDICTION OF CLOSENESS OF PRESIDENTIAL RACE*

	Republican Charis- matics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charis- matics (N = 544)	All Charis- matics (N = 32)	All Non-charis- matics (N = 922)
(Very) close race	50 %	68 %	53 %	68 %
One candidate will win by (quite) a lot	46	21	44	19
Respondent answered but gave no clear-cut prediction	0	7	0	7
Don't know or not ascertained	4	4	3	6

* The question was: "Who do you think will be elected president in November? Do you think it will be a close race or will (respondent's choice) win by quite a bit?"

The intolerance for perceptual ambiguity is evidenced also in the discrepancy between the candidate respondents voted for and the one they said would make the best President aside from the party. Few people can be expected to believe or to state that in their opinion there is a difference between the candidate of their choice and the best potential President. Nevertheless, here again the charismatic Republicans differ from the non-charismatics; there is slightly more than one chance in twenty that the difference is due to chance. The difference therefore falls short of statistical significance.

¹² The difference is significant in both cases at the five per cent level of confidence. In Table IV, because the expected frequency among the least black-and-white charismatics was less than five, the following formula was used:

$$\chi^2 = \frac{N \left(\frac{AD - BC}{2} - \frac{N}{2} \right)^2}{(A + B)(C + D)(A + C)(B + D)}$$

See Quinn McNemar, Psychological Statistics (New York, 1949), p. 207.

The third hypothesis—that the charismatic individual is more likely to believe that other people share his opinions and act as he acts—is related to the second in that the inability to maintain ambiguous perceptions is presumably part of the same psychic inability to tolerate diversity. The third hypothesis, however, introduces the additional factor of the charismatic's need for group

TABLE VII. CANDIDATE BEST SUITED FOR THE PRESIDENCY*

	Republican Charismatics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charismatics (N = 544)
Eisenhower	97%	83%
Stevenson	3	10
Either; neither; it depends	0	2
Don't know or not ascertained	0	5

* The question was: "Now, adding up the good points and the bad points about the two candidates, and forgetting for a minute the parties they belong to, which one do you think would make the best president?"

support for his own judgments, his relative inability to stand alone. In the pre-election interview respondents were asked how they thought various groups would vote. The groups in question were farmers, the working class, Negroes, the middle class, big businessmen, union members, Protestants, Catholics, and Jews. The Republican charismatic respondents were much more likely to believe that farmers, working class, and middle class would vote Republican. There were slight differences also between charismatic and non-charismatic respondents on the other groups, but the differences were generally so small that they must be attributed to other factors or to chance.

The fourth hypothesis states that the charismatic follower will have weaker ties to party than others because his main concern is to attach himself to an

TABLE VIII. PREDICTION OF VOTE OF VARIOUS GROUPS OF REPUBLICANS

	Farmers		Working Class		Middle Class
	Charis- matics (N = 30)	Non- charis- matics (N = 544)	Charis- matics (N = 30)	Non- charis- matics (N = 544)	Charis- matics (N = 30)	Non- charis- matics (N = 544)
Will vote Democratic	17%	24%	23%	38%	3%	11%
Will vote Republican	40	20	27	14	47	35
Will split	30	33	30	32	30	31
Don't know and not ascertained	13	23	20	16	20	23

infallible leader. The evidence in support of this notion is not so strong as for the other hypotheses. In terms of classifying themselves as either strong or weak Republicans or Democrats rather than as Independents with or without leanings toward one or the other of the parties, there is some evidence—which falls slightly short of statistical significance at the five per cent level—that charismatics are more likely than the non-charismatics to attach themselves to party.

But when asked what they would do if confronted with voting for a candidate of their own party whom they liked less than the candidate of the other party, the charismatics differ markedly from the non-charismatics. Three-fourths of the former would vote for the candidate rather than the party of their preference, while less than half of the latter would do so. Only one out of eight of the charismatics in such a conflict situation would stick by his party or else not vote at all, whereas one out of four of the non-charismatics would choose one or the other of these alternatives that maintain his party ties. The relationship is evident whether one contrasts all charismatics or only those who voted or would have voted Republican in 1952.

TABLE IX. VOTING FOR CANDIDATE OR PARTY*

	Republican Charis- matics (N = 30)	Republican Non-charis- matics (N = 544)	All Charis- matics (N = 32)	All Non-charis- matics (N = 922)
Would vote for candidate of other party	74%	49%	72%	42%
Would vote for candidate of own party	10	10	9	14
Would not vote for either candidate	3	14	3	17
Don't know or not ascertained	13	27	16	27

* The question was: "Suppose there was an election where your party was running a candidate that you didn't like or you didn't agree with. Which of the following things comes closest to what you think you would do? (1) I probably would vote for him anyway because a person should be loyal to his party. (2) I probably would not vote for either candidate in that election. (3) I probably would vote for the other party's candidate."

The interesting aspect of this information is that, if charismatics are indeed more likely to attach a party label to themselves, the label means less for them than for non-charismatics. The former may declare rather more strongly or more often their loyalty to party, but this loyalty means less to them than the attraction of a strong candidate. One can speculate on an explanation for this, saying that conventional loyalties are prominent among charismatics but that the convention is honored mostly on the verbal level and will be flouted in action—without the flouters being particularly aware that their party loyalty is largely sham. The available evidence from the election study, however, offers no clue other than the data presented to explain a phenomenon—apparent real weakness of verbally strong party ties—that is by no means self-explanatory.

IV

One of the most important broad questions about charisma-oriented individuals is the amount and kind of their political activity. If they are relatively active politically, their importance is of course greater than their numbers. If their orientation toward political issues differs from more common patterns, this too may be portentous. The inconclusiveness of relevant data from the election study makes improper any testing of hypotheses. But some of the material is suggestive and merits brief mention.

The charismatic respondents reported being "very much" or "somewhat" interested in the 1952 campaign much more often than did the non-charismatics.¹³ Nine out of ten of the charismatics compared with three out of four non-charismatics expressed such interest. (And less than a tenth of the charismatics said they were not much interested, compared with about a fourth of the non-charismatics.) Furthermore, three out of four of the charismatics said the differences between the parties were such as to make it important or very important to the country which party won the election; somewhat more than half of the non-charismatics said so.¹⁴ Statistically, these differences are significant.

But these differences in reported strong political feelings among the charismatics are not so clearly evident in the differences in reported action. There is either no difference between charismatics and non-charismatics on the reported regularity of their actual voting, or a difference indicating that the charismatics are somewhat less likely to vote in all or most presidential elections.¹⁵ On the other hand, charismatics slightly more often than non-charismatics reported having voted in both 1952 and 1948 elections. In both cases the differences fall short of statistical significance. The only reasonable conclusion from these data is that charismatics by and large vote neither more nor less often than non-charismatics.

Aside from voting, charismatics are in some ways apparently more active than non-charismatics. Respondents were asked after the election whether they had (a) talked to people, trying to persuade them how to vote, (b) given money, (c) attended meetings or rallies, (d) done any party campaign work, or (e) belonged to any political club or organization. On two scores the charismatics were significantly more active than non-charismatics—talking to people and doing campaign work. In the other kinds of political activity they were either as active or possibly slightly more so. Republicans generally are more active politically than Democrats, so part of the charismatic's activity may be related to being Republican. But when all Democrats were eliminated, the remaining charismatics were still in the ways described more active than Republican non-charismatics.

¹³ The question was: "Some people don't pay much attention to the political campaigns. How about you, would you say that you have been very much interested, somewhat interested, or not much interested in following the political campaigns so far this year?"

¹⁴ The question was: "Do you think it will make a good deal of difference to the country whether the Democrats or the Republicans win the election this November, or that it won't make much difference which side wins?"

¹⁵ The question was: "In the elections for president since you have been old enough to vote, would you say that you have voted in all of them, most of them, some of them, or none of them?"

The orientation of charismatics toward partisan issues is substantially the same as that of non-charismatics. On the three domestic issues used in the election study to test partisanship of orientation—government welfare activities, FEPC, and the Taft-Hartley Act—charismatics did not significantly differ from non-charismatics, although they may lean very slightly more toward the Democratic position on welfare legislation and slightly more toward the Republican view on FEPC. On two of the four foreign issues—Have we gone too far in foreign involvement? Was it right to go into Korea in 1950?—the difference is microscopic. On the issue of whether it was our fault China went Communist, charismatics are inclined to blame this country more than do non-charismatic Republicans. If charismatics are adopting a partisan view on our China policy, it is so extreme as to indicate more zealous Republicanism than most Republicans themselves exhibit.

A more likely explanation than partisanship is that this belief in our blame for China's going Communist is associated with the characteristically charismatic attitude toward the fourth of the foreign issues—what should we do in Korea now? The strong tendency of charismatics either to say we should pull out of Korea or to say we should bomb Manchuria and China has been explained above in connection with Table I as evidence of intolerance of sustained political indecision and crisis.

V

The foregoing analysis of charisma in the 1952 campaign was undertaken for three reasons: to assess the researchability of an important political phenomenon which heretofore has remained largely in the intuitive realm of thought, to find out how prevalent the phenomenon is in contemporary American politics, and to test the validity of certain intuitive hypotheses as to the way charismatic followers will act.

The analysis presented is neither exhaustive nor deeply etiological. Because of the broad scope of the election study undertaken by the Survey Research Center, it was not possible to insert in the interview questions which could be designed to explore in depth the causes and in breadth the manifestations of charisma. The absence of prior research that is of directly probative value would have made imprudent the large expenditure necessary to gather a large national sample for the sole or primary purpose of research in patterns of leadership perception. But it was in fact possible by relatively exact, though crude, techniques to isolate a category of respondents whose primary orientation to politics indicated a strong predilection for a particular kind of leadership. And meaningful as well as statistically significant relationships between this predilection and kinds of political attitude and action did in fact emerge. I believe the analysis does indicate that a concept which up to now has been confined largely to intuitive observation can be subjected to empirical observation and test.

As we have noted, less than two per cent of the very precisely representative and random sample of the national adult population gave clear evidence of a primarily charismatic orientation. This fact is indeed significant, in more than a statistical sense, but its significance should not be overestimated. There is evidence in the interviews suggesting that more than such a tiny fraction of the general public has some charismatic reactions to politics. There is indeed no evidence that only about one person in fifty would actively support a man with a halo on a white horse. However, the fact that 32 cases produced striking relationships whereas more cases less precisely selected did not—despite the pronounced statistical advantage of large numbers—indicates rather clearly that charisma judged by fairly clear-cut criteria and exhibiting specific behavioral manifestations is not now epidemic in our society.

The four intuitive hypotheses stated at the beginning of Section III find considerable support in the data presented. It does seem clear that charisma-oriented individuals are relatively intolerant of political crisis, incapable of maintaining ambiguous perceptions, and more likely to see others as sharing their opinions and actions. The fourth hypothesis, on relative weakness of party ties among the charismatics is supported by less convincing evidence. The hypotheses are by no means proven, but they state differences which are theoretically consistent, and the relevant data are consistent with the hypotheses. Further research should not only test anew such hypotheses as these but also seek to examine in greater depth and breadth the causes and political consequences of charisma.

As is true with all research, a danger of investigations in charisma is that they lead the analyst and the reader to believe that the concept is the sole one having portent for our political future. Social analysts having an established set of work interests are prone to see charisma or anomie or authoritarianism or class struggle as the crucial concept, in terms of which the past can be explained and the future predicted with a confident sadness. No claim is here made for the primacy of charisma. Liberal and democratic political institutions are surely fostered or destroyed in consequence of a wide range of phenomena operating together and during the same time period. The isolation and abstraction of a particular phase of political life is necessary but should not lead to the crowning of kings when it seems clear that causal regency is plural.

We have noted that certain hypothesized relationships exist between underlying behavior patterns and charisma. Those who are looking for an omnipotent leader are doing so because they cannot tolerate either ambiguous thought or uncertain action. They tend to seek group support for their judgments and perhaps to be less firmly attached to political parties than others. More elaborate analysis would surely produce a wider range of knowledge about the dynamics of charisma.

The major caveat I would make is that there is danger of inferring from general behavior patterns to political behavior and vice versa. No claim can legitimately be made that, because charismatics cannot tolerate ambiguous thought and action, all those who cannot tolerate such ambiguity are charismatics. The term charisma refers to a particular pattern of political behavior and not to a general characterological type. The charismatic individual is not a personality type any more than the person with cancer is an organic type. Charisma is in this paper conceived of as a characteristic of a particular aspect of the individual's total pattern of behavior—the political aspect. No more is asserted than one would say in describing a person as having cancer when he had a cancerous lung or liver. As a political behavior pattern, charisma is probably more fundamental than Republican or Democratic, but much less basic psychologically than, let us say, sado-masochistic or paranoid.

There is a growing tendency in current social research to jump with verbal ease from political to psychological concepts and back again. This saltatory process is presumably designed to establish profound relationships between the two areas of investigation. Profound relationships do exist, and are researchable, but the facile leap is likely to impede rather than facilitate the growth of our knowledge of political behavior. Until such time as we can demonstrate that all those who are insecure or intolerant of ambiguity or paranoid are of a single political type (whether charismatic or authoritarian or anomic) and can demonstrate that all charismatics or authoritarians can be subsumed under a particular broad psychological type, it seems likely that progress in knowledge can be more rapid the more cautiously we generalize. All individuals who are characterologically intolerant of ambiguous thought and action may share a political predisposition not to tolerate indecision and crisis in politics. But for some of them, family tradition or community pressure may preclude identification with candidates in a charismatic manner. Some political non-charismatics may have a strong tendency to attach themselves charismatically to leaders in business or trade union or to religious fanatics or even to their spouses. Preliminary efforts to establish relationships between general and specifically political behavior patterns must be recognized as such and regarded as initial efforts to appraise the significance of only some of the wide range of determinants of people's political attitudes and actions.

The broader context in which charisma is here conceptualized is the irrational tendency not to solve but to suppress major political problems of the age. Isaiah Berlin has said that the new belief of the 20th century "consists, not in developing the logical implications and elucidating the meaning, the context, or the relevance and origin of a specific problem . . . but in altering the outlook which gave rise to it in the first place. . . ."¹⁶ Charisma is regarded as only one of the major forms which this tendency takes. The evidence here presented indicates that the factor is not now prevalent on the manifest level. The extent to which it is a latent disease in the body politic cannot here be judged. If our political institutions remain strong and prove generally though falteringly able to handle the crises of our times or if the crises abate, charismatic leaders and followers alike may be frustrated in their combined search for power and glory.

¹⁶ Isaiah Berlin, "Political Ideas in the 20th Century," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 28, pp. 351-85, at p. 371 (April, 1950).

NOTE ON METHOD

The central methodological problem was selection of the charismatic cases. This process went through three stages. The first stage was facilitated by the elaborate code established for appraising respondents' perception of Stevenson and Eisenhower. A range of over a hundred different kinds of responses favorable to each of the candidates and about the same number of unfavorable responses was established in the code. From this range of possible responses were selected those that indicated some possibility of charismatic content, such as the one that he is a natural leader, he is above politics, people have confidence in him, etc. A machine sorting produced a total of 252 interviews in which one or more such possibly charismatic remarks had been made about Eisenhower or Stevenson. I then read through each of these interviews to determine which contained defensible evidence of charisma and which did not. This reduced the number to 50. The final sifting process involved having two other judges independently read through the 252 interviews and apply the criteria described in the next paragraph. There was some difference of opinion among the two independent judges and myself. Cases on which agreement was not unanimous among the three of us were discussed. Those on which there was not final unanimous agreement were discarded. On 32 cases there was final unanimous agreement, and this group provided the basis for analysis.

The criteria used in judging were established in a four-page, single-spaced "code." It described the concept of charisma, specified the questions in the interview (those listed in footnote 4) that were to be first examined for evidence of the characteristic and the questions that specifically were not to be examined (such as the one on vice-presidential candidates and how the respondent expected to vote), and gave examples of responses which did and did not meet minimal standards for charisma. Since the examples were so important in establishing a cutting point, the most relevant responses in three different interviews are given below:

1. An interview classified as not sufficiently charismatic to be included:

(What do you like about the Republican party?) "Nothing except their choice of candidate, General Eisenhower. I'm a particular admirer of him." (What do you like about Eisenhower?) "His qualities of leadership. His ability to accept responsibility and make up his mind."

The respondent says he is "a particular admirer" of Eisenhower and praises his qualities of leadership, but speaks of his ability to accept responsibility and make up his own mind, which are not uniquely charismatic qualities.

2. An interview classified as minimally charismatic:

(Why will it make a difference if the Republicans win?) "... I am trusting to the Republicans and Ike to end this awful war."

(What do you dislike about Stevenson?)

"Truman got the nomination for him, and, instead of being himself, Stevenson is being a little second Truman. We don't need a weak sister now ..."

(What do you like about Eisenhower?)

"His past record has shown him a man of decision and honor. He will do the wise thing about Korea and get our boys out of there ..."

(Is Eisenhower a real Republican?)

"... In some ways he may differ, but only in ways he feels it best for the country, and then the Republicans will listen, as they know they have a wise man to listen to."

The charismatic clues are: (1) Stevenson is "a little second Truman" and "a weak sister"; (2) Eisenhower is trusted to end the Korean war; (3) Eisenhower is "a man of decision"; (4) the Republicans will listen to "a wise man"; (5) there is belief in the certainty that Eisenhower will end the war and that he will lead the Republicans.

3. An interview classified as clearly charismatic:

(What do you like about Eisenhower?)

"I think Eisenhower is God-sent in our moment of strife. He will, I believe, get us out of this turmoil and back on our feet again. He is a leader of men, and he can do the job if anyone can."

(Are Eisenhower's ideas pretty much the same as other Republicans?)

"I'd say a little different, maybe. His ideals of right and wrong are much higher than most politicians. He has been at the head of an army, a college, and men all over have looked up to him and respected him. Why, he is just the man to lead this country and put it on a firm footing."

The belief in Eisenhower's omnipotence and moral excellence are rather clear-cut here.

There were inevitably some borderline cases. It was because our primary interest was in assessing the characteristics found to be clearly associated with charisma rather than in reaching a firm conclusion on the number of individuals whose approach to politics is charismatic, that we excluded all cases on which the three judges could not agree. This proved to be sound because the predicted relationships were more clear-cut among the 32 cases than among the 50 that I had chosen without the aid of judges—despite the fact that the criteria used by the other two judges were my own.

A statistical measure of the amount of agreement between the three judges indicated reliability of judgments considerably above the level of chance. Using a measure of agreement between judges labeled π by its author, William A. Scott,¹⁷ we found that the completely independent classification of interviews as charismatic by the three judges (including myself) had a π of .40, where 0 indicates only chance agreement and 1 indicates complete agreement. The π score for agreement between the two independent judges, who had no part in preparing the criteria for charisma, was higher (.53) than the agreement scores .32 and .36) between each of them separately and me. If I had gone through the 50 interviews I originally classified as charismatic and judged them in accordance with the more rigorous formal criteria used by the two judges, agreement would have been statistically higher but would have needlessly involved my being both judge and jury.

¹⁷ Wherein $\pi = P_0 - P_e/1 - P_e$. P_0 signifies observed per cent of agreement between two or more judges selecting a particular characteristic out of a group. P_e signifies expected or chance per cent of agreement between two or more judges selecting such cases.

THE PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC INTEREST WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATION*

EMMETTE S. REDFORD

University of Texas

There are two aspects of the relation between government and interest groups which are of primary significance for the political scientist. One is the realistic approach to the study of interest groups, which gives attention to the demands of groups, their pressure on government, and the ways government yields to or tries to accommodate their conflicting demands. The other is the idealist tradition that the purpose of the state is the common weal, which has been expressed diversely, as for example, in the concepts of salus populi suprema lex and "public office is a public trust." If these two were necessarily in conflict, we should have to choose between ethical nihilism and utopianism. This paper moves from the assumptions that realism and idealism both have a place in the study of political science, today as in ancient tradition, and that in the study of the particular problem of government control of the economy, analysis of the upward impact of interest pressures and their accommodation through government policies should be supplemented by a search for the best means of strengthening the impact of the concept of the common weal in the decision-making process.

I

An initial problem is the difficult one of accuracy in use of concepts. The term "group," as Leiserson has told us, has two connotations: one is that of persons associated in organizations or associations; "the other is that of a category of persons presumed or observed by the investigator to possess attributes in common."¹ So defined a group can include members of a family, a labor union, the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, all wheat farmers, or all citizens of the U. S. Each group is a kind of public, but the term "public" has special connotations when applied to the association of men in geographical areas, i.e., in states and their subdivisions. The special connotations are not only those associated with the concept of "sovereignty," but also those associated with the fact of inclusiveness. For my purposes here the term "public" refers only to these particular types of inclusive associations, and the term "group" to other associations or categories of persons within the "publics."

This says no more than the "public interest" is the interest of people living within a politically organized society. It can be added, however, that the terms "group interest" and "public interest" assume some identity of interest among those within the group or public. The search for a "group" interest or a "public interest" is therefore a search for the common interest. This would be true even if the common interest were no more than the ability to reach a compromise among special interests. But the common interest often includes more. That it has substantive content even for our diversified publics can easily be illustrated. Peace, jobs for employables, education for children are obvious examples in our day. That these may be qualified by other interests, or that we cannot be positive that we know their precise limits, does not mean that their existence as elements of public interest need be denied.

* This paper was presented at the fiftieth annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in Chicago, September 10, 1954.

¹ Avery Leiserson, Administrative Regulation: A Study in Representation of Interests (Chicago, 1942), p. 6.

We can say, then, that one element in the idea of public interest is that of broad, inclusive, or widely-shared interests, called variously general, common, or public interests. Another is the idea of enduring interests. For social as well as individual units a drunken debauch at the moment which erupts ulcers tomorrow is hardly deemed in the interest of the subject.

The identification of these two elements does not mean that there are not others which would enter into the determination of the public interest in a particular instance. Widely-shared interests may have to be compromised with existing or emerging special interests, of either a functional or a geographical nature, and long-run interests compromised with immediate interests. Moreover, the best attainable in the pursuit of the public interest may be a compromise among varied and perhaps conflicting interests, subsumed possibly under some standard of community purpose.

We are brought then to the conclusion that the geographical units forming states or subdivisions thereof are publics, and that within these publics there are public interests, which may be identical interests of large portions of the public, or compromises of different interests, or some of both. It should be added that the only constituent of the public interest which can be accepted is the interests of individuals as human beings, for those in whom the Western tradition has sunk its taproots will recognize no interests of groups or institutions except as these are bearers of the interests of men. No concessions need to be made to those who talk as though there were some separate and mystic interest in states, groups, or institutions, as such.

II

In recent years discussions of the public interest have become more realistic by reason of two developments in thought about group interests. The first is the expanded emphasis on the significance of group organization and group identities. Recently in an article in this journal Earl Latham summarized this development and argued the need for recognition of the fact in political theory.²

² "The Group Basis of Politics: Notes for a Theory," this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 376-97 (June, 1952). Latham's bibliographical notes range comprehensively through the several academic disciplines.

It has become clear that "a plurality of social groupings"³ does exist, and that consideration of their place in the governmental process must supplement, though not supplant, the attention given to man and the state.

The second development is the emphasis on compromise of group interests as the essence of the process of government. This idea has been expressed in various ways⁴ by some of our most perceptive thinkers: by Bentley in his group process theory, according to which "All phenomena of government are phenomena of groups pressing one another, forming one another, and pushing out new groups and group representatives (the organs or agencies of government) to mediate the adjustments;"⁵ by Herring in his reconciliation theory, according to which "the purpose of the democratic state is the free reconciliation of group interests;"⁶ by Leiserson in his acceptance theory of the public interest, according to which "a satisfactory criterion of the public interest is the preponderant acceptance of administrative action by politically influential groups;"⁷ by those who have advocated a "new democracy" in which the interests participate in the actual process of government.⁸ In addition to these, T. V. Smith has glorified compromise as the essence of the democratic way of life.⁹

One of the most significant modes of generalization is Herring's statement of a reconciliation theory. Herring even says that a harmonious working relationship must be established between the bureaucrats and the special interests.¹⁰ There is validity in his argument. Especially is this true of government regula-

³ John Dewey's phrase, The Public and Its Problems (New York, 1927), p. 73.

⁴ For a fuller summary see my Administration of National Economic Control (New York, 1952), pp. 220-25.

⁵ Arthur E. Bentley, The Process of Government (Chicago, 1908), p. 269.

⁶ E. Pendleton Herring, Public Administration and the Public Interest (New York, 1936), p. 9.

⁷ Administrative Regulation (cited in note 1), p. 16.

⁸ The term "new democracy" was used, for example, by John D. Lewis in "Democratic Planning in Agriculture," this REVIEW, Vol. 35, pp. 232-49, 454-69, at p. 469 (April, June, 1941). Walter Gellhorn succinctly stated the point of view expressed in the text when, in discussing lay participation in administration, he concluded: "affected private interests are shaping the course of action. It is democracy at work." Federal Administrative Proceedings (Baltimore, 1941), p. 130. But Gellhorn stresses advice as the proper means of participation. Ibid., p. 133. Ordway Tead sets forth "the principle of the representation of interests, which says that every group which has a clearly identifiable set of interests is safeguarded in its dealings with other groups only as it has the opportunity for an explicit voicing of its interests in councils where the common problems of the several groups are under consideration." New Adventures in Democracy: Practical Applications of the Democratic Idea (New York, 1939), p. 5.

⁹ See particularly The Legislative Way of Life (Chicago, 1940); The Democratic Tradition in America (New York, 1951); Discipline for Democracy (Chapel Hill, 1942); The Compromise Principle in Politics ("Edmund J. James Lectures on Government: Second Series" [Urbana, 1941]); "Compromise: Its Context and Limits," Ethics, Vol. 53, pp. 1-13 (Oct., 1942). For a recent analysis of Smith's theory, by one who opposes it, see John H. Hallowell, The Moral Foundation of Democracy (Chicago, 1954), ch. 2.

¹⁰ Public Administration and the Public Interest, especially p. 16.

tion of economic enterprise, where law often sets a standard which conflicts with the interests of affected industries, and where some compromise has to be effected between the purpose of the law and the interest of the groups. There are limitations on attainment of public ends through a system of overhead public controls of private enterprisers, arising out of the interests of the latter.

There is much validity in the arguments of the interest group theorists, and much guide for the administrator in the practice of his art. It may still be argued, however, that there is danger that the emphasis on interest groups will lead us to overlook other factors which are important in policy making. Other factors are recognized in broadly-gauged discussions, as for example in Herring's and Leiserson's, but repetition of the fact of group interest in many places may obscure them.

We may note three types of additional factors. First, the interests of men are not fully represented in group associations. American group structure is complex and so also are the life and loyalties of individuals. There is much lack of identity of interest among members of groups, much overlapping of interests across group lines, great variation in the extent to which interests are represented in groups, and considerable sharing of interests among men as men and as members of the large society.¹¹ We can easily be misled into believing that group interest is something concrete in contrast to a public interest which is elusive and vague. Second, value concepts determine choices among competing interests. Each of us has an interest in the security of our nation and an interest in personal liberty. Our separate judgments on many current measures of legislation will depend upon the value we have placed on each of these two interests. We may differ in our conclusions even though we have the same interests. In Texas I have recently seen men with identical interests take opposed positions on candidates for governor because they had formed different value judgments on segregation. One defect I find in the group interest theory as developed by some is that insufficient emphasis is given to the role of value judgments. Third, the interests of men must be interpreted in the light of developments in society. There is a certain "logic of events," from which the interests of men arise.¹² For example, the interest of men in government provision for security for old age arises out of changes in conditions, and the policy makers must look to the trend and tendency of events to determine the legitimacy of claims of interest.

Those who search for the public interest should look for the common denominators in group and individual interests and value judgments, and for the imperatives in specific situations. To the extent that their search involves compromise of interests, the efforts would be mechanical if centered on this factor alone. The process of government itself would be threatened with stalemate if based at every turn on the adjustment of the separate interests rather than on the discovery of the common interests and ideals, and the necessities arising from circumstances.

¹¹ See the analysis by David Truman in The Governmental Process: Political Interests and Public Opinion (New York, 1951), particularly ch. 16.

¹² Compare John M. Gaus' discussion of "The Ecology of Government," in his Reflections on Public Administration (University, Ala., 1947), ch. 1.

There is danger that the social scientist will overlook the varied nature of social engineering. First, in certain situations decision is appropriately based on presentation and analysis of opposed interests. In courts decision is reached by this process. Second, occasionally decision must be made by a process of bargaining. Third, in other situations research and analysis, perhaps with the aim of forestalling or minimizing advocacy or bargaining roles, is the initial and perhaps the main step toward decision. The joinder-of-interests and advocacy techniques, characteristic of the so-called judicial state, and the bargaining technique, characteristic of certain bipartite or tripartite agencies, appear to be of less value than the problem-solving techniques for the modern legislative-administrative state. In my opinion the early belief that regulation was a judicial process led to excessive use of the joinder-of-interest technique, and thus to overemphasis on compromise of interests. And bipartisan representation of labor and management in government can be a dangerous expedient if not held within proper bounds.

The primary needs, in my judgment, are to recognize the complexity of problems which must be faced and to emphasize the part that creative intelligence can play in the solution of problems.

Creative intelligence may supply a standard or solution to a problem which will be acceptable to interest groups. This step may be taken in advance of the crystallization of views of group interests or may result in modification of views already developed. The effect of creative intelligence is to raise the search for solutions to a different level where factors other than compromise of notions of special interest may be influential. Leiserson has referred to the "independence of administrative initiative,"¹³ and Herring has said, "The offering of positive proposals by a responsible administration is then the first goal to seek."¹⁴

One reason creative intelligence can be effective is because it provides accurate appraisal of situational factors and of ways of responding to these with workable and acceptable solutions. In regard to situational factors I have said elsewhere that the economic organism "is a complex of technologies, institutional framework, and behavior patterns. Within this complex the administrator finds points of resistance and pliability. Expert analysis consists in the discovery of the areas of pliability and the means of manipulating these."¹⁵

The demands of the interest groups is only one of the situational factors which limit pliability. The policy maker will be limited in many ways. In the regulation of the oil industry, for example, "he cannot change the geology of formation and lift of oil, nor change the technology of drilling and transportation, nor ignore the law of capture and the correlative rights of men, nor move without ¹³ Administrative Regulation, p. 284.

¹⁴ Public Administration and the Public Interest, p. 383.

¹⁵ Administration of National Economic Control, p. 230.

recognition of the ways men will react to what he does."¹⁶ On the other hand, some factors can be manipulated, including frequently or perhaps usually, in some degree, the pressures of interest groups.

In the application of creative intelligence much depends upon the orientation of the policy-making crew. The directives of law will be some guide to an administrator and he must recognize these as governing standards for the moment. But he may recommend amendments to these or find that they leave a wide area of free discretion. It becomes important therefore whether he is oriented to think in terms of the broader identities of social interest and purpose.

Such identities, it may be repeated, do exist. Pound spent many years developing a list of the social interests embodied in the law, and his list reveals the existence of many social interests.¹⁷ No one has made such a search in our legislation, but if made it might uncover more identities of interest and purpose than we are immediately conscious of. It would help reveal, in Pound's phrase, the "received ideals" of the nation, which political scientists have sought too exclusively in judicial decisions. But though our tools of instruction are inadequate, it can be stated that the conditioning of the administrator to look for common and enduring interests is an essential safeguard for the public interest, at least in a society which has accepted the ideal of democracy as fully as ours has.

We can at this point broaden the definition of the public interest: it may be defined as the best response to a situation in terms of all the interests and of the concepts of value which are generally accepted in our society. Each of the elements in the definition—situation, all the interests, concepts of value—is a complex of many strands. It is this complexity which provides the opportunity for the "manipulative power" which Fainsod has said is within the capacity of the "wielders" of regulatory instruments.¹⁸

III

In a pluralistic society with strong and assertive group organizations which furnish opportunities for multiple approaches to a disintegrated government, the great problem in policy making is to develop policies which reflect a broad ¹⁶ Ibid., p. 232.

¹⁷ See particularly Roscoe Pound, Outlines of Lectures on Jurisprudence, 5th ed. (Cambridge, Mass., 1943) and "A Survey of Social Interests," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 57, pp. 1-39 (1943).

¹⁸ Merle Fainsod, "Some Reflections on the Nature of the Regulatory Process," in Public Policy, ed. C. J. Friedrich and Edward S. Mason, Vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1940), pp. 298-99. Since writing this paper I have seen Don K. Price's statement of the reasons why he wrote Government and Science: Their Dynamic Relation in American Democracy (New York, 1954), p. v.: "The deeper reason was a notion that had been developing in my mind for several years (not a particularly original one) that the development of public policy and of the methods of its administration owed less in the long run to the processes of conflict among political parties and social or economic pressure groups than to the more objective processes of research and discussion among professional groups."

and long view of social interests. There is little chance that the immediate interests of organized groups will not receive adequate attention. The real danger is that the interests of the unorganized and weak, the shared interests of men generally, and the interests of men for tomorrow will not have proper weight in government councils.

If this be true, the challenge to the political scientist is to ascertain what arrangements in government will facilitate the inclusive view in policy making. This is a task similar to that undertaken by Madison in Federalist Paper No. 10. He accepted faction and sought ways of moderating its effects and preventing damage to society by group interests. Today the political scientist must accept the fact of group interests and pressure and seek ways of preventing this from destroying the search for a common weal. Madison had more fears of majority than of minority interests, but in our day the dangers in the latter as well as the former are evident. Also, Madison and the men of his day could place faith in checks on action as a safeguard against dominance of a particular interest, but in our day the rapid flux of economic factors and of movement on the international checkerboard call for arrangements in government to facilitate decision.

Both the literature of political science and trends in law seem to reveal some arrangements which may facilitate the discovery and advancement of the public interest. There is, therefore, nothing novel in the suggestions to be advanced here, except in their association with the basic aim of promoting the common good.

The first need is to adopt every expedient which promises to increase the amount and to raise the quality of creative intelligence available to government. Political scientists have long recognized that the complexity of modern problems requires experts of various types in government, and governments generally have quite unavoidably reached for experts in successive problem areas. The justification which has been offered is efficiency, but a deeper justification is moral. It is through the expert that we can expect to find ways of preventing the use of government for narrow aims, for only an expert can have the competence to discover workable solutions and thus show the ways to manipulate discordant elements toward public ends.

I am using the word "expert" comprehensively to include every form of intelligence which can be employed efficiently in the solution of problems. There are experts in technical detail, experts in analysis of facets of problems, experts in synthesis and the choice that forms decision, and experts in human (including group) relations. The highest level of expertness is the point where synthesis is reached as a result of juncture of analysis of the obstinacies and flexibilities of organic factors with analysis of the obstinacies and amenabilities of people. This gets close to or includes the expertness of the statesman, whether administrative or political.¹⁹ I would not say politician when speaking of this function in politics, for there are variations in politicians. T. V. Smith has told us that the politician is "The secular saint of a sinful society."²⁰ But I would not want to raise to sainthood the politician who looks only one way, as a leader of the French revolution who is reputed to have said, "There goes the crowd. I am its leader. I must follow." If he looks the other way, also, at the diverse knowledge which experts can give him on what is possible and what is best and grasps in his synthesizing role the highest measure of the best that will be accepted by the people, then he may merit the appellation of saint.

¹⁹ Or even judicial, as in the case of the next step of the Supreme Court on segregation in education.

There are areas in which the work of the expert is conclusive. In my city I have never witnessed significant controversy over traffic engineering. The experts in placement and timing of traffic signals, choice of one-way streets, etc., are of course compromising the interests of people going south, north, east, and west, but they are doing this not directly at all times but oftentimes by a search for ways of moving traffic. There are areas of public convenience and of public necessity where men yield to the expert, or fail to yield only because they have not been told the reasons for his decisions.

There are other areas in which the divisions of men become more significant influences in the determination of policy. For this reason it is desirable to consider ways of keeping the creative intelligence within government oriented toward the inclusive interests of men. This requires special arrangements in personnel policies and organization.

The arrangements in personnel policies are those designed to maintain remoteness from particularistic viewpoints and an attachment to general interests. To attain these ends the following guides²¹ are suggested:

1. Avoid representation of the interests in the composition of public authority (as on regulatory boards) or occupational qualifications which are equivalent, except where necessary to obtain consent of parties to a mediatory process (as in some aspects of labor relations).
2. Strive to preserve the principle that officers of government should have no interests save as members of the public in matters within their jurisdiction, except as emergencies require temporary departures from the principle.
3. Give continued emphasis to the task of developing a flexible, transferable group of experts for service at top levels in administration, a group of "experts in social engineering—the men who are skilled in the process of finding, within the framework of institutional organization and process, solution to public problems."²²

²⁰ The statement was recorded from one of his speeches. Smith informs me that it appears in his writings as follows: "The politician is the secular saint of our sinful society one of whose sad businesses it is to keep the self-advertised saints from cutting each others' throats out of the very excess of their saintliness." The Political Way of Life (Pamphlet of the California Bar Association, 1948), p. 18.

²¹ For fuller discussion see my Administration of National Economic Control (cited in note 4), pp. 236–51, 255–57, 270–71, 369–71. For other discussions of personnel problems in regulation see E. Pendleton Herring, Federal Commissioners: A Study of Their Careers and Qualifications (Cambridge, Mass., 1936), and Avery Leiserson's discussion in Fritz Morstein Marx, The Elements of Public Administration (New York, 1946), ch. 14.

²² Administration of National Economic Control, p. 369.

4. Develop a code of ethics for public office holders, containing rules on improper associations and guides on administrative practice, among which the following are suggestive: "conduct business in public offices, get the matter on the record, require clearances by professional staff members, prepare for particular pressures by developing a general policy, sink decisions on matters affecting persons or concerns individually deep enough in the administrative hierarchy and procedure to insulate against political direction on particulars."²³ The code could also outline the ideals of public office, e.g., nondiscriminatory action toward persons and groups, the independence of public office, the obligation to defend and promote the public interest. The ethics of public office might even be a section in in-service or pre-service training courses.

Arrangements in organization²⁴ should have, negatively, the aim of preventing too much identity of viewpoint between the regulator and the regulated and, positively, the aim of channeling the creative intelligence within the government toward a large, publicly-oriented consideration of social problems. In my opinion, our present knowledge points toward certain expedients of organization which will contribute to these ends.

First, in economic regulation there should be a predisposition toward cautiousness about establishing units of organization which deal continuously with the same industry or industry group. It must be recognized that there are some advantages in organizing on the basis of clientele served or commodity or industry controlled, and that it is even necessary sometimes to organize on such bases. But wherever it is necessary to establish clientele- or industry-oriented agencies, these should be subordinated to policy-forming echelons representing more inclusive viewpoints. This rule is suggested: for every use of the clientele or industry principle of organization, there should be compensating arrangements for consideration of other viewpoints.

Second, enlargement of the units of administration may force consideration of policy from broader viewpoints. The establishment of the Department of National Defense set the stage for the development of comprehensive planning for national defense, such as would not have been possible in the three separate services. Consolidation of agencies should be considered in many other areas: banking regulation and the Treasury, fuel, water, resources development, transportation. Ultimately the needs discussed in this paper and the need for reducing the President's span of control may require the establishment of even larger units of planning, coordination, and direction.²⁵

²³ Ibid. See also relative to a code of ethics, Ethical Standards in Government, Report of a Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U. S. Senate, 82nd Cong., 1st sess. (1951); Phillip Monypenny, "A Code of Ethics for Public Administration," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 21, pp. 423-44 (March, 1953) and "A Code of Ethics as a Means of Controlling Administrative Conduct," Public Administration Review, Vol. 13, pp. 184-87 (Summer, 1953); "A Code of Public Ethics: Excerpts from a Code Prepared by the Citizens Commission on Ethics in Government, Arlington County, Virginia," Public Administration Review, Vol. 13, pp. 120-22 (Spring, 1953).

²⁴ For fuller discussion of these see pp. 251-57, 272-324, 361-64, ibid. A good discussion of the relation of interest groups and organization, based upon experience in wage stabilization in World War II, is Murray Edelman, "Governmental Organization and Public Policy," Public Administration Review, Vol. 12, pp. 276-83 (Autumn, 1952).

Third, assuming the integration of regulatory activities in large agencies, units for staff aid could be created in the top offices of each agency. The creative intelligence within such units could be applied to the broad problems which cut across industry or other lines of group interest.

Fourth, the whole executive branch should be integrated under the President so as to give him opportunities for influencing the direction of policy. I mean by this to attack the principle of independence of regulatory agencies as it developed in this country. Independence, if it was ever justified, is now an anachronism: it arose in a day when men assumed that regulation could be judicialized and when courts were saying that legislative power could not be delegated. Independence and plural headship have prevented the development of normal relationships between political and permanent officials. The two together have fostered traditionalism in approach and close affinities between the regulators and the regulated, and have insulated regulatory agencies against a responsible exercise of democratic control.

Fortunately, the idea of independence is dwindling on the vine, but unfortunately we have not yet adjusted our theory to the basic need. For half a century reformists have argued for integration as a means of saving money and gaining efficiency. But integration is more than a budgeteer's gadget or a technician's toy: it has a moral purpose. Integration is an instrument through which the related ideals of democracy and the common weal can have a chance to prevail in the practice of government: the former through a channel of control over the wielders of public power, the latter by raising the basic issues of public policy to a level where men may be forced to think inclusively.

The same moral purpose justifies geographical centralization on matters affecting the whole nation. Madison argued for centralized power in government as a means of preventing one faction from dominating society. Today we can see that centralized power gives an opportunity for the creative intelligence of men to find responses to situations which will take account of all the interests of the people over an extensive area. We have not yet adjusted our thinking to an international regime which can seek an international public interest which will ride over our particularistic national interests, but within our own nation the creation of the Constitution and the will to use the powers thereunder have created new possibilities for discovering and promoting the commonly-shared interests of men.

²⁵ See, for example, the argument for a new echelon between the departments and the presidency (including an Executive Secretary for Economic Affairs) by George Graham in "The Presidency and the Executive Office of the President," Journal of Politics, Vol. 12, pp. 519-621 (Nov., 1950), and discussion favorable to a Department of Foreign Affairs with subordinate administrative departments, as a long-run solution to the organizational problem in the conduct of foreign affairs, in The Administration of Foreign Affairs and Overseas Operation: A Report Prepared for the Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, by the Brookings Institution (Washington, 1951) and in Arthur W. Macmahon, "The Administration of Foreign Affairs," this REVIEW, Vol. 45, pp. 836-66, especially at p. 846 (Sept., 1951), and Administration in Foreign Affairs (University, Ala., 1953), pp. 94-103.

Herring has said that the reconciliation of interests called for "a great administrative machine."²⁶ We have reached the same conclusion. If government is to exercise controls over the economy on behalf of the people, it must put force in the places where men are forced to search for the common interests of all. This does not mean, of course, that all power must be concentrated. It only means that a framework is needed within which the inclusive interests, problem-wise or area-wise, can have adequate attention. In policy making, deconcentration within a hierarchy and local self-government are principles applicable for less inclusive interests.

IV

A "great administrative machine," adequately equipped with multiple brain centers within, will have some force of its own; but it can gain sufficient strength to counter powerful undercurrents of special interest only if it draws energy from political power centers. An administrator who operates without political support from above will find that his manipulative powers are weakened and that capitulation to group demand is unavoidable.

Obtaining adequate political support is difficult in our political system, where power is splintered and dissipated in many directions. Within the Congress power is distributed among many "working centers," as V. O. Key puts it, and each of these becomes a potential center of direct influence on administration. Before this group of working centers and the organs of overhead management and supervision within the executive branch the administrator strives to obtain a greater measure of support than of resistance and in doing so may find that his power to deal with situations is compromised.

The unity within the executive branch for which Hamilton, the Brownlow and Hoover Commissions, and students of administration generally have argued can be achieved only if there is more unity in the Congress, and apparently this can be achieved only through provision of means by which a unified executive can work with organs of leadership in Congress.

The problem of administrative regulation is ultimately the problem of our total political system. The inclusive point of view cannot be expected to prevail sufficiently in administration unless it prevails also in the Congress. The problem is more difficult for the Congress because the system of local representation puts the representation of interests inside the government. But the primary need is the same, namely, to shift the location of power to a level where men must search for the common interest of the people of the nation. The means of doing this in Congress would carry us out of the area of administration, and would call for another paper.

²⁶ Public Administration and the Public Interest (cited in note 6), p. 9.

CO-DETERMINATION IN GERMANY*

HERBERT J. SPIRO

Harvard University

When the Labour Government began to nationalize industries in Great Britain, swarms of social scientists descended upon that island. They wanted to study this "great experiment," which many of them viewed as the trail-blazer for an inevitable trend in all modern industrial societies. That was nine years ago. Now it seems that the nationalization dogma has lost most of its force even in Labour circles. But another great experiment has been in progress on the Continent, in West Germany: Mitbestimmung, the scheme under which labor participates in the management of private industrial corporations. In part it was born out of British disillusionment with socialism's erstwhile cure-all. Because of its novelty and uniqueness, it is attracting increasing attention from social scientists. But this time, the different disciplines are unevenly represented. Economists, and especially experts in labor relations, have shown the most interest. When they run across a student of politics in pursuit of the same quarry, they often express surprise. And the Germans, who are being visited, interviewed, questioned, polled, and subjected to every conceivable form of social-scientific scrutiny, react even more strongly. They are positively puzzled: "You are not a Nationaloekonom? But then surely an Industrie- or Betriebssoziologe, or perhaps a Jurist. . . ." The political scientist is an animal of which few of them have heard. And fewer still can imagine off-hand why he would want to concern himself with co-determination.

And yet this German experiment seems to be pre-eminently suited for investigation by the student of government and politics, and not just for the conventional reason that it has played a role as one of the major issues in recent German politics. The main direction of our interest should rather be in Mitbestimmung as a deliberate attempt to introduce constitutionalism at a new level. It appears as a kind of constitutionalism not only in the traditional, negative sense of that word, i.e., because it has created a system of effective and regular restraints upon the action of the wielders of power at this level; but also in the more contemporary, positive meaning of democratic constitutionalism as an arrangement which seeks to distribute responsibility for central decisions among individuals in a manner fairly proportioned to the extent to which these individuals are affected by the consequences of such decisions. To make possible responsible living through institutions of this kind has in recent years been the great preoccupation of a large and diverse number of the most influential friends, in thought and practice, of constitutional democracy.¹ It was also the primary normative conception which motivated the creators of co-determination. To demonstrate this will be the purpose of the first part of this paper, while the second section will try to examine the workings of this new constitutionalism. Finally, an attempt will be made to legitimize the political scientist's special interest in this scheme through indicating some parallels between it and the more familiar varieties of constitutional government and politics.

* The research upon which this paper is based was made possible by a Sheldon Traveling Fellowship from Harvard and a Fulbright Grant. The author wishes to express his appreciation also for the valuable information which scores of German practitioners of co-determination have given him, usually in confidence. Since the notion of secrecy plays an important role in German politics and business, he feels it would be improper to identify these sources of information. And because most of the German literature on co-determination—the bibliography runs to more than 800 titles—is of a highly formalistic and juristic nature, the footnotes will mention only some of the most useful sources.

I

Mitbestimmung was for the first time concretely introduced, early in 1947, in four and eventually twenty-four iron- and steel-producing corporations which had been created out of existing trusts by fiat of the (British) North German Iron and Steel Control. Here co-determination worked as follows: (1) The supervisory board of directors (Aufsichtsrat)² of the corporation consisted of eleven members, five representing labor, five capital, and an eleventh member the German Steel Trusteeship Administration, a creature of the British Control. (2) The managing board (Vorstand) was expanded to include, in addition to the usual business and technical directors, a third or labor director (Arbeitsdirektor, or sometimes, in the beginning, Sozialdirektor), to be in charge of personnel and "social" matters. (3) The Arbeitsdirektor was to cooperate closely with the works council (Betriebsrat), consisting of elected representatives of the workers (Arbeiter) and white collar employees (Angestellte) of the corporation. The works council provided two of the five labor members of the supervisory board of directors; two others represented the metal workers union and the union federation, respectively; while the fifth labor representative was not directly connected with either the corporation or the union, but was nominated by the latter. The labor director, too, was nominated by labor through their representative on the Steel Trusteeship Administration.

What normative conceptions led to the adoption of this scheme? We have to consider this question in relation to the three groups who helped to bring the scheme into being: unions, management, and the British. The British had the final say in all matters affecting the decartelized steel industry. To execute its authority, the Control relied largely on the German Trusteeship Administration. The Administration was headed by Heinrich Dinkelbach, a former managing director of the German United Steel Works, and one of the few German managers who could afford to voice his views at a time when many of his colleagues were being held in Allied concentration camps. The unions, at British invitation and especially through their leader, Hans Böckler, participated in the original establishment of the Trusteeship Administration and were represented on its board.

¹ Cf. the author's "Responsibility in Citizenship, Government, and Administration," in Public Policy, ed. Carl J. Friedrich and J. Kenneth Galbraith (Cambridge, Mass., 1953), Vol. 4, pp. 116-33.

² The German Corporation Law of 1937, which is still applicable to the Aktiengesellschaft, provides for three governing bodies: the general stockholders' meeting, which usually takes place once a year; the supervisory board of directors, which is elected by the general meeting, meets about four times annually, and lays down the long-range policies of the corporation; and the managing board of directors (Vorstand), which is appointed by the supervisory board and usually has two or three members, who either function collegially or are presided over by a Generaldirektor. Membership on one of these boards excludes membership on the other.

What prompted the German labor unions to promote Mitbestimmung, a scheme which would seem off-hand to go against their traditionally Marxian socialist aims? For there can be no doubt that they did then—and indeed for the most part still do—advocate the socialization of basic industries. Nor can it be denied that they were still carrying most of the ideological baggage of Marxism. Consequently, they might have been expected to look askance at any scheme which would give managerial functions to representatives of the working class and force upon them day-to-day collaboration with capitalists in a reviving capitalist economy. And what prompted capitalist managers, such as Dinkelbach, to promote a scheme which might well restrict managerial initiative and freedom of decision, and give labor representatives the opportunity to supervise and control management activities? And, finally, what prompted the British controllers, appointed by the Labour Government, to forego their chance to socialize on an even larger scale than at home?

To be sure, many concrete coercions which the existing postwar situation imposed upon all three groups played an important role here, quite independently of the normative goals which each of them may have wanted to pursue. For example, the labor unions were not allowed to organize above the local level during the first year after the end of the war. Their first concern was to give their members work, food, and shelter. This led to their active cooperation with what was left of management in the various plants. Meanwhile, socialization continued to be their goal. But even when they were granted Occupation permission to organize on a Zonal scale, they were given no opportunity to bring about socialization. Co-determination therefore appeared to some of their leaders as the little finger which they should accept prior to grabbing the whole arm (or body). Management, on the other hand, had been badly discredited through close association with the Nazi regime. Some managers were released from Occupation arrest only on requests by the unions. And those managers who were permitted to play a role in the reconstruction and reorganization of the steel industry undoubtedly felt that they needed labor support in order to be able to resist those Occupation demands which they considered particularly obnoxious, as for example dismantling. The British controllers, finally, had to defer socialization out of respect for United States views on this question. And since they needed German help in order to put their steel program into effect at all, they had to accommodate themselves to some wishes of those Germans upon whose cooperation they had to rely.

Notwithstanding the importance of these favorable conditions, purely normative considerations did play a significant role in shaping the institution of Mitbestimmung. This is true especially of the German actors on the scene, partly because of the old German tradition of ideologically determined and/or rationalized action. Anyone seeking corroboration for the influence of normative theory on political practice could probably find better cases in Germany than anywhere else. Political action which cannot be justified in terms of an elaborate "scientific" ideology is hard to find there. The German labor movement especially stands in this tradition. During the Weimar period, its theoreticians had already worked out the theory of economic democracy as a pendant to socialization.³ The economy as a whole was to be democratized in addition to being rationalized through socialization. This economic democracy was to be realized through the equal participation of labor and management in a series of economic councils at different levels of the economy. Participation within the individual enterprise was also considered, and the Works Council Law of 1920 indeed granted it, though on a very limited scale. However, these Weimar theories gave but scanty elaboration to labor participation at this lowest level of the economy. But when postwar force of circumstances necessitated relegation of socialization, it was only natural that the theory of economic democracy should be brought to the ideological front in its place. Thus one ground for labor's ideological acceptance of co-determination was given.

A second, and more important, basis existed. Despite the German labor movement's continued espousal of socialization, the expectations which it held of socialization had undergone a profound change. The orthodox Marxist expected socialization to bring about, first, a rational organization of the economy, and, eventually, the establishment of the classless Utopia. But by 1945 too much had happened to leave many adherents of this optimistic variety of Marxism, which holds that socialism enables all individuals to become responsible for their fate through making decisions based upon perfect, certain knowledge. Faith in the supreme desirability of individual responsibility survived the war, but faith in the attainability of perfect knowledge, along with the attractiveness of the rationalism of large-scale organization which both "monopoly capitalism" and socialism bring with themselves, was one of the casualties of the preceding decades. The survivors in Germany of National Socialism, war, and defeat attributed these disasters in part to the institutional inability of the many to contribute to decisions made by the few. True, better opportunities for the affected many to share responsibility for the disastrous course of events might not have made that course any less disastrous. But it would have made the consequences less unbearable. They would rather suffer something for which they deemed themselves responsible than something for which they knew they were not.

A democratic socialism might redress this situation. But because of the gigantic proportions of its organization, the individual would not be able to make really meaningful contributions to central decisions. Co-determination within individual plants, on the other hand, would afford him opportunities for such meaningful responsibility. Of course, bankruptcy of businesses or a depression in the whole national or international economy could still occur, but at least the individuals affected would feel that they had contributed to the occurrence. And the individual worker within the plant would better understand the complexity of the total process of decision-making. He would participate in it not only at the polls, as in democratic socialism, but also in the factory. He would, as the most often used slogan of the proponents of Mitbestimmung has it, be brought back into the center of things: Der Mensch muss in den Mittelpunkt gebracht werden.

³ Cf. G. Decker, "Zum Begriff der Wirtschaftsdemokratie," Die Arbeit, Vol. 4, pp. 827 ff. (1927); T. Leipart, Auf dem Wege zur Wirtschaftsdemokratie (Berlin, 1928); Fritz Naphtali, Wirtschaftsdemokratie (Berlin, 1928).

An additional reason for labor's espousal of co-determination was its interpretation of the past. Large segments of the German labor movement and the Social Democratic party adhere to the Marxian interpretation of the fall of the Weimar Republic and the rise of National Socialism. They believe that this chapter in German history teaches that "monopoly capitalism" leads to fascism, because Thyssen "paid Hitler," Schacht made his collection, and so forth. The correctness of this interpretation is not at issue here, but only the weight carried by the conviction that it is correct. This weight is tremendous. And one means for preventing the recurrence of this kind of subsidization of political extremists by powerful industrialists was seen in the control which co-determination would give labor through its representatives on the supervisory boards of corporations. Thus a changed view of the historical process—the conversion from "optimistic" to "pessimistic" Marxism—led to the advocacy of political institutions designed to canalize that process, so that men might become responsible for their fate.

Normative considerations on the part of the earliest managerial proponents of Mitbestimmung may be more easily subsumed under the two main headings of "Christianity" and "escape from accountability." To say that several of the most important managerial supporters of the scheme stood under the influence of modern Christian social doctrines is not to imply that management held a monopoly on Christianity. On the contrary, the inclusion of non-socialist groups in the new unified German Trade Union Federation (Deutscher Gewerkschaftsbund or DGB) brought many convinced "Christliche" unionists into positions of influence on the labor side. This fact made peaceful cooperation between labor and management less difficult in postwar than in Weimar Germany. But, whereas the workers and their leaders would have advanced claims to a greater role in the life of the nation whether they were influenced by Christian thought or not, managers needed this kind of stimulus, in order to grant such a role to the workers. Roman Catholics were able to fall back upon a tradition which goes back at least to Rerum novarum and has always had strong exponents in Germany in particular.⁴ Both this and newer Protestant social doctrine were entirely sympathetic to any arrangements which, while leaving the institution of private property undisturbed, were designed to give individuals living within huge organizations improved opportunities for the exercise of responsibility. Some old and some newly "Christian" managers devoted themselves to the realization of just this Christian goal after the German collapse had left little else standing in Germany but the moral authority of the churches. Thus they too could agree with the slogan of returning the human being to the center of things through co-determination.

⁴ Cf. Ralph Henry Bowen, German Theories of the Corporative State (New York, 1947), ch. 3 "Social Catholicism," and passim. Also John F. Cronin, Mitbestimmung im Streit der Meinungen (Bad Nauheim, 1953), pp. 46 ff.

At the same time, however, many of them preferred to remove themselves somewhat from the center of things. This motive gave rise to the second normative consideration which made for managerial supporters of the scheme. They wanted to relieve themselves of at least part of the responsibility which had hitherto rested upon their shoulders and consciences, because they had only too recently learned of the corresponding accountability which went with it. Many of them, indeed, felt that they had been held accountable by the Allies for many events to an extent which far exceeded their responsibility therefor. And they sensed from the German climate of opinion that their capacity to shape the course of events had been, and was being, overestimated. The chances were that, if things should go wrong in industry and in the economy in the future, they would again be blamed. So, when Mitbestimmung presented them with an opportunity to unburden themselves of part of their responsibility by sharing it with representatives of labor, they were glad to do so in anticipation of letting these representatives share also accountability for the consequences of decisions which would henceforth be made jointly. Managerial support for co-determination thus came from two normative considerations: the partly "Christian" recognition of workers' claims for more responsibility, and the managerial desire to escape total accountability.

What normative considerations, finally, prompted the British Steel Control to permit the experiment to take place? Here, dissatisfaction with the results of the nationalization of coal in Britain played a most important role. This dissatisfaction had nothing to do with the economic results of nationalization, but was the result of the relatively unchanged situation of the miners. They had no more opportunities for meaningful, responsible participation in shaping the future of the enterprises for which they worked than before nationalization. Mitbestimmung would be an experiment in providing such opportunities. The title of the major British report on the subject, "Workers Responsibility for Management in the Reorganized Iron and Steel Works," was not selected by accident.

Thus management and labor, Christians and Marxists, Germans and British, thinkers and actors who came from all sorts of radically diverse ideological backgrounds were able to agree on the desirability of giving individuals better opportunities for responsibility by letting them contribute to decisions about the fate of the corporations, on which their own fate depended to a large extent. Whether co-determination, the institution which they deliberately called into being for this purpose, served this end will be our next concern.

II

What happens to any individual depends in large measure upon the course taken by the many groups and organizations to which he belongs. Their fate is in part determined by human decisions. Men who make these decisions may be said to be responsible for their consequences, when the decisions are made (1) upon a choice among alternatives; (2) in light of the availability of resources with which to put them into effect; (3) with knowledge of their consequences. Democratic and constitutional politics seeks to facilitate individual responsibility by enabling individuals to contribute to such central decisions to the extent that they will be affected by their consequences. To examine the functioning of Mitbestimmung as a kind of constitutionalism, therefore, we should ask such questions as the following: Who is affected, and how so, by decisions made in and about the corporations covered by the law? Who makes these decisions, and who contributes to making them? What are the alternatives, the resources, and the knowledge upon which these decisions are made? Through which channels can one make contributions to them? And how does all this differ from conditions in these corporations before co-determination was introduced and from conditions in other corporations not affected by the several co-determination laws?

We cannot examine the twenty-four iron- and steel-producing corporations in which the scheme was first tried as though they existed in a vacuum or operated with a fixed, unchanging institution. The provisions and practices of Mitbestimmung have been undergoing continuous change. Legally, the high-marks of this process of evolution are to be found in the laws of May 21, 1951, and October 11, 1952.⁵ The first of these gave the Bundestag's sanction, with slight changes, to existing arrangements in iron and steel and at the same time extended them to all corporations engaged in the production of iron and steel and in mining. It was adopted after lengthy negotiations and a struggle which involved the threat of a general strike by the DGB. The second law introduced a milder version of co-determination to most other privately owned corporations. It governs the elections and functions, including a limited right of co-determination, of works councils in all private businesses, including those governed by the earlier law. Under its provisions, one-third of the members of the supervisory board of corporations are elected by its workers and employees. But the unions are not empowered to appoint any members to this board, and there is no provision for a labor director. Passage of a further law, establishing economic councils at various levels, may be expected within a year.

American political scientists of an alegal or antilegal orientation may object to a detailed consideration of the highly detailed provisions of the two laws, and of the vast volume of juristic arguments which have been woven around them, and out of which they emerged. For lack of space, I shall indeed forego such a discussion, but not without first emphasizing the practical importance which legal provisions and controversies have in German politics. Whether it is because of the tradition of Roman and codified law, a characteristic hankering after order and orderliness, a faith in the capacity of human reason to pre-determine the course of events, or an aversion to direct personal negotiation for the settlement of differences, it is a fact that a legalism pervades the German political atmosphere which is bound to impress most Americans as excessive. The general practice is to make detailed and comprehensive legal provisions for all possible eventualities before embarking upon a new political experiment, rather than to experiment before giving tried institutions and processes the stamp of legality after they have proved their worth, as in the Anglo-Saxon countries. The only reason why the "German way" was not followed from the very beginning in the case of co-determination is to be found in the non-existence of a German legislature at the time of its introduction under British Occupation auspices. But even in those early postwar days, the participating Germans repeatedly lamented the absence of a legal basis for Mitbestimmung. When they were able to create such a basis, they did, and ever since then the literal provisions of articles and paragraphs are forever cited by all those concerned with co-determination, from Generaldirektoren to workers.

⁵ Gesetz über die Mitbestimmung der Arbeitnehmer in den Aufsichtsräten und Vorständen der Unternehmen des Bergbaus und der Eisen und Stahl erzeugenden Industrie, May 21, 1951; Betriebsverfassungsgesetz, October 11, 1952.

This pervasive legalism also backs up the other caveat: not to consider the twenty-four decartelized steel-producing corporations as though they existed in a vacuum. They existed within, among other things, this legalistic atmosphere. They existed, also, under the difficult economic conditions of the first few postwar years. Their workers lived as members of the newly unified German trade union movement, which made the full realization of co-determination and its extension to all sectors of the economy, both private and public, its primary goal. For the last couple of years, they have lived next door to coal miners, in whose industry co-determination has had a slow and difficult start, and to workers in other corporations governed by the Law of 1952, which granted co-determination on a much narrower scale. They lived close to the Soviet Zone and at a focal point in the East-West struggle. Mitbestimmung was evolved in plants which have been practicing it for seven years, in full consciousness, on the part of the participants, of the importance of the experiment for the rest of Germany and—as some think—of the world.

But what has co-determination achieved with respect to opportunities for individual responsibility? To begin with, no great changes have occurred so far as the effects of decisions made in or about the corporations are concerned. These consequences still affect everyone living in the German and, to a lesser extent, the world economies. They also still affect corporate stockholders who, an Occupation promise to the contrary notwithstanding, have since had their property restored to them. And they still affect, above all, the men and women who work in the plants. Drastic changes have, however, occurred in the distribution of responsibility for making these decisions. They are made by different people than before; new circles of individuals and organizations can contribute to these decisions; and the alternatives, resources, and knowledge upon which they are based are of another kind than previously.

Formerly, day-to-day management decisions were made by the (usually two) collegial business and technical directors. These were appointed by, and personally directly accountable to, the supervisory board and, indirectly, the general stockholders' meeting, in terms of the provisions of the Corporation Law of 1937. These two groups, and the others whom they represented, were thus able to make indirect contributions to the managerial decisions made by the directors. The latter's discretionary power, i.e., the range of alternatives upon which they based their decisions, was limited by their personal accountability to the board and by the prevailing business and labor situation. Their resources for effectuating decisions consisted of physical and financial givens plus their managerial subordinates. Their knowledge about the consequences of their decisions was derived from their general business experience, from the advice of the supervisory board, and, for intra-corporation effects of decisions, from the information which their managerial subordinates supplied.

What changes has Mitbestimmung wrought here? Day-to-day management decisions are now made by the three-man managing board. The third or labor director is appointed, as are his two colleagues, by the supervisory board, but on recommendation of the metal workers union. The three managing directors are individually and collectively accountable to the supervisory board of eleven. Five of these eleven represent the stockholders of the corporation. Five others represent labor. Two of these are elected by the works council, one being a worker and the other a white collar employee. Two others are appointed by the metal workers union and the DGB, respectively. The eleventh member of the board must be acceptable to the other ten. In other words, the circle of those capable of contributing indirectly to managerial decisions has been vastly extended, and the network of channels through which these contributions flow, vastly complicated. This means that contributions made by those who belonged to this circle prior to the introduction of Mitbestimmung have lost in relative weight. At least this is true of the discretionary power upon which decisions by stockholders are based, since the law now restricts the direct choice of the general stockholders' meeting to only five-elevenths of the members of the supervisory board. The increase in the discretion component of responsibility on the part of the workers thus occurred at the cost of the owners. Meanwhile, however, it is possible that the resources and knowledge components have been improved all around.

Managerial responsibility presents a good test case for this hypothesis. Under the law, the three managing directors are collectively accountable for action by any one of them. While each concerns himself primarily with business, technical, and personnel matters, respectively, all important decisions are made jointly. The alternatives available to the two original directors have thus been somewhat curtailed through the addition of the labor director and through the stricter delimitation of their jurisdiction by the co-determination law. Incidentally, this tends to be a general result of the subjection of any sphere of life to explicit legal regulation. Another such general result is improvement of the knowledge about probable consequences of decisions governed by the law. This result may also be observed in the case of co-determination. All three directors, as indeed all concerned, can now anticipate with greater clarity than previously the probable effects of their decisions within (though not necessarily outside) their corporation. But their general knowledge, as well as their legal foreknowledge, has been improved. Through addition of the labor director to the managing board, new channels have been opened for the flow of knowledge to the other two directors. This has occurred not merely through expansion of the corporation's personnel department, which in most cases was rather neglected in Germany before 1945, but also through securing the coöperation of the workers' representatives. This same labor cooperation has also improved the institutional resources which are at the disposal of management in order to put their decisions into effect.

What is the concrete form taken by these improvements in the knowledge and resources components of management's capacity for responsibility? The case of a managerial decision may serve as an illustration. Suppose that the managing board of a steel corporation is considering an expansion of its plant. The financial outlay for this must be approved by the supervisory board. Its five stockholder members provide the usual fund of information about the corporation's competitive situation, the capital market, and other financial factors. Eventually they will also help to secure the needed capital. The two labor members of the supervisory board who represent the workers and employees of the corporation will bring to bear what knowledge they possess of conditions in the plant. This knowledge will be considerable, since these two are usually the chairman and vice-chairman of the works council, positions to which they would not have been elected had they themselves not worked in the plant for many years. Moreover, as officers of the works council they constantly work with its other members, who represent all the different shops of the plant. Members of the council will bring up much relevant information—and not just of a personnel or labor-relations character—in the course of its meetings. These two workers' representatives of the supervisory board will therefore be well informed on such matters as extent of utilization of existing capacity and efficiency of organization. The two supervisory board members who represent the unions, usually high union officers themselves, are able to contribute their general economic knowledge, which is often impressive and is being constantly expanded through union-sponsored training conferences for labor participants in Mitbestimmung. In addition to this general knowledge, they can also bring to bear their special knowledge of labor problems. If they had reason, for example, to foresee strikes, they would probably react differently to the expansion proposal than otherwise. It is too early to tell whether co-determination will act as a permanent or strong deterrent to strikes. But it is a fact that a special delegates' conference of the coal miners union recently voted to shelve demands for wage increases which had earlier been voted by the union's general convention. This change in plans must have been a result in part of the improved knowledge about the general economic situation available to the union's representatives on the supervisory boards of the coal mining corporations. Foreknowledge of the consequences of decisions is thus improved for labor as well as for management.

Once the supervisory board votes to accept the managing directors' proposal, the project is put into effect. Then the workers' legal right to "co-determine" through their elected works council becomes most noticeable in personnel questions. Old workers and managers have to be transferred and new ones hired.

Here the operations of the works council assume the character and proportions almost of those of a personnel office. Transfers, hirings, and firings are often done only through the council. Even managers are not hired without approval of the works council in some corporations. Decisions on these matters are made by joint management-works council committees on which both sides have equal representation. A series of such committees exists in each plant. Usually they deal with specialized matters such as economic, personnel, wage, and insurance questions, working conditions, accident prevention, and minors and women employed in the plant. These joint committees provide the managing board with a useful institutional channel for purposes not only of gathering knowledge for their decision-making, but also of putting their decisions into effect with less friction than would be the case if they were obviously management-imposed.

Finally, what opportunities for exercising responsibility exist for the workers themselves? They are informed about the state of the enterprise by management and workers' representatives at quarterly meetings held for this purpose. They elect the works council in biennial elections. They can always carry personal problems and general grievances to their representatives on the council. The council for its part maintains close liaison with its constituents through so-called "men of confidence" (Vertrauensmänner), of whom there is one for about forty workers, on the average. The workers also contribute to central decisions made about the future of the corporation through participation at the different levels of trade union politics, which finally produce, among other things, the union representatives on the supervisory board. They can further contribute to corporate decisions through joining the study and action groups which are maintained in most factories by the several political parties. These groups play an important role in the election of the works council, which often gives an accurate reflection of the political composition of the workers in the plant. In addition, two methods which had been available before co-determination was introduced may still be used: straight union activity of the traditional kind, from collective bargaining through to the strike, and the ballot, through which the corporation's policies and future may be influenced via "the state."

Such, then, in outline, is the shape taken by the new corporate constitutionalism in the German steel-producing industry. The makers of central decisions seem to be provided with a better basis of knowledge and resources. This improved knowledge may also in fact increase the range of alternatives available to them, despite the restrictions imposed in this respect by the co-determination law itself. Certainly the workers in these plants have new means for making contributions to central decisions and for availing themselves of information upon which to base these decisions. The multiplicity of channels through which they may influence central decisions will also tend to increase the alternatives among which they can choose, because it often happens that works council, union local, union, union federation, and Arbeitsdirektor—to mention only some of these channels—pursue different policies, which individual workers may then support, as e.g., in works council elections or at the quarterly meetings for all personnel (rarely attended by more than twenty per cent). One danger, however, arises in this respect: the monopolization of these positions by a group of more or less like-minded Funktionäre, which would make the multiplicity of channels a mere fiction. When this happens, the worker is in fact confronted by the same union machine, no matter where he turns. When some labor union theoreticians advance the claim that only their organization is truly entitled to represent the workers in all their interests, they only feed this particular flame in the fire of criticism of Mitbestimmung, which is constantly maintained by their unreconstructed free-enterprise opponents. They, and even many labor leaders, often also raise the objection that the "average worker" will neither make use of, nor understand, the information on which he may base his contributory decisions. For this reason, the whole scheme has been transformed in the minds of some of its earliest proponents into a great educational experiment, designed to raise the level of economic, social, and political understanding of the German workers.⁶ They also insist that academically trained experts must be used as labor representatives on supervisory boards for these reasons. It might be pointed out, however, that the "average citizen" in a constitutional democracy also often fails to make use of or to understand political information available to him. But even if this be true, both citizen and worker are still able to become responsible for central decisions through the accountability to themselves of those men who are charged with making the decisions. Moreover, through participating concretely in the exercise of such responsibility, they become aware of the limits set to the knowledge of all human beings—including that of the most polished academic experts. They recognize also the inadequacies of the ideologies upon which they used to base their decisions. They learn that fundamental ideological disagreements between workers and capitalists need be no barrier to cooperation between human beings forced to find practical solutions to practical problems.⁷ All around, their view of reality becomes more "realistic" through their ability to enforce the accountability of the men charged with the exercise of responsibility for the future of the corporation. To the extent that this is true, one of the purposes of the introduction of this constitutionalism at the level of the industrial corporation will have been achieved.

III

Devotees of "scientific management" from the United States who approach the co-determination experiment ask of it: How can a committee of three run a huge corporation? More important, how can the three-man managing board function properly when one of its members, the labor director, is appointed by and accountable to, not the stockholders, who are interested in maximizing profits, but labor, which has quite different aims? Will not the conflicting demands which the interests of the firm, the unions, and the workers make of the labor director cause him to turn into a permanent schizophrenic, or else to favor one side at the cost of betraying the others? Industrial sociologists who are studying Mitbestimmung inquire: What are its effects on the attitude of the workers to their job, their employers, to the unions, and to each other? What is happening to the managerial layer of industrial society? Has it been expanded to include labor union leaders? Have the goals and attitudes of its older members changed?

⁶ Cf. the author's "Ein Amerikaner zur Mitbestimmung," Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte, Vol. 4, pp. 527-30 (Sept., 1953).

⁷ Cf. Carl J. Friedrich, The New Image of the Common Man, and the author's review of Cronin, op. cit., in Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte, Vol. 4, p. 511 (Aug., 1953).

Economists who approach the experiment ask these questions: What economic consequences does it bring? Will it result, e.g., in "excessive" economic benefits for the workers and thereby harm the German steel industry in international competition, or raise the cost of steel for domestic consumers? Students of labor relations ask: How can the steel corporations engage in collective bargaining with the metal workers union, if men appointed by that union, and owing it their primary loyalty, conduct negotiations on behalf of the corporations? How will strikes be possible under these conditions? Are not the German labor unions "perverting" their traditional goals?⁸

Now these are important questions and, in terms of the relatively narrow focus in which they are put, quite adequate.⁹ But all of them miss the really crucial point about Mitbestimmung: it is a conscious experiment in constitutional and democratic politics at a new level. It tries to repeat for the history of private industrial corporations what happened in the history of the countries which have become constitutional democracies in the course of the last three centuries. They, just as these corporations, were once ruled by single sovereigns, accountable only to God or "History," and possessed of sole responsibility for all that transpired in their realms as a result of the discretionary capacity, resources, and knowledge which they had concentrated in their hands. Their responsibility, too, was gradually—sometimes not so gradually—restrained and then divided and subdivided among ever more of those who were affected by the consequences of decisions centrally made, until finally all citizens came to share in it. And just as with the managing board today, the executive officials or bureaucrats of one-time sovereign rulers had to exchange very simple relations of accountability to their monarch, for very complicated relations of accountability to all those individuals and groups from whom they now derive their delegated capacity for responsibility, and who are specially affected by the consequences of bureaucratic decisions. Efficiency may sometimes have suffered, but this result was simply taken in stride by those who preferred to go to ruin under their own steam than to be guided to heaven by an efficient but unaccountable bureaucracy. Anyhow did efficiency really suffer? The notion that an unrestrained and uncontrolled individual can accomplish a job more efficiently than one who is in many, and often devious, ways restrained and supervised by others, is based upon the assumption that this one individual possesses certain knowledge about the consequences of his actions. If he were only permitted to act upon this knowledge, instead of having to consider the conflicting instructions of others who derive a different "knowledge" from their observation of reality, then he could achieve perfect efficiency. But it is precisely the rejection of the attainability of perfect knowledge which lies at the bottom of the contemporary advocacy of the norm of individual responsibility by friends of constitutional and democratic government. They realize first that much of what happens to men as members of communities is not at all the result of human decisions, but is determined by the data of nature and society, and second, that human decisions are based upon limited alternatives, executed with limited resources, and made by men whose foreknowledge of the consequences of their decisions will persistently remain merely probable. But they are also aware of the effects of such decisions on many people who do not themselves make them. Since they are motivated above all by the desire to give these individuals the opportunity to shape their own future, they ask that they be enabled to make equitable contributions to these central decisions—contributions, that is, which are reasonably balanced with reference to the extent to which they will be affected by the consequences of these decisions.

⁸ Cf. Cronin, Mitbestimmung im Streit der Meinungen (cited in note 4); Goetz Briefs, Zwischen Kapitalismus und Syndikalismus (Munich, 1952); Franz Böhm, Das wirtschaftliche Mitbestimmungsrecht der Arbeiter im Betrieb, in Ordo, Vol. 4 (Düsseldorf, 1951); H. D. Ortlieb, "Der Kampf um Wirtschaftsdemokratie und Mitbestimmung," Wirtschaftsdienst (Hamburg), Dec., 1952; McKittrick and Roberts, Workers and Management—The German Co-determination Experiment, Fabian Research Series No. 160 (London, 1953); W. H. McPherson, "Co-Determination: Germany's Move toward a New Economy," Industrial and Labor Relations Review, Vol. 5, pp. 20-32 (Oct., 1951).

⁹ The author hopes to deal with some of them in a broader focus in later publications. Cf. also his "Vom menschlichen und sozialen Wert der Mitbestimmung," Sonderbeilage Nr. 70, Informationen, Gesellschaft für soziale Betriebspraxis, Düsseldorf, Feb. 1, 1954.

To get ever closer to this unattainable goal of enabling individual human beings to live responsibly seems to be one of the basic purposes which constitutional and democratic government is designed to promote. The constitution-makers and legislators of the German Federal Republic also conceive of it in those terms, as is clearly shown by the Basic Law, the unique "Law to Equalize the Burdens" of the war, by much other recent legislation, and last but not least by the legislation on Mitbestimmung. This concept of constitutional democracy pervades the German political atmosphere today in an almost tangible way. It probably arises out of recent disillusionment with Utopian ideologies of the right and left, but contains an element of Utopianism of its own in the form of faith in the feasibility of constitutionalizing literally all spheres of life. The political scientist's paramount interest in the experiment of co-determination is legitimized, because Mitbestimmung is a manifestation of this faith. The extreme devotees of the faith are bound eventually to be disappointed, too, though one great hope exists: the introduction of constitutional and democratic politics at this and other new levels may show all those who participate in them that what really matters for their success is not formal agreement on fundamental ideological convictions, but informal observance of methods of procedure.

AN INTERPRETATION OF THE PHILIPPINE ELECTION OF 1953*

HAROLD F. GOSNELL

American University

Conditions for the successful operation of the democratic form of government have not been present in the Orient. Democracy requires a people who have confidence in themselves, in their leaders, and in the democratic processes, and who have the means for operating democratic institutions. Included in the tools that make democracy work are literacy, a willingness to abide by the rules of the game, and a rapid means of communication and transportation.¹ In the Orient a fatalistic view regarding government is widespread. People in the lower income groups feel that government is an institution of the few, by the few, and for the few. Vote buying, spoils politics, favoritism, nepotism, grafting, the squeeze, the hold up, the percentage are all taken for granted. As one Filipino senator put it, "Graft and corruption are inherent in human nature."² The Orient also suffers from the primitive character of means of transportation and communications. Roads are bad, newspapers have limited circulations, telephones and telegraph stations are few, radios are scarce, and travel is often complicated by hazards of water, mountainous terrain, bandits, and wild animals.

The Philippine elections of November 10, 1953 show that the difficulties that have hindered the growth of democracy in the Orient can be overcome.³ Before the elections apprehension was widespread that extensive use might be made of fraud and terror to defeat the free expression of the popular will. The election demonstrated that popular sentiment could be mobilized and its expression protected in a Far Eastern country with limited experience with democratic institutions. The election was, therefore, an especially serious setback to communism and fascism.

I

It should not be expected that a country governed for four hundred and fifty years by foreigners would develop leaders of its own overnight. In governing the Philippines the Spaniards made little attempt to train the Filipinos for self-

* The author was in the Philippines as an observer of the November, 1953 elections for president and national legislature.

¹ Harold F. Gosnell, Democracy: Threshold of Freedom (New York, 1948); Richard McKeon and Rokkan Stein, Democracy in a World of Tensions; A Symposium Prepared by UNESCO (Chicago, 1951); Robert Strausz-Hupé and Stefan T. Possony, International Relations in the Age of Conflict between Democracy and Dictatorship (New York, 1950).

² Senator José Avelino, quoted by Philippines Herald, Oct. 21, 1953.

³ Harold F. Gosnell, "Filipinos Hold Free Election," National Municipal Review, Vol. 43, pp. 120-22 (March, 1954); T. Durdin, "Philippines Awaits a New Deal," Reporter, Vol. 10, pp. 17-19 (Jan. 5, 1954); T. Durdin, "Filipino Emerges as a New Asian Leader," New York Times Magazine, Nov. 22, 1953, p. 17; C. P. Romulo, "Right Man Wins," Atlantic, Vol. 193, pp. 50-52 (Feb., 1954).

government. They did not provide universal education, they kept the Filipinos divided by their local dialects, they failed to build a modern system of communication and transportation, and they set the example of a highly centralized government operated for the benefit of the few. The United States, in slightly less than half a century, made some progress in introducing universal education, teaching English as a common language, training leaders, and developing communications.⁴ But democracy has to be learned through experience, and for the Filipinos the process of learning really began July 4, 1946, their Independence Day.

The first elections for the republic were actually held before Independence Day. Sergio Osmeña, who became the President in exile when President Quezon died in 1944, ran for re-election in April, 1946 as the candidate of the Nacionalista party. Had he been given a free hand, he might have been re-elected. When he returned from exile, he wanted to outlaw all who had collaborated with the Japanese occupation. General MacArthur prevented his doing this by directing the calling of a session of Congress which included a number of collaborators. One of these, Senator Manuel Roxas, had been long a rival of President Osmeña.

Roxas led the formation of a new political party, called the Liberal party, which challenged President Osmeña's bid for re-election. The Liberals, an offshoot from the Nacionalistas, charged the Osmeña administration with inefficiency, weakness, and favoritism. Effective as a speaker and backed by a large faction of former Nacionalistas, Roxas waged a vigorous campaign, while President Osmeña refused to exert himself. Roxas won by a narrow margin.⁵ The election proved that the administration could be changed by democratic means and showed that it might be possible to build up a two-party system in the Philippines.⁶

The Roxas administration was disappointing to many. The new president failed to convince the people that he was governing primarily for their benefit rather than for that of the favored few. Spoils and graft in the disturbed postwar days were hard to eliminate. In his two years in office Roxas failed to live up to the promises of his campaign.⁷

Former Senator Elpidio Quirino, who had been elected vice president in 1946 as a Liberal, became president in April, 1948 following the sudden death of President Roxas. Before he became president, Quirino had not been regarded as an outstanding political leader. He had neither the oratorical powers of ⁴ C. Ralston Hayden, The Philippines, A Study of National Development (New York, 1942).

⁵ The returns were: Roxas, 1,333,392; Osmeña, 1,129,996.

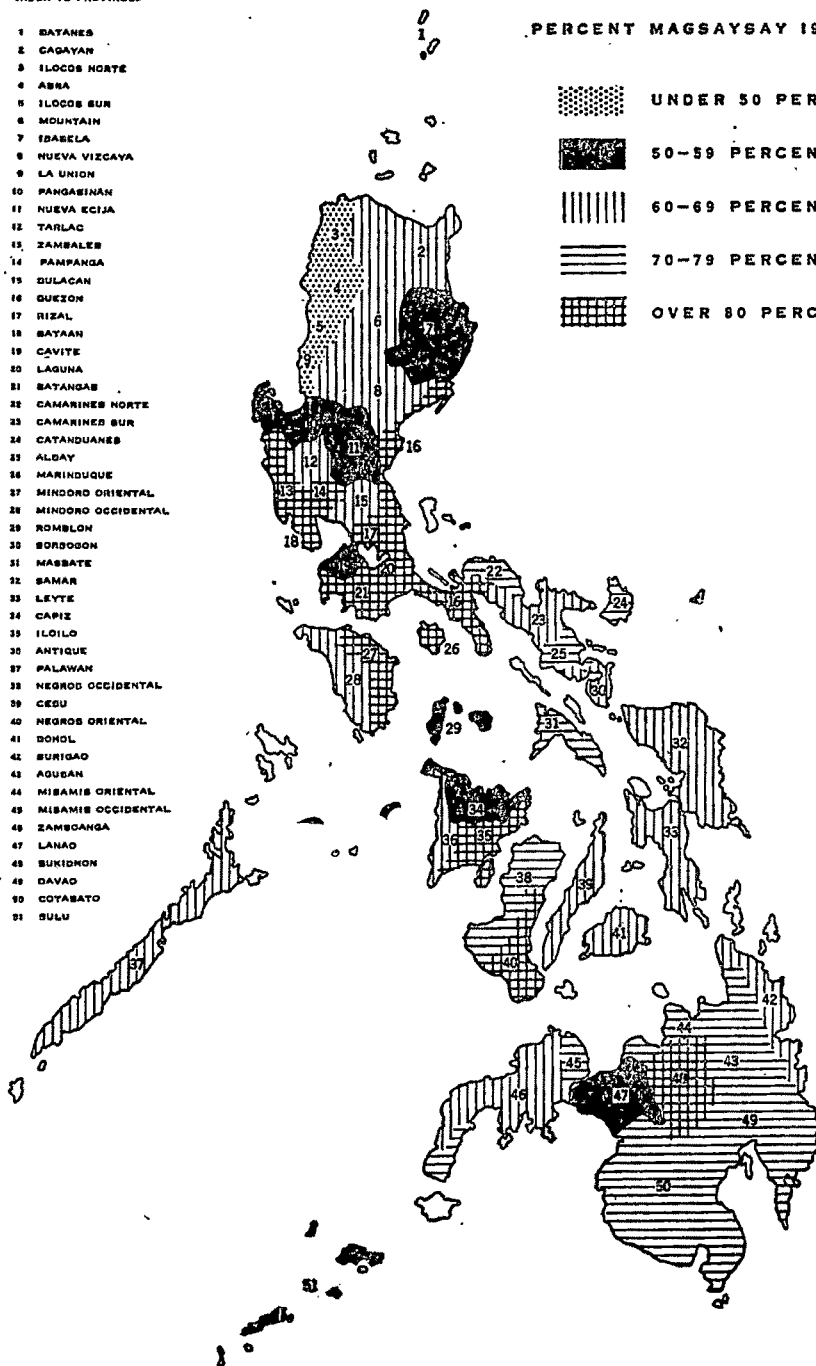

⁶ Bernard Seeman and Laurence Salisbury, Cross-Currents in the Philippines (American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1946). This discussion has a curious blind spot on the Communist leadership in the Huk movement. On the party system in the Philippines, see Hayden, op. cit.; José M. Aruego, Philippine Government in Action (Manila, 1953); George A. Malcolm, First Malayan Republic, The Story of the Philippines (Boston, 1951).

⁷ Manila Sunday Times Magazine, Oct. 25, 1953, pp. 14-16; C. F. Nivera, "Political Review," in Philippine Yearbook 1950-1951 (Manila, 1951), p. 108.

INDEX TO PROVINCES

- 1 BATANES
- 2 CAGAYAN
- 3 ILOCOS NORTE
- 4 ABRA
- 5 ILOCOS SUR
- 6 MOUNTAIN
- 7 ISABELA
- 8 NUEVA VIZCAYA
- 9 LA UNION
- 10 PANGASINAN
- 11 NUEVA ECIIJA
- 12 TARLAC
- 13 ZAMBALES
- 14 PAMPANGA
- 15 BULACAN
- 16 QUEZON
- 17 RIZAL
- 18 BATAAN
- 19 CAVITE
- 20 LAGUNA
- 21 BATANGAS
- 22 CAMARINES NORTE
- 23 CAMARINES SUR
- 24 CATANDUANES
- 25 ALBAY
- 26 MARINDUQUE
- 27 MINDORO ORIENTAL
- 28 MINDORO OCCIDENTAL
- 29 ROMBLON
- 30 SORSOGON
- 31 MASBATE
- 32 SAMAR
- 33 LEYTE
- 34 CAPIZ
- 35 ILOILO
- 36 ANTIGUE
- 37 PALAWAN
- 38 NEGROS OCCIDENTAL
- 39 CEBU
- 40 NEGROS ORIENTAL
- 41 BOHOL
- 42 SURIGAO
- 43 AGUSAN
- 44 MISAMIS ORIENTAL
- 45 MISAMIS OCCIDENTAL
- 46 ZAMBOANGA
- 47 LANAO
- 48 SUKIDRON
- 49 DAVAO
- 50 COTABATO
- 51 SULU

THE PHILIPPINES
PERCENT MAGSAYSAY 1953

Quezon or Roxas, nor the organizing abilities of Senator José Avelino or Speaker Eugenio Perez. The son of a jail warden of Spanish days, Quirino acquired an education, including a law course, in the early days of the American regime, earning his way by government clerkships. He learned politics and administration under the Americans, serving as representative, senator, Secretary of Finance, Secretary of the Interior, and Secretary of Foreign Affairs. He had married into a wealthy family, and had no financial need to indulge in spoils politics. It was charged that he had collaborated to some extent with the Japanese;⁸ to counterbalance this charge, however, his supporters could point to the killing of his wife and two of his children by the Japanese. As Secretary of Foreign Affairs he had several diplomatic victories to his credit.

President Quirino started out with plenty of goodwill, but lacked the vigorous health needed for a clean-up administration. His own friends betrayed his confidence and he found it difficult to get rid of them. Instead he used the techniques of palace intrigue, keeping secret dossiers and using them when he felt that his power was threatened.⁹

The elections of 1949 were disillusioning to those who hoped to see increasing acceptance of democratic methods. President Quirino gained control of the nominating machinery by bringing graft charges against Senator José Avelino, who was trying to unseat him. Senator Avelino bolted the Liberal convention and ran on a Liberal ticket of his own. The Nacionalistas put forward José Laurel, an effective orator who had been president during the Japanese occupation and who wanted to vindicate his record. Laurel claimed that General MacArthur had left him behind to do what he could for his people.

President Quirino was apparently unwilling to take his chances in a free election. The temptation to bring pressure to bear upon the voters was too strong. He used the vast powers of the executive, inherited from Spanish times, to influence the result. It was charged that he used the Philippine Constabulary, the provincial treasuries, the mayors, and other officials to terrorize the voters and manipulate the results. In contests following these elections several Liberal representatives lost their seats. It was alleged that ghosts, monkeys, and bees were allowed to vote in some provinces. While the official returns gave President Quirino 1,796,446 votes, Laurel 1,303,575, and Avelino 419,890, Laurel never admitted that he been defeated.¹⁰

⁸ Malcolm, First Malayan Republic (cited in note 6), p. 185; Seeman and Salisbury, Cross-Currents in the Philippines (cited in note 6), p. 22; Hernando J. Abaya, Betrayal in the Philippines (New York, 1946).

⁹ Malcolm, p. 301; "The Tenant in Malacanan," Manila Sunday Times Magazine, Oct. 25, 1953, pp. 14-16; José L. Guevara, "LP Chances in the Elections," Ibid., Oct. 25, 1953, pp. 30-31; Isidro L. Tetizos, "Why the LP Is Confident of Victory," Counter-Point, Manila, Oct. 20, 1953, pp. 2-3.

¹⁰ Nivera, "Political Review" (cited in note 7). The 1953 presidential elections marked a high point in popular participation in the Philippines as a whole. In spite of this, the vote cast in 1949 in the provinces of Negros Occidental and Lanao was far higher than it was in 1953. In Lanao 150 per cent of the estimated number of eligible voters were registered in 1951, according to the National Movement for Free Elections (NAMFREL.)

In the meantime, the problems facing the government were mounting. Important among these was the growing power of the Communist-led Huk guerrilla movement. The Huks or Hukbalahaps were an offshoot of a wartime guerrilla group. In central Luzon, where farm tenancy and unemployment were highest, the Huks were making rapid inroads by promises and threats just as the Communists were doing in other parts of Asia. The armed forces of the Philippines were unable to cope with the situation; their morale was low and they were not popular with the local population, because of the high-handed methods they sometimes used.¹¹

The United States made the granting of military aid contingent on the improvement of the internal security situation. A young legislator by the name of Ramon Magsaysay was acceptable to the United States as a new Secretary of Defense.¹² President Quirino appointed him to the post in 1950. The son of a blacksmith, Magsaysay had earned his way through college driving a taxicab. Starting out as a mechanic, he rose before the war to the position of manager of the Zambales branch of a transportation company. His lorries were requisitioned by the Americans. After the surrender to the Japanese, he fled to the hills and became a captain of guerrillas. Following liberation he was made military governor of Zambales. No one could question his war record. He was first elected to the House of Representatives from Zambales as a Liberal in 1946. In the House he stood out as a champion of the interests of the veterans and as a critic of his own party for demoralizing the army and failing to control the Huk menace.

As Secretary of Defense, Magsaysay tackled the main problems facing the Department with great vigor. His rules seemed to be: promotion in the army on the basis of merit without favoritism and nepotism, elimination of the causes of discontent, rehabilitation of the Huks willing to surrender. The measures adopted improved the morale of the army, led to the arrest of prominent members of the Communist Politburo in the Philippines, kept increasing military pressure on the Huks, placed relations between soldiers and civilians on a better basis, and resettled a respectable number of Huks on farms in the public lands of Mindanao. His record was so outstanding that it caught the imagination of the people and as early as 1951 he was hailed as the next president of the Philippines. His prestige was enhanced by the attention that he attracted abroad, particularly in the United States, where he became the subject of a number of articles in magazines of wide circulation.¹³

¹¹ Russell H. Fifield, "The Hukbalahap Today," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 20, pp. 13-18 (Jan. 24, 1951).

¹² Mr. Magsaysay said on October 17, 1953, in a speech; "Ask Mr. Quirino if it is not true that the United States refused to enter into the military assistance pact unless he first cleaned out the corruption and inefficiency of his armed forces. Ask him if it is not true that when he suggested that I be made Secretary of National Defense, the American negotiators promptly agreed, and only then was the pact concluded." Philippines Free Press, Oct. 31, 1953, p. 55.

¹³ Robert Shaplen, "Huks, Foe in the Philippines," Colliers, Vol. 127, pp. 11-13 (April 7, 1951), and "Letter from Manila," New Yorker, Vol. 27, p. 96 (April 7, 1951);

As the 1951 senatorial and provincial elections approached, President Quirino gave his Secretary of Defense the job of trying to insure the honesty of the voting. Secretary Magsaysay performed this task so well that the elections were generally accepted as fair and clean. The Nacionalista senatorial candidates defeated the Liberal candidates, including the President's brother, Tony Quirino. All Nacionalista candidates were elected, polling about 59 per cent of the total vote.¹⁴

The growing rivalry between the President and his Secretary of National Defense made a break between the two men inevitable. On February 28, 1953, Secretary Magsaysay resigned from the cabinet and issued a statement in which he said in part: "... it would be useless for me to continue as Secretary of National Defense with the special duty of killing Huks as long as the administration continues to foster and tolerate conditions which offer fertile soil for Communism and I have repeatedly and publicly said that merely killing dissidents will not solve the Communist problem. Its solution lies in the correction of social evils and injustices and in giving people a decent government free from dishonesty and graft."¹⁵ Magsaysay left the Liberal party and Senators Laurel and Recto backed his nomination as the Nacionalista party candidate for president. At the Nacionalista convention, Senator Laurel and other senatorial leaders were able to persuade most of the delegates to support Magsaysay for the nomination. A small number of delegates held out for Senator Osias and then bolted the party to the opposition.

In the Liberal convention, former Ambassador Carlos P. Romulo sought the nomination but the control of the delegates was firmly in the hands of President Quirino. Vice President Fernando Lopez, who had been refused a renomination by the Liberals, joined forces with Romulo. Both men bolted the Liberal party and formed a new Democratic party which campaigned until the middle of August, at which time the two men withdrew their candidacies and formed a coalition with the Nacionalista party. Lopez became a candidate for senator on the Nacionalista-Democratic ticket.

II

Representing the old order, President Quirino made a last stand. Some of his Liberal colleagues had wisely urged him to step aside,¹⁶ but he clung to the idea that he might repeat his performance of 1949. He found it hard to believe that Time, "Cleanup Man," Vol. 58, pp. 33-34 (Nov. 26, 1951); W. L. Worden, "Robin Hood of the Islands," Saturday Evening Post, Vol. 224, pp. 26-27 (Jan. 12, 1952); H. W. Fey, "Changes in the Philippines," Christian Century, Vol. 69, pp. 119-21 (Jan. 30, 1952); W. C. Bullitt, "No Peace in the Philippines," Readers Digest, Vol. 60, pp. 95-98 (March, 1952).

¹⁴ Journal of Philippine Statistics, Vol. 5, Table 5 (Nov.-Dec., 1952).

¹⁵ "Philippine Elections," World Today, Chatham House Review, pp. 508-10 (Dec., 1953).

¹⁶ Leon O. Ty, "Peaceful Revolution," Philippines Free Press, Manila, Nov. 21, 1953, p. 4.

this young upstart, whom he had helped to make successful, could defeat an experienced statesman like himself.

He had delusions that he was popular. His sycophants did not tell him that, as one Filipino put it, the people were mad.¹⁷ He attempted to whip up the old fear of American imperialism in order to win the nationalist vote. In reply to Senator Laurel's statement that American help might be needed to get an honest vote, President Quirino exclaimed that he would resist American intervention with the last drop of his blood. He failed to note that the old issue no longer held the interest that it once did. There was little danger of American intervention, as indeed he admitted, but this did not stop his beating the dead horse.¹⁸ The real issue was not American intervention but American aid.

He also appealed, somewhat plaintively, to the record of his accomplishments, insisting that the war damage had been repaired more rapidly in the Philippines than in any other country and that Philippine production had gone forward. On paper the record was impressive. But the opposition questioned how much credit Quirino could claim for it. With American aid and with private capital and initiative, the economic well-being of the country had indeed been going forward, they conceded. What they wanted to know, however, was whether it was going forward as fast as it could and who was reaping the benefit.

The President was confident of winning. He had a well-oiled, well-fueled, and well-financed machine, operated by the shrewd Speaker of the House, Eugenio Perez. This machine had defeated the experienced Laurel in 1949. President Quirino had also the Philippine constabulary, which could bring pressure to bear on the voters; he had the provincial treasurers, who had charge of the election returns; he had appointed members of the Commission on Election; he had local officials; he had means of reaching the remote villages; he had control over the schools. He did not think that the people would be swept off their feet by an ex-mechanic, who shook hands with the barrio folk as though he were running for mayor.

President Quirino was a polished speaker and waged as active a campaign as the delicate state of his health permitted. Because of a serious operation, he did not begin his campaign until late in the summer. By conserving his strength he was able to appear in the principal parts of the Philippines. In the northern provinces he spoke in Ilocano, but in other provinces he spoke in English, sometimes using an interpreter. In some localities various pressures were used upon government employees and school children to see that a crowd was assembled. The audiences were respectful but cool. The relative size and enthusiasm of the crowds at Liberal and Nacionalista-Democratic meetings indicated clearly that the tide was running against the Liberals.

III

Shortly after his nomination in April, 1953, Magsaysay began the most strenuous campaign ever waged by a candidate for president in the Philippines.

¹⁷ Ibid., p. 65.

¹⁸ Philippines Free Press, Manila, Oct. 31, 1953, p. 11.

By plane, by bus, by car, by boat, and on foot he covered nearly every section of the archipelago. At the end of seven months of such campaigning he was still going as strong as ever. The irregular meals and sleeping arrangements required an iron constitution, an excellent digestion, and an even temperament. His genuine liking for people was such that he did not hesitate to go into the barrios and shake hands with the common folk. In previous campaigns the barrios had been neglected. While Magsaysay was not an eloquent speaker and did not strain for oratorical effects, he was a persuasive talker, knew how to conserve his voice, and impressed his listeners with his sincerity, his humor, and his interest in their welfare. He spoke English with a pronounced Philippine accent. With most of his listeners this was an asset. He could also address audiences in at least two of the main dialects, Ilocano and Tagalog. No special preparations were needed in order to collect an audience for one of his appearances. The people wanted to hear and see the new leader and they would travel for miles, and wait hours in the rain or sun or darkness, when it was announced that he would be speaking in the vicinity. Magsaysay gave the poor people in the barrios the idea that they were important in national politics.

Liberal party attempts to belittle and ridicule Magsaysay as vulgar and uneducated backfired. When he heard that a prominent Liberal had said that he was "fit only to be a basurero" (garbage collector), he answered at the next political meeting: "Yes, I am only fit to be a basurero, but if you will elect me, my friends, I will play the role of a good, a very efficient basurero. I will clean up all the garbage of graft and corruption that the Liberals have piled up in our government! Just give me a chance and I'll show the Liberals what a good garbage collector I'll turn out to be."¹⁹

Magsaysay's supporters endeavored to win votes for their candidate by building him up as a man of courage, energy, integrity, and action in contrast to President Quirino who was pictured as aging, sick, haughty, tired, and ineffective. They pointed out that under President Quirino unemployment had increased, the deficit in the national budget had become larger, and the government had acquired a reputation for graft and corruption. The Nacionalista platform included among its planks statements on balancing the budget, increasing industrialization as a means of reducing unemployment, effecting land reforms so as to improve the tenant situation, improving educational standards, and securing freedom of action in the field of foreign relations. Magsaysay did not spell out in detail how these objectives would be secured. In a campaign to bring about a change in administration, it is wise for opposition candidates not to be too specific. Magsaysay did, however, place special emphasis upon building artesian wells for barrios, on improving the health services of the government, and on building up friendly relations with the United States government. In answering the claims of President Quirino that his administration had brought many economic improvements, Magsaysay accused the administration of favoritism and laxity in collecting taxes and of failure to utilize all the American aid that was available.²⁰

¹⁹ L. O. Ty, "Day of Reckoning," Philippines Free Press, Manila, Nov. 14, 1953, p. 5.

Instead of relying on the regular Nacionalista and Democratic parties to carry on the campaign and making arrangements for safeguarding the vote, a group of active Magsaysay volunteers set up their own organization which included the Magsaysay-for-President Movement (MPM), the Women's Magsaysay-for-President Movement (WMPM), and the Student Magsaysay-for-President Movement. The leaders of these organizations were recruited from the Veterans organizations, the Jaycees, the Rotary clubs, the Lions, the League of Women Voters, the National Students' Movement for Democracy, and other special groups. The Coordinator of MPM said that the idea for the organization came from the Eisenhower-Nixon clubs which functioned so well in the American presidential election of 1952. Out of some 18,000 barrios in the Philippines, MPM clubs were established in 15,600. Club members checked registration lists, canvassed the voters, supplied information for exclusion proceedings held to revise the lists of voters, educated the voters, arranged for political meetings, organized watchers, couriers, and reserves for safeguarding the casting and counting of the ballots, organized their own system of communications for reporting on the returns, and took other measures to combat fraud and terrorism during the elections.²¹ MPM carried on all of these operations using only candidates' watchers credentials. Before this election, candidates had supposed that they had to have the naming of election inspectors to protect their vote. MPM showed that an election could be watched without naming the election inspectors.

Both parties tried to attract and to avoid offending voters who might be influenced by religious considerations. Over four-fifths of the Filipinos are Roman Catholics, but the Constitution provides for separation of church and state. During the campaign certain religious questions were brought in indirectly. Some members of the Church hierarchy signed a pastoral letter which deplored attempts to use fraud and terrorism to win votes. This letter pointed mainly to the Liberal party. The Quirino administration was also under fire on account of a position taken by Catholic clergy on the question of religious instruction in the public schools.

IV

The Nacionalista candidate, Ramon Magsaysay, won a resounding victory, receiving over two-thirds of the total vote cast. In Manila he won four-fifths of the votes and in the other cities over seven-tenths. Such an overwhelming vote meant that all elements of the population supported him. He received strong backing from the Catholics, from other religious elements, from the city dwell-

²⁰ Summaries of his speeches are to be found in Philippines Free Press, Manila Times, Daily Mirror, Daily Record, Evening News, Manila Chronicle, Manila Daily Bulletin, and Philippines Herald.

²¹ Mimeographed publications of the organizations and articles in Philippines Free Press.

ers, from the farmers, from the literate and semi-literate, from those living in nipa huts, and from those living in the most expensive houses.²²

Magsaysay carried 25 of the 28 cities and 48 of the 52 provinces.²³ He received his highest percentage in his home province of Zambales. He also ran extremely well in the adjoining provinces of Bataan and Pampanga. These high votes reflect the influence of local loyalties in Philippine politics. Traditional party influences were shown in the overwhelming vote which he received in the Nacionalista strongholds of Batangas, Laguna, Quezon, and Marinduque, which were carried overwhelmingly by Laurel in 1949.

The four provinces which Magsaysay lost were President Quirino's home province of Ilocos Sur and the three adjoining provinces in northern Luzon. In these provinces Magsaysay ran ahead of the Nacionalista percentage obtained in 1949, except in La Union where the difference was slight. The loyalty of the Ilocos region to President Quirino is another illustration of the favorite son influence in Philippine politics. It was striking that Magsaysay carried the other provinces that were once part of the Liberal stronghold in the north.

A comparison of the provincial percentages obtained by the Nacionalista candidates in 1949 and 1953 shows that on the average Magsaysay received 20 per cent more of the total votes recorded than did Laurel. The Nacionalista party made its greatest gains in those provinces where there had been charges of election corruption in 1949, in those where there were concentrations of Mohammedans, in Magsaysay's home provinces, and in the most populous provinces of the Visayas.

The greatest absolute gain was made in the province of Negros Occidental in the Visayas, where Magsaysay won over 70 per cent of the vote as compared with less than 10 per cent received by Laurel in 1949. Serious charges of election manipulation were made in this province following the 1949 elections. It was alleged that the registration lists in 1949 had been padded by nearly 100,000 names.²⁴ This province is the principal sugar-producing area of the Philippines and on election day the trucks of some of the larger sugar plantations were seen transporting persons who were attempting to be "flying voters." Vigilance on the part of the Magsaysay workers, the National Movement for Free Elections (NAMFREL), the Philippine Constabulary, the Commission on Elections, and the local officials prevented the repetition of the 1949 tactics of the Liberals.²⁵

A striking feature of the election was the large increase in the Nacionalista vote in the Mindanao provinces containing large numbers of Mohammedans, who in the Philippines are called Moros. In Cotabato and Lanao, which had ²² A scatter diagram of the percentage of the total vote for Magsaysay and the percentage of families living in dwellings of light materials shows a slight negative relationship between these two variables, but the high Magsaysay provinces spread over the whole range. In other words, Magsaysay got a high vote in both prosperous and poor provinces.

²³ See map.

²⁴ Philippines Free Press, Manila, Vol. 44, pp. 1-3 (Oct. 24, 1953).

²⁵ Gosnell, "Filipinos Hold Free Election" (cited in note 3).

the largest proportion of Moros, and in the two Misamis provinces there was an increase of over 30 per cent in the Nacionalista vote. There were serious charges of election frauds in Lanao in 1949, and it was claimed that fake voters and false returns swelled the Liberal vote. The number of voters in Lanao was twice the number of literate adults given later by the census. In 1953 Magsaysay's popularity and splits in the local Liberal ranks reduced the Liberal vote while precautions taken by the Nacionalista candidates, non-partisan organizations, and the Commission on Elections prevented extensive frauds. The Commission on Elections attorneys, with representatives of both parties, canvassed the Moro areas in order to forestall efforts to pad the registration lists. Special measures to safeguard the ballot were also taken by the Commission immediately preceding and during the election itself. Magsaysay's speeches in Mindanao were well received and he seemed to attract the Moros as well as other elements of the population.

Magsaysay won the election because he inspired faith in his ability to establish a government for the people. His success story helped the Filipinos build up faith in themselves. Here was one of them, of Malayan stock, who had gained worldwide fame in a short time by reason of his courage, his integrity, his altruism, and his appeal as a fighting leader of the people who was willing to face threats to democracy coming either from the extreme Right or the extreme Left. He met the danger of the Huks by action on some of the grievances of the downtrodden peasants.

The Filipinos have demonstrated that in an oriental country confidence in democratic institutions can be established in spite of the many influences pushing toward a dictatorial system either of the Right or the Left. Both fascist and communist trends have been reversed and a change in power has been brought about by the methods of persuasion, fair election administration, and free organization of citizens.

While caution should be used in interpreting the elections, it is quite clear that they mark a significant achievement in the progress of democratic government in the Far East. The elections demonstrated that given the right kind of leadership, Far Eastern peoples can be stirred to faith in the ideal—fundamental to democratic government—of government as the instrument of the people. They also showed that volunteers can be organized in these countries to safeguard the election process against fraud and terror. The formidable obstacles to the effective operation of democratic processes in the Far East can be overcome.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE.....	1140
Basic Materials for the Study of State Constitutions and State Constitutional Development. J. ALTON BURDINE.....	1140
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	1153
Woodbury (ed.) , The Future of Cities and Urban Redevelopment; Urban Redevelopment: Problems and Practices. JOHN C. BOLLENS	1153
Mosher , Program Budgeting: Theory and Practice with Particular Reference to the United States Department of the Army. HARVEY C. MANSFIELD.....	1155
Dragnich , Tito's Promised Land. LOUIS NEMZER.....	1157
Moore , Terror and Progress USSR: Some Sources of Change and Stability in the Soviet Dictatorship. JULIAN TOWSTER.....	1159
Haines , The Threat of Soviet Imperialism. ALFRED G. MEYER.....	1160
Hammer , The Struggle for Indochina. WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD.....	1162
Friedrich (ed.) , Totalitarianism: Proceedings of a Conference Held at the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, March 1953. JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR.....	1164
Cahn (ed.) , Supreme Court and Supreme Law. ROBERT J. HARRIS...	1165
LaFollette and LaFollette , Robert M. LaFollette: June 14, 1855-June 18, 1925. WALLACE S. SAYRE.....	1167
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	1169
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	1169
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	1180
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	1192
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH AND METHODOLOGY.....	1204

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE

BASIC MATERIALS FOR THE STUDY OF STATE CONSTITUTIONS AND STATE CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT*

The application of democratic theory to the practice of government in the United States is seen most clearly in state constitutional development. In his survey of American political institutions and practices near the close of the last century, Lord Bryce observed that a better understanding of the changes in the American democracy can be gained from "a study of the State governments than of the Federal Constitution."¹ He referred to the state constitutions and amendments thereto since 1776 as "a mine of instruction for the natural history of democratic communities."² In his well-known textbook on state government, Professor Holcombe described the constitutional history of the three branches of the state governments—legislative, executive and judicial—as "a history of the progress of democracy."³

The first state constitutions were framed during the early years of the Revolutionary period. In these documents, and especially in those that contained separate bills of rights, was stated the political theory of the American Revolution. Although this theory was libertarian in emphasis and outlook, its chief characteristic perhaps, as Clinton Rossiter has shown in his excellent study of the origin of the American tradition of political liberty, was "its deep-seated conservatism,"⁴ its traditionalism and respect for the past. The relatively free society that had developed during the colonial period made unnecessary any great social upheaval like that occasioned by the French Revolution of 1789.⁵ It is true that in some states, Pennsylvania for example, the Revolution with its attendant constitution-making precipitated a bitter struggle between radicals and conservatives;⁶ but, for the most part, the distance between the two groups was, as Rossiter points out, "the distance between men who stood at opposite edges of a broad, unbroken plateau."⁷

The leaders of the Revolution and the framers of the first state constitutions sought to consolidate gains already won rather than to create a new social

* I am indebted to my research assistant, Mr. William M. Griffin, for the detailed checking of library materials cited in this article.

¹ James Bryce, The American Commonwealth, 2 vols., 2nd ed. (London and New York, 1891), Vol. 1, p. 399.

² Ibid., p. 434.

³ Arthur N. Holcombe, State Government in the United States, 3rd ed. (New York, 1931), p. 450.

⁴ Clinton Rossiter, Seedtime of the Republic (New York, 1953), p. 448. See also the Introduction by Carl J. Friedrich and Robert G. McCloskey, eds., From the Declaration of Independence to the Constitution (New York, 1954).

⁵ Louis Hartz, "American Political Thought and the American Revolution," this Review, Vol. 46, pp. 321-43 (June, 1952).

⁶ These struggles are described in Allan Nevins, The American States during and after the Revolution (New York, 1924).

⁷ Seedtime of the Republic, p. 428.

order. For this reason, the written fundamental laws of the several states, with the possible exception of Pennsylvania, did not establish governments that differed markedly from the actual governmental arrangements that existed in the respective colonies near the end of the colonial period; and Connecticut and Rhode Island, with slight modification, retained their "self-governing" charters as the basis of their state governments. Moreover, in spite of the lofty democratic ideas of the equality of man and the consent of the governed that were expressed in the first state constitutions, the right to vote and to hold office was limited generally to men of property.

These constitutions, formulated in haste and under the stress of war, were characterized generally by legislative supremacy, a property-qualified suffrage, a weak executive, dependence of the executive and the judiciary upon the legislature, and the lack of a clear distinction between fundamental and statutory law. Defects in the operation of many of these constitutions led to early movements for their revision. It is in this process of constitutional revision and in the framing of constitutions by new states that from time to time were admitted to the union that basic materials for the study of state constitutional development are to be found.

When the voters of Massachusetts were given the opportunity in 1779 to elect a special body to draft a new state constitution and to accept or reject the document recommended, a democratic procedure was originated which afterwards became customary in the revision or initial framing of state constitutions. Since that time almost two hundred constitutional conventions have met in the American states,⁸ and in the work and records of these bodies is to be found much of the constitutional history of the American democracy.

All but ten of the forty-eight states operate now under constitutions made prior to 1900. The nineteenth century, in fact, was the great century of state constitution making and revision. It was also a century that witnessed, in the political struggles in the constitutional conventions of that period, a gradual democratization of governmental forms and procedures. Among the most significant developments were broadening of the suffrage, strengthening of the principles of separation of powers and checks and balances through the extension of popular election to the executive and judicial branches of the state governments and the growth of judicial review of legislation, a rather rapid increase in the number of constitutional limitations on the legislature, projection of the state into several fields of social welfare, increasing governmental action in relation to economic activities, especially corporate enterprise, and the extension of popular participation in the revision and amendment of state constitutions. Near the close of the century, a movement to incorporate in constitutions the direct democratic processes of the initiative, statutory referendum, and recall began to gather momentum in many states.

⁸ The Book of the States, 1941-1942 (The Council of State Governments, Chicago, 1941), p. 45, and table of constitutional conventions, by states, pp. 48-55. Less than one-third of the states have had only one convention; see The Book of the States, 1954-1955 (Chicago, 1954), pp. 68-73.

Basic materials relating to these developments consist of the state constitutions with their amendments and the debates and proceedings of constitutional conventions. In addition, statutes and legislative committee reports, judicial decisions, newspaper files, pamphlets, official speeches, messages and reports, and personal information concerning the participants should be perused if the nature and significance of specific developments in any state are to be evaluated properly.⁹ The mere listing of these sources indicates their scattered and voluminous character as well as their inaccessibility, in many instances, except in the state where the events occurred. This bibliographic survey is concerned primarily with the basic materials, which may be available, at least in part, in the larger university libraries.¹⁰

I. THE STATE CONSTITUTIONS

A state constitution, framed or revised by an elected constitutional convention, inevitably reflects the environment which exists at the time the convention meets. The political history of the particular state, current political thinking, and experiences of other states are significant factors in shaping this environment. The tendency of constitutional conventions to enshrine the present through long, detailed constitutions has made frequent amendment or revision necessary. The large number of changes resulting creates difficulty for those who attempt to keep abreast of these developments.

Individual State Constitutions. Each state publishes its constitution in booklet form from time to time, but the intervals of publication are not regular.¹¹ In addition, the revised or consolidated statutes or code of laws of the state contain the constitution, usually annotated, in effect at the time of publication.¹² More-

⁹ For the skillful use and blending of these materials in tracing a particular development in one state, see Louis Hartz, Economic Policy and Democratic Thought: Pennsylvania, 1776-1860 (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1948).

¹⁰ Some of the published materials mentioned were unavailable for inspection by the author. Information concerning these was obtained from Library of Congress cards.

¹¹ An examination of the publication dates of state constitutions indicates that Arkansas, California, Ohio, and Washington lead other states in the frequency of publication since 1930. The length of many state constitutions makes publication rather expensive. For example, sixteen states have constitutions that contain more than 20,000 words. For this estimate, see table prepared by W. Brooke Graves, in The Book of the States, 1954-1965, pp. 68-73. State constitutions are usually published by the office of the secretary of state. See State Constitutions: A Bibliography (Bureau of the Census, Governments Division, Washington, June, 1944), with Supplement (1947).

¹² Space does not permit a listing of the statutory codes of the states, which may be found, of course, in university law libraries. A useful listing, as of 1948, is "Schedule of Latest Editions of Federal, State and Territorial Statutory Compilations with Supplements . . .," compiled by Minnie Wiener (Federal Works Agency, 1948). A cursory examination of these codes reveals that some twenty-two have been published within the past ten years. In addition, twenty codes have had supplements added since 1950. Leading publishers of state codes are the Michie Co., Charlottesville, Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis, and West Publishing Co., St. Paul. All but four states, it appears, have had annotated constitutions published as part of their codes.

over, some states follow the practice of publishing their constitutions in their legislative manuals.¹³ The most convenient source for checking the official publication of state constitutions is the Monthly Checklist of State Publications (Government Printing Office, Washington) with yearly index, prepared by the Division of Documents of the Library of Congress. It lists all official publications of the states which are received in the Library.¹⁴

*Amendments.*¹⁵ As of August, 1953, almost 3,000 amendments had been added to the state constitutions now in effect.¹⁶ Only the New Jersey Constitution of 1947 has not been amended.¹⁷ The volume and frequency of amendments within a majority of the forty-eight states often outmode the published constitutions soon after their publication and make the task of determining current content a major problem.

There are several sources for checking constitutional amendments in the states. Session laws, published in most states after each legislative session, usually contain the resolutions proposing amendments. The Monthly Checklist of State Publications, mentioned previously, lists the official publication of amendments in the few states that follow this practice. In addition, the magazine, State Government, published monthly by the Council of State Governments (Chicago), in its section, "Among the States," and the National Municipal Review, monthly publication of the National Municipal League (New York), in its section, "News in Review," often contain brief notices of significant changes in state constitutions. From 1941 on, the biennial editions of The Book of the States, also published by the Council of State Governments, contain summaries of state constitutional developments in a separate section and a useful table, in the most recent editions, giving information on the length, number of amendments adopted, and amendment procedures of state constitutions.¹⁸

¹³ In Texas, for example, these manuals are published biennially to correspond with the regular legislative sessions.

¹⁴ For other sources concerned with state publications, see Everett S. Brown, Manual of Government Publications (Appleton-Century-Crofts, New York, 1950), pp. 45-58.

¹⁵ Constitutional provisions for amending each of the forty-eight state constitutions are reproduced in Christian L. Larsen and Conrad Cowan, South Carolina State Constitution Amendment Procedures (Bureau of Public Administration, University of South Carolina, Columbia, 1948), pp. 19-58. See also James Q. Dealey, Growth of American State Constitutions (Ginn and Co., Boston, 1915).

¹⁶ See the table on "State Constitutions and Constitutional Conventions," prepared by W. Brooke Graves, in The Book of the States, 1954-1955, pp. 68-73.

¹⁷ Because of the difficulty of the procedure, no amendments to the Tennessee Constitution of 1870 were adopted until November, 1953. National Municipal Review, Vol. 42, p. 562 (Dec., 1953).

¹⁸ One of the most helpful aids in tracing state constitutional changes was the State Law Index (Government Printing Office, Washington), a biennial publication (12 editions) prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, which was published until 1948. In this publication the proposed, ratified, and rejected amendments to state constitutions were indexed for each biennium. From 1929 to 1937, inclusive, and in 1940 this REVIEW carried an annual article on "State Constitutional Development." Sometimes bureaus of public administration or similar agencies of state universities publish pamphlets summarizing and discussing proposed constitutional amendments in a

Collections and Digests of State Constitutions. Several collections of state constitutions have been published. Ben P. Poore made the first comprehensive collection in The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters and Other Organic Laws of the United States, 2 vols. (Government Printing Office, Washington, 1877). This was followed by the compilation by Francis Newton Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters and Other Organic Laws of the States, Territories and Colonies Now or Heretofore Forming the United States of America, 7 vols. (Government Printing Office, Washington, 1909). Each of these compilations contains the texts of all state constitutions adopted prior to its publication. The text of all state constitutions as of 1917 may be found in The State Constitutions and the Federal Constitution and Organic Laws of the Territories and Other Colonial Dependencies of the United States of America, ed. Charles Kettleborough (B. F. Bowen Co., Indianapolis, 1918) and, as of January 1, 1938, in Constitutions of the States and the United States, Vol. 3 of the reports of the New York State Constitutional Convention Committee (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, 1938). The most comprehensive comparative digest of state constitutional provisions that has been published is Index Digest of State Constitutions (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, 1915), which was prepared for the New York State Constitutional Convention Commission of 1915.¹⁹ Recent comparisons of state constitutions are made briefly in Christian L. Larsen and G. G. Williamson, A Comparative Analysis of the Constitution of South Carolina (Bureau of Public Administration, University of South Carolina, Columbia, 1947) and more extensively in Manual on State Constitutional Provisions (Legislative Reference Bureau, University of Hawaii, 1950).²⁰ Studies prepared for the use of constitutional conventions, which are mentioned later, often contain valuable comparative data on specific constitutional topics.

II. THE WORK OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

The constitutional convention is the most significant original contribution of the states to the practice of government. It has played such a significant role in the history of the state governments that the literature concerning the nature and work of constitutional conventions is rather extensive.

state. An example is Florida's Proposed Constitutional Amendments—1954 by William F. Larsen (Civic Information Series, No. 19, Public Administration Clearing House, University of Florida, Gainesville, 1954). A detailed analysis of state proposals, both constitutional and statutory, voted on in 1946 may be found in State Proposals Voted upon in 1946, by Richard C. Spencer and Anna A. Meck (Bureau of the Census, Governments Division, Washington, May, 1947).

¹⁹ In 1912, the Legislative Reference Department of the Ohio State Library published a Digest of State Constitutions (F. J. Heer Co., Columbus, 1912), edited by J. H. Newman, for the use of the Ohio Constitutional Convention of that year. Because of the arrangement of materials and its brevity, this digest is not as useful as the one mentioned in the text.

²⁰ One earlier comparative study is James Q. Dealey, Our State Constitutions, Supplement to the Annals (American Academy of Political and Social Science, Philadelphia, 1907).

Bibliographic Aids and General Works. Bibliographic aids to the study of constitutional conventions may be found in "State Constitutions and Constitutional Conventions," by Paul B. DeWitt, in Manual on the Use of State Publications, ed. Jerome K. Wilcox (American Library Association, Chicago, 1940) pp. 117-21; W. Brooke Graves, Norman J. Small, and E. Foster Dowell, American State Government and Administration: A State by State Bibliography (Council of State Governments, Chicago, 1949); Official Publications Relating to American State Constitutional Conventions, comp. A. F. Kuhlman (H. W. Wilson Co., New York, 1936); and General Constitutional Revision in the States; A Selected List of References Covering the Period 1937-1947, comp. Ione E. Dority (University of Michigan, Bureau of Government, Ann Arbor, 1948).

Two standard treatises on constitutional conventions are John A. Jameson, The Constitutional Convention: Its History and Modes of Proceeding (Charles Scribner & Co., New York, 1867) and Roger S. Hoar, Constitutional Conventions: Their Nature, Powers and Limitations (Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1919). A good summary treatment of the constitutional convention is given in Raymond Uhl, R. H. Stoudemire, and G. R. Sherrill, Constitutional Conventions: Organization, Powers, Functions and Procedures (Convention Bulletin No. 1, Bureau of Public Administration, University of South Carolina, Columbia, 1951).²¹

Records of Constitutional Conventions. The most valuable guide to the publications of state constitutional conventions is A List of Official Publications of American State Constitutional Conventions, 1776-1916, ed. Shearer (2 Bulletins, Newberry Library, Chicago, 1917). The principal records of conventions are (1) the journals, (2) the debates, and (3) manuals or studies prepared for the use of conventions by convention committees or other agencies.

With few exceptions, the proceedings of every constitutional convention have been reported in a published journal.²² Taken alone, these journals offer little help in understanding the social, economic, and political forces that shaped constitutional changes at the time. When used in conjunction with the debates, however, they are a meaningful and necessary guide to the work of the conventions.

Unfortunately the debates in many state constitutional conventions were not recorded and published. In some seventy-four instances, however, the convention debates have been published in full or in part. These significant records are now available for one or more constitutional conventions held in each decade since 1810. In these records one may find the development of ideas and the clash of interests that led to the "progress of democracy" in state constitutional development. A list of the published debates of state constitutional conventions is attached as an appendix.

²¹ See also Walter F. Dodd, The Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions (Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, 1910). The several methods of constitutional revision are described in John P. Keith, Methods of Constitutional Revision (Bureau of Municipal Research, University of Texas, Austin, 1949). Appendices B through E list recent joint legislative constitutional committees, unofficial constitutional committees, constitutional commissions, and constitutional conventions in the states. There is a tendency toward greater use of the constitutional commission in the initial phase of constitutional revision. The development of the American procedure for framing constitutions is traced by W. F. Dodd, "The First State Constitutional Conventions, 1776-1783," this REVIEW, Vol. 2, pp. 545-61 (Nov., 1908).

²² The journals record the motions, votes, resolutions, reports of committees, and other actions of the convention. Many of them also give brief biographical sketches of the delegates. In a few instances the journal also includes the debates.

A constitutional convention, by its very nature as an elective ad hoc body, faces tremendous problems in arriving at fundamental decisions which it must make usually within a relatively short period of time. One of the greatest problems is the availability of the necessary information upon the basis of which the delegates may make intelligent decisions. To meet this problem, preparatory work has been done in numerous instances either by convention committees or by outside agencies prior to the convening of the convention.²³ Manuals of varying content, digests or comparisons of state constitutions, or a series of studies of current problems may result from such preliminary work. Among the most significant recent efforts in this regard are the studies made for constitutional conventions in New York (1938),²⁴ Missouri (1943-1944)²⁵ and New Jersey (1947)²⁶ and by the Louisiana State Law Institute, pursuant to a legislative act of 1946, for "any future constitutional convention" that might be called in that state.²⁷

Studies of Particular Conventions. In view of the large number of constitutional conventions that have been held, it is surprising to find that very few studies have been made of the work of particular conventions. Among the more significant studies are Vernon A. O'Rourke and Douglas W. Campbell, Constitution-Making in a Democracy (Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, 1943), which describes the work of the New York Convention of 1938; John E. Bebout, The Making of the New Jersey Constitution (MacCrellich & Quigley, Trenton, 1945); Seth S. McKay, Making the Texas Constitution of 1876 (University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia, 1924); and Carl Brent Swisher, Motivation and Political Technique in the California Constitutional Convention, 1878-79 (Pomona College, Claremont, 1930). Briefer studies of the work of conventions are Oliver ²³ Several states have used an appointive commission to study and recommend changes in the state constitution and to report to the governor or the legislature or an elected convention. See, for example, Report of the Commission on Constitutional Amendment and Revision (Harrisburg, 1920), a report made to the Pennsylvania General Assembly.

²⁴ Report of the New York State Constitutional Convention Committee, 12 vols. (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, 1938).

²⁵ A series of eight Manuals (Columbia, 1943) prepared for the Missouri Constitutional Convention of 1943.

²⁶ A series of mimeographed "monographs" (Trenton, 1947) prepared by individual authors under the general coordination of the Governor's Committee on Preparatory Research for the New Jersey Constitutional Convention of 1947.

²⁷ Constitutional Problems, prepared by the Central Research Staff, Constitution Revision Project, Louisiana Law Institute (1947-1948). This is a series of mimeographed bulletins (sixty-three numbers, some with separate parts) covering the major problems which a convention would face in Louisiana. The Oklahoma Legislative Council prepared a series of constitutional studies (21 bulletins) in 1948.

M. Dickerson, The Illinois Convention of 1862 (University of Illinois Press, Urbana, 1905); James W. Harry, The Maryland Constitution of 1851 (Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, 1902); and William Starr Myers, The Maryland Constitution of 1864 (Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore, 1901).

III. STATE CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Although brief treatments of constitutional development in individual states usually are found in books on the history or government of the respective states, detailed constitutional histories of particular states are few in number. In this latter category may be mentioned Albert B. Saye, A Constitutional History of Georgia, 1732-1945 (University of Georgia Press, Athens, 1948); Ethel K. Ware, A Constitutional History of Georgia (Columbia University Press, New York, 1947); William Anderson and Albert J. Lobb, A History of the Constitution of Minnesota (University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, 1921); and Benjamin F. Shambaugh, The Constitutions of Iowa (State Historical Society, Iowa City, 1934).

A brief historical study of the changing content of state constitutions generally is Sister M. Barbara McCarthy, The Widening Scope of American Constitutions (Catholic University of America, Washington, 1928). The constitutional history of a group of states is surveyed in Fletcher M. Green, Constitutional Development in the South Atlantic States, 1776-1860 (University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, 1930), a study of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and in John D. Hicks, The Constitutions of the Northwest States (University of Nebraska Studies, Lincoln, 1924), which deals with Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, and the Dakotas.

J. ALTON BURDINE.

The University of Texas.

APPENDIX*

THE PUBLISHED DEBATES OF STATE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

ALABAMA

1901. Official Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Alabama, May 21st, 1901, to September 3rd, 1901, 4 vols. (Wetumpka Printing Co., Wetumpka, 1941).

ARKANSAS

1868. Debates and Proceedings of the Convention which Assembled at Little Rock, January 7th, 1868, to form a Constitution for the State of Arkansas (J. G. Price, Printer, Little Rock, 1868).

CALIFORNIA

1849. Report of the Debates in the Convention of California, on the Formation of the State Constitution, in September and October, 1849 (J. T. Towers, Printer, Washington, 1850).

* It is believed that this convenient listing of the published debates, by states and dates, will serve as a guide to those who may be interested in the informative and voluminous records of state constitutional conventions. These debates are available for thirty-nine states and for one or more constitutional conventions in each decade since 1810.

- 1878-1879. Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of California, Convened at the City of Sacramento, Saturday, September 28, 1878, 3 vols. (J. D. Young, State Printer, Sacramento, 1880).

DELAWARE

1831. Debates of the Delaware Convention, for Revising the Constitution of the State or Adopting a New One; Held at Dover, November, 1831 (Samuel Harker, Printer, Wilmington, 1831).

GEORGIA

1877. A Stenographic Report of the Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention held in Atlanta, Georgia, 1877 (Constitution Publishing Co., Atlanta, 1877).
 1943-1944. Records of the Commission of 1943-1944 to Revise the Constitution of Georgia, ed. Albert B. Saye, 2 vols. (Published by authority of the State, Atlanta, 1946). This was a constitutional commission, not a convention.

IDAHO

1889. Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of Idaho, 1889, edited and annotated by I. W. Hart, 2 vols. (Caxton Printers, Ltd., Caldwell, 1912).

ILLINOIS

1847. The Constitutional Debates of 1847, edited with introduction and notes by Arthur Charles Cole (The Trustees of Illinois State Historical Library, Springfield, 1919).
 1869-1870. Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Illinois, Convened at the City of Springfield, Tuesday, December 13, 1869, 2 vols. (E. L. Merritt and Brother, Printer, Springfield, 1870).
 1920-1922. Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of Illinois convened January 6, 1920, 5 vols. (Illinois State Journal Co., Springfield, 1920-22).

INDIANA

- 1850-1851. Report of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention for the Revision of the Constitution of the State of Indiana, 1850, 2 vols. (A. H. Brown, Printer, Indianapolis, 1850?).

IOWA

1844. Fragments of the Debates of the Iowa Constitutional Conventions of 1844 and 1846, edited and compiled with explanations by Benjamin F. Shambaugh, pp. 1-217 (State Historical Society of Iowa, Iowa City, 1900).
 1846. Fragments of the Debates of the Iowa Constitutional Conventions of 1844 and 1846, edited and compiled with explanations by Benjamin F. Shambaugh, pp. 217-333 (State Historical Society of Iowa, Iowa City, 1900).
 1857. The Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Iowa, Assembled at Iowa City, Monday, January 19, 1857, 2 vols. (Luse, Lane and Co., Davenport, 1857).

KANSAS

1859. Proceedings and Debates, Printed by order of the Convention from the columns of the Commercial Gazette (S. D. Macdonald, Printer, Wyandot, 1859).

KENTUCKY

- 1849-1850. Report of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention for the Revision of the Constitution of the State of Kentucky, 1849 (A. G. Hodges and Co., Frankfort, 1849?).

- 1890-1891. Official Report of the Proceedings and Debates in the Convention Assembled at Frankfort, on the 8th day of September, 1890, to Adopt, Amend or Change the Constitution of the State of Kentucky, 4 vols. (E. P. Johnson, Printer, Frankfort, 1890?).

LOUISIANA

- 1844-1845. Proceedings and Debates of the Convention of Louisiana, Which Assembled at the City of New Orleans, January 14, 1844 (Besancon, Ferguson and Co., New Orleans, 1845).
1864. Debates in the Convention for the Revision and Amendment of the Constitution of the State of Louisiana, Assembled at Liberty Hall, New Orleans, April 6, 1864 (W. R. Fish, Printer, New Orleans, 1864).

MAINE

- 1819-1820. Debates and Journal of the Constitutional Convention of Maine, 1819-'20 (Farmers' Almanac Press, Augusta, 1894).

MARYLAND

- 1850-1851. Proceedings of the Maryland Reform Convention to Revise the State Constitution, 2 vols. (William M'Neir, Printer, Annapolis, 1851).
1864. The Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Maryland Assembled at the City of Annapolis, Wednesday, April 27, 1864, 3 vols. (Richard P. Bayly, Printer, Annapolis, 1864).
1867. Debates of the Maryland Constitutional Convention of 1867 (as reprinted from articles reported in the Baltimore Sun), comp. Philip B. Perlman (Hepbron and Haydon, Baltimore, 1923).

MASSACHUSETTS

1820. Journal of Debates and Proceedings in the Convention of Delegates to Revise the Constitution of Massachusetts, Begun and Holden at Boston, November 15, 1820, and Continued by Adjournment to January 9, 1821, New Edition, Revised and Corrected (Daily Advertiser, Publisher, Boston, 1853).
1853. Official Report of the Debates and Proceedings in the State Convention, Assembled May 4th, 1853, to Revise and Amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 3 vols. (White and Potter, Printers, Boston, 1853).
- 1917-1919. Debates in the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, 1917-1919, 4 vols. (Wright and Potter Printing Co., Boston, 1918?).

MICHIGAN

- 1835-1836. The Michigan Constitutional Convention of 1835-1836; Debates and Proceedings, ed. Harold M. Dorr (The University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, 1940).
1850. Report of the Proceedings and Debates in the Convention to Revise the Constitution of the State of Michigan 1850 (R. W. Ingals, Printer, Lansing, 1850).
1867. The Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Michigan, Convened at the City of Lansing, Wednesday, May 15, 1867, 2 vols. (John A. Kerr Co., Lansing, 1867).
- 1907-1908. Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Michigan, Convened in the City of Lansing, Tuesday, October 22, 1907, 2 vols. (Wynkoop, Hallenbeck Crawford Co., Lansing, 1907?).

MINNESOTA

1857. Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention for the Territory of Minnesota to form a Constitution Preparatory to its Admission into the Union as a State (G. W. Moore, Printer, Saint Paul, 1858).

MISSISSIPPI

1865. Journal of the Proceedings and Debates in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Mississippi, August, 1865 (E. M. Yeager, Printer, Jackson, 1865).

MISSOURI

1875. Debates in the Missouri Constitutional Convention of 1875, eds. Isidor Loeb and Floyd C. Shoemaker, 12 vols. (The State Historical Society of Missouri, Columbia, 1933-1934).

MONTANA

1889. Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention Held in the City of Helena, Montana, July 4th, 1889 [to] August 17, 1889 (State Publishing Co., Helena, 1921).

NEBRASKA

1871. Official Report of the Debates and Proceedings in the Nebraska Constitutional Convention Assembled in Lincoln, June 13, 1871, revised, edited and indexed by Addison E. Sheldon, 3 vols. (Nebraska State Historical Society, York, 1906-1913).
- 1919-1920. Journal of the Nebraska Constitutional Convention Convened in Lincoln, December 2, 1919, 2 vols. (The Kline Publishing Co., Lincoln, 1920).

NEVADA

1864. Official Reports of the Debates and Proceedings in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Nevada, Assembled at Carson City, July 4, 1864, to form a Constitution and State Government (Frank Eastman, Printer, San Francisco, 1866).

NEW HAMPSHIRE

1876. Journal of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New Hampshire, December, 1876 (E. A. Jenks, Printer, Concord, 1877).
1889. Journal of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New Hampshire (John B. Clark, Printer, Manchester, 1889).
1902. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, December, 1902 (The Rumford Press, Concord, 1903).
1912. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, June, 1912 (John B. Clark Co., Manchester, 1912).
1918. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, June, 1918 (John B. Clark Co., Manchester, 1918).
- 1920-1921. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, June 5, 1918, January 3, 1920, January 28, 1921 (John B. Clark Co., Manchester, 1921).
1930. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, June, 1930 (Granite State Press, Manchester, 1930).
1938. State of New Hampshire Convention to Revise the Constitution, May, 1938 (Granite State Press, Manchester, 1938).

NEW JERSEY

1844. Proceedings of the New Jersey State Constitutional Convention of 1844, compiled and edited by New Jersey Writers' Project, and sponsored by New Jersey State House Commission, 1942.
1947. State of New Jersey Constitutional Convention of 1947, Held at Rutgers University, the State University of New Jersey, ed. Sidney Goldman and Herman Crystal, 2 vols. (Trenton, 1949-1951).

NEW YORK

1821. Reports of the Proceedings and Debates of the Convention of 1821, Assembled for the purpose of amending the Constitution of the State of New York; Containing all of the Official Documents relating to the Subject, and other Valuable Material (E. and E. Hosford, Printers, Albany, 1821).
1846. Report of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention for the Revision of the Constitution of the State of New York (The Office of the Evening Atlas, Albany, 1846).
- 1867-1868. Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York, held in 1867 and 1868, in the City of Albany, 5 vols. (Weed, Parsons and Co., Albany, 1868).
1894. Revised Records of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York, May 8, 1894, to September 29, 1894, 5 vols. (The Argus Company, Albany, 1900).
1915. Revised Record of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York, April Sixth to September Tenth, 1915, 4 vols. (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, 1916).
1938. Revised Record of the Constitutional Convention of the State of New York, April Fifth to August Twenty-Sixth, 1938, 4 vols. (J. B. Lyon Co., Albany, 1938).

NORTH CAROLINA

1835. Proceedings and Debates of the Convention of North Carolina, Called to Amend the Constitution of the State, Which Assembled at Raleigh, June 4, 1835 (Gales and Son, Printers, Raleigh, 1835).

NORTH DAKOTA

1889. Official Report of the Proceedings and Debates of the First Constitutional Convention of North Dakota, Assembled in the City of Bismarck, July 4th to August 17th, 1889 (Tribune, State Printers, Bismarck, 1889).

OHIO

- 1850-1851. Report of the Debates and Proceedings of the Convention for the Revision of the Constitution of the State of Ohio, 1850-51, 2 vols. (S. Medary, Printer, Columbus, 1851).
- 1873-1874. Official Report of the Proceedings and Debates of the Third Constitutional Convention of Ohio, Assembled in the City of Columbus, on Tuesday, May 13, 1873, 2 vols. (W. S. Robinson Co., Cleveland, 1874).
1912. Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Ohio; Convened January 9, 1912; Adjourned June 7, 1912; Reconvened and Adjourned without Day, August 26, 1912, 2 vols. (F. J. Heer Printing Co., Columbus, 1912).

OREGON

1857. The Oregon Constitution and Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1857, ed. Charles Henry Cary (State Printing Department, Salem, 1926).

PENNSYLVANIA

- 1837-1838. Proceedings and Debates of the Convention of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to propose Amendments to the Constitution, Commenced at Harrisburg, on the Second day of May 1837, 14 vols. (Packer, Barrett and Parke, Harrisburg, 1837-1839).
- 1872-1873. Debates of the Convention to Amend the Constitution of Pennsylvania: Convened at Harrisburg, November 12, 1872; Adjourned, November 27, to Meet at Philadelphia January 7, 1873, 9 vols. (B. Singerly, Printer, Harrisburg, 1873).

RHODE ISLAND

1951. Proceedings of the Limited Constitutional Convention of the State of Rhode Island, Held on the 1st, 2nd and 3rd days of June, A.D. 1951 (Secretary of State Publication, Providence, 1951).

SOUTH CAROLINA

1868. Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of South Carolina, Held at Charleston, S.C., Beginning January 14th and Ending March 17th, 1868, 2 vols. (Denny and Perry, Charleston, 1868).

SOUTH DAKOTA

1885. Dakota Constitutional Convention, ed. Doane Robinson, Vol. I (Huronite Printing Co., Huron, 1907).
 1889. Dakota Constitutional Convention, ed. Doane Robinson, Vol. II (Huronite Printing Co., Huron, 1907).

TEXAS

1875. Debates in the Texas Constitutional Convention of 1875, edited and compiled, largely from newspaper reports, by Seth S. McKay (University of Texas Press, Austin, 1930).

UTAH

1895. Official Report of the Proceedings and Debates of the Convention Assembled at Salt Lake City on the Fourth Day of March, 1895, to Adopt a Constitution for the State of Utah, 2 vols. (Star Printing Co., Salt Lake City, 1898).

VIRGINIA

- 1829-1830. Proceedings and Debates of the Virginia State Convention of 1829-30 (Samuel Shepard and Co., Richmond, 1830).
 1867-1868. The Debates and Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Virginia, Assembled at the City of Richmond, Tuesday December 3, 1867, 2 vols. (New Nation, Printer, Richmond, 1868).
 1901-1902. Report of the Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention, State of Virginia, Held in the City of Richmond, June 12, 1901 to June 26, 1902, 2 vols. (The Hermitage Press, Richmond, 1906).

WEST VIRGINIA

- 1861-1863. Debates and Proceedings of the First Constitutional Convention of West Virginia (1861-1863), eds. Charles H. Ambler, Frances Haney, and William B. Matthews, 3 vols. (Gentry Brothers, Printers, Huntington, 1939).

WISCONSIN

- 1847-1848. Journal of the Convention to form a Constitution for the State of Wisconsin, with a Sketch of the Debates, Begun and Held at Madison, on the Fifteenth Day of December Eighteen Hundred and Forty-Seven (Smith and Holt, Printers, Madison, 1848).

WYOMING

1889. Journal and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Wyoming. Begun at the City of Cheyenne on September 2, 1889, and Concluded September 30, 1889 (The Daily Sun Printing Co., Cheyenne, 1893).

BOOK REVIEWS

The Future of Cities and Urban Redevelopment. EDITED BY COLEMAN WOODBURY. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xix, 764. $9.00.)

Urban Redevelopment: Problems and Practices. EDITED BY COLEMAN WOODBURY. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 525. $7.50.)

Unquestionably these two volumes are major contributions to the literature on urbanism in the United States. Representing the principal products of the Urban Redevelopment Study financed through a Spelman Fund grant to the Public Administration Clearing House, they consist of penetrating essays and research studies diagnosing and frequently prescribing for some of our most serious urban weaknesses. The subject matter is generally broad and interdisciplinary in nature and is not cast within the confines of a narrow concept of urban redevelopment. It does, however, center largely on situations in local areas and not on national and state governmental policies.

The first of the five parts of The Future of Cities and Urban Redevelopment, the book of more general interest, contains short essays on urban redevelopment goals, design, and strategy, although the last phase is largely subordinated. The essayists are well known in the planning and housing fields—Catherine Bauer, G. Holmes Perkins, Henry S. Churchill, Robert C. Weinberg, Arthur B. Gallion, and Vernon De Mars. Their statements are happy choices for introductory considerations, furnishing perspective, and inquiring into difficult problems of urban living. They stress governmental leadership in redevelopment, variety and contrast in design, amenity in the city pattern, and knowledge of people's needs and desires. The six essays all interrelate through the strong thread of their democratic and humane approach.

"Industrial Location and Urban Redevelopment" is a very detailed statement of industrial location developments by the editor with the assistance of Frank Cliffe. It starts with major relationships between industrial location and urban redevelopment, emphasizing the great significance of industrial location within an urban area in shaping its overall structure and land-use pattern. Discussions of industrial location theory and influential factors in location decisions, regional patterns of industrial distribution, and national security considerations in industrial location follow. Attention then turns to the major facts and trends of actual plant location. The chapters effectively uproot a number of long-standing preconceptions, such as the assumption that most communities benefit from any type of industrial expansion.

Despite the problem nature of the subject, William L. Slayton and Richard Dewey in "Urban Redevelopment and the Urbanite" furnish a highly useful and significant monograph. Needs and desires of urban dwellers for housing, recreation, and social relationships, attitudes of residents, property owners, and interests in and near proposed redevelopment areas toward such projects, and participation of groups in redevelopment receive extended treatment. The authors are adept at interweaving many fugitive materials and argue persuasively for the potentialities of the sample survey in determining attitudes toward redevelopment programs. Victor Jones competently deals with developments, problems, and governmental actions in metropolitan areas in "Local Government Organization in Metropolitan Areas." Concentrating on the evaluation of public devices to lessen metropolitan problems, he examines the resurgence of annexation and the continuing growth of special districts and authorities and warns about some activities of functional specialists. Professor Jones exhibits particular interest in reorganization of the urbanized county as an approach to the metropolitan muddle. Metropolitan area students will find this part of the book a worthy supplement to the author's earlier related work.

Coleman Woodbury concludes with "The Background and Prospects of Urban Redevelopment in the United States." Emphasizing that redevelopment can be successful only as one part of an advance on a much broader front of urban life, he imaginatively and interestingly discusses numerous major urban problems, raising key questions and putting forth acute observations and conclusions. The essay is a most incisive and stimulating statement. Metropolitanism, political problems of social heterogeneity, urban planning, local government finance, organizations for improving local government, and representation and leadership in urban public affairs are considered in turn. Especially meaningful are his comments on the impact of tight group and class lines, the financial plight of cities in a high real income period, and the frequency of low morale and ineffective leadership.

The companion volume, Urban Redevelopment: Problems and Practices, deals with more technical considerations and is directed mainly to professionals and civic leaders in the planning, housing, and redevelopment fields. In "Measuring the Quality of Housing in Planning for Redevelopment," Allan A. Twichell shows the kinds of information that proper blighted area and screening surveys can produce and how best to obtain the desired data once the needs are determined. "Urban Densities and Their Costs," written by William H. Ludlow, analyzes the relations between various population densities and the costs of housing, public services, and urban businesses and industries and appraises density determinations for redevelopment projects. The role of private covenants in urban redevelopment, warnings about their utilization, and a case study of twenty years' experience with them in Radburn, New Jersey, receive careful scrutiny by Charles S. Ascher in "Private Covenants in Urban Redevelopment." William L. Slayton devotes considerable attention in "Urban Redevelopment Short of Clearance" to the experience with police power regulation of housing and the studies of rehabilitating areas.

Based on events in Chicago, "Relocation of Families in Urban Redevelopment" has wide applicability. Jack Meltzer and Sheilah Orloff speak forcefully and accurately, noting that haphazard redevelopment causes many relocation problems. The final part, "Eminent Domain in Acquiring Subdivision and Open Land in Redevelopment Programs," by Ira S. Robbins and Marian Yankauer, takes an unusual but effective means of presentation for the subject at hand. The first portion is shaped as a legal brief, tracing the evolving concept of public use. The second indicates kinds of social and economic data appropriate and available for use in litigation over the validity of governmental action to "insure that such vacant land as is left in our cities will be used for the welfare of all" (p. 496).

These two volumes stand as impressive stock-taking, analysis, and advice on many major phases of urban life and growth. A listing of incidental criticisms would be inconsequential in comparison with the execution of the undertaking and would be like a flea biting at a citadel. The books furnish an agenda for further inquiry and action as well as an excellent informational source on past research and efforts. They reveal again the large-scale significance of many facets of urbanism and represent a magnificent challenge to researchers, public officials, and private leaders on the urban scene. How effectively and comprehensively will the challenge be met?

JOHN C. BOLLENS.

University of California (Los Angeles).

Program Budgeting: Theory and Practice with Particular Reference to the U. S. Department of the Army. BY FREDERICK C. MOSHER. (Chicago: Public Administration Service. 1954. Pp. xiii, 258. $5.00.)

This book is the outgrowth of studies that began with a focus on the military budget as an economic phenomenon, and moved to the processes of military budgeting as a cluster of problems in organization and administration. The result is a sophisticated and illuminating work which continually lifts the reader's attention from factual detail to significant question or generalization—"from technique to statesmanship," to use Paul Appleby's phrase.

For military practitioners it is a suitable textbook, particularly because of its chapters on the study of budgeting, on the setting of military budgeting, and on military comptrollers and the budget. For any civilian student of public administration and budgeting the main interest will lie in three central chapters on plans, programs and budgets, on military performance budgets, and on the budget process, together with the concluding recommendations stemming from these. Here is a first-rate contribution to the literature, at once empirical and theoretical.

Mosher dispels some illusions and confirms some suspicions. One of the former is the notion that a program or "performance" budget is a simpler substitute for the traditional forms of presenting estimates, either by the organization units that spend or by the objects (e.g., materials, personal services) to be bought. It is not a substitute but a new synthesis, emphasizing ends rather than means, superimposed on the older classifications, and much more complex to work out, however more enlightening the product may be. Another illusion is the notion that military budget administration in practice pays attention to the precept, cherished in military tradition, that authority and responsibility should be commensurate. A post commander, according to this principle (and the author defers to tradition by listing, p. 6, seven such principles), should estimate for all his needs. But his basic needs, men and equipment, are determined for him in tables of organization and equipment already fixed; they are furnished gratis to him and estimated for him centrally. If his complement includes a band, the budget reviewer may surmise as much from the presence of an estimated figure for more sheet music, but the players and instruments are given and do not appear in his budget. One suspicion confirmed is that much military planning, including budgeting based on "requirements," is paper work irrelevant to any subsequent event.

Most significant, however, is the author's analysis of the problems and inner contradictions of the concept of a performance budget itself. A performance budget should be based on approved work plans. But for a military organization these are uncontrollably uncertain. The processes of developing them, and of meshing their annual and longer-term components over successive cycles of time, are too lengthy and too complex, and move through channels too distinct from the fiscal, to serve the need. The organizational difficulties are as baffling as the temporal. The Air Force is functionally organized and the Navy's performance budget is "functional in the same degree [as] the organization of Navy bureaus" (p. 85). But the Army, with its geographical area commands, its technical service commands (medical, signal, transportation, etc.), and its multi-purpose field installations, cannot possibly construct a budget classification according to performance goals that does not do violence to one or another of the prescriptions the Hoover Commission loosely lumped in a slogan. The segregation of capital from operating expenses poses another perplexing search for criteria. The attainment of economical procurement and issue of many items appears to involve setting up working capital funds, which thereupon drop out of any annual expenditure budgeting system. The reconciliation of responsible field operation with headquarters estimates based on political feasibility raises more than budgetary questions. "The performance budget is more a statement of direction and intent than a description of a current condition" (p. 123). The author recommends a performance budget, with lump-sum appropriations to a few suggested broad categories, for purposes of executive and congressional review, and an "administrative budget," along organizational unit lines, to be prescribed by delegated authority for purposes of internal management and control, as Budget Bureau apportionments are now handled; all within a much shorter time span.

The discussion of these and related topics marks a real advance in the clarification of an important and nebulous concept. Two matters his theory does not comprehend are the role of Congress in all this, and the role of a performance budget in times of emergency military build up when money does not matter and other instruments must be relied upon to insure that first things are put first.

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD.

The Ohio State University.

Tito's Promised Land. BY ALEX N. DRAGNICH. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 1954. Pp. 333. $5.75.)

Two of the basic functions of the political scientist in foreign affairs are performed competently in Alex N. Dragnich's Tito's Promised Land. The author not only has brought together and analyzed a vast supply of data to make the finest available study of the contemporary Yugoslav state, but also has gone beyond the fact-finding process to raise some serious questions concerning Western policy toward that unhappy land. Dragnich has an impressive background for his task, including knowledge of the language and traditions of Yugoslavia which he secured from his Montenegrin immigrant parents, a good training in political science and Slavic studies at the University of California, a tour of duty for the American government in Washington and Belgrade, and intensive research and investigation in the Western and Slavic literature, all capped by several trips through Yugoslavia, where he interviewed government officials, many professional people and opinion leaders, and hundreds of peasants.

More than two-thirds of the book is devoted to a detailed analysis of Tito's regime. Serious attention is given to the rulers' efforts to find a rationale different from those found in the Soviet philosophy or Western theory; to the mechanisms in the fields of policy making, administration, law, propaganda and mass control, and economics; and to the results achieved and the strengths and weaknesses revealed, especially in relation to the needs and desires of the Yugoslav people. This is one of the best presentations of the subject, ranking in perceptiveness and insight with Josef Korbel's Tito's Communism, hitherto the best available in the English language, and surpassing it in quantity of detail, especially for the vital years after the Tito-Stalin break and the alleged "transition to democratic socialism" after 1950. This aspect of the book is invaluable to the Western student of foreign affairs and comparative government, providing analysis of up-to-date data and source materials which are as yet unavailable in English.

In addition to his study of the contemporary Yugoslav regime, Dragnich examines several historical developments relating to Tito's road to power. He concludes that Mihailovich, Tito's great rival in the civil war that raged between 1942 and 1945, was outsmarted by Tito and betrayed by the Western powers—in spite of Tito's inability to secure a real following among the Yugoslav masses and his failure to make a real contribution to the Allied war effort against the Axis. Although Dragnich does not fail to analyze Mihailovich's mistakes and shortcomings, which were serious, and while he does not overlook Tito's skillful tactics (including his exploitation of the uprooted and disorganized and his masterful propaganda operations), Dragnich believes that the "most important source of Communist success" was Western aid.

The key issue now for the United States is focused by Dragnich's sharp analysis on two questions. How strong is the Tito regime likely to be in any future crisis? Dragnich believes that there is deep and widespread hatred for that regime among the Yugoslav people. Moreover, he feels that the army, thought by many observers to be Tito's strongest power base, is actually deeply disloyal, with the officers largely pro-Soviet and the enlisted men likely to refuse to fight for Tito in any conflict. Among the non-military masses, Dragnich finds the young people increasingly anti-Tito, and the older Yugoslavs yearning for significant political changes and even willing to accept the old prewar types of government if no other alternative to Tito is possible.

Dragnich's picture of the Yugoslav situation is full of despair and tragedy. In the urban areas, there have been some advances toward industrialization, but at tremendous cost in human blood, as well as money and materials. The people despair before the show of unreal aims, gross inefficiency and corruption in industry, terribly low standards of living, and even some unemployment. In the countryside, the peasants hate the collective farm system and resist the efforts to impose it upon them, and Tito's cause is not helped by the low rate of production and inefficient management. The clear outlines of the Soviet class state are already evident, with privileged classes in existence and growing with each passing year, while the standard of living among the masses is at an abysmally low level—"considerably below that of pre-World War II." Dragnich declares that "every Yugoslav citizen knows that Communist experimentation has been more ruinous to the economy than the direct consequences of the war"—and thus for material reasons does not support the regime. But more important is the fierce hatred which Dragnich found to exist among the masses for their Communist overlords, as a result of the stifling of civil liberties, the anti-religious campaigns, and the ubiquitous secret police. Even inside the Communist ranks, Dragnich found confusion and divided loyalties, with pro-Soviet elements, disillusioned idealists, and resentful party people accused of disloyalty because they are dissatisfied. Dragnich summarizes this situation by reporting that the American diplomats agree that 85% of the population are opposed to the Tito regime, that he himself now feels the figure should be 90%, and that Yugoslavs whose judgment he trusts insist that the figure should be even higher.

Should the United States continue to give material and political assistance to Tito? Dragnich feels that Western aid to Tito was wisely given in 1948, when there was some hope of splitting the Communist empire, and when Yugoslav aid to the Greek rebels and the threat to Trieste menaced fragile Western defenses. Today, however, Dragnich asserts that Western aid to Tito is no longer desirable in terms of our national interest or our moral principles. Our aid, he hints, simply bolsters a tottering regime, led by men who prefer living as equals in a Communist world and who maintain their uneasy alliance with the West on a temporary basis. Tito's interest in the Western orientation will continue only so long as he cannot get his supplies elsewhere and would be replaced if he worked out a satisfactory arrangement with Stalin's successors. Dragnich ends his discussion of Western policy toward the Yugoslavs with this question: "How can we justify contributing to an indefinite enslavement of those people?"

LOUIS NEMZER.

The Ohio State University.

Terror and Progress USSR: Some Sources of Change and Stability in the Soviet Dictatorship. BY BARRINGTON MOORE, JR. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xvii, 261. $4.50.)

The Russian Research Center of Harvard University has published the twelfth book in its series of publications, a slim yet insightful volume by one of its senior research fellows, the author of the valuable analysis of Soviet society, Soviet Politics—the Dilemma of Power. In his latest book Dr. Moore has utilized Russian source materials and the interviews with Soviet refugees conducted in 1950–51 by members of the Russian Research Center in “an attempt to weigh with an eye to the future the sources of stability and the potentialities for change in the Bolshevik regime.” He has supplied many illuminating answers to the question of what people in different walks of Soviet life do when confronted with a series of situations which arise, as it were, from the logic of dictatorship.

The author begins by examining some of the problems with which the Soviet leaders have to contend, and the agencies of control which they utilize to solve them: the party, the secret police, the armed forces, and the “Soviet apparatus.” He then proceeds to an examination of the specific way in which these agencies operate in industry, agriculture, and the cultural sphere of the arts and sciences, and of the reactions, tensions, and pressures in the people over whom the controls are exercised. He points out that the dynamism of the Soviet economic system is due to the tremendous political pressure exercised from the top of the hierarchy downward, and suggests that if this drive for the prompt and efficient fulfillment and overfulfillment of production standards suddenly ceased or slackened, stagnation and collapse would ensue. Moore believes that disastrous as the agricultural collectivization program was, it was at the same time a highly practicable albeit ruthless way of breaking the political resistance of the conservative peasantry. Today, torn between the demand for increased agricultural output and the desire to maintain its political control over the peasantry, the regime finds the peasant question one of the “running sores” of the body politic. In respect to intellectuals, the author thinks that the Kremlin has been forced continually to compromise between its own demand for practical results and the amount of control that it entails, and the requirements of freedom and autonomy necessary for creative endeavor. Estimating that one in every five Soviet men has felt the iron hand of the police, and that of those subjected to it perhaps less than one-half were actually sentenced, Moore maintains that the regime is constantly having to avoid applying too little terror, thereby losing effective control of various sectors within society, and of employing too much coercion, thereby producing a complete collapse of morale.

The volume ends with a chapter entitled “Images of the Future,” in which Moore hazards some guesses as to the long-range tendencies of the present Soviet dictatorship. His forecasts tend to lie between the extremes of no foreseeable change in the future and total disintegration. He sees at present three possibilities of change. One is that there will be a continuation and intensification of the dynamic totalitarian characteristics of the Stalinist regime. He feels, however, that this would require a consolidation and strengthening of power in the hands of a single leader as ruthless and as politically astute as Stalin. A second alternative would be a "managerial revolution," with a triumph of the technical bureaucracy. Such a change would hardly lead to democracy, but would be characterized by the rule of law and great social mobility. A third possibility is the coming into prominence of traditionalist elements, including a freezing of the status quo, the creation of a caste system, and the dispersion of power among despotic satrapies. The change in this direction of oriental despotism could come only with a cessation of hostilities between East and West which would allow a de-emphasis of dictatorship and industrialization. Moore feels that the second possibility is the most likely, although he does not rule out the third, and admits that he is dealing with ideal types. Any regime which may eventuate will contain elements of all three, with emphasis on one.

Dr. Moore has written a book which dramatically describes the politics of survival of both the rulers and the ruled in the Soviet Union. It is indeed a pity that he did not expand upon this theme, portraying it with many more examples than he has given us. The title is perhaps a misnomer, for although the use of terror by the regime in molding the human stuff to its will is insightfully elucidated, terror remains always as a backdrop. And industrial and economic progress has been possible only because there have existed spheres in which the politics of survival could operate. In other words, at least in this respect a completely monolithic society exists and is feasible only on paper.

In the reviewer's mind, the chief value of this book lies in its descriptions of the efforts of people caught in the Soviet bureaucratic web to create some sort of modus vivendi. Paradoxically enough, the regime endures because this is possible. The "private deals," the personal intrigues, the "family circles," the extra-legal operations, in short, peculiar and perverted forms of political compromise, become an absolute necessity for the individual, if he is to have any security in a monolithic police state. Moore's treatment sustains the conclusion that Soviet communism falls far short of realizing Engels' ideal of the "administration of things," that the government of men continues to flourish instead. Contemporary political scientists will do well to glean at least one lesson from Moore's essay, and that is that public administration has not replaced politics based on interest, even in a polity embodying planning, manipulation, and coercion—all directed without democratic or constitutional checks from a central authority.

JULIAN TOWSTER.

University of California (Berkeley).

The Threat of Soviet Imperialism. EDITED BY C. GROVE HAINES. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1954. Pp. xvi, 402. $5.00.)

In August, 1953, the School of Advanced International Studies sponsored a conference in Washington on "The Problem of Soviet Imperialism." The twenty papers which were read and discussed at the conference form the chapters of the present volume. Its title, like the theme of the conference, is somewhat misleading, for the real theme of these papers is the cold war in all its complexities and ramifications.

The first three papers discuss in the broadest outlines the Soviet attitude toward the non-Soviet world, its historical background, the baffling question concerning Soviet motivation, and the principles of Soviet strategy. Part Two is devoted to a survey of tools and techniques used by the Kremlin in its struggle with the West. Part Three contains an assessment of the most important features of strength and weakness in the Soviet world. Parts Four and Five give an area-by-area survey of the cold war, the forces that fight it out, the battle lines that have been drawn, and the prospects for further development. In the final paper, some implications for United States foreign policy are drawn on the basis of the preceding discussions.

A symposium in which half of the participants were State Department officials, and the title of which consists of loaded words, might well arouse caution or suspicion in the academic reviewer. Any such reserve, however, is unjustified in the present case. Instead, the outcome of this conference has been a first-class summary of cold war problems. It contains admirable individual contributions; it has been edited with skill; and it constitutes a valuable addition to the library of any student of contemporary world affairs. The elements of discontinuity inevitable in symposia of this sort have been kept at a minimum by a judicious balance in the overall outline. Since very few of the papers fall short of very high standards, the entire book provides almost uninterruptedly excellent reading. The inclusion of brief comments by discussants enriches the contribution of the main speakers, although it does tend to make the book a little more disjointed. Some of these comments are rather cryptic, and some are banal and superfluous. The only other criticism that might be offered is that the scope of each contributor's subject was so vast that many speakers had to talk in generalizations. Statements of this kind often raise more questions in the readers' minds than they answer.

In the discussion of Soviet motivation, in the first part of the book, Messrs. Kennan and Morgan have performed brilliantly indeed. And yet one misses a consideration of the Soviet national interest, which is clearly relevant for an understanding of Soviet foreign policy. Professor Barghoorn, who observes the skillful use made by Soviet propagandists of Western ideals and Western slogans, might have supplemented this by examining why the Kremlin finds it possible to use our own slogans with such success, though later speakers dealt with this problem at great length. Certainly every single contribution could be subjected to criticism in this manner, but it is clear that this would go beyond the confines of this review.

Some propositions can be singled out which run through all the contributions of this book. Every speaker took it for granted that the Soviet state and the world Communist movement constitute a grave threat to the existence and prosperity of the United States, and to the integrity of its institutions. Every speaker revealed a healthy respect for the skill which the Kremlin has shown in "exploiting intangibles," to use the happy phrase found by Admiral Stevens.

Most or all of them seemed to believe that it is these intangibles which will count most decisively in the cold war. Finally, many speakers seemed to agree that the United States and its agencies have shown themselves inept and clumsy in manipulating these intangibles; and the sobering impression that the cold war has not, so far, taken a course favorable to the United States is gained from the book.

A number of current clichés are rejected in these papers. Willis Armstrong in an excellent presentation shows that Soviet trade will never be a very dangerous weapon. D. Vernon McKay indicates that Africa is not likely to fall victim to communism in the foreseeable future. Perhaps the greatest surprise is the implication left by many speakers that the greatest threat to America lies not in Soviet strength or the Kremlin's aggressiveness, but in the possibility that the nations of Europe, Asia, and Latin America who have not yet been incorporated into the Soviet orbit might lose faith in the United States and cease to support us in the cold war. Paul H. Nitze's concluding words, which seem to echo the Administration's current "tough" language, therefore come as an anticlimax. One wonders just how much of the wise, restrained, and detached analysis of high-level foreign service officers such as the contributors to this volume ever reaches the ears of those who really make American foreign policy.

ALFRED G. MEYER.

University of Washington.

The Struggle for Indochina. BY ELLEN J. HAMMER WITH A PREFACE BY RUPERT EMERSON. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Published under the Auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Pp. xvii, 332. $5.00.)

In Indochina the Communists have scored a significant triumph—their second in Asia since World War II. Americans with few exceptions had been led to expect a happier outcome. As it turns out, Indochina has furnished an almost classic demonstration of Communist strategy in a colonial setting. It is important to establish just what happened, and why.

Miss Hammer's book is a welcome contribution to the scanty literature in English. Wisely she refrains from trying to answer all the questions. And some of her judgments can be challenged. For the most part, however, she subordinates judgments to a straightforward, well-constructed narrative of events from the fall of France in 1940 to the eve of the Geneva Conference in 1954. Rupert Emerson adds a thoughtful preface pointing up the tragedy of the whole affair, and the dilemmas it has posed alike for Frenchmen, Americans, and the peoples of Indochina.

After telling the interesting tale of Decoux and the Japanese, the author turns to her main subject: France confronted with postwar Vietnamese nationalism. In some detail she describes the eight years of negotiation and fighting which followed upon the French attempt to return to Indochina in 1945. One learns much about French party politics and politicians in relation to Indochina, about the personalities and structure of the Bao Dai regime, and something of the Viet Minh before they passed behind the Iron Curtain in 1950. The book is written from documentary and personal sources in France and the United States. Enough historical background is provided to introduce the reader to the more contemporary scene.

Miss Hammer tells the story in terms of lost opportunities. She blames extremists and blunderers on both sides for the war, la sale guerre, which sowed anarchy in the countryside and ended by delivering north Viet Nam (at least) into the Communist camp. The Communists she condemns for betraying the Vietnamese national revolution. Turning on their allies in the Viet Minh, they imposed a Communist dictatorship which overtly allied itself with Moscow and Peiping in 1949 and invited large-scale American and Chinese intervention. It is the French, however, specifically the Right Wing, on whom she places the underlying responsibility for the Communists' success in capturing and so largely retaining the leadership of Vietnamese nationalism through the postwar struggle.

For France the issue was really settled in 1940, says the author. Struck down by Hitler in Europe, France had also to suffer the disintegration of her prestige and authority in Indochina during Japan's humiliating overlordship. At the war's end she had no viable course of action, weakened and distracted as she was, but to come to terms with an aroused Asian nationalism. Instead, French policymakers and administrators grossly miscalculated the dynamics of the situation. Determined to return France to a paramount position, they rejected the demands of Ho Chi Minh's new coalition government for the unity and independence of Viet Nam within the French Union. Thus the opportunity was lost for a peaceful settlement in 1946, when the Viet Minh was far weaker and more conciliatory than it later became.

Thereafter military action could never solve the problem, as General LeClerc and others predicted. Nor did the accompanying political maneuvers to split the resistance movement—especially the Bao Dai experiment—achieve their hoped for results. To win over the Vietnamese attentistes, and still more Ho's non-Communist supporters, Bao Dai had first to convince them of his independence of the French. His regime had also to organize some representative political base and program. In neither did it carry conviction or inspire confidence. The immediate reason, in Miss Hammer's view, was the grudging, halting manner in which the French had to be driven to yield the substance of freedom—always too little or too late. More fundamentally, she attributes the weakness of nonrevolutionary nationalism in Indochina to France's longstanding colonial policies. They stunted the growth of a modern middle class and blighted its opportunities for leadership and self-expression in moderate channels. This is the burden of the author's argument.

It is possible to agree that the French blundered badly in Indochina, of course, and still take a more sympathetic view of their purposes and their objective difficulties after the war. Perhaps they would have done better to concede independence and national authority to the Viet Minh regime in 1946. But Miss Hammer herself describes it as already firmly in the grip of the Communists, despite its posture of moderation and conciliation. Its subsequent behavior shows all too clearly that it was merely applying the Trojan-horse tactics of the two-stage revolution long advocated by Ho Chi Minh in company with Mao Tse-tung. In the disunity and the political incapacity of the non-Communist nationalists, relative to the disciplined strength of the Communists, the French faced a more intractable problem than the British in India and Burma, or the Dutch in Indonesia. Besides faction-ridden Viet Nam, there were Cambodia and Laos, weak and fearful of their neighbor. And once again in the spread of communism the contiguous border becomes a strategic factor with the arrival of the Chinese Red armies in December, 1949.

After eight years the French could find no satisfactory way out of their policy dilemma, despite massive American aid. Prophetically, Miss Hammer quotes the 1950 speech of a Radical Socialist whose views were to win increasing acceptance by his party. Addressing the National Assembly, he rejected France's whole military effort and political policy in Indochina as falsely conceived and powerless to effect a solution. In their place he called for "concessions, large concessions" to reach an agreement with the Viet Minh. In 1954, when Pierre Mendès-France took the premiership, he moved at once to translate his words into action.

WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD.

Princeton University.

Totalitarianism: Proceedings of a Conference Held at the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, March 1953. EDITED BY CARL J. FRIEDRICH. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 386. $6.50.)

This symposium is an attempt to develop an appraisal of the nature, origins, strengths, and weaknesses of modern totalitarian dictatorships. It is a provocative and balanced volume containing diverse papers and commentary by a veritable small army of scholars. Its contents range from an impressionistic paper by George F. Kennan to a speculative model by Harold Lasswell.

A number of basic issues are discussed. One of these is the question of whether totalitarianism is a historically unique phenomenon without genuine precedent or a trait which has characterized various earlier authoritarian societies. Nicholas Timasheff takes the latter position and, with the help of a rather elaborate system of distinctions and categories, suggests a quantitative approach to the study of the phenomenon. Carl Friedrich contends that totalitarian society, like the Greek polis, is sui generis and then identifies a series of characteristics which support this view. Probably the question is really one of the extent to which the totality can be escaped and whether or not it was easier to evade it in the past than it is now. If escape and evasion are less likely now as a result of the development of political technology, then Friedrich's thesis appears to be the stronger one.

Many other questions also receive attention. The nature of Soviet and Nazi anti-intellectualism and the attitude of the two regimes toward science are treated quite fully in the papers of Raymond Bauer, H. J. Muller, Bertram Wolfe, and Else Frenkel-Brunswik, as well as in the commentary by Hannah Arendt. The function of terror and tensions is well defined by Jerzy Glikzman, Alex Inkeles, and George Kennan. The role of ideology is dealt with in the papers of Carl Friedrich, Raymond Bauer, Alex Inkeles, and the late Waldemar Gurian. Of special interest to political scientists is the paper by Karl W. Deutsch, which contains a series of hypotheses and categories for determining the effectiveness of totalitarian regimes.

A number of questions were raised but not fully discussed. Among these was the question of the contribution of Christianity and democracy to the context from which totalitarianism emerged. Another problem not fully explored—although discussed to some extent by Andrew Gyorgy in his commentary on the proceedings—was that of how “total” a regime must be to be genuinely totalitarian. A more impressive effort also could have been made to define the respective roles of rationality, irrationality, and nonrationality in decision-making under totalitarian systems.

The study of a phenomenon such as totalitarianism obviously requires a multi-faceted approach, and a number of disciplines and varieties of experience are represented in this symposium. It is unfortunate, however, that the extent to which social scientists do not speak the same language is so much in evidence. An additional problem is that of comparability of data. The psychologists employ a rather abstract and generalized approach, concerning themselves almost as much with manifestations of embryonic totalitarianism among Americans in 1953 as among Germans in the 'thirties. Yet they almost completely ignore the Russian species of totalitarianism. Their discussions of the psychic needs fulfilled by totalitarian ideology, the characteristics of the totalitarian personality, and the conditions of ideological compliance are based on very limited data but do offer many insights and apparently valid hypotheses although they are sometimes buried in verbosity.

This is a symposium of substance on a subject which, unfortunately, has long been neglected by too many political scientists. It contains much data of the kind which too often has not been included in courses in comparative government. If the volume lacks a certain unity it is probably due to the fact that all participants were not fully acquainted with all totalitarian regimes. This condition might also be regarded as inherent in symposia of any size unless the editor himself employs totalitarian methods. Yet a symposium of this type serves a very real purpose to the extent that it reflects a genuine exchange of views, facilitates further interdisciplinary research, defines the key issues, and clarifies areas of disagreement. In terms of these criteria, the editor and his fellow-participants in the conference have succeeded in producing a volume of consequence.

JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR.

Princeton University.

Supreme Court and Supreme Law. EDITED BY EDMOND CAHN. (Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 250. $4.00.)

This volume, the outgrowth of the New York University Law School's commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Marbury v. Madison, contains papers presented by Edmond Cahn, Ralph F. Bischoff, John P. Frank, Paul A. Freund, Willard Hurst, and Charles P. Curtis. The eight chapters represent an attempt to describe and appraise the institution of judicial review in action from 1803 to 1953 and, as the editor states in the preface, the essays "present questions of policy and judicial statecraft that are enormously important because they cut sectionally across the entire corpus of constitutional law" (p. vii). The book deals specifically with such matters as constitutional change, justiciability, the process of constitutional construction, and the impact of judicial review upon federalism, civil liberties, the distribution of national power, and majority rule.

As regards justiciability, Professor Bischoff believes in a relaxation of the Court's insistence upon the presence of parties with a material interest in cases involving civil liberties, just as Professor Frank is in favor of narrowing the concept of political question in similar cases. In his longer essay, "Review and Federalism," Professor Freund provides a good account of the impact of judicial review upon federal power, which has increased as judicial review has declined.

Perhaps the most controversial chapter of the book is Professor Frank's essay, "Review and Basic Liberties," in which he concludes that judicial review in the expectations of the Founding Fathers has been "in its relation to basic liberty . . . a failure of prediction almost as great as the electoral college" (p. 130). This does not mean that Mr. Frank is opposed to judicial review. On the contrary, he desires more of it, but in what he regards as the right instances. Accordingly, among other devices to extend judicial review in civil liberties cases, he recommends the contraction of the area of non-justiciability, enlargement of the concept of standing of parties to raise constitutional issues, and reversal of the traditional presumption of the validity of statutes into one of invalidity in cases affecting basic liberties. In some instances his last suggestion has already been followed by the Court in decisions granting a "preferred position" to freedom of speech, the press, assembly, and religious worship. Professor Frank apparently prefers a double standard of judicial review in that he is willing for the Court to be abstemious in the invalidation of legislation not affecting basic liberties by resting constitutionality in such cases upon the traditional formula of reasonableness, but anxious for the Court to be activist when statutes are challenged as infringing the basic freedoms. Double standards of judicial review are not new, as all know who are familiar with the history of the distortion of liberty into freedom of contract and the later application of the "preferred position" principle. Although Mr. Frank expressly asserts that he would not have the Court accept a roving commission to correct evil, his demurrer is hardly convincing because there is a fundamental incompatibility between restraint and activism which produces in turn a rather cruel dilemma for those juristic libertarians who support the extension of legislative and executive power into some areas but seek judicial intervention when the extended power of government intrudes upon civil liberties. Professor Hurst raises less controversial issues in his discussion of "Review and the Distribution of National Power," where he describes the extent of abdication by the Court as final censor of legislative and administrative action. In the final chapter, "Review and Majority Rule," Mr. Curtis concludes that John Marshall "snatched from the majority and offered to our courts, the function of rendering our political decencies and aspirations into immanent law. What we owe to John Marshall is the opportunity he gave us of combining "a reign of conscience with a republic" (p. 198).

Professor Cahn and his associates have provided a volume of an unusually high uniform quality for a collective effort and one highly suggestive for the continuing study of that institution which "combines a reign of conscience with a republic."

ROBERT J. HARRIS.

Vanderbilt University.

Robert M. LaFollette: June 14, 1855-June 18, 1925. BY BELLA CASE LAFOLLETTE AND FOLA LAFOLLETTE. (New York: Macmillan Co. 1953. 2 vols. Pp. xx, 730; vii, 731-1305. $15.00.)

This is an unusual biography of an important American political leader and statesman. The first biography of Robert M. LaFollette, it is a "family" biography in the sense that it was begun by his wife and completed by his daughter, but it is immeasurably superior in concept and execution to most such works. It is solidly based upon the vast collection of LaFollette letters and papers, which are extensively quoted; it draws upon the rich personal knowledge of the two authors, who were each actively associated with the Senator's political career; and it is as conscientiously objective in narration as the intelligence and integrity of the authors, combined with their deep affection and loyalty for the Senator, could make it. The result is a full and detailed account of the long political career of one of the giants of the American past, dramatic in the telling as it was in life, and revealing LaFollette (with Bryan, Theodore Roosevelt, and Wilson) as one of the four dominant political figures in the United States from 1890 to 1920.

LaFollette was actively engaged in politics throughout his mature life. Elected district attorney at age 25, he served in that office 1881-1885, as Congressman 1885-1891, as leader of Wisconsin Republican insurgency 1892-1900, as governor of Wisconsin 1901-1906, and as United States Senator 1906-1925. In addition, he was a leading contender for the 1912 Republican presidential nomination and in 1924 polled almost five million votes as an independent presidential candidate. It is this long and prominent career, with LaFollette at the center of successive major political battles, which marks him as one of the important professionals in our political history and makes him of such great interest to political scientists. His long-sustained leadership role, so richly annotated in these two volumes—ranging from his fight for the McKinley Tariff in 1890, through the dynamic "Wisconsin Idea" of his governorship, his leadership of the Progressive movement of 1910-12, his opposition to Wilson's war policy, his fight against the Versailles Treaty and the League, to the culmination of his career in the third-party effort in 1924—makes the story of his life an illuminating synopsis of much of American political history in the half-century from Cleveland to Coolidge.

There are some major disappointments in this distinguished biography. The first of these is the brief and inadequate treatment of the Wisconsin phase of the LaFollette career, particularly his decade of struggle in the '90's to capture and make a progressive instrument of the Republican state organization and his great record as governor of the state. This was the period in which his distinctive political ideas and methods were developed and the period when he exercised his outstanding talents as a chief executive to make Wisconsin a great example of enlightened government. Yet less than 200 pages are devoted to his pre-senatorial career, as contrasted with the 1,000 pages given to the period following 1906. A second defect is the disproportionate detail (the whole of the 500-page second volume) devoted to the 1917-1925 period, in contrast with the much briefer treatment of his central role in the Senate during the Roosevelt-Taft years and of his great national influence on the beginnings and growth of the Progressive movement from 1910 to 1912. There is, too, a consistent tendency to concentrate upon the issues which LaFollette emphasized and to neglect the story of his relationship to the party system, to the interest groups which supported or opposed him, to his party colleagues and rivals, and to the broad social movements upon which his leadership depended. The authors may have felt that these are matters for others to relate.

However this may be judged, there remains the problem of the one-dimensional effect produced by the biography. LaFollette occupies the center of the stage—all else is background; the story is told as LaFollette saw it; his policies and decisions are explained, not weighed or questioned. The reader frequently gets the impression that time stopped in 1925; that the flow of events since then, and our greater knowledge of what happened in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, have provided no new perspectives from which to judge, by results, the wisdom of the leaders who contended for and against tariffs, trusts, direct primaries, isolation, war, the League, and the return to normalcy. In any such account LaFollette will emerge not without fault but with great stature. This family biography will provide a rich storehouse for such a future critical and analytical biography.

WALLACE S. SAYRE.

Columbia University.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

A Court for Children: A Study of the New York City Children's Court. By ALFRED J. KAHN. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1953. Pp. xxii, 359. $4.50.)

The problem of "individualized justice" as it is practiced in the juvenile court has received less attention from political scientists than it would appear to warrant. The problem is two-fold. One aspect is the need to balance the child's and his family's rights to protection from well-meaning but arbitrary interference with the flexibility necessary for individual treatment and care where the state has established its right to intervene. Fortunately the New York court which Dr. Kahn studies appears to be more careful than most in this respect and Dr. Kahn has little reason to be concerned, aware as he is of the problem. One might comment in passing, however, that his otherwise adequate bibliography omits the more outstanding writings in this area, such as those of Judges Waite, Woodward, and Vanderbilt.¹

The second aspect of the problem, and the one implicit in Dr. Kahn's work, is the question of criteria. Once the comparative certainty of the penal code has been, for humanitarian and pragmatic reasons, abandoned, what can be put in its place, so that "individualized" shall refer to the child and his situation rather than to the judge? Dr. Kahn makes his judgments of the court in the light of a "yardstick" of values which could perhaps best be summed up as those of a humanitarian clinicism. With some reservations, he finds the court sadly lacking by these, or, in fact, by any other reasonable standards. He paints a pathetic picture of judges who lecture children on the Ten Commandments, extract meaningless promises from them "to be good," and erect for themselves routinized or impulsive criteria of judgment; he tells too of probation officers who fail to make of probation anything but the most superficial of experiences.

Public indifference, overworked probation officers who lack professional training and skill, judges who are ill-equipped or jealous of their prerogatives—these are the identifiable factors which hinder the realization of what Dr. Kahn calls his "still unrealized dream." That this dream is by no means a monopoly of social workers is shown by the almost identical diagnosis and recommendations of a group of lawyers who have studied the same court.² What neither group has examined—and what Dr. Kahn, in view of his declared values, certainly could not be asked to examine—is the question of whether the values implicit in humanitarian clinicism can or ought to be the predominant values in approaching the problem of society's demands on the individual, youthful or mature. There seems to be room to question whether the judges' fumbling attempts, for instance, to impose their own versions of morality on children is due solely to ignorance or obstinacy, or whether it does not in fact represent some confused recognition of the need for something more of a moral content, some greater investment of the human will, than clinicism can provide. No one would wish to deny that clinicists have contributed to our knowledge of causes and treatment. The question is not whether clinicism is useful, but whether it does not need to be integrated into some larger framework.

These are questions for further study. The successes, excesses, and failures of "individualized justice" provide a fruitful commentary on the dilemma of our times. Dr. Kahn's book is excellent case material. It is courageous, fair, well-documented, illuminating, and essentially practical, particularly in the sphere of administrative reorganization. It is recommended both to those who wish to acquaint themselves with the practical problems of juvenile courts and those whose interest is in the more abstract problems presented.—ALAN KEITH-LUCAS, University of North Carolina.

¹ The best discussion of this problem is contained in The United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Standards for Specialized Courts Dealing with Children (Washington, D. C., 1954), prepared in cooperation with the National Probation and Parole Association and the National Council of Juvenile Court Judges.

² Children and Families in the Courts of New York City, A Report by a Special Committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York and a Study by Walter Gellhorn, assisted by Jacob D. Hyman and Sidney H. Asch, on the "Administration of Laws Relating to the Family in the City of New York" (New York, 1954).

Federal-State-Local Tax Correlation: Symposium. (Princeton: Tax Institute. 1954. Pp. viii, 248. $5.00.)

The Tax Institute selected the formidable subject of intergovernmental fiscal relations for its 1953 symposium. Twenty-two persons, representing universities, business, and government, sought over a two-day period for means by which our three levels of taxation could be brought into balance. For the purpose, primarily, of analyzing American practice and prescription, the managers of the symposium organized the papers and discussion in five parts: background considerations, intergovernmental relations, federal aid and state aid, conflicts of jurisdiction, and potentialities of cooperation. The finished product, as might be expected, suffers from a lack of balance. Yet it can be said that this little volume embraces much of the experience and wisdom that has been distilled from the many studies of the problem of intergovernmental fiscal relations during the past twenty-five years.

The supporters of separation of tax sources as between the federal and state governments will receive no comfort from these pages. Paul Studenski characterizes the proposal for tax source separation as "an attempt to turn the clock of history backward." He goes on to say that the development of overlapping federal-state taxation has not been wholly irrational; the two levels of government, with revenue requirements not always overlapping in time, have naturally moved in on a tax source which was not being used to full capacity. And even if such a separation should be imposed, Studenski concludes, the fluctuating revenue requirements of the states and the nation would soon lead to its abandonment. The U. S. Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, which has received many recommendations for tax source separation, will find it difficult to overcome the arguments presented in these pages.

The familiar subject of federal and state grants-in-aid is discussed by Mabel Newcomer. She finds the fundamental objections to grants-in-aid to be that they (1) undermine home rule and promote centralization, (2) lead to the distortion of governmental services, (3) redistribute wealth, geographically, in a wasteful and unfair manner, and (4) promote irresponsible spending and consequent waste. While certain specific programs may be open to criticism, she does not find any substantial evidence to support the four fundamental objections. Piecemeal though the development of federal and state aid may have been, she concludes, "Piecemeal revision of a piecemeal growth can conceivably result, given time, in a rational and effective system."

What, then, are the "potentialities of cooperation" if we cannot look forward to tax source separation or the abandonment or serious curtailment of grants-in-aid? As revealed by the concluding part of this symposium, these seem to lie in the continuation, at an accelerated pace, of the present beginnings of administrative cooperation among federal, state, and local tax administrators. Uniformity in definitions for tax purposes, coordinated action on domicile problems, interstate cooperation in the development of allocation formulas for corporation taxation, acceptance of the tax audits of one jurisdiction by another—these and many more are proposed as means for the reduction of administrative conflict. The much-abused tax administrator, whatever his habitat, may find solace from the recognition in this book of the significance of his work.—WELDON COOPER, University of Virginia.

The Regulation of Businessmen. By ROBERT E. LANE. (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press. 1954. Pp. xiii, 144. $3.75.)

This book is the first serious study of the responses of businessmen to regulation. It is principally concerned with business attitudes toward federal acts of general application: the trade regulation statutes, the labor relations acts, and the wage-hour law. The study draws upon the reports of federal agencies, which of course are of limited utility because enforcement is fragmentary and reporting is poor. In addition, the author interviewed twenty-five New England businessmen and several federal administrators and made a content analysis of two long runs of the journal of the Manufacturers Association of Connecticut. The author has thoroughly digested the behavioral sciences and the principal tools employed are concepts from psychology, sociology, and opinion analysis. Numerous graphic and tabular representations will assist or vex the reader.

A number of the conclusions appear to be well substantiated. Resentment towards and violation of regulatory laws by businessmen do not spring, in the main, from economic causes. Resistance to regulation is a defense of the businessman's conception of the good society and of his social role, or, more accurately, a defense of his conception of proper power relations in society. These values, like others, are socially conferred; they are common to the community to which the businessman belongs. But there is no single business community, nor are a man's associations solely in his business. Large businesses tend to be more law-abiding than small; those in cities resist change less bitterly than those in small towns. Moreover, within a single firm one may find occupational attitudes peculiar to the lawyer, the personnel man, or the public relations man. Between businessmen as a whole and administrators, however, there stands a great gulf. Burnham's thesis of the "managerial class" is shown to be pure fiction.

The tools of opinion analysis brought to bear in this book make it possible to replace impressionism with scientific findings. It is probable, however, that the author is unduly optimistic when he looks forward to a resolution of the conflict of economic interests by a regulatory administration informed in "the growing knowledge of inter-personal and inter-group relations."—FRANCIS D. WORMUTH, University of Utah.

Is There a Republican Majority? Political Trends, 1952-1956. BY LOUIS HARRIS. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. xviii, 231. $3.50.)

Louis Harris, research executive with Elmo Roper, has presented a readable analysis of recent election returns and of six pre-election polls and one post-election poll conducted in 1952. A principal value of using poll data to study political behavior is that voting preferences can be related directly to the social characteristics of the voters. The author's tabulations show that Eisenhower was supported by a coalition of executive and professional, white collar, independent, upper income, college educated, German-American, Irish-American, farmer, and feminine groups, while Stevenson was supported by a coalition of labor, low income, lower middle income, Italian-American, Polish-American, Negro, Jewish, Catholic, and less educated groups. These two coalitions had within their ranks conflicting tendencies on foreign and domestic policies.

In his study of the candidates, Mr. Harris shows that while Stevenson gained in popularity, Eisenhower did not lose any. An increasing number of people thought Stevenson a man of high intelligence and attractive personality, but the number regarding him as a man inspiring confidence remained small. The polling method thus sharpens our perception of the role of the personality of the candidate in the campaign.

In order to appeal to a wider audience, Mr. Harris has sacrificed details which are essential to research technicians. He does not present the numbers on which the percentages are based, and does not give the important cross tabulations; he does not describe his questionnaire design in which such concepts as white collar, upper and lower income are defined; nor does he describe the sampling design. The turnout index which was used to calculate most of the figures was based on a post-election estimate of the actual proportion of 1952 voters in the total population. Because of the author's insight in interpreting his materials, however, the book is an excellent contribution to the understanding of American party trends.—HAROLD F. GOSNELL, Washington, D. C.

Letters on Public Administration: From a Dean to His Graduates. BY LENT D. UPSON. (Detroit: Citizens Research Council of Michigan. 1954. Pp. xi, 178.)

In content, this book consists of six "letters" which, as the title indicates, the late Dean Upson wrote (over the years, with revisions from time to time) to his graduate students. Actually, the letters turn out to be essays written in informal, conversational, indeed highly personal style. The first four obviously were done, as another reviewer has said, with tongue in cheek. The fifth ("How to Graft") marks Dr. Upson as a master of the curve ball. The sixth, and as public administration the best, of the letters was written in serious and purposeful, but also good-humored, vein. I propose to leave the reading of the book to anyone who may be interested enough to pick it up—it is worthy of and doubtless will command a wide audience—and to comment briefly on the letters from the three principal points of view which their style and content invite.

First, as humor, the letters are good fun: they are whimsical, light-hearted, witty, sometimes gay. They reveal a fine sense of the incongruity which almost always provokes a smile. They also reveal an author who could laugh at himself and all his works, not to mention the works of most other writers as well. One suspects that the letters succeeded well in what clearly was their primary objective, namely to amuse the audience for which they were written.

Second, as literature, the letters leave a good deal to be desired. (I would not invoke this criterion except that the author, on p. 36, lists the ability to write and speak "the King's English" as a primary attribute of an administrator. He comments that most people around a university are fairly intelligent, but that practically nobody knows how to write and speak so as to make himself understood.) The author's style is so very conversational that it loses considerable through simple reduction to print. There are frequent grammatical slips. Worse, the proof was very poorly read: witness "sound" for "second" (p. 7), "scaler" for "scalar" (p. 8), "meanful" for "meaningful" (p. 15), "underlying" for "underling" (p. 33), and so on to "demurer" for "demurrer" toward the end of the book (p. 174). "Up" deserved better of his academic executors.

Third, as public administration, the book is wholly lacking in system and plan. There is no skeleton on which the essays depend, and there is no common thread running through the series unless the author's humor be taken as providing the underlying motif. In subject matter the letters are uneven, probably for no more obscure reason than that they were designed to entertain rather than to instruct. As a not unnatural consequence substantive disharmonies appear, so that Dean Upson's unquestioned technical mastery does not show through consistently.

Some of the author's friends and admirers—and they are legion—may inquire, "What do you want for a dollar-seventy-five, a combination of Browning, Bryce, and Benchley?" Conceding the point, let's apply the one standard which seems the most appropriate and with which Dean Upson, in the circumstances, presumably would have been the most pleased. I find little of Browning here, and not much more of Bryce; but as Benchley, the Letters are good.—ROSCOE C. MARTIN, Syracuse University.

A Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications of the United States, September 5, 1774–March 4, 1881. BY BEN: PERLEY POORE. (Washington: Government Printing Office. 1885. Ann Arbor, Mich.: J. W. Edwards, reprinted, 1953. Pp. 1392. $14.40.)

The above basic catalog of United States public documents, together with the two volumes of the Comprehensive Index, 1881–1893, of Ames, and the Checklist of United States Public Documents, 1789–1909, all three of which have been out of print and increasingly difficult to obtain, have been reissued in facsimile reprint editions under the auspices of the Joint Committee on the Reproduction of Bibliographical and Reference Works appointed by the Reference Librarians Section of the Association of College and Reference Libraries (ALA) and the Association of Research Libraries. Poore and Ames were both prepared at a time when very extensive collections of public documents were not readily available. Increasingly for the period previous to 1893, when the office of the Superintendent of Documents was created at the United States Government Printing Office, there is a need for the reworking of the material in both Poore and Ames in view of the present status of collections of public documents and of present-day needs for information.—J.B.C.

Party Politics in the Golden State. BY DEAN R. CRESAP. (Los Angeles: The Haynes Foundation. 1954. Pp. xi, 126. $2.50 cloth, $2.00 paper.)

This monograph presents a comprehensive and scholarly picture of the structure and operation of the California party system at every level of government. Such subjects are included as state regulation of parties, state and local executive organization, the state convention, the relationship between state and national party organizations, partisanship in the legislature, the nominating process, the conduct of campaigns, and party leadership. A final chapter presents a plea and sets forth the conditions for a more responsible two-party system in the state. Interviews, personal observations, and questionnaires as well as written sources were employed in securing the data used. Such studies are needed in every state if the intricacies and variations of our national two-party system are to be thoroughly understood.

Civil-Military Relations: An Annotated Bibliography, 1940-1952. BY COMMITTEE ON CIVIL-MILITARY RELATIONS RESEARCH OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH COUNCIL. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. x, 140. $2.00.)

This selective bibliography begins chronologically at the termination date of the Social Science Research Council's 1940 publication on Civil-Military Relations: Bibliographical Notes of Administrative Problems of Civilian Mobilization. It includes only English titles and focuses on the United States, with some related listings from British Commonwealth experience. Its aim is to include titles which will reveal procedures for making policies at levels where policy decisions are of joint concern to civilian and military officials. References to other bibliographical sources for the United States and Great Britain are given in the introduction. An index is included.

Management in the Public Service: The Quest for Effective Performance. BY JOHN D. MILLETT. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. xi, 417. $5.50.)

This text is planned as one of two volumes, the as yet unpublished one to deal with the "politics of public administration," while this one is on "the operation of administrative agencies as such." It treats problems of management which are common to the different agencies and takes as the apex of attention the department head or other chief agency officer. There are chapters on "work direction," including leadership, planning, communication, supervision, and public relations; on "work operation," including organization, budget and fiscal operations, personnel, legal service, and management improvement; on "internal services," including capital, plant, supply, etc.; and a final chapter on "The Value of Management." It should serve as a useful text for those desiring emphasis on management.

Ford: The Times, the Man, the Company. BY ALLAN NEVINS. WITH THE COLLABORATION OF FRANK ERNEST HILL. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1954. Pp. xx, 688. $6.75.)

While this book states as its purpose the relating of the story of the Ford Motor Company from its antecedents through its attainment of spectacular success by the middle of World War I, it is also, as the title implies, a biography of the firm's central figure—the first attempt at depicting Ford from the extensive use of inside sources. Professor Nevins, his collaborator, and his research staff have had full access to the Ford Archives, a treatment accorded no previous biographer, with the result that here is a rather appreciative, somewhat discursive, but quite full account of the Company and the man.

Le Système Constitutionnel des États-Unis d'Amérique: Histoire Constitutionnelle. BY ANDRÉ TUNC AND SUZANNE TUNC. PREFACE BY RENÉ DAVID. (Paris: Éditions Domat Montchrestien. 1954. Pp. viii, 507.)

This is a comprehensive, well-annotated survey of the constitutional history of the United States from the earliest colonial period through 1952, with interesting comments on the complexities of the American legal system as it looks to those trained in the civil law. This is the first of three volumes planned by the authors to fill a gap in French literature on the United States Constitution.

The American Government: Democracy in Action. BY CHARLES E. MERRIAM AND ROBERT E. MERRIAM. (Boston: Ginn & Co. 1954. Pp. xi, 944. $6.25.)

This text is the result of a joint attempt by the late Professor C. E. Merriam and his son, Robert E. Merriam, to introduce a fresh approach to the beginning course in American Government. Departing from the traditional sequence, the authors take up first state government, then local, and finally national. As to the effectiveness of this device, the individual teacher will have to decide for himself. The text on the whole is somewhat detailed and ponderous, although attempts are made to lighten it by including a profusion of illustrations, charts, and graphs.

I Protest. BY G. BROMLEY OXNAM. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. 186. $2.50.)

Bishop Oxnam's account of his experiences with the Velde Committee and of the procedures used by investigatorial committees.

Local Government and Administration: Principles and Problems. BY JAMES E. PATE. (New York: American Book Co. 1954. Pp. ix, 595. $5.75.)

A textbook in which principles and problems are treated sometimes with reference to local government in general, sometimes with reference to a particular unit. The municipality is given more extensive consideration than other units.

Newton D. Baker and His Books. By WILLIS THORNTON. (Cleveland: The Press of Western Reserve University. 1954. Pp. 85.)

A reproduction of selected comments written by Newton D. Baker on the margins of many of the books in his large personal library, which was given after his death to the Cleveland College Library of Western Reserve University. The comments are woven together by the explanations of the author.

Building a Better Home Town: A Program of Community Self-Analysis and Self-Help. By H. CLAY TATE. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. xvi, 236. $3.50.)

A presentation of the merits of urban decentralization with reference to the small city rather than the metropolitan suburbs, and an analysis of the Central Illinois Community Betterment Program carried on cooperatively by The Daily Plantagraph of Bloomington and the University of Illinois, closing with a formula for community improvement based on this experience.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

• University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Harmon, M. Judd. Some Contributions of Harold L. Ickes. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.

Harrison, Robert W. Public Land Records of the Federal Government. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. September, 1954.

Hood, Ronald C. Reorganizing the Council of Economic Advisers. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1954.

Matthews, Donald R. United States Senators and the Class Structure. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

"Voluntary": A Concept in Expatriation Law. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

State Government

Action by the Legislatures—1954. State Government. July, 1954.

Cape, William H., and Edwin O. Stene. State Civil Service in Kansas. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1954.

Constitutional Debt Control in the States. Tax Foundation. 1954.

Friedman, Robert S. How States Find Out About Their Tourist Trade. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1954.

Graves, W. Brooke. Concepts of Legislative Power in State Constitutions. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1954.

Hague, John Allen. The Massachusetts Constitutional Convention: 1917–1919. New England Quarterly. June, 1954.

Macdonald, H. Malcolm. Texas Removes and Replaces a Judge. Journal of the American Judicature Society. August, 1954.

Olson, Russell E. Illinois Faces Redistricting. National Municipal Review. July, 1954.

Owen, Kimbrough. The Concept of Legislative Power in Louisiana Constitutions. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1954.

Pealy, Dorothee Strauss. A Statewide Census Every Five Years. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1954.

Thornton, H. V. An Outline of Oklahoma Government. Rickner's Book Store, Norman, Oklahoma. 1954.

Young, William H. Court Settles Apportionment. National Municipal Review. September, 1954.

Local Government

Blair, George S. County Government in Pennsylvania. County Officer. August, 1954.

———. A New Look at the "Dark Continent" of American Politics. County Officer. September, 1954.

A Brighter Future for America's Cities. (Report on Businessmen's Conference on Urban Problems.) Chamber of Commerce of the United States. 1954.

Daland, Robert T. A Brief Survey of Municipal Auditing Practices in Alabama.

Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1954.

———. Some Aspects of Municipal Utility Administration in Alabama. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama, and Alabama League of Municipalities. 1954.

Drury, James W. Township Government in Kansas. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1954.

Gove, Samuel K. A County Executive Officer. County Officer. September, 1954.

Hamilton, Randy H. Federal Legislation of Municipal Interest. Illinois Municipal Review. September, 1954.

McMillan, T. E., Jr. County Unit Road Administration in Texas. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1954.

Weiford, Douglas G. The Changing Role of the City Manager. Public Management. August, 1954.

Intergovernmental Relations

Cope, O. K., and M. D. Tarshes. Consolidation of City-County Health Functions in San Diego. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1954.

Federal Grant-in-Aid Programs. Report of the Committee on Social Legislation, Chamber of Commerce of the United States. 1954.

Hopkins, Arthur S. The Northeastern Forest Fire Protection Commission. State Government. September, 1954.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Boudin, Leonard B. The Immunity Bill. Georgetown Law Journal. May, 1954.

Boyer, William W., Jr. The Riddle of Double Jeopardy in Wisconsin; The Defendant's View. Wisconsin Law Review. May, 1954.

Brockelbank, W. J. The Role of Due Process in American Constitutional Law. Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

The Constitutional Prohibition of Bills of Attainder: A Waning Guaranty of Judicial Trial. Yale Law Journal. April, 1954.

Fetter, Frank W. Witch Hunt in the Lincoln Country. South Atlantic Quarterly. July, 1954.

Hallows, E. Harold, and J. R. DeWitt. The Need for Court Organization. Wisconsin Law Review. May, 1954.

Hook, Sidney. Security and Freedom. Confluence. June, 1954.

Horowitz, Harold W. Loyalty Tests for Employment in the Motion Picture Industry. Stanford Law Review. May, 1954.

Maslow, Will. Fair Procedure in Congressional Investigations: A Proposed Code. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

Mishkin, Paul J. Prophecy, Realism and the Supreme Court: The Development of Institutional Unity. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1954.

Report on Congressional Investigations. Special Committee on Individual Rights as Affected by National Security, American Bar Association. 1954.

Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. The Oppenheimer Case. Atlantic Monthly. October, 1954.

Scott, Austin W. State Criminal Procedure, the Fourteenth Amendment, and Prejudice. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1954.

Smith, James Morton. Alexander Hamilton, the Alien Law, and Seditious Libels. Review of Politics. July, 1954.

Sutherland, Arthur E. Segregation and the Supreme Court. Atlantic Monthly. July, 1954.

———. The Supreme Court and the Public School. Harvard Educational Review. Spring, 1954.

Wiener, Frederick Bernays. The New Supreme Court Practice: A Summary of the New Rules. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1954.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Compelling Appearance in Court: Administration of Bail in Philadelphia. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1954.

Davidson, Henry A. Psychiatrists in Administration of Criminal Justice. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. May-June, 1954.

Donnelly, Richard C. Comments and Caveats on the Wire Tapping Controversy. Yale Law Journal. April, 1954.

The Limits of Constitutional Inquiry on Habeas Corpus in Interstate Rendition. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1954.

Miller, Justin. Lawyers and Judges and Legal Aid. Journal of the American Judicature Society. June, 1954.

The Nature and Consequences of Forensic Misconduct in the Prosecution of a Criminal Case. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

Paulsen, Monrad G. The Fourteenth Amendment and the Third Degree. Stanford Law Review. May, 1954.

Rogers, William P. The Case for Wire Tapping. Yale Law Journal. April, 1954.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Backman, Jules, and Ernest Kurnow. Pricing of Government Services. National Tax Journal. June, 1954.

Berger, Raoul. Estoppel Against the Government. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1954.

Brandon, Michael. Sovereign Immunity of Government-Owned Corporations and Ships. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Davis, Ross D. The Federal Conflict of Interest Laws. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

Dirks, F. C. Recent Progress in the Federal Budget. National Tax Journal. June, 1954.

Engelbert, Ernest A. Some Essentials of Good Report Writing. Public Management. September, 1954.

Helstad, Orrin L., and Earl Sachse. A Study of Administrative Rule Making in Wisconsin. Wisconsin Law Review. May, 1954.

Hoover, John Edgar. Role of the FBI in the Federal Employee Security Program. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1954.

Kaplan, H. Eliot. U. S. Studies Pension Plans. National Municipal Review. September, 1954.

Manvel, Allen D. Regional Differences in the Scale of State and Local Government. National Tax Journal. June, 1954.

Ramey, James T., and John A. Erlewine. Mistakes and Bailouts of Suppliers under Government Contracts and Subcontracts—A Study of Doctrine, Practice and Adhesions. Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Ridley, Clarence E. Twenty Years of Management Training. Public Management. September, 1954.

Schwartz, Bernard. The Administrative Procedure Act in Operation. New York University Law Review. June, 1954.

Seidman, Harold. The Government Corporation: Organization and Controls. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1954.

Stahl, O. Glenn. Perspective on Promotion Policy. Public Personnel Review. July, 1954.

The State Courts and Delegation of Public Authority to Private Groups. Harvard Law Review. June, 1954.

Welch, Ronald B. Measuring the Optimum

Size of a Field Audit Staff. National Tax Journal. September, 1954.

Wengert, Norman, and John C. Honey. Program Planning in the U. S. Department of the Interior, 1946-1953. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1954.

Zeidler, Frank P. The Administrator and Public Policy. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1954.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

The American Medical Association: Power, Purpose, and Politics in Organized Medicine. Yale Law Journal. May, 1954.

Batlin, Robert. San Francisco Newspapers' Campaign Coverage; 1896, 1952. Journalism Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Christopherson, Richard. Regulating Political Activities of Public Employees. Personnel Report No. 543. Civil Service Assembly. 1954.

Dexter, Lewis Anthony. The Use of Public Opinion Polls by Political Party Organizations. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Glaser, William A. The Units of Political Action. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Goodman, William. Inherited Domain: Political Parties in Tennessee. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Tennessee. 1954.

Grimes, Marcene. Kansas Primaries: Our Nominating Process. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1954.

The Influence of Television on the 1952 Election. Miami University-Crosley Broadcasting Corporation Study. 1954.

Klein, Malcolm W., and Nathan Maccoby. Newspaper Objectivity in the 1952 Campaign. Journalism Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Larsen, Otto N., and Richard J. Hill. Mass Media and Interpersonal Communication in the Diffusion of a News Event. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Leonard, Sister Joan de Lourdes, C. S. J. Elections in Colonial Pennsylvania. William and Mary Quarterly. July, 1954.

Levin, Harvey J. Competition Among Mass Media and the Public Interest. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Maccoby, Eleanor E., Richard E. Matthews, and Anton S. Morton. Youth and Political Change. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Mason, Bruce. The Townsend Movement. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Prothro, James W. Public Interest Advertising—Hucksterism or Conservatism? The Social Studies. May, 1954.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

de Chazeau, Melvin G. Can We Avoid Depression in a Dynamic Economy? Harvard Business Review. July-August, 1954.

Highsaw, Robert B. Natural Resources and an Informed Public. Southern Public Administration Research Council. [1954.]

Kaufmann, John H. The Problem of Coordinating Price and Wage Programs in 1950-1953. Part 1. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1954.

Lepawsky, Albert. Public Power and Power Technology. Public Utilities Fortnightly. September 2, 1954.

Newcomer, Mabel. State and Local Financing in Relation to Economic Fluctuations. National Tax Journal. June, 1954.

Pricing. [Symposium.] Journal of Business. July, 1954.

Public or Private Power—Responsibilities of the FPC. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1954.

Riehm, J. W. Federal Taxation: Perspective during the Fifth Decade. Michigan Law Review. May, 1954.

Swift, Thomas P. What Does the New Atomic Energy Law Mean? Public Utilities Fortnightly. September 16, 1954.

United States Tax Policy. [Symposium.] Current History. August, 1954.

United States Trade Policy. [Symposium.] Current History. September, 1954.

Business and Labor

Bernstein, Irving. The Growth of American Unions. American Economic Review. June, 1954.

Condemnation of Public Utilities: A New York Statute and a New Approach. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

Cox, Archibald. Federalism in the Law of Labor Relations. Harvard Law Review. June, 1954.

———. The Role of Law in Labor Disputes. Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Craig, Peter S. A New Look at Section 416(b) of the Civil Aeronautics Act. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Spring, 1954.

Forkosch, Morris D. Government Impact on Labor-Management Relations: Past—

Present—Future. Labor Law Journal. August, 1954.

Hays, Paul R. Federalism and Labor Relations in the United States. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1954.

Jones, Edgar A., Jr. The Right to Picket—Twilight Zone of the Constitution. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1954.

McLane, Alfred E. Jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission over Production and Gathering of Gas. Tulane Law Review. April, 1954.

Ornati, Oscar. Union Discipline, Minority Rights and Public Policy. Labor Law Journal. July, 1954.

The Regulation of Natural Gas. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Summer, 1954.

Robinson, Edward Arthur. Federal Incorporation. Catholic University of America Press. 1954.

Sherman, Sidney. Boycotts, Strikes and Damages. Labor Law Journal. September, 1954.

Stocking, George W. The Rule of Reason, Workable Competition, and the Legality of Trade Association Activities. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1954.

Summers, Harold X., and Bernard Samoff. A New Look at the NLRA and Arbitration. Labor Law Journal. August, 1954.

Symposium on Cooperatives. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1954.

A Symposium on the Robinson-Patman Act. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1954.

Tax Treatment of Lobbying Expenses and Contributions. Harvard Law Review. June, 1954.

Tetreault, Francis L. Seamen, Seaworthiness, and the Rights of Harbor Workers. Cornell Law Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

United States Labor Policy. [Symposium.] Current History. July, 1954.

Van de Water, John R. Work Restrictions in Antitrust Legislation. Labor Law Journal. September, 1954.

Agriculture

Brandt, Karl. Farm Price Supports—Rigid or Flexible? American Enterprise Association. 1954.

Buck, Robert K. Beginning Farmers: A Vulnerable Group in American Agriculture. National Planning Association. 1954.

Leach, Richard H. The Federal Government and the Peanut Industry. Southern Economic Journal. July, 1954.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Andrews, William H., and Taulman A. Miller. Unemployment Benefits, Experience Rating, and Employment Stability. National Tax Journal. September, 1954.

Application of the Sherman Act to Housing Segregation. Yale Law Journal. June, 1954.

Next Steps in Racial Desegregation in Education. [Symposium.] Journal of Negro Education. Summer, 1954.

Public Assistance Today. [Symposium.] Social Service Review. June, 1954.

Public School Financing 1930-1954. Tax Foundation. 1954.

Schlenger, Jacques T. Disability Benefits under Section 22(b)(5). Virginia Law Review. June, 1954.

Segregation in the Public Schools—A Symposium. Journal of Public Law. Spring, 1954.

Thompson, Carey C. Unemployment Insurance in Texas. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1954.

Military Affairs and National Security

Davies, Paul L. A Business Look at the Army. Harvard Business Review. July-August, 1954.

Finletter, Thomas K. The Strength to Win. Atlantic Monthly. October, 1954.

———. When Russia Is Ready. Atlantic Monthly. September, 1954.

Coercion: A Defense to Misconduct While a Prisoner of War. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1954.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Drought Program. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Federal Grants for Fine Arts Programs and Projects. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. To Amend the Foreign Service Act of 1946. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Investigation of Racketeering in the Washington, D. C., Area. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Organization and Administration of the Military Research and Development Programs. House Report No. 2618. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Study of Overseas Administrative Personnel Problems. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on House Administration. Voting in the Armed Services. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2257. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Federal Cooperation in Non-Federal Projects. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st and 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. The Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Reorganization Plan of the United States Bureau of Mines. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Advertising of Alcoholic Beverages. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Amending Interstate Commerce Act (Segregation of Passengers). Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Health Reinsurance Legislation. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Composition and Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Grant of Immunity to Witnesses. House Report No. 2606. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Internal Security Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Federal Maritime Training Program. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Study of Operations of Military Sea Transportation Service. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 2672. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Federal Salaries and Classifications. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Public Works. Rivers and Harbors Omnibus Bill. Also Flood Control Omnibus Bill. Hearings before Subcommittees. Also House Report No. 2247. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Colonization of America's Basic Industries by the Communist Party of the U. S. A. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist

Activities in the Pacific Northwest. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist Activities in the State of California. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Investigation of Communist Activities in the State of Michigan. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Increase of Duty-Free Allowance to American Tourists. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Unemployment Insurance. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The Contribution of Atomic Energy to Medicine. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. S. 3323 and H. R. 8862, to Amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1946. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1699. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Congressional Action on Major Economic Recommendations of the President, 1954. Joint Committee Print. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Senate. Committee on Armed Services. Armed Services Security Cases. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Essentiality to the National Defense of the Domestic Horological Industry. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Historic Naval Vessels. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Reserve Officer Personnel Act of 1954. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Bank Holding Legislation. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Finance. Social Security Amendments of 1954. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 1987 and House Report No. 2679. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Federal Case Law Concerning the Security of the United States. Legal Survey by Library of Congress. Committee Print. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations and Committee on the Judiciary. Universal Copyright Convention and Implementing Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1936. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Payments in Lieu of Taxes to States or Local Taxing Units. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Special Senate Investigation on Charges and Countercharges Involving: Secretary of the Army Robert T. Stevens, John G. Adams, H. Struve Hensel and Senator Joe McCarthy, Roy M. Cohn, and Francis P. Carr. Hearing before Special Subcommittee on Investigations. Also Senate Report No. 2507. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Amend Civil Aeronautics Act Relating to Ratemaking Authority. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Liquor Advertising. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Merchant Marine Studies. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Private Financing of New Ship Construction. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. To Protect Rights of United States Vessels on High Seas and in Territorial Waters of Foreign Countries. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Communism in Labor Unions. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Communist Propaganda. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Return of Confiscated Property. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Strategy and Tactics of World Communism. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. To Control Illegal Migration. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Wiretapping for National Security. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Construction of School Facilities. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Financial Assistance to School Construction and Maintenance and Operation of Schools in Areas Affected by Federal Activities. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Group Hospital, Medical, and Other Personal Health Service Benefits for Federal Employees. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Group Life Insurance for Federal Employees. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Select Committee to Study Censure Charges. Report. Committee Print. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Other Federal

Atomic Energy Commission. In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer. Texts of Principal Documents and Letters. . . . Also: Transcript of Hearing before Personnel Security Board. ibid. 1954.

1954.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Governments Division. Summary of City Government Finances in 1953. 1954.

Department of the Interior. National Park Service. State Park Statistics—1953. 1954.

General Services Administration. National Archives. Select List of Documents in the Records of the National Recovery Administration. Compiled by Homer C. Calkin and Meyer H. Fishbein. 1954.

Housing and Home Finance Agency. Division of Housing Research. A Report on Administrative Procedures for Enforcement of Building Regulations. By Gilbert R. Barnhart. 1954.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Future of the House of Lords. EDITED BY SYDNEY D. BAILEY. (London: The Hansard Society. 1954. Pp. 180. 10/6.)

This symposium on the House of Lords first appeared in Parliamentary Affairs. By making it available in book form the Hansard Society furthers its splendid work of acquainting the public with all phases of parliamentary government.

There might be some question as to whether the title is not misleading, since this collection of articles deals but little with the future. The editor justifies the title by pointing out that knowledge of the past and present is essential to plans for the future. The book is important, nevertheless, not so much for what it reveals about the future of the House of Lords as for the light cast upon the development and operation of the British constitution by the examination of a major element of that constitution.

For example, the article by V. M. R. Goodman on "Appellate Jurisdiction" traces the history of the House of Lords as a judicial body. An excellent description is provided of the constitutional problems which faced the government in the 19th century when it began to appear that the Lord Chancellor was the only peer qualified to hear legal arguments. This impasse was solved by empowering the Crown to confer baronies for life on persons with high legal qualifications. Thus the House was enabled to remain the representative of the High Court of Parliament in judicial affairs. Again illustrating how the British constitution may develop, the author suggests that the Law Lords in moving from the House chamber to a committee room in 1947, to escape the noise of a pile driver used in rebuilding the Palace of Westminster, may have set in motion profound developments in the constitution. This "Appellate Committee's" sittings have continued in a separate room though the cause for moving has disappeared. While judgment is reserved for the House, the committee hears arguments without interference from the general business of Parliament.

Although the symposium covers most aspects of the House of Lords, including "The Queen in Parliament," "Should Peers be Paid?", and "The Delaying Power," the usefulness of the volume for a political scientist might have been increased by including an examination of the educational, vocational, and political characteristics of the peers. Also valuable would have been a statistical analysis of the bills delayed by the peers as well as an examination of the socio-economic background of recently created peers.

There is some unevenness of quality (and some repetition) among these articles, but many of them are valuable indeed. Sydney D. Bailey presents a well-documented account of "Life Peerages." R. W. Perceval's description of "The Origin and Development of the House of Lords" is a concise and scholarly survey of considerable merit. Lord Campion's discussion of "Second Chambers in Theory and Practice" is a sweeping and thoughtful analysis of second chambers in general. Classifying second chambers as "strong" (co-ordinate) or "useful" (limited), he examines those of most governments in the Western world. He concludes that a "useful" chamber may "perform its minor but valuable functions in a spirit of objectivity." His conclusions with regard to a "strong" second chamber are less sanguine, for he believes that "in the end party spirit will use its strength to kill its usefulness."

One of the most valuable features of this volume is the appendix. Here are to be found letters patent creating a baron; writs of summons to a new Parliament; An Act For the Abolishing the House of Peers, 1649; reports of the Bryce (1918) and Roseberry (1908) committees; The Parliament Acts, 1911 and 1948; and the statement issued by the conference of party leaders on the Parliament Bill, 1948.—JOHN R. WILLIAMS, West Virginia University.

Uruguay: Portrait of a Democracy. BY RUSSELL H. FITZGIBBON. (New Brunswick, N. J.: Rutgers University Press. 1954. Pp. xiv, 301. $5.75.)

In this worthwhile new book Russell Fitzgibbon paints a full-length and distinguished portrait of a small but remarkable South American nation. It is particularly fortunate that this study of Uruguay, a country in so many ways the exception to the rule among Latin-American states, was undertaken by a person of Professor Fitzgibbon's broad experience in the area, for he brings to it a rare ability to evaluate and to underline the differences which set Uruguay apart from its neighbors.

Here, as the author demonstrates, is a Latin-American country that has overcome the difficulties which beset its sister-states and achieved its own type of democracy, based on a politically responsible government that administers progressive social legislation honestly and faithfully and that participates in a broadly conceived and expanding semi-socialistic economy for the benefit of the general population. Obviously, from the way he writes and the things he says, Professor Fitzgibbon approved most of the things he saw in Uruguay and found its citizens simpático. He points out certain weaknesses in the Uruguayan way of life, such as the disparity between the economic and social conditions found in Montevideo and those in the hinterland, but he tempers this with a higher proportion of favorable comments about life in a country whose citizens have, as he puts it, learned to enjoy themselves.

The book is not primarily a monograph on government as the title might seem to indicate; instead, as the dust jacket states, it is "an informal survey of the Switzerland of Latin America." Its pages are crowded with a wide range of things Uruguayan—geography, history, art, economics, politics, and the like, together with a liberal sprinkling of introductions to the persons past and present who have made these things what they are. Reading the book leaves one with a feeling of insight into the country and the people who inhabit it.

The three short chapters which deal specifically with politics and government demonstrate clearly that Professor Fitzgibbon has captured the sense of the political system of the orientales, as the Uruguayans call themselves. They also prove that by the author's or any other reasonable standard Uruguay deserves to be recognized as a democracy. Freedom of elections, effectiveness of justice, a strong legislature, the adoption of a collegial executive, all indicate a limited and responsible government.

Some readers may be disappointed that the author did not devote a greater portion of his book to the political system of Uruguay. The present book, however, does supply a wealth of material upon which Professor Fitzgibbon or some other student may build a specifically political study in the future. Certainly the stated objective of presenting a comprehensive picture of Uruguay has been accomplished. No one can demand more of a writer than that he do what he set out to do.

A short but inclusive bibliography adds to the value of the study.—ROBERT E. SCOTT, University of Illinois.

Interpretación de la Historia de Sudamerica. BY ARTURO VILELA. (La Paz, Bolivia: Biblioteca Pacena. 1953. Pp. 230.)

This is without doubt the best short interpretative essay on the political development of the Spanish-speaking republics of South America to be found in any language. It has so much to commend it that it is difficult to know where to begin. The author is an exceptionally able young Bolivian social scientist who did his graduate work in political science at Northwestern University. His book shows a mastery of research techniques used in this country. With some minor exceptions, the footnoting and bibliography of over 200 sources demonstrate use of the standard and classic sources (in Spanish, English, and French) relevant to the subject. Vilela writes so lucidly that the reader with only a rudimentary knowledge of Spanish will have no trouble in understanding the major ideas. At the same time his graceful style will be a pleasure to those who know Spanish well.

It is the author's contention that the political evolution of the Latin-American countries can best be understood through evaluation of sociological, economic, and historical factors. He therefore dismisses as inadequate and naive the efforts of a fairly large number of Latin-American intellectuals to explain political development in terms of the class struggles. He is aware of the importance of social classes, of course. Indeed, his sections on the criteria of class (race, culture, possession of wealth) and the relationship of classes to politics is certainly one of the best short treatments available. The book is organized chronologically—colonial period, independence, nineteenth century, the present time.

Dr. Vilela is concerned throughout with the dynamics of change. The theme that runs through every historical period, however, is the struggle of the Latin-American countries to free themselves from the hierarchical, authoritarian, absolutist nature of political, social, and economic institutions of the colonial period. His abstracts of the political thinking of the men of the independence period are excellent. It is hard to point to better analyses of the classic nineteenth-century thinkers, men such as the Argentines Alberdi and Sarmiento, the Ecuadorian Montalvo, the Chilean Lastarria, the Bolivian René Moreno, the Cuban José Martí, and others. The author believes that men like Lastarria of Chile, Alem of Argentina, Batlle of Uruguay, and Aquileo Ortiz Parra of Colombia established bases for the development of the liberal-democratic state. However, whereas the upper-middle elite understood both the theory and the practice of democracy, the masses did not. Traditional liberalism failed to achieve the successes for which it is noted in England and in the United States. The emphasis at present among major Latin-American thinkers, and certainly among those who call themselves "liberals," is not on political democracy but on what is frequently referred to as economic democracy. Intervention of the state in economic affairs ("dirigismo") is the outstanding characteristic of modern political theory in the Latin-American countries. The "liberal" or revolutionary thus tends to be a statist. The supporter of liberal democracy and economic capitalism is a conservative or reactionary.

The author is inclined to believe that Dr.

Vilela has correctly analyzed and evaluated the political thinking of leading men in the South American countries. However, it is ironical that after a century and a half of seeking liberty and freedom the principles of state centralization, regulation, and control associated with the colonial period should reappear as the creed of the modern-day liberal! —WILLIAM S. STOKES, University of Wisconsin.

The Dynamics of Democratic Government. BY JOHN P. ROCHE AND MURRAY S. STEDMAN, JR. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. ix, 445. $5.00.)

A comparative study of democratic government in the United States, Great Britain, and France with a functional approach. The main subjects considered are the basis of democratic government, political parties, interest groups, electoral systems, the legislative, administrative, and judicial processes, the regulation of economic activity, and the conduct of foreign affairs.

Why Dictators? The Causes and Forms of Tyrannical Rule since 600 B.C. BY GEORGE W. F. HALLGARTEN. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1954. Pp. xiii, 379. $5.50.)

The purpose of this book, in the author's own words, is to "prove that there were typical situations—both economic and social—in which certain kinds of dictatorships arose, and were indeed bound to do so whenever the basic situation repeated itself." In support of his thesis the author offers an all-embracing "comparative social diagnosis" of the various dictatorial régimes from the tyrants of ancient Greece and Rome through the dictatorships of the Middle Ages and the "ultra-revolutionary" dictators in the 18th and 19th century revolutions to the dictatorial systems of today, including such recent additions as Mao Tse-tung, Malenkov, Tito, and Egypt's Naguib.

Art under a Dictatorship. BY HELLMUT LEHMANN-HAUPT. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. xv, 277. $5.50.)

A study of the abuse of art for the purposes of political ideology and propaganda under the Nazi rule in Germany. Three concluding chapters deal, briefly, with the postwar situation in Germany, with the fate of art in the Soviet-controlled part of Germany, and with the exploitation of art by the Communist rulers in the Soviet Union.

Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations. By KJELD PHILIP. (Copenhagen: Ejnar Munksgaard. 1954. Pp. 171.)

A short comparative study by an economist at the University of Copenhagen of grants-in-aid to local government, covering several European countries, England, and the United States. This is not a comprehensive survey of the subject, but rather a consideration of the general topic of centralization and an exploration of several of the problems arising from fiscal relationships.

Public Administration Organizations: A Directory of Unofficial Organizations in the Field of Public Administration in the United States and Canada. (Chicago: Public Administration Clearing House. 1954. Pp. xi, 150. $2.50.)

Though similar in arrangement to previous editions, the seventh edition of this directory confines the listings more closely to national organizations directly identified with some field of public service, omitting state and provincial associations.

Catalogue of Papers Printed by Order of the House of Commons, 1731-1800. (London: H. M. Stationery Office. 1953. Pp. ix, 101. £1 1s. 0d.)

Shortly after 1801, when the collecting and binding of annual sets of the papers presented to the House of Commons was initiated, four sets were collected of all previous papers available from 1731 through 1800, and bound in 110 volumes. The original Catalogue of these made-up sets was printed in a small edition in 1807, and has been out of print for many years. The facsimile reprint of the Catalogue in 1953 may make it desirable to consider making positive microfilm prints of the original collections more generally available from the microfilm negative on file in the Library of Congress.—J.B.C.

The Home Office. By SIR FRANK NEWSAM. (London: Allen & Unwin; New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. 224. New Whitehall Series. 15s.)

The first volume of the New Whitehall series deals with one of the oldest departments of state, and has been prepared by the permanent under-secretary of state for the Home Department. At the end of the volume is given a table of the Secretaries of State for the Home Department from 1782, and also of the parliamentary under-secretaries of state and of the permanent under-secretaries. The series is being edited by Sir Robert Fraser under the auspices of the Royal Institute of Public Administration.—J.B.C.

Consolidated Index to Government Publications, 1946-1960. (London: H. M. Stationery Office. 1954. Pp. 162. 6s.)

Beginning with the year 1936, the British annual Government Publications Consolidated List, covering the publications issued for sale by H. M. Stationery Office, has been paged continuously by five-year periods. The above is the third of the five-year indexes. Thus, the annual catalogues from 1936 through 1950 can now be bound in three five-year volumes, the temporary annual indexes which have been excluded from the pagination being discarded.—J.B.C.

Members of the Long Parliament. By D. BRUNTON AND D. H. PENNINGTON. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xxi, 256, $4.25.)

The Long Parliament, 1640-1641: A Biographical Study of Its Members. By MARY FREAR KEELER. (Philadelphia: The American Philosophical Society. 1954. Pp. ix, 410. $6.00.)

The first of these books is an analytical study of the Long Parliament based upon biographical data with respect to all 800 of its members who sat between 1640 and 1653. The second is primarily an elaborate biographical dictionary of the 547 members who sat during the first year of the Long Parliament, 1640-1641, with introductory chapters on the body as a whole and on the elections in which it was chosen.

A Short History of Parliament: 1295-1642. By FAITH THOMPSON. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1953. Pp. x, 280. $4.50.)

A readable account of the growth of the English Parliament up to the time of the English Revolution. It is particularly valuable to the scholarly reader for the integration of some recent views of British and American historians into the traditional framework.

British Politics and the American Revolution. By CHARLES R. RITCHESON. (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 1954. Pp. xv, 320. $4.00.)

A scholarly inquiry into political developments in Britain during the period of the Revolution and the reasons for the split in opinion that brought on the conflict. The volume will serve as a useful corrective to some of the distortions in the traditional American explanations of the period.

The Constitution of Sweden. TRANSLATED BY SARAH V. THORELLI WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ELIAS HÅSTAD. (Stockholm: Ivar Haeggströms Boktryckeri. 1954. Pp. 110. Documents published by the Royal Ministry for Foreign Affairs, New Series, II: 4. 7 Sw. crowns.)

The Swedish Constitution is not a single document, but four fundamental laws embodying the constitutional provisions. The English translation presents these four, The Instrument of Government, the Riksdag Act, the Act of Succession, and the Freedom of the Press Act, all as amended through 1953.—J.B.C.

French Institutions: Values and Politics. BY SAUL K. PADOVER WITH THE COLLABORATION OF FRANÇOIS GOGUEL, LOUIS ROSENSTOCK-FRANCK AND ERIC WEIL. (Stanford: University Press. 1954. Pp. vi, 102.)

Themes In French Culture: A Preface to a Study of French Community. BY RHODA MÉTRAUX AND MARGARET MEAD. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 120. $1.50.)

Two Hoover Institute studies containing much valuable background information helpful for the proper understanding of French political behavior and the operation of French political institutions. The first-named study in particular could serve as useful collateral reading in courses on French government and politics.

Protestantism and Politics in France. BY STUART R. SCHRAM. (Alençon, France: Imprimerie Corbière & Jugain. 1954. Pp. viii, 272. $2.50.)

While a great deal has been written on Catholicism and politics in France, the opposite is true of the impact of Protestantism on French politics. Mr. Schram's dissertation is therefore a welcome contribution to the study of a field hitherto greatly neglected.

Handbuch für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 1953. BY THE BUNDESMINISTERIUM DES

INNERN. (Köln-Berlin: C. Heymanns Verlag K. G. 1953. Pp. 247.)

The first official directory of the Federal Republic of Germany is much after the pattern of the former Handbuch für das Deutsche Reich, which last appeared in 1938. It includes information about the Parliament, executive and other agencies, diplomatic and consular representatives, and federal organizations of cities, of "Landkreise," and "Landgemeinde." There are indexes by agency and by person.—J.B.C.

Administration et Politique en Allemagne Occidentale. BY ALFRED GROSSER, ET AL. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1954. Pp. xxi, 247.)

This is the first in a series of studies on the government and politics of Western Germany by the Centre d'Études Des Relations Internationales of the French Foundation of Political Science. The present volume contains contributions by both French and German scholars and administrators. It consists of several "case" studies of governmental systems of selected German states and cities, preceded by a general review of the work of the first federal legislature (1949-1953) and followed by a useful bibliography of German sources. It is a valuable contribution to the literature on the political system of the West German Republic and its subdivisions.

Toward Understanding Germany. BY ROBERT H. LOWIE. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 396. $6.00.)

A study of the social psychology of the German people by a professor emeritus of anthropology at the University of California. Basing the study mainly upon his recent field study in Western Germany, the author analyzes the attitudes and behavior of various social groups, discusses family life and relations, and covers such political topics as particularism, nationalism, anti-semitism and the German attitude toward democracy and dictatorship.

The Federal Constitution of Switzerland: With German Texts. TRANSLATION AND COMMENTARY BY CHRISTOPHER HUGHES. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. 223. $4.00.)

The usefulness of this concise volume lies mainly in the running commentaries which are appended to almost every article of the constitution. The book includes also verbatim translations of the 1902 law on the relations between the councils and of the 1939 decree on emergency powers.

The Ideology and Program of the Peruvian Aprista Movement. BY HARRY KANTOR. (Berkeley: University of California. 1953. Pp. v, 163. Paper, $2.00; cloth, $3.00.)

A sympathetic account of the Aprista movement in Peru, whose program advocated "the reconstruction of social and economic institutions" within the democratic framework. Following a short and disastrous tenure of governmental participation, and the 'detention' in the Colombian Embassy of its leader, Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre, the movement has virtually collapsed.

Jawaharlal Nehru's Speeches, 1949-1953. (Delhi: Publications Division, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting. 1954. Pp. x, 586. $2.50.)

The selection of the more significant of the Indian Prime Minister's speeches and writings covering the period August, 1949 to February, 1953 is arranged in a topical fashion. Messages, broadcasts, and articles are included. The message on the inauguration of the Republic, January 26, 1950, furnishes introduction. The volume is a sequel to the Indian Prime Minister's collection entitled Independence and After, published in 1949, including his more important speeches from September, 1946 to May, 1949.—J.B.C.

Some Characteristics of the Indian Constitution: Being Lectures Given in the University of Madras during March 1952 under the Sir Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyer Shashtiabda-poorthi Endowment. BY SIR IVOR JENNINGS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. 86. $1.25.)

A famous British authority on constitutions concludes in these brief lectures that India has laid up trouble for itself in a Constitution that is too long, too detailed, and thus too rigid, and that claims to create a federal system while endowing the central government with extensive power.

The Viet-Minh Regime; Government and Administration in the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. BY BERNARD B. FALL. (Ithaca: Cornell University Southeast Asia Program. 1954. Pp. ix, 143. $1.75.)

An important description and analysis of the Vietminh regime in Indochina. The author, a French citizen who has done advanced work in American universities, had access to official government documents and other sources in Vietnam.

Far Eastern Governments and Politics: China and Japan. BY PAUL M. A. LINEBARGER, DJANG CHU, ARDATH W. BURKS. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Co. 1954. Pp. x, 630. $6.50.)

The first postwar text on the governments of these countries. The emphasis is heavily historical: of the 250 pages on China, only 50 treat the Communist government; of the 290 pages devoted to Japan, 100 are on postwar and only 20 on post-occupation Japan. Among the useful appendices are the Chinese Organic Law and the Japanese Constitution.

A Selected List of Books and Articles on Japan in English, French and German. COMPILED BY HUGH BORTON, SERGE ELISSEFF, WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD AND JOHN C. PELZEL. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 272. $5.00.)

Revised and enlarged edition of a 1940 volume, containing the titles of over 1700 books and articles, and divided into sections dealing with geography, history, economics, sociology, language, literature, etc.

A Survey of Local Government in the Philippines. BY JOHN H. ROMANI AND M. LADD THOMAS. (Manila: University of the Philippines, Institute of Public Administration. 1954. Pp. iii, 151.)

A descriptive handbook, dealing with organization, offices, procedures, finances, judiciary, city services, central-local relations, etc.

Colonial Development and Population in Taiwan. BY GEORGE W. BARCLAY. (Princeton, Princeton University Press. 1954. Pp. xviii, 273. $5.00.)

When the Japanese, at the beginning of the century, undertook to improve the conditions of life in Taiwan in order to make of the island a profitable colony, they incidentally collected valuable population statistics; these statistics constitute the basic material of this book. They clearly show that the Japanese occupation inaugurated a period of population increase so rapid that if long continued it can only end in disaster.

Le Droit Soviétique: Tome I. Les Données Fondamentales du Droit Soviétique. Tome II. Le Droit et L'Évolution de la Société Dans L'U.R.S.S. By RENÉ DAVID AND JOHN N. HAZARD. (Paris: Librairie Generale de Droit et de Jurisprudence. 1954. Pp. viii, 366; 409.)

These volumes form part of a series on contemporary legal systems published by the Institute of Comparative Law of the University of Paris. The first, by René David of the University of Paris faculty of law, deals with the fundamental concepts of Soviet law as viewed philosophically and juristically by a student of the Civil Law. The division of his work falls into four parts dealing successively with the Russian legal tradition, the Marxian theory of law, sources of Soviet law, and the organization of the courts and legal profession. The second volume, by John N. Hazard, is a translation, with the omission of Chapter XI, of Law and Social Change in the USSR reviewed in this REVIEW, vol. 48, pp. 541-44. Since each author originally presented his work in lecture form, the approach is more generalized and elementary than is the case in some of the recent detailed studies of Soviet law. Mention should be made of the excellent bibliography appended to the second volume and covering the literature published on the subject in six languages since 1941.

Challenge in Eastern Europe. EDITED BY C. E. BLACK. (New Brunswick, N. J.: Rutgers University Press. 1954. Pp. xviii, 276. $4.00.)

A collection of twelve essays on selected Eastern European political and economic topics of today and of the recent past. Written partly by American scholars and partly by exiled Eastern European statesmen.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

General

Almond, G. A. Research in Comparative Politics. Items. March, 1954.

Blagojevic, B. T. Le Droit Comparé. Méthode ou Science. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. October-December, 1953.

Borges de Carvalho, R. Do Contrôles Jurisdicional da Administração Pública. Revista do Serviço Público. September, 1953.

Chroust, A. H. The Managerial Function of Law. Boston University Law Review. June, 1954.

Clavero Arévalo, M. F. Eficacia y Garantía en la Administración. Arbor. March, 1954.

Cuesta, S. La Crisis de la Democracia y la Técnica de la Representación Ciudadana. Politeia. Nos. 1-2, 1953.

Fagoaga G. Solana, M. Democracia, Totalitarismo y Corporativismo. Cuadernos de Política Social. No. 3, 1953.

Fusillier, R. L'Évolution des Partis Communistes. Revue Socialiste. July, 1954.

Garrido Falla, F. Las Transformaciones del Concepto Jurídico de Policía Administrativa. Revista de Administración Pública. May-August, 1953.

Gascón Hernández, I. Los Fines de la Administración. Revista de Administración Pública. May-August, 1953.

Jaeger, H. Die Weltsituation des Sozialismus. Deutsche Rundschau. March, 1954.

Jones, W. H. M. In Defense of Apathy: Some Doubts on the Duty to Vote. Political Studies. February, 1954.

Mackenzie, W. J. M. Representation in Plural Societies. Political Studies. February, 1954.

Seeldrayers, Ed.-P. L'Évolution du Droit Administratif. Déclin ou Renaissance? Revue de l'Institut de Sociologie. Nos. 2-3, 1953.

Vieg, J. A. La Teoria dell'Amministrazione Democratica. Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. February, 1954.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Butler, D. E. Some Notes on the Nature of British Political Parties. Occidente. March-April, 1954.

Chambers, F. P. Interest Groups and Foreign Affairs. Year Book of World Affairs. 1954.

Chapman, D. What Prospects for the Labour Party? Political Quarterly. July-September, 1954.

Cooper, Lord. Administrative Justice. Public Administration. Summer, 1954.

Donnison, D. V. The Functions of Local Labour Parties. Political Studies. June, 1954.

Edwards, H. W. J. The Course of Welsh Nationalism Today. Dublin Review. Third Quarter, 1954.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Health Services in Britain. London, 1954.

———. Local Government in Britain. London, 1954.

———. Universities in Britain. London, 1954.

Griffiths, R. The Role of the British Civil Servant in Policy Formation. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. March, 1954.

Hanson, A. H. Labour and the Public Corporation. Public Administration. Summer, 1954.

Leibholz, G. Estado y Sociedad en Inglaterra. Revista de Estudios Políticos, March-April, 1954.

McKelvey, J. T. The "Closed Shop" Controversy in Postwar Britain. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. July, 1954.

Maddick, H. Local Government: Reorganization or Reform. Political Quarterly. July-September, 1954.

Nottage, R. Organisation and Methods in the Smaller Public Authority. Public Administration. Summer, 1954.

Richards, P. G. County Administration of Planning Controls. Political Studies. February, 1954.

Robson, W. A. La Législation Sociale en Angleterre. Revue Syndicale Suisse. January, 1954.

Shils, E. The Meaning of the Coronation. Sociological Review. December, 1953.

Slessor, H. Anglo-Catholic Sociology. Blackfriars. July-August, 1954.

Taylor, R. W. Central Economic Coordination in British Government. Social Research. Summer, 1954.

Colonial Areas

Carnell, F. G. Constitutional Reform and Elections in Malaya. Pacific Affairs. September, 1954.

Hanrahan, G. Z. The Communist Struggle in Malaya. New York, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1954.

Oetting, W. Nigerien—Afrikas Volks-reichstes Land. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. July, 1954.

Report by the Resumed Conference on the Nigerian Constitution. London, H.M.S.O., 1954. (Cmd. 9059).

Commonwealth of Nations

Alexandrowicz, C. H. Is India a Federation? International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1954.

Cowen, Z. Die Entwicklung der Australischen Verfassung von 1901 bis 1951. Jahrbuch des Öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart. N.F. Bd. 3.

Ganguli, B. N. India and the Commonwealth: Economic Relations. India Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Griffiths, P. The Republics of the Indian Subcontinent. Asian Review. April, 1954.

Hartnell, B. W. Current Problems in Commonwealth Administration. Public Administration (Sydney). December, 1953.

Keon, S. M. Parliamentary Control of Departments. Public Administration (Sydney). March, 1954.

Lichtblau, G. E. The Politics of Trade Union Leadership in Southern Asia. World Politics. October, 1954.

Limaye, M. Indian Communism: the New Phase. Pacific Affairs. September, 1954.

McHenry, D. E. Formal Recognition of the Leader of the Opposition in Parliaments of the British Commonwealth. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1954.

McWhinney, E. Legislative Power in Federal Constitutional Systems—the Experience of Commonwealth Countries. Louisiana Law Review. June, 1954.

Mallory, J. R. Cabinet Government in Canada. Political Studies. June, 1954.

Ornati, O. Indian Trade Unions Since Independence. Far Eastern Survey. August, 1954.

Pakistan: Problems of Partition. Round Table. September, 1954.

Palit, D. K. Manpower and Modern Arms. U.S.I. Journal. April, 1954.

Parry, C. Citizenship with Special Reference to India. India Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Penfold, J. The New Zealand Labour Party. Political Science (Wellington). March, 1954.

Prause, F.-M. La Situation Politique de l'Islam au Pakistan. L'Afrique et l'Asie. No. 3, 1954.

Robson, W. A. India as a Welfare State. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1954.

Roll, C. Rechts- und Linksradikalismus in Indien. Aussenpolitik. July, 1954.

Ross, A. D. French and English Canadian Contacts and Institutional Change. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1954.

Schenkman, A. S. The Universities of India. Australian Quarterly. March, 1954.

Sharma, B. R. Reflections on Parliamentary Government in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1954.

Sharma, S. R. An Appraisal of Appleby Report on Public Administration in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. January-March, 1954.

South Africa: Bantu Legislation. Round Table. September, 1954.

Spain, J. W. New Trends in Pakistan. Foreign Policy Bulletin. July 1, 1954.

Thistle, M. The National Research Council. Ottawa, Department of National Defence, 1954.

Vakil, C. N. Economic Outlook in India and the Budget for 1954-55. Indian Economic Journal. April, 1954.

Weiner, H. E. The Reduction of Communist Power in the Australian Trade Unions: a Case Study. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1954.

Western Europe

Abbamonte, G. Osservazioni sul Diritto al Lavoro. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. January-March, 1954.

Aperçu sur les Problèmes Sociaux en Italie. I. Notes et Études Documentaires. January 30, 1954.

Becher, H. Spaniens Ringen um Geistige Ordnung. Stimmen der Zeit. April, 1954.

Biays, P. L'Appareillement des Listes Électorales. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. April-June, 1954.

Broglie, J. de. Le Conseil de la République devant la Réforme Constitutionnelle. Revue des Deux Mondes. February 1, 1954.

Chapman, B. Recent French Administrative Reforms. Public Administration. Summer, 1954.

Chubb, B. Vocational Representation and the Irish Senate. Political Studies. June, 1954.

Colliard, C. A. Politique et Législation Fiscales. Revue d'Économie Politique. July-October, 1954.

Coulbois, P. Le Budget, la Trésorerie et la Dette Publique. Revue d'Économie Politique. July-October, 1954.

Diamant, A. The Département, the Prefect, and Dual Supervision in French Administration. Journal of Politics. August, 1954.

Eastman, S. The Influence of Government on Labour Relations in France. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1954.

Eula, E. Rassegna di Giurisprudenza in Materia Costituzionale. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. January-March, 1954.

Les Fonctions de la Banque de France. Notes et Études Documentaires. February 18, 1954.

Friiz, H. Trends in Social Welfare in Denmark since 1933. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. June-July, 1954.

Galeotti, S. Sull'Elezion dei Giudici della Corte Costituzionale di Competenza del Parlamento. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. January-March, 1954.

Gasparri, P. Appunti per una Classificazione Generale delle Disfunzioni Amministrative. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. January-March, 1954.

Goguel, F. Political Instability in France. Foreign Affairs. October, 1954.

Gruner, E. Wirtschaftsverbände und Staat. Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Volkswirtschaft und Statistik. March, 1954.

Guyon, J. R. La Réforme Administrative. Revue Socialiste. March, 1954.

Heil, A. Skizze des Schweizerischen Gewerkschaftswesens. Politica. Nos. 3-4, 1953.

Henry, L. La Situation Démographique de la France. Revue d'Économie Politique. July-October, 1954.

Iturriz, J. La Sociologia Religiosa en Europa. Revista Internacional de Sociologia. July-September, 1953.

Kuuskoski, R. Appeal from Government Decisions in Finland. Nordisk Administrativ Tidsskrift. No. 1, 1954.

Lange, H. Administrative Problems of the Norwegian Foreign Service. Nordisk Administrativ Tidsskrift. No. 1, 1954.

LaPalombara, J. G. Left-Wing Trade Unionism: the Matrix of Communist Power in Italy. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.

Laufenburger, H. Aspects Politique, Économique et Social de la Réforme de la Fiscalité Française. Économie Internationale (Genova). November, 1953.

Leoni, A. La Situazione Religiosa in Italia. Realtà Sociale d'Oggi. November-December, 1953.

Matthews, H. L. Spain: a Static Nation. Foreign Policy Bulletin. August 15, 1954.

Miele, G. Italian Administrative Law. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1954.

Ministère de l'Intérieur. France-Documents. February, 1954.

Mirkine-Guetzévitch, B. Constitutional Reform in France. Political Quarterly. July-September, 1954.

Modificación de la Ley de Bases de Régimen Local. Revista de Estudios de la Vida Local. November-December, 1953.

L'Organisation et la Vie Communales en France. Notes et Études Documentaires. February 2, 1954.

Panter-Brick, S. K. Constitutional Monarchy: a Comment on a Belgian Practice. Cambidge Journal. July, 1954.

Pellier, J. L'Union Française d'Outre-Mer. Revue d'Économie Politique. July-October, 1954.

Pischel, G. I Partiti Politici Italiani, Oggi. Occidente. March, 1954.

Recent Social Security Developments in the Netherlands. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. June-July, 1954.

Rodgers, B. Social Security in France (II). Public Administration. Spring, 1954.

Schnur, R. Die Krise des Begriffs der Services Publics im Französischen Verwaltungsrecht. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. August, 1954.

Trotabas, L. La Législation Fiscale Française, 1951-1953. Bulletin for International Fiscal Documentation. No. 5, 1953.

Tuominen, A. The Northern Countries and Communism. Norskman. July-August, 1954.

Tutsch, H. E. Communism in Italy. Swiss Review of World Affairs. July, 1954.

Williams, P. M. The French Party System. Occidente. March-April, 1954.

..... Problems of the Fourth Republic. Political Studies. February, 1954.

Central Europe

Adenauer, K. The Development of Parliamentary Institutions in Germany since 1945. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1954.

Aycoberry, P. La Démocratie Chrétienne en Allemagne. Cahiers des Groupes Reconstruction. January, 1954.

Buchheim, H. Zur Nationalsozialistischen Apologetik. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. April, 1954.

Cook, H. Adult Education in Citizenship in Postwar Germany. New York, Fund for Adult Education, 1954.

Ehinké, H. Verfassungsänderung und Verfassungsdurchbrechung. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. August, 1954.

Federer, J. Das Böhmer Grundgesetz und die Rechtsprechung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. Jahrbuch des Öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart. N.F. Bd. 3.

Frei, O. Administrative Reforms in the Soviet Zone of Germany. Swiss Review of World Affairs. April, 1954.

Gollwitzer, H. Parties and "Weltanschauungen" in the Federal Republic of Western Germany. Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik. July, 1954.

Herz, J. H. German Officialdom Revisited: Political Views and Attitudes of the West German Civil Service. World Politics. October, 1954.

Kutsch, H. Übernahme des Begriffs "Service Public" ins Deutsche Recht? Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. August, 1954.

Maetzsche, E. O. Die Parteisprache in der Sowjetzone. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. October, 1953.

Nipperdey, H. C. The Development of Labour Law in the Federal Republic of Germany since 1945 (II). International Labour Review. August, 1954.

Die Veränderungen der Deutschen Bevölkerungsstruktur 1939 bis 1953. Europa Archiv. March 5, 1954.

Vialon, F. K. Die Stellung des Finanzministers. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. April, 1954.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Artemyev, V. P. Political Controls in the Soviet Army. New York, Research Program on the U.S.S.R., No. 6, 1954.

Bauer, R. A. The Psycho-Cultural Approach to Soviet Studies. World Politics. October, 1954.

Bock, E. The Soviet Welfare State. Contemporary Review. July, 1954.

Braham, R. L. The New Constitution of Rumania. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1954.

A Broad Survey of Soviet Science and its Tasks. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. August 18, 1954.

Caballero, E. G. Perspectiva de Rumania. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.

- Caroe, O. Sources of Soviet Power. National and English Review. July, 1954.
- Ferraris di Celle, G. I Musulmani nell'Unione Sovietica. Civitas. June, 1954.
- Gorove, S. The New Polish Constitution. Washington University Law Quarterly. June, 1954.
- Gradoboev, V. Composition of the Supreme Soviet in 1954. Journal of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. No. 4, 1954.
- Klees, A. Ethnogenese—eine Neue Sowjetwissenschaft. Osteuropa. June, 1954.
- Kohn, H. Panslawismus in und nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. July, 1954.
- Laeuen, H. Der Polnische Parteikongress. Osteuropa. June, 1954.
- Long, J. F. L. Russia's Railways. Air Power. Summer, 1954.
- Meissner, B. Sowjetunion—Innenpolitik—Neuwahl des Obersten "Sowjetparlaments" und Parteisäuberungen—ein Jahr Personeller Veränderungen. Osteuropa, June, 1954.
- . Sowjetunion—Innenpolitik—Verwaltungsumbau—Administrativ-Territoriale Gliederung. Osteuropa. August, 1954.
- Miller, J. Soviet Documents; September 1952–December 1953. Soviet Studies. April, 1954.
- Moodie, A. E. Agrarian Reform in East Central Europe. Year Book of World Affairs. 1954.
- La République Populaire d'Albanie. Notes et Études Documentaires. March 2, 4 and 6, 1954.
- Roth, P. Die Sowjetische Tagespresse. Stimmen der Zeit. August, 1954.
- Samdomirsky, V. The Spirit of the New Soviet Middle Class. Russian Review. July, 1954.
- Schepky, E. R. Bulgarien: der VI. Kongress der Bulgarischen KP. Osteuropa. August, 1954.
- Schlesinger, R. Soviet Law and Soviet Society. Soviet Studies. July, 1954.
- Schultz, L. Die Verfassungsentwicklung Polens seit 1944. Jahrbuch des Öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart. N.F. Bd. 3.
- Scott, D. J. R. The Development of Local Government: Yugoslavia's Experience. Journal of African Administration. July, 1954.
- Seraphim, P. H. Bevölkerungsverschiebungen im Baltischen Raum. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. July, 1954.
- Six-Month Report on the National Economy. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. September 1, 1954.
- Slapnicka, H. Wissenschaftspolitik in den Volksdemokratien. Europa Archiv. March 5, 1954.
- Sokol, A. E. Le Potentiel de Guerre des Soviets. Articles et Documents. February 18, 1954.
- Soviet Planning. A Comparative Study. Calcutta, The Employers' Association, 1954.
- Sowjetunion—Landwirtschaft—Neulandgewinnung—das Neue Programm. Osteuropa. August, 1954.
- Spulber, M. Soviet Undertakings and Soviet Mixed Companies in Eastern Europe. Journal of Central European Affairs. July, 1954.
- Stein, W. Die Zeitung in der Sowjetunion. Politische Studien. August 15, 1954.
- Tucker, R. C. The Metamorphosis of the Stalin Myth. World Politics. October, 1954.
- U.S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. Tensions Within the Soviet Captive Countries: Czechoslovakia. 83d Cong., 1st sess. Senate Doc. No. 70, pt. 4.
- Von Senger, F. Sowjetische Kriegslehre. Aussenpolitik. March, 1954.
- Middle East and Africa*
- Abrahams, P. The Conflict of Culture in Africa. International Affairs. July, 1954.
- An African Press Survey. (1) West Africa. New Commonwealth. July 22, 1954.
- Ali, S. W. A. Muslim Brotherhoods. Royal Central Asian Journal. April, 1954.
- Bransby-Williams, M. E. Nationalism in the Middle and Far East. Military Review. March, 1954.
- Broadbent, P. B. Sudanese Self-Government. International Affairs. July, 1954.
- Cohen, W. J. Social Security in Israel. Social Security Bulletin. July, 1954.
- Colombe, M. Egypt from the Fall of King Farouk to the February 1954 Crisis. Middle Eastern Affairs. June–July, 1954.
- Dimock, M. E. U. N. Technical Assistance Activities in Turkey. March 1–May 31, 1954 (mimeo).
- Documents relatifs aux Réformes du Maroc. Notes et Études Documentaires. January 26, 28, 1954.
- Ferro, M. Quarante ans de Panislamisme. Études. April, 1954.
- Joesten, J. F. Tanger unter dem Regime der Generalkonsuln. Aussenpolitik. March, 1954.
- Kanev, I. National Insurance in Israel—the First Act. Bulletin of the International Social Security Association. May, 1954.

Lewis, B. Nationalism and Patriotism in the Middle East. World Affairs Interpreter. Summer, 1954.

Marii, S. La Réforme Agraire en Égypte. Revue Internationale du Travail. February, 1954.

Marzoratti, A. F. G. The Political Organisation and the Evolution of African Society in the Belgian Congo. African Affairs. April, 1954.

Nasser, G. A. el. The Philosophy of the Egyptian Revolution. Internationales Jahrbuch der Politik. July, 1954.

Reed, H. A. Revival of Islam in Secular Turkey. Middle East Journal. Summer, 1954.

Report of the Sudan Electoral Commission. London, H.M.S.O., 1954 (Cmd. 9058).

Report on Jordan. National and English Review. April, 1954.

Revenue Administration and Policy in Israel. New York, United Nations, Technical Assistance Programme, 1953.

Rondot, P. Les Structures Socio-Politiques de la Nation Libanaise. Revue Française de Science Politique. January-March, 1954.

Silvera, V. Le Protectorat en Tunisie et au Maroc. Revue Juridique et Politique de l'Union Française. July-September, 1953.

Von Boltho, A. Libyen: Idealismus und Strategie. Aussenpolitik. March, 1954.

Southeast Asia

Barton, W. Democracy and Communism in Asia. Quarterly Review. January, 1954.

Bartling, C. T. Les Populations d'Indonésie. Revue de Psychologie des Peuples. No. 1, 1954.

E. H. Burma, 1948-1954. British Survey. June, 1954.

Fall, B. B. Representative Government in the State of Vietnam. Far Eastern Survey. August, 1954.

———. The Viet-Minh Regime. Ithaca, Cornell University, Southeast Asia Program, Data Paper #14, 1954.

Feith, H. Toward Elections in Indonesia. Pacific Affairs. September, 1954.

Fischer, R. Ho Chi Minh: Disciplined Communist. Foreign Affairs. October, 1954.

Goodman, R. J. The Karen Problem in Burma. World Affairs Interpreter. Spring, 1954.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Economic Development in South and South East Asia. London, 1954.

Halle, D. G. E. Thoughts on the Chinese

Question in South East Asia. Asian Review. April, 1954.

Henderson, W. Communist Movement in South East Asia. Journal of International Affairs. No. 1, 1954.

Levi, W. Political Rivalries in Nepal. Far Eastern Survey. July, 1954.

Leyser, J. Legal Developments in Indonesia. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1954.

Lloyd, J. Planning a Welfare State in Burma. International Labour Review. August, 1954.

Mythical States in Indo-China. Economist. August 21, 1954.

Palmier, L. H. Modern Islam in Indonesia. Pacific Affairs. September, 1954.

Stanton, E. F. Spotlight on Thailand. Foreign Affairs. October, 1954.

Pacific and Far East

Chang, C. M. Five Years of Communist Rule in China. Foreign Affairs. October, 1954.

Franke, W. Die Stufen der Revolution in China. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. April, 1954.

Guelzo, C. Education and the Future of Japan. World Affairs Interpreter. Summer, 1954.

Levine, S. B. Prospects of Japanese Labor (II). Far Eastern Survey. July, 1954.

Major Bills at 19th Session (1)—Japan. Oriental Economist. July, 1954.

Poppe, N. The Mongolian People's Republic. Journal of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR. No. 4, 1954.

Romani, J. H. The Office of the Philippine President. Manila, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, 1954.

———. A Survey of Local Government in the Philippines. Manila, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, 1954.

Steiner, K. Local Government in Japan: Reform and Reaction. Far Eastern Survey. July, 1954.

Latin America

Cavalcanti, T. B. Le Droit Municipal au Brésil. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 2, 1954.

Flores, E. Land Reform in Bolivia. Land Economics. May, 1954.

Menez, J. Presidents and Constitutions in Americas. Mid-America. April, 1954.

Pendle, G. President Peron's Philosophy. Fortnightly. April, 1954.

Ramella, P. A. Derechos del Trabajador en la Constitución Argentina. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.

Reorganisation of Social Insurance in Brazil. Bulletin of the International Social Security

Association. June-July, 1954.

Tendencia de la Nueva Legislación de Banca Central en la América Latina. Revista de Derecho Mercantil. December, 1953.

Venezuela. Constitution of the Republic of Venezuela, 1953. Washington, Pan American Union, 1954.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

A Study of the Philosophy of International Law as Seen in Works of Latin American Writers. By H. B. JACOBINI. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff. 1954. Pp. viii, 158.)

This study is a successful attempt to extract the Latin-American attitudes toward international law from the works of 19th and 20th century writers. The first chapter gives a general survey of the philosophy of international law since the 15th century. With this background, Professor Jacobini discusses the works of Latin-American writers in Chapters II and III, classifying them into the traditional schools of international law—naturalist, positivist, and eclectic. His discussion is interesting and stimulating. He perhaps exaggerates when he says that most Latin-American writers are eclectic. Although this reviewer would not agree with the label attached to certain writers, in general the author's classifications are well-conceived and acceptable. He shows the enormous influence exercised by European publicists on Latin-American writers. Finally, in Chapter IV Professor Jacobini gives an exposition of the highly controversial American international law school. Conceding that there are legal rules and practices peculiar to the Western Hemisphere, he goes on to say that they are not enough to constitute a body of doctrine which would warrant the recognition of an American international law. He reveals that most Latin-American writers object to the American school.

The argument of the book is well-reasoned and the plan expertly executed. The author might well have given more attention to the attitude of contemporary Latin-American writers toward the protection of human rights. The views of the Brazilian Jorge Américo, which the author discusses briefly, are not representative enough to give an adequate idea of the exact nature of the Latin-American position. This matter is important, for Latin-American writers are perhaps the strongest supporters of an international covenant on human rights. The author narrowed his discussion greatly by merely showing each writer's attitude toward the idea of the individual as a subject of the law of nations.

In spite of this deficiency, Professor Jacobini should be congratulated for a scholarly and original study, enriched by an excellent bibliography. He has certainly made a major contribution toward the understanding of a regional interpretation of international law.—MANUEL R. GARCÍA-MORA, University of Detroit.

Benjamin Franklin and American Foreign Policy. By GERALD STOURZH. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1954. Pp. xvii, 335. $4.50.)

This is an excellent book; it reflects painstaking research, is well written, and is thoroughly documented. It was written under the auspices of the Center for the Study of American Foreign Policy, directed by Hans Morgenthau, and is the second in a projected series of works analyzing the foreign policies of American statesmen.

Being both a protégé and disciple of Professor Morgenthau, Mr. Stourzh's analysis of Franklin's thought is undertaken from the realist viewpoint. The central assumption of his book is therefore that one's views on politics are ultimately linked with his conception of human nature. After an exhaustive analysis of Franklin's political thought, the author concludes that the traditional view of Franklin as the "embodiment of the Age of Reason" is wrong. Franklin, argues Mr. Stourzh, is a victim of misrepresentation. He did not share the Enlightenment's confidence in the boundless goodness of man; on the contrary, he held a modest opinion of human nature. Consequently Mr. Stourzh's Franklin is less the advocate of "reason," less attached to the belief in "progress," and, in general, less the personification of eighteenth-century ideas than he has been previously painted. Franklin, the author asserts, "rejected the idea of inevitable human progress"; he recognized the "permanency of moral imperfection"; and he "acknowledged the imperfection of human reason." Moreover, in his own thinking he "sacrificed 'reason' to 'experience'." Insofar as the theory of Jeffersonian democracy rests upon faith in the rationality and goodness of man, Mr. Stourzh holds that Franklin cannot be classed as a Jeffersonian. Franklin was a confirmed monarchist during most of his life; and his advocacy of democracy in later life was, according to the author, largely based upon his conviction that democracy "works better," is more "practical," than other governmental forms. (Government is more "efficient," argued Franklin, if founded on public opinion rather than upon force alone.) In similar fashion, Franklin's ardent pacifism was, Mr. Stourzh believes, based primarily on pragmatic considerations; i.e., only by accommodation and a reasonable adjustment of differences can you "get things done."

In Mr. Stourzh's hands, then, Franklin becomes more the political bedmate of Edmund Burke than the embodiment of the Enlightenment. One must recognize the painstaking scholarship that has gone into this effort; and it is quite evident that Mr. Stourzh has discovered hitherto neglected aspects of Franklin's political thought. In this reviewer's opinion, the earlier view of Franklin must be revised as a result of this work. The author may have exaggerated to make his point, but it is a point both well worth making and well made: Franklin held a modest view of human nature and his political beliefs were framed accordingly.

But how does this relate to Franklin's views on foreign policy? Mr. Stourzh's central theme in this regard is that Franklin had an acute appreciation of the nature and role of political power. Here again the point is worth making and the author demonstrates it repeatedly; but it seems to be overdoing the matter to present Franklin as a protégé of Hans Morgenthau. Franklin's conception of the role of national power was not formal and doctrinaire; it was casual and matter-of-fact.

Franklin took power for granted. Consequently, he appears never to have been much bothered by the conflict between morality and power which concerns rival academicians of our day. He was both a pragmatist and an enlightened idealist, and he never doubted that there was ample room for both altruism and self-interest in the conduct of personal and state affairs. To the "realist" of our day Franklin has this to say: "I dislike those pessimists who affect to discover self-interested views everywhere at the bottom of the fairest, the most generous conduct." To the "moralist" he declares: "There is no Science, the Study of which is more useful and commendable than the Knowledge of the true Interest of one's Country." In essence, then, Franklin's appeal is to prudence, tolerance, and an enlightened self-interest.—S. GROVER RICH, JR., University of Utah.

Perpetual War for Perpetual Peace: A Critical Examination of the Foreign Policy of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Its Aftermath. EDITED BY HARRY ELMER BARNES. (Caldwell, Idaho: The Caxton Printers, Ltd. 1953. Pp. xiii, 679. $6.00.)

This is an unpleasant book to read. Ostensibly it is a review and appraisal of American foreign policy during and after the presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Actually it is a shallow piece of special pleading, arguing that the foreign policy of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman involved "perpetual war, presented in the guise of a global struggle of free peoples for perpetual peace"; its purpose is to acquaint the American people with that "fact" before "it is too late to revise our course and resume a sane foreign policy, based on continentalism, national interest, ideological co-existence, international urbanity, and rational co-operation in world affairs" (p. viii). The most significant circumstances and events of these fateful years are either ignored or shuffled by so fast that one can hardly recognize them. Such procedures undoubtedly make for good polemics; but they do not add up to historical analysis.

Eight men have written the ten chapters in the volume. Except in one instance the chapters are very much alike, reflecting the fact that the contributors are mostly the leading revisionist writers of the post-World War II period. Harry Elmer Barnes, the editor, wrote both an introduction, which treats of the "historical blackout" which he says has greeted revisionist writings, and the conclusion. In both places, Mr. Barnes tries manfully to discourage criticism by vilifying all critics in advance. Charles Callan Tansill has offered two chapters, one dealing with American policy in Europe from the end of the First World War to the beginning of the Second, and the other with Japanese-American relations during the same period. His sweeping indictments in both are backstopped first by Frederic R. Sanborn, in a chapter called "Roosevelt is Frustrated in Europe," and then by George Morgenstern, who discusses "The Actual Road to Pearl Harbor." There is also a partisan survey of the various investigations of the Pearl Harbor attack, by Percy L. Greaves, Jr.; another political broadside at the "bankruptcy" of Roosevelt's foreign policy, by William Henry Chamberlin; and an odd and elusive argument about American foreign policy and the national interest, by George A. Lundberg. Almost hidden in this mountain of chaff, but glowing in comparison, is a thought-provoking essay by William L. Neumann on how American policy contributed to war in the Pacific. Dr. Neumann seems to suffer the limitations of a pacifist ideology, and it is not always possible to agree with him, but he demonstrates more analytical ability, insight, and care in the use of data than all the other contributors put together. He also respects the all-important distinction between poor policy judgments and acts of treason, a distinction his colleagues do not seem even to understand.

It is useless to try to argue with the school of thought embodied in this book, and equally a waste of time to refute individually all of the wildly improbable assertions it contains. To these men, "revisionism" is by definition "truth" and any criticism a "smear." Thus their armor of "righteousness" is impregnable. All that a reviewer can usefully do with this book is describe it, and characterize it, and then let the reader beware.

The book is distinguished by three closely related features: on the analytical level, by an almost total lack of consideration given to problems of American security in a dangerous world; on the factual level, by distorted interpretation of evidence; and on the philosophical level, by a conservatism so pervasive that it destroys all balance in the making of evaluations.

1. None of the authors of this volume has any realistic conception of what American security consists of, or of what a threat to it looks like. They steadfastly refuse to concede that the United States has any interests of any character anywhere in the world outside of our continental borders which are important enough to protect by force of arms if they are threatened by hostile power. The actions of American political leaders are repeatedly divorced from the threatening international situation in which they took place, and are treated as if policy making were an easy succession of simple acts rather than a groping, in an atmosphere of indeterminacy, toward some desired but ill-defined objectives.

2. The cavalier fashion in which historical fact and evidence are treated does not inspire confidence in the professional judgment and competence of the authors. Facts must always be evaluated by scholars according to their own criteria of relevance, to be sure, but the authors have set their own topic and have then omitted data incontestably pertinent to it and have included evidence of the most doubtful, irrelevant, or meaningless sorts. For example, in treating American relations with Germany prior to World War II almost all of Hitler's acts of violence and aggression are ignored and he is portrayed as a sweet, reasonable, attractive, and understanding statesman. Even Hitler himself knew better than this!

One is obliged to conclude that the major criterion of admissible evidence is the usefulness of any datum in advancing the standard revisionist argument: that Roosevelt and his henchmen were responsible for World War II. Thus the crafty words of Adolf Hitler, for instance, or the insignificant phrases of Hamilton Fish at the Interparliamentary Union, are given credence by Tansill and treated as important steps to halt the tide of war, while the words and pleas of President Roosevelt are regarded as spoken only "for the record" (pp. 161-65).

3. Underlying both the analysis and the selection of evidence in this volume is an ideological standard against which all things are measured and found to be "true" or "false." The standard is a conservatism so deep that it rejects both of the major political parties as they are now constituted, although it reserves its greatest antipathy for the Democratic party and particularly for Franklin D. Roosevelt. The connection between the philosophy of the authors and the revisionist school of historiography to which they belong is especially transparent in this book, because the authors move so often from historical to political discourse.

The primary public values in this conservative ideology are "civil liberty, economic expansion, financial solvency, national prosperity, and governmental economy" (p. xi). The chief enemy of these values is modern war, with its tremendous consumption of resources and output of destruction. In the shadow of such an enemy, however, the ideology is not able to direct hostility toward any external threat, since that would only foster an eventual conflict. The blame for any war, then, has to be transferred away from those who instigate conflict by demanding unacceptable things, to those who, like Roosevelt, accept the challenge of war rather than accede to those demands and surrender what they conceive to be vital interests. And it is particularly easy to lay the guilt at Roosevelt's door because the social values of his Administration were as antagonistic to nineteenth-century values as are the demands of modern war.

The uninformed student who is persuaded to read this book will be further away from knowing the real history of these times than he was before. Mr. Barnes, the editor, complains that revisionists are not well reviewed today, as they were in the interwar period. Perhaps the reason is that today's revisionists write such poor books.—BERNARD C. COHEN, Princeton University.

Japan: From Surrender to Peace. BY BARON E. J. LEWE VAN ADUARD. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1954. Pp. xv, 351. $7.50.)

When an account of the wholly American occupation of Japan and the subsequent peace negotiations appears from the pen of a non-American it is reasonable that we should take particular notice. Of the many surveys of our relations with Japan since 1945, only two (Harold Wakefield's New Paths for Japan and W. Macmahon Ball's Japan: Enemy or Ally) were written by non-Americans. Mr. Ball's particularly critical and searching account, written from the vantage point of his position as Australian representative on the Allied Council for Japan, revealed aspects of the occupation unknown to anyone in a lesser position.

Although Baron Van Aduard held a similar diplomatic post as head of the Netherlands Mission in Japan during the years 1949–1952, his book is not so much a critique as a conventional account of our relations with Japan since 1945. Van Aduard's position of diplomatic importance and his Dutch citizenship seem to have made him an agreeable and sympathetic recorder of events and trends rather than a foreign critic. Doubtless the author's position did make it possible for him to show the changes in occupation policy under the impact of international tension. He demonstrates how a growing American awareness of the Soviet threat resulted in more aggressive efforts to conclude a peace treaty with Japan. This account of the transition in American policy is an important contribution of the book. Of equal significance is the fact that it is the first major work which recounts in some detail the negotiations preceding the peace treaty ratified by Japan in 1952.

Wisely limiting his discussion of the occupation to about a quarter of the volume, Van Aduard devotes the remaining 300 pages to the problems of the peace treaty and the future of Japan. He is generous in his praise of both General MacArthur and Secretary Dulles. One of the disappointments of the book is the absence of documentation of any kind. In the preface by Mr. Dulles the reader is assured that while "it cannot be completely authoritative" yet it is "on the whole a reliable account." It is lamentable, too, that the author does not expand his analysis of Japanese reaction to the treaty and document this reaction by reference to Diet debates and committee hearings. This expanded treatment might have taken the place of the opening quarter of the book dealing with the surrender and occupation—topics adequately treated in many other books. As it is, Baron Van Aduard's book has the virtues of restraint, balance, and completeness. It lacks the qualities of probing critical analysis which we so badly need for this crucial period of Japanese-American relations.—RALPH BRAIBANTI, Duke University.

Bibliografía de las Conferencias Americanas.

BY THE COLUMBUS MEMORIAL LIBRARY OF THE PAN AMERICAN UNION. (Washington, D.C.: Pan American Union. 1954. Pp. x, 277. Bibliographic Series No. 41. $1.50.)

The bibliography of the American conferences includes the 1st to 9th International Conferences of American States; the three conferences for the maintenance of peace and security, Buenos Aires, 1936, Mexico, 1945, Rio de Janeiro, 1947; and the four meetings of consultation of Foreign Ministers, 1939–1951. An attempt has been made to list (a) the documents of these conferences, as completely as possible; (b) publications related to the conferences; and (c) reports and works on the conferences. The publication of the documents of the conferences has usually been the charge of the country acting as host, and as a result there has not always been uniformity in the publication of the various editions and in their distribution. For the first time there is really an adequate record of these materials.—J.B.C.

Doubleday Short Studies in Political Science: Political Community at the International Level: Problems of Definition and Measurement. BY KARL W. DEUTSCH. (Pp. x, 70.) The Revolution in American Foreign Policy, 1945-1954. BY WILLIAM G. CARLETON. (Pp. x, 94.) France: Keystone of Western Defense. BY EDGAR S. FURNESS, JR. (Pp. xvii, 77.) The Problem of Internal Security in Great Britain, 1948-1953. BY H. H. WILSON AND HARVEY GLICKMAN. (Pp. x, 86.) Germany: Dilemma for American Foreign Policy. BY OTTO BÜTZ. (Pp. x, 69.) Democratic Rights versus Communist Activity. BY THOMAS I. COOK. (Pp. viii, 56.) (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1954. $.95 each for Studies 1-5, $.85 for sixth.)

The first volumes in a series of paper-bound booklets dealing with specialized or topical subjects; a highly commendable publishing venture and an extremely useful set for supplementary or illustrative readings in various political science courses. A lengthy list of additional titles has been announced for early publication.

L'Internationalisation des Constitutions. BY YVES L. AUGUSTE. (Madrid: Industrias Gráficas España. N.D. Pp. 226.)

The author, First Secretary of the Haitian Embassy in Madrid, examines the relationship of international and constitutional law. Believing in the supremacy of international law over national law, he concludes that a new chapter ought to be added to all national constitutions which would "fix the obligations of the states as members of the international community," including such obligations as the duty to execute international obligations or to settle international disputes by peaceful means.

NATO and Its Prospects. BY J. D. WARNE. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1954. Pp. vii, 110. $3.00.)

A British officer, formerly on the staff at SHAPE, succinctly summarizes the origins and evolution of NATO, deals briefly with the many problems—by no means all military—encountered in its development, discusses the role of the proposed European Defense Community, and speculates on the future of the Atlantic Community and the East-West split.

Freedom of Information as a Project of International Legislation: A Study of International Law in Making. BY HILPING EBE. (Uppsala: A.-B. Lundequistska Bokhandeln and Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz. 1953. Pp. 176. 12 kr.)

A scholarly and technical analysis of the problems surrounding the drafting of international legislation aimed at securing a worldwide right to freedom of information. An analysis and critique of existing international draft covenants is also presented by the author, a former member of the U.N. Secretariat.

Organizing for Peace: International Organization in World Affairs. BY DANIEL S. CHEEVER AND H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. 1954. Pp. x, 917. $7.00.)

A new text by two young professors who still retain considerable enthusiasm and optimism for the future of international organization. Following the usual review of historical attempts at some kind of international organization are two lengthy sections (670 pages) that treat the League and the United Nations simultaneously, first from the standpoint of structure and authority, then from the functional standpoint. These are followed by a shorter section on regional systems, and brief concluding chapters in which the authors discuss the "fundamental issues."

Introduction to International Relations. BY CHARLES P. SCHLEICHER. (New York: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1954. Pp. xvi, 941. $6.75.)

A new text in the traditional approach. Part I ("Principles and Dynamics") contains the customary background materials, and discusses the elements of national power along with such topics as nationalism, sovereignty, international law, and war; Part II ("Foreign Policies and Area Problems") draws on seven other contributors for discussions of the major countries or regions, and their interests and policies; Part III ("Organizing the World Society") devotes 300 pages to the structure, activities, successes, and failures of various international bodies.

International Relations: In the Age of the Conflict between Democracy and Dictatorship.

By ROBERT STRAUSS-HUPÉ AND STEFAN T. POSSONY. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. 2nd ed. Pp. xiv, 826. $6.50.)

Reduced in length by 121 pages, this new edition of a 1950 text is greatly improved in style, content, and arrangement.

Documents on American Foreign Relations, 1953. Edited by PETER V. CURL. (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1954. Pp. xxii, 458. $5.00.)

Fifteenth volume in this reference series of world affairs. Included in this compilation are policy statements of Republican and Democratic party leaders as well as policy documents of foreign governments. Increased coverage has been given to events in the Communist world.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1936. Vol. II: Europe. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office, 1954. Pp. xcv, 853. $4.25.)

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1936. Vol. IV. The Far East. (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1954. Pp. xci, 1012. $4.50.)

In Europe the Nazi controls over Germany tighten, and the Spanish civil war prompts policy of strict neutrality; in the Far East Japan continues to consolidate the control of Manchuria, Japanese pressure upon China grows, Chiang Kai-shek is kidnapped, and assassinations in Japan confirm the growing power of the militarists.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1936. Vol. V. The American Republics. (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1954. Pp. xcv, 992. $4.50.)

Concluding the 1936 series, this volume is concerned almost entirely with commercial and financial topics, and with the reciprocal trade agreements program.

Documents on German Foreign Policy: 1918-1945. Series D (1937-1945). Vol. VIII. The War Years: September 4, 1939-March 18,

1940. (Washington: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1954. Pp. lxxvi, 974. $4.00.)

Continuing the massive project of documenting Germany's foreign policy, this volume—already the eighth—covers the period from the entrance of France and Britain into the war, to the eve of the Brenner Pass meeting between Hitler and Mussolini in March, 1940. German-Soviet relations, economic as well as political and military, bulk largest in this period; relations with Italy, with the Low Countries and the Scandinavian area, and with the neutrals, are also of interest and importance.

Russland, die Westmächte und Deutschland: Die Sowjetische Deutschlandpolitik 1943-1953. By BORIS MEISSNER. (Hamburg: H. H. Nölke Verlag, 1954. Pp. 372.)

A well-documented and thorough description of Soviet policy toward Germany from the Teheran Conference to the Nineteenth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Oil in the Middle East: Its Discovery and Development. By STEPHEN HEMSLEY LONGRIGG. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1954. Issued under the Auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Pp. xiii, 305. $4.00.)

An exhaustive history of the subject down to 1953, with emphasis on oil politics. The author is a long-time British resident of the Middle East, most recently as an oil company executive.

Security and the Middle East: The Problem and Its Solution. (New York: The Nation Associates, 1954. Pp. xiv, 159.)

A report concluding that the United States is on dangerous ground in helping arm the Arab states, and in siding so unqualifiedly with governments that practice neither political nor economic democracy; urging U.S. efforts and financial assistance to resettle Arab refugees in Arab lands; and proposing U.S. sponsorship of a Regional Resources Development Board whose assets would be available when such resettlement was agreed upon and when Arab-Israeli agreement was reached on the terms concluding the Palestine war.

China's Response to the West: A Documentary Survey, 1839-1923. By SHU-YÜ TENG AND

JOHN K. FAIRBANK. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. vi, 296. $6.75.)

A fascinating collection of translations of Chinese documents, dealing with the reactions of the Chinese to the appearance or impact of Western people, weapons, and ideas, and to the problems generated by these foreign influences. The documents cover the period from 1839 through 1923, and are introduced by comments of the editors.

Japan's Decision to Surrender. By ROBERT J. C. BUTOW. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 259. $4.00.)

A carefully documented study of the forces in Japan which led to the surrender. The cumulative effect of successive defeats and the "political miracle" of the influence of the Imperial Throne were far more important than the atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Sources used are primarily records of the International Military Tribunal of the Far East, and unpublished memoirs and interviews.

Typhoon in Tokyo. By HARRY EMERSON WILDES. (New York: Macmillan Company. 1954. Pp. v, 356. $4.50.)

A semi-popular account of the American occupation of Japan based largely on the personal experiences of the author, who served in the government section of SCAP throughout the occupation. The focus is on personalities and tidbits of information rather than on issues and fundamental problems.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

H. ARTHUR STEINER*

University of California (Los Angeles)

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Hoffmann, Stanley. Deux Directoires des Grandes Puissances au XX^e Siècle. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1954.

Kaplan, Morton A. The International Arena as a Source of Dysfunctional Tension. World Politics. July, 1954.

Snyder, Richard C., et al. Decision-Making as an Approach to the Study of International Politics. Foreign Policy Analysis Series, No. 3. Princeton, 1954.

von Hehn, Jürgen. Die Weltfriedensbewegung im Atomzeitalter. Europa Archiv (Frankfurt). August 20, 1954.

De Waterstofbom in Internationaal-Politiek Perspectief. Internationale Spectator ('s-Gravenhage). June 22, 1954.

United States

America and a New Asia [a symposium]. The Annals. Vol. 294 (July, 1954).

Boggs, S. Whittemore. Global Relations of

* Prepared with the assistance of Mr. P. Allan Dionisopoulos.

the United States. Department of State Bulletin. June 14, 1954.

Call, Joseph L. Government by Decree Through Executive Agreement. Baylor Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Forkosch, Morris D. Treaties and Executive Agreements. Chicago-Kent Law Review. June, 1954.

Friedenberg, Daniel. Our Foreign Policy in North Africa. Antioch Review. Summer, 1954.

Huntington, Samuel P. Radicalism and Conservatism in National Defense Policy. Journal of International Affairs (New York). No. 2 (1954).

Jones, Stephen B. The Power Inventory and National Strategy. World Politics. July, 1954.

McGee, Gale W. A China Policy for the United States. South Atlantic Quarterly. July, 1954.

Murphy, Robert. The Interrelationship of Military Power and Foreign Policy. Department of State Bulletin. August 30, 1954.

Napier, Jack P. and Nestel, Arnold. Military-Civilian Relations in the Occupation of Japan and Korea. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2 (1954).

Sapin, Burton, et al. An Appropriate Role for the Military in American Foreign Policy-Making; a Research Note. Foreign Policy Analysis Series, No. 4. Princeton, 1954.

Smith, Walter B. America's Primary Interests in Asia. Department of State Bulletin. August 9, 1954.

Stone, William T. Foreign Trade and the National Interest. Editorial Research Reports. July 28, 1954.

United States Trade Policy [a symposium]. Current History. September, 1954.

Williams, David C. Does America Have A Policy? Twentieth Century. August, 1954.

Wright, Esmond. America and Russia. Political Quarterly. July–September, 1954.

Latin America

Alba, Víctor. Mitología del Movimiento Obrero; El Nacionalismo Proletario. Cuadernos Americanos. September–October, 1954.

Cale, Edward G. Economic Bases of United States-Latin American Relations. Department of State Bulletin. July 19, 1954.

Colorado, Antonio J. and Santana, Arturo. El Caso de Puerto Rico. Cuadernos Americanos. September–October, 1954.

Hadley, Paul E. The Caracas Conference. World Affairs. Summer, 1954.

Lloréns, Noel. América Irredenta. Cuadernos Americanos. September–October, 1954.

Commonwealth of Nations

Alexandrowicz, C. H. The Kashmir Deadlock. Political Quarterly. July–September, 1954.

Allen, George V. American-Indian Relations. India Quarterly. January–March, 1954.

Anglin, Douglas G. Canada's External Assistance Programme. International Journal (Toronto). Summer, 1954.

Barton, William. India and the Cold War. Queen's Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Bell, Coral. Britain in the Pacific. Quarterly Review. July, 1954.

Biggs-Davison, John. The Commonwealth in a Divided World. Fortnightly. August, 1954.

Baldwin, Hanson W. Churchill Was Right. Atlantic Monthly. July, 1954.

Ganguli, B. N. India and Commonwealth: Economic Relations. India Quarterly. April–June, 1954.

Heathcote-Amory, D. Future Pattern of Commonwealth Trade. United Empire. July–August, 1954.

Hessler, William H. Pakistan and the Himalayas. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. August, 1954.

The Prime Ministers' Conference at Colombo. India Quarterly. April–June, 1954.

Stone, William T. Neutral India. Editorial Research Reports. June 10, 1954.

Trumbull, Robert. India Since Independence. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series. No. 105, May–June, 1954.

Utley, T. E. The Commonwealth and Europe. Fortnightly. July, 1954.

Younger, Kenneth. A British View of the Far East. Pacific Affairs. June, 1954.

The German Question

Adenauer, Konrad. German Reunion and the Future of Europe. International Journal. Summer, 1954.

Cross-Currents in Western German Opinion. World Today. July, 1954.

Debevoise, Eli W. The Occupation of Germany. Journal of International Affairs. No. 2 (1954).

D'Harcourt, Robert. En Allemagne; Réarmement ou Militarisme. Revue des Deux Mondes. August 1, 1954.

Krause, Roland E. Whither Germany? United States Naval Institute Proceedings. July, 1954.

Plischke, Elmer. The "Contractual Agreements" and Changing Allied-West German Relations. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Woodward, Margaret R. Germany Makes Amends. Department of State Bulletin. July 26, 1954.

Western and Central Europe

Albrecht-Carrié, René. France in Europe; Prospect and Retrospect. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Bhargava, G. S. French Settlements in India. Eastern World. July, 1954.

Dacier, Michel. Le Problème de la Sarre. Écrits de Paris. May, 1954.

de la Souchère, Elena. L'Évolution Française et l'Alliance Américaine. Esprit. May, 1954.

The Europeanisation of the Saar. British Survey. June, 1954.

Fertig, Norman. The Berlin Conference. World Affairs. Summer, 1954.

Is France Our Ally? Two Views. New Leader. July 26, 1954.

Lange, Halvard. Scandinavian Cooperation in International Affairs. International Affairs. July, 1954.

Lepotier, Contre-Amiral. La Méditerranée,

Axe Stratégique. Revue de Défense Nationale. July, 1954.

Menzel, Eberhard. Die Diskussion über die Gegenwärtige Rechtsstellung des Saarlandes. Europa Archiv. June 5, 1954.

Roche, Emile. La France à Genève. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1954.

Rousseau, Ch. Les Frontières de la France. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1954.

The Salazar Regime and Goa. World Today. September, 1954.

Schuman, Robert. Can France and Germany Hit it off? Realités. February, 1954.

Zaitman, I. William. Neutralism and Neutrality in Scandinavia. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.

Balkans and Eastern Mediterranean

Anthem, Thomas. The Cyprus Challenge. Contemporary Review. July, 1954.

Calogeropoulos-Stratis, S. Griechenland, die Grossmächte und der Friede. Europä Archiv. July 5, 1954.

Cyprus: The Closed Issue? World Today. September, 1954.

Popović, Koča. For Peace, Freedom, Independence and Equal Rights. Review of International Affairs (Belgrade). May 16, 1954.

Radovanovic, Ljuba. La Politique du Traité d'Ankara. Politique Etrangère. June-July, 1954.

Skendi, Stavro. The Northern Epirus Question Reconsidered. Journal of Central European Affairs. July, 1954.

U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe

Aines, Edward. Soviet Bloc Currency Conversions. American Economic Review. June, 1954.

Armstrong, John A. The Soviet Attitude Toward UNESCO. International Organization. May, 1954.

Atkinson, William C. On Friendship with Russia. Fortnightly. July, 1954.

Barghoorn, Frederick C. Nationality Doctrine in Soviet Political Strategy. Review of Politics. July, 1954.

Daniel, Wolfram. Danzig Heute. Öst-Europa. August, 1954.

Developments of Soviet Policy 1953-1954. British Survey. July, 1954.

Finletter, Thomas K. When Russia is Ready. Atlantic Monthly. September, 1954.

Lie, Trygve. Talking Peace with Stalin. Saturday Review. September 4, 1954.

Meissner, Boris. Buitenlandse Handelspolitiek der Sowjet-Unie. Internationale Spectator. July 8, 1954.

Overzicht van de Voornaamste Gebeurtenissen en Ontwikkelingen in de Satellietstaten sedert Begin 1954. Internationale Spectator. July 22, 1954.

Postwar Soviet Foreign Policy; a World Perspective [a symposium]. Journal of International Affairs. No. 1 (1954).

Roche, Emile. Le Neutralisme au Service de l'U.R.S.S. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. March, 1954.

Zenkovsky, S. A. Ideological Deviation in Soviet Central Asia. Slavonic and East European Review. June, 1954.

Middle East

Cox, Frederick J. The Perennial Near Eastern Question. World Affairs. Summer, 1954.

Efimenko, N. Marbury. American Impact upon Middle East Leadership. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Shwadran, Benjamin. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Dispute. Middle Eastern Affairs. June-July, 1954.

Spain, James W. Middle East Defense; A New Approach. Middle East Journal. Summer, 1954.

Africa

Alport, C. J. M. Kenya's Answer to the Mau Mau Challenge. African Affairs. July, 1954.

Barbour, Nevill. Variations in Arab National Feeling in French North Africa. Middle East Journal. Summer, 1954.

Demnati, L. Esquisse d'une Politique Franco-Marocaine; La Double Nationalité. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1954.

Half Way to Independence; Somaliland under Italian Administration. United Nations Review. July, 1954.

Idenburg, P. J. Zuid-West-Afrika en de Verenigde Naties. Internationale Spectator. August 8, 1954.

Overzicht van de Voornaamste Gebeurtenissen in West-, Centraal-, Oost- en Zuid-Afrika sedert Januari 1954. Internationale Spectator. August 22, 1954.

Pacific and Far East

Aron, Raymond. La Rencontre de L'Asie et de l'Occident. Preuves. July, 1954.

Dokumente der Genfer Konferenz über

Indochina (21 Juli 1954). Europa Archiv. August 20, 1954.

European Refugees in China. Eastern World. July, 1954.

Hiscocks, C. R. Communist China and the West. International Journal. Summer, 1954.

Korea; The Peace Efforts in the United Nations up to the Geneva Conference. United Nations Review. July, 1954.

Lü Hsu-chang. China's Foreign Trade Expands. Eastern World. July, 1954.

Midkiff, Frank E. Problems of the Pacific Trust Territory. Department of State Bulletin. July 26, 1954. U.S. Administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. Ibid. July 19, 1954.

Okita, Saburo, Japan's Trade with Asia. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 10-12 (1954).

Robertson, Walter S. Communist Tactics in the Far East. Department of State Bulletin. August 23, 1954.

Southeast Asia

Padover, Saul K. Burma and Malaya; Jungle War Against Communism. Foreign Policy Bulletin. August 1, 1954.

Van der Kroef, Justus M. The Dutch Position in Indonesia Today. Far Eastern Survey. June, 1954.

Van der Veer, Paul W. The Eurasians of Indonesia; Castaways of Colonialism. Pacific Affairs. June, 1954.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Allen, G. C. Western Enterprise in the Far East. International Affairs. July, 1954.

Campbell, Alexander. Technical Assistance for Economic Development. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. March, 1954.

de Neuman, A. M. "Tied" International Trading; The Indonesian Rami Fibre Test Case. Economic Journal (London). June, 1954.

Features of Post-War European Migration. International Labour Review. July, 1954.

Haywood, C. F. and Ruprecht, T. K. The Box Diagram in International Trade Theory. American Economic Review. June, 1954.

Hotchkis, Preston. The United States and the World Economic Situation. Department of State Bulletin. July 26, 1954.

Hunt, Chester L. Cultural Barriers to Point Four. Antioch Review. Summer, 1954.

Kravitz, Irving B. The Trade Agreements Escape Clause. American Economic Review. June, 1954.

Lubin, Isador, and Murden, F. D., Jr. Our

Stake in World Trade. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series. No. 106, July-August, 1954.

McAuley, James. Paradoxes of Development in the South Pacific. Pacific Affairs. June, 1954.

Nelson, Eastin. Product Profiles and National Income; A Method of Studying Economic Change in Underdeveloped Countries. Inter-American Economic Affairs. Autumn, 1954.

Singh, V. B. Keynesian Economics in Relation to Underdeveloped Countries. Science and Society. Summer, 1954.

Whitaker, T. K. The Dollar Problem Reviewed. Studies (Dublin). Summer, 1954.

International Law

Bayitch, S. A. Conflict Law in United States Treaties. Miami Law Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Bilfinger, Carl. Vollendete Tatsache und Völkerrecht; Eine Studie. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. May, 1954.

Cavarré, L. L'Immunité de Jurisdiction des États Étrangers. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1954. Les Recours en Interprétation et en Appréciation de la Légimité devant les Tribunaux Internationaux. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. May, 1954.

Currie, Brainerd. Full Faith and Credit to Foreign Land Decrees. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1954.

The Fate of Executive Agreements under the Capps Case. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1954.

Hunt, Alan R. Reservations to Commercial Treaties Dealing with Aliens' Right to Engage in the Professions. Michigan Law Review. June, 1954.

Jully, Laurent. Arbitration and Judicial Settlement; Recent Trends. American Journal of International Law. July, 1954.

Kennedy, Gilbert D. "Reciprocity" in the Recognition of Foreign Judgments; The Implication of Travers v. Holley. Canadian Bar Review. April, 1954.

Mann, Michael. Foreign Revenue Laws and English Conflict of Laws. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1954.

Metzger, Stanley D. Settlement of International Disputes by Non-Judicial Methods. American Journal of International Law. July, 1954.

"Voluntary"; A Concept in Expatriation Law. Columbia Law Review. June, 1954.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

The Asian Regional Conference [of I.L.O.]. International Labour Review. May, 1954.

The Balkan Observers; A Mission Completed.

United Nations Review. August, 1954.
Beer, Max. The United Nations in Crisis. Swiss Review of World Affairs. August, 1954.

Cunningham, Harry F. Meaning of "Aggression" in the United Nations Charter. Nebraska Law Review. May, 1954.

Issues before the Ninth General Assembly. International Conciliation. No. 499, September, 1954.

Key, David McK. A Fresh Look at the United Nations. Department of State Bulletin. June 28, 1954. The Organization of American States and the United Nations; Rivals or Partners? Ibid. July 26, 1954. Some Challenging Issues Facing the United Nations. Ibid. July 5, 1954.

Liang Yuen-li. The Question of Access to the United Nations Headquarters of Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Status. American Journal of International Law. July, 1954.

Minnesota World Affairs Center. Institute on United Nations Charter Review, April 9-10, 1954 [proceedings]. University of Minnesota Center for Continuation Study, 1954.

Padelford, Norman J. Regional Organization and the United Nations. International Organization. May, 1954.

Verdross, Alfred. General International Law and the United Nations Charter. International Affairs. July, 1954.

Wainhouse, David W. Charter Review as a Means of Strengthening the U.N. Department of State Bulletin. August 30, 1954.

Wolf, F. Le Tribunal Administratif de l'Organisation Internationale du Travail. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April-June, 1954.

Military and Security Questions

La Contribution Financière Allemande à la Communauté Européenne de Défense. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. July, 1954.

Debau, Lt. Col. Défense de l'Europe ou Défense Périphérique. Revue de Défense Nationale. February, 1954.

The European Defense Community. Europe Today and Tomorrow (Paris). May, 1954.

N.A.T.O. and Atomic Strategy. Interavia. No. 7 (1954).

Russell, Bertrand. A Prescription for the World. Saturday Review. August 28, 1954.

Schnabel, Oscar. The Atlantic Community. New Leader. July 26, 1954.

Regional Organizations

Bebr, Gerhard. Labor and the Schuman Plan. Michigan Law Review. May, 1954.

Breitner, Franz. Menschenrechtsschutz und Europäische Integration; Gedanken. . . . Europa Archiv. May 20, 1954.

The Colombo Conference; Neutrality the Keynote. World Today. July, 1954.

Dile, Anne-Lise. La Communauté Politique Européenne; Arrêt ou Progression? Revue Politique et Parlementaire. March, 1954.

Guggenheim, Paul. Universalisme et Régionalisme Européen en Droit International. Bruges Quarterly. April, 1954.

Henri-Vignes, Daniel. Notes sur l'Évolution Institutionnelle de la Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de l'Acier. Bruges Quarterly. April, 1954.

Karp, Basil. The Draft Constitution for a European Political Community. International Organization. May, 1954.

Mayer, René. Organisation Européenne et Coexistence Pacifique. Politique Étrangère. June-July, 1954.

Towards An Atlantic Union. World Today. July, 1954.

Verdoorn, P. J. A Customs Union for Western Europe; Advantages and Feasibility. World Politics. July, 1954.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Council of Europe. Consultative Assembly. Sixth Ordinary Session. The Future Position of the Saar [Appendix to Doc. 225]. Strasbourg, 20 March 1954.

——— Directorate of Information. Balance Sheet of the Work of the Council of Europe (1949-1954). Strasbourg, 1954.

GATT. International Trade 1953. Geneva, June, 1954. (Doc. GATT/1954-3.)

International Court of Justice. Reports of Judgements, Advisory Opinions and Orders. Case of the Monetary Gold Removed from Rome in 1943 (Italy v. France, U.K. and U.S.A.). Judgement of 15 June 1954. The Hague, 1954. (Sales No. 119.)

——— Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala). Order of 8 May 1954. The Hague, 1954. (Sales No. 118.)

International Labour Organisation. International Labour Conference, 37th Session, Geneva, 1954. Report III. Geneva, 1954.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Atlantic Alliance; The Story of NATO. Paris, NATO, 1954.

United Kingdom. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. British Foreign Policy; A Brief Collection of Fact and Quotation. London, 1954.

——— The United Nations and Arab-Israel Relations. London, 1954.

UNESCO. General Conference. Proposed Programme and Budget for 1955 and 1956 . . . [presented at Eighth Session, Montevideo, November–December, 1954]. Paris, UNESCO, n.d. (Doc. UNESCO 8C/5.)

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1954, unless a different place or date is shown.

Economic and Social Council. The Development of Coordination and Cooperation Among UN and the Specialized Agencies in Economic and Social Programmes. Geneva, 18 June 1954. (Doc. E/2607/Add.1.)

——— Financial Implications of the Council. . . . Work Programmes and Costs of the Economic and Social Activities of the UN. Geneva, July 10, 1954. (Doc. E/2635.)

——— ECAFE. Official Records. Tenth Session. 8–18 February 1954. (Doc. E/CN.11/389, 25 March 1954.)

——— ECLA. Economic Survey of Latin America 1953. (Doc. E/CN.12/358; April, 1954.)

——— Interim Coordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements. Review of International Commodity Problems 1953. (Doc. E/2578.)

——— TAC. Technical Assistance Activities under the Expanded Programme. Status Report as at 28 February 1954. (Doc. E/TAC/REP/9, 18 June 1954.)

——— Techniques of Evaluation of the Expanded Programme. . . . (Doc. E/TAC/41, 4 June 1954.)

General Assembly. Provisional Agenda of Ninth Session of the United Nations General Assembly. (Doc. A/2667, 23 July 1954.)

——— Issues Confronting the Ninth Session of the General Assembly; Background Information on the Provisional Agenda and Supplementary lists. [Unnumbered publication of the Secretariat, September, 1954.]

——— Disarmament Commission. Subcommittee. . . . Report. . . . (Doc. DC/SC.1/11, London, 22 June 1954.)

——— USA; Working Paper

on Methods of Implementing and Enforcing Disarmament Programmes. . . . (Doc. DC/SC.1/5, London, 25 May 1954.)

——— Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction. Report. . . . (Doc. A/2645.)

——— Committee on South West Africa. Information and Documentation in Respect of the Territory of South West Africa. Parts I and II. (Docs. A/AC.73/L.3 and Ibid./Add.1, 11 May 1954.)

——— Report . . . to the General Assembly. (Doc. A/2666.)

——— High Commissioner for Refugees. Report. . . . (Doc. A/2648.)

——— International Law Commission. Report . . . covering the Work of its Sixth Session. (Doc. A/CN.4/88, 5 August 1954.)

——— Sixth Session. Second Report on the Law of Treaties by H. Lauterpacht, Special Rapporteur. (Doc. A/CN.4/87, 8 July, 1954.)

——— Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression. Report. . . . (Doc. A. 2638.)

Secretariat. Special Study on Educational Conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (Doc. ST/TRI/Ser.A/8/Add.1.)

——— Department of Economic Affairs. World Economic Report 1952–1953. (Doc. E/2560, and ST/ECA/24.)

——— Department of Public Information. U.N. Fact Series. . . . (Doc. ST/DPI/Ser. C/1–9, 1 March 1954.)

——— Background Papers. No. 78. Refugees. (Doc. ST/DPI/Ser.A/78, 28 December 1953). No. 79. The Question of Korea (1950–1953). (Doc. ST/DPI/Ser.A/79, 10 March 1954.)

Security Council. Communication . . . 8 July 1954 from the Chairman of the Inter-American Peace Committee to the Secretary-General Transmitting the Committee's Report. (Doc. S/3267, 13 July 1954.)

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington, Government Printing Office, 1954"; and the congressional materials are those of the 83rd Congress, 2nd Session.

Attorney General. Report . . . to the Congress . . . on the Administration of the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938, as Amended, for the Calendar Year 1953.

Congress. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. To Amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1946. Hearings. . . . Part I, May 10–19, 1954.

— Mutual Security Act of 1954. Conference Report to Accompany H.R. 9678. Report No. 2637, August 5, 1954.

— House. Committee on Appropriations. Subcommittee. . . Mutual Security Appropriations for 1955. Hearings . . . July 7-17, 1954.

— Committee on Foreign Affairs. To Amend the Foreign Service Act of 1946. Hearing . . . on H.R. 9910 . . . July 14, 1954.

— Special Study Mission to Latin America on Technical Cooperation; Report by Hon. Donald L. Jackson. July 22, 1954. House Rep. No. 2442.

— Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy. Survey of United States Private Technical Assistance. Report . . . August 1, 1954. (Subcommittee Print.)

— Subcommittee on International Organizations and Movements. International Organizations and Movements. Hearings. . .

— Senate. Committee on Appropriations. Special Subcommittee. Special Report on Spain and French Morocco Covering Economic and Military Programs under Spanish Agreements. . . January, 1954. (Committee Print.)

— Committee on Foreign Relations. International Opium Protocol. Hearings. . .

— Mutual Security Act of 1954. (1) Hearings . . . June 4 . . . 22, 1954. (2) Report (S. Rep. No. 1799). (3) Minority Views (S. Rep. No. 1799, Part 2).

— Report on India by Ambassador George V. Allen. Hearing. . .

— Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. (1) Representation and Voting in the United Nations General Assembly. Staff Study No. 4, September, 1954. Committee Print. (2) Review of the United Nations Charter. Hearings. . . Part 4 [Greensboro, N. Car.], May 15, 1953; Part 5 [Louisville, Ky.] June 7, 1954.

— Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Subcommittee. . . Hearing . . . on S. 3713, a Bill to Give Effect to the International Convention for High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean, signed at Tokyo, May 9, 1952. . .

— Committee on the Judiciary. Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act. . . Strategy and Tactics of World Communism. . . Hearings . . . Part 1, May 18 and 27, 1954.

Department of State. Intervention of International Communism in Guatemala. (Pub. No. 5556.)

— The Philippines 1954. (Pub. No. 5508.)

— Report on the Operations of the Department of State (under P.L. 584). . . April 7, 1954. H.Doc. No. 365.

— Toward a Stronger Foreign Service; Report of the Secretary of State's Public Committee on Personnel. (Pub. No. 5458.)

— The United Nations; An Appraisal for 1954. (Pub. No. 5554.)

— United States Contributions to International Organizations. Letter from the Acting Secretary. . . June 2, 1954. House Doc. No. 410.

— International Educational Exchange Service. People to People Diplomacy. July, 1954.

National Commission for UNESCO. The American Citizen's Stake in the Progress of Less Developed Areas of the World. Stanford Research Institute, Preliminary edition, August, 1954.

President. Report to Congress on the Mutual Security Program for the Six Months ended June 30, 1954.

— US Participation in the UN; Report by the President to the Congress for the Year 1953. (Department of State Pub. No. 5459.)

United States Delegation to the Fifth Meeting of Consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the American Republics. Penetration of the Political Institutions of Guatemala by the International Communist Movement; Threat to the Peace and Security of America and to the Sovereignty and Political Independence of Guatemala. . . [Offset; no publisher shown.] Washington, June, 1954.

United States Information Agency. Second Report to Congress; January-June, 1954.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

The Question of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. BY ERNST CASSIRER. TRANSLATED AND EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY PETER GAY.

(New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. vii, 129. $2.75.)

Professor Peter Gay has supplied the first

English translation of Ernst Cassirer's The Question of Jean Jacques Rousseau, first published in German in 1932. Professor Gay has furnished an excellent introduction reviewing the primary interpretative theories about Rousseau's works, and also a careful annotation of Cassirer's text.

Cassirer approached the question of Jean-Jacques Rousseau with the assumption that all internal inconsistencies could be legitimately resolved by rational doctrinal analysis. Moreover, Cassirer announced that the purpose of the essay was to demonstrate the universal "objective necessity" of Rousseau's moral teachings.

The absolutism of the Social Contract and the radical individualism of the main corpus of Rousseau's works are resolved by interpreting the absolutes of the Social Contract as Kantian moral imperatives embodying freedom. The general will is another term for rechtsstaat. Its fundamental aim is not happiness or welfare for the individual but the realization of higher moral purpose.

Accordingly, the apparent conflict between the rationalism of the Social Contract and the mysticism of Emile, Neouvelle Héloïse and the Confessions disappears, for at the base of them all Cassirer finds a mystical self-validating intuitionism with Rousseau assuming an objective scientific validity for his random sense impressions, emotional preferences, and moral judgments. This natural virtue (Cassirer suggests that "nature" for Rousseau carried a Baconian meaning) was achievable on the individual level through education which removes the inhibitions arising from conventional restraints, thus freeing the individual to develop according to his ideal-natural potential. On the social level, evil inhibitions were so deeply embedded in political institutions that liberal reformism would not suffice. Nothing less than revolutionary root and branch excision of social evils would release men to live and develop freely according to their natural potential.

This revolutionary social transformation, which according to Cassirer was one of Rousseau's greatest creations, need not be feared, for man's basic nature is good rather than sinful. Rousseau solved the problem of theodicy by eliminating original sin and placing it in evil human institutions which could be rationally and confidently reconstructed.

Thus Rousseau's educational and moral writings only appear more individualistic than his political writings, for in the former he was concerned primarily with the negative "revolutionary" problem of saying what inhibitions it was necessary to put away to permit free development according to natural human potential. Man's positive potential remains nonetheless categorically absolute, as glimpsed especially in Rousseau's passages on civil religion.

Cassirer's argument is a powerful one, despite a few unintegrated side explorations. As Professor Gay has pointed out, it has strongly influenced contemporary analysis of Rousseau. However, the underlying assumption of the validity of devising rational syntheses of internal inconsistencies was never inspected. The Kantian freedom required to integrate individualist and absolutist texts seems forced. Finally, Cassirer failed to demonstrate the validity and "objective necessity" of Rousseau's intuitive moral perceptions.—HARVEY WHEELER, Washington and Lee University.

Notre Matière, M. Sorel. By PIERRE ANDREU. (Paris: Bernard Grasset. 1953. Pp. 338.)

A gap in the literature about the author of the Reflections on Violence, has now been filled: Dr. Andreu's book, in addition to being a competent survey of Georges Sorel's diffuse writings, is the first real story of the man, a man whose peaceful, suburban existence seemed to belie the violent ideas he expressed in speech and print. No future writer on the subject will be able to do without the findings of this author, who devoted many years of research to establish hitherto unknown facts about Sorel—the government official who resigned his position and began writing at the age of forty; the agnostic husband of a devoutly religious girl, whose education he took in hand while respecting her convictions; the mercurial friend of many distinguished contemporaries, among whom the creative genius of Charles Péguy stands out foremost. In general, Dr. Andreu's account confirms what a close reading of Sorel's works leads us to suspect: that his revolutionism was essentially conservative; he wanted to destroy in order to preserve—a tendency which makes Sorel's occasionally violent vacillations between extremes of political persuasion intelligible if not fully convincing.

The other great merit of this study is that, in contrast to most previous monographs on Sorel, it pays a great deal of attention to the philosophical substratum of his political thought, above all to the influence upon him of Henri Bergson and William James—two authors about whom Sorel in his turn has a great deal to say. But who ever read his De l'utilité du pragmatisme? It was, and still is, a pity that Sorel should be known by one book only. In his introduction to the present work, Dr. Daniel Halévy, one of the few surviving personal friends of the hermit of Boulogne-sur-Seine, and one who had been instrumental in getting the Reflections published, relates how, after the death of Sorel and Péguy, within the same week both the Fascist and the Soviet governments had approached a high French official offering to restore the supposedly neglected graves of the two illustrious Frenchmen—an anecdote which, at least as far as Sorel is concerned, sums up very neatly the indestructible popular misconception about his “responsibility” for both Mussolini’s and Lenin’s revolutions.—JAMES H. MEISEL, University of Michigan.

Principia Politica. By LEONARD WOOLF. (London: Hogarth Press. 1953. Pp. 315. 25/-.)

The Vocabulary of Politics. By T. D. WELDON. (Baltimore: Penguin Books. 1953. Pp. 199. 2/-.)

These two books present a singular contrast. Mr. Leonard Woolf is a rationalist who is angry with the follies of a world bewitched by superstition. Mr. Weldon, a Magdalen College don, holds that principles, like tastes, are not really matters for disputes among civilized men. De gustibus non disputandum as to Buchenwald and Siberia is a slight exaggeration, but yet is pretty near to the truth. What matters for logical positivists is to get their words right.

Mr. Woolf writes a book on the (doubtless well-meant) advice of Lord Keynes unfortunately called by the great name of Principia Politica. However, he explains to us that it is no systematic discourse but in part an autobiography. He wrings his hands over “the stupidity of the human mind . . . only in Athens, human beings enjoyed for a brief moment a lucid interval in their chronic lunacy.” The probable character of the good may well be indicated by a grand tradition of the centuries—what E. M. Forster calls “the true human tradition,” shaped by and shaping human culture. But it is dangerous to construe this tradition as something bequeathed to a little inner circle of the Bloomsbury illuminati who can scold the rest. This impulse is all the more extraordinary since Mr. Woolf is the British publisher of Freud, and should know that the great tradition has been written out on the broad page of history and contains more things than were acceptable to Voltaire.

Mr. Weldon, on the other hand, is no crusader, although he is nearer to that painstaking Linnaean task of classification to-day so necessary for basing principles and examining morphology in the social sciences. He holds the view that it would be wisest to say that a man is a good judge of political institutions as “he is a good judge of pictures or of wines.” This can require “an intelligent performance.” “There is no agreement as to what political institutions are for.” Mr. Woolf, who reviews Mr. Weldon, disapproves of this iconoclasm. Many, however, of Mr. Weldon’s prejudices are sound—as that to base political studies on so transient a form as “the State” is misleading. But, like many British academics, Mr. Weldon, properly concerned with semantics and vocabulary, neglects almost entirely the work in that field of measurement and experimental observation (not to speak of psychological study) which Hume rightly said was indispensable to significant advance.—GEORGE CATLIN, London, England.

The Political Ideas of Alexander von Humboldt: A Brief Preliminary Study. By E. R. BRANN. (Madison, Wisconsin: E. R. Brann. 1954. Pp. v, 50.)

Any student of political theory who has had an interest in Wilhelm von Humboldt, will find this short study a useful addition to the literature in the field. Brann notes that von Humboldt was reputed to be in sympathy with republican thought and other liberal trends. His position at the Prussian Court was thus weakened and his advice seldom called for or used.

Individualism Reconsidered and Other Essays. By DAVID RIESMAN. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1954. Pp. 529. $6.00.)

The re-publication of thirty essays published by the writer (a few with collaborators) in fifteen journals and half a dozen symposium volumes between 1947 and 1953 and dealing with such subjects as individualism, freedom, culture, Veblen, Freud, totalitarianism, and the methods of the social sciences.

American Thought: A Critical Sketch. By MORRIS R. COHEN. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1954. Pp. 360. $5.00.)

This comprehensive volume illuminates the history of American ideas with respect to history; scientific, economic, political, legal and religious thought; aesthetics; and general philosophy. After Morris Cohen's death, Dr. Felix S. Cohen completed the editing before his own death.

French Thought in the Eighteenth Century: Rousseau, Voltaire, Diderot. By ROMAIN ROLLAND, ANDRÉ MAUROIS AND EDOUARD HERRIOT. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY GEOFFREY BRERETON. (New York: David McKay Co. 1953. Pp. xxiii, 428. $3.00.)

Excerpts from the writings of Rousseau, Voltaire, and Diderot with introductions, respectively, by Romain Rolland, André Maurois, and Edouard Herriot, together with a general introduction by Geoffrey Brereton. The material on Rousseau and Voltaire was previously published in separate volumes of The Living Thoughts Library.

The Great Issues of Politics: An Introduction to Political Science. By LESLIE LIPSON. (New York: Prentice-Hall. 1954. Pp. xvi, 431. $7.00.)

This book discusses such general problems as the nature of society, the origins of the state, the content and method of political science, citizenship, equalitarianism, politics and economics, authority, the constitutional distribution of governmental powers, international relations, and the dynamics of political change.

Communism: Challenge to Americans. By CARROLL HAWKINS. (East Lansing: Michigan State College Press. 1953. Pp. 76. $1.00.)

Second edition of a volume intended as a handbook for the average citizen, presenting a general summary of the nature and development of communism and its status in the United States and throughout the world, along with some suggestions as to how it can best be combated by the West.

Mao Tse-Tung: Selected Works. Vol. 1: 1926-1936. (New York: International Publishers. 1954. Pp. 336. $3.00.)

The first of five volumes bringing together, in chronological order, what the Chinese Communists believe to be Mao's most important writings. Based on the Chinese edition, but translated, published, and further annotated in England, this first volume includes the famous "Report on an Investigation into the Peasant Movement in Hunan," Mao's analysis of classes in Chinese society, considerable comment on revolutionary and guerrilla warfare, and first speeches pointing toward a united front against the Japanese.

The State the Enemy. By ERNEST BENN. (London: Ernest Benn Ltd. 1953. Distributed by the British Book Centre, New York. Pp. 175. $3.00.)

Sir Ernest Benn, head of one of the large English publishing houses, spells out in Spencerian terms his indictment of socialism and the planned society. For Sir Ernest, nationalization, socialism, and the Labor party are anathema and the utilization of the state as the instrument for the attainment of their purposes is deplored. The author's solution is a return to unhampered individualism.

Contemporary British Conservatism: Its Nature and Content. By LUIGI SAVASTANO. (New York: Vantage Press. 1953. Pp. v, 63. $2.50.)

This book comprises a superficial summary of the "content" of British conservatism, followed by the author's conclusion that it represents neither a sound political philosophy nor a serious contender for popular support in the modern world.

Wirtschaftssysteme und Gesellschaftssysteme. By EDUARD HEIMANN. (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr Paul Siebeck. 1954. Pp. xiv, 250.)

A searching analysis of various economic and social systems by an author who believes that the present social crisis is caused by the weakening of the religious spirit of Western man and that the solution of the problems confronting our society can only be attained through Christian social ethics.

Experiment in Education: What We Can Learn from Teaching Germany. By WILLIAM ERNEST HOCKING. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1954. Pp. xvi, 303. $5.00.)

Using the American attempts to "reeducate" Germany as a springboard, the famous philosopher subjects the American system of higher education and its philosophy to a searching criticism that focusses primarily upon what he believes to be the faulty assumption that democratic education means equal education open to all comers; to proceed from such a premise means only that educational standards and the quality of scholarship decline together.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Abel, Deryck. Cobden—150th Anniversary. Contemporary Review. July, 1954.

Alföldi, Andreas. Die Geburt der Kaiserlichen Bildsymbolik. Museum Helveticum. July, 1954.

Ames, Van Meter. Zen and Pragmatism. Philosophy East and West. April, 1954.

Antheunis, L. La Succession au Trône d'Elizabeth I^{re} d'Angleterre et les Catholiques. Revue d'Histoire Ecclésiastique. XLIX/I. 1954.

Arciniegas, German. Savonarola, Machiavelli and Guido Antonio Vespucci: Totalitarian and Democrat Five Hundred Years Ago. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Ballard, René N. The Administrative Theory of William Howard Taft. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

Baratier, P. Un Texte Inédité d'Edmund Burke. Études Anglaises. April, 1954.

Becker, George J. Edward Bellamy: Utopia, American Plan. Antioch Review. June, 1954.

Beutin, L. Hamilton und Jefferson. Historische Zeitschrift. 177/3. 1954.

Bewley, Marius. Fenimore Cooper and the Economic Age. American Literature. May, 1954.

Biscione, Michele. Rassegna di Studi Burckhardtiani. Rassegna di Filosofia. January-March, 1954.

Bouissounouse, Janine. George Sand, Militante Sociale. Europe. June-July, 1954.

Brann, E. R. The Political Ideas of Alexander Von Humboldt. (Madison, Wis.: 1954).

Brown, B. Katherine. A Note on the Puritan Concept of Aristocracy. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1954.

Brown, B. Katherine. Freemanship in Puritan Massachusetts. American Historical Review. July, 1954.

Brown, Truesdell S. Hefodotus and His Profession. American Historical Review. July, 1954.

Bruère, Richard T. Tacitus and Pliny's Panegyricus. Classical Philology. July, 1954.

Burns, Edward McNall. The Philosophy of History of the Founding Fathers. Historian. Spring, 1954.

Bussón, Henri. La Pratique Religieuse de Montaigne. Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance. 16/1. 1954.

Child, Arthur. History as Practical. Philosophical Quarterly. July, 1954.

Childe, Gordon. The Position of Old-World Prehistory. Diogenes. Winter, 1954; Spring, 1954.

Collins, Irene. The Government and the Press During the Reign of Louis-Philippe. English Historical Review. April, 1954.

Conover, Milton. St. Thomas Aquinas as a Social Realist. Social Science. June, 1954.

Costanzo, Joseph F. Juridic Origins of Representation. Fordham Law Review. June, 1954.

Crabbe, V. Balzac et l'Administration. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. 20/2. 1954.

Cuvillier, Armand. Progrès de la Connaissance et Pressentiment de son Pouvoir (Bacon, Descartes, l'Encyclopédie). Revue de Synthèse. July-December, 1953.

d'Angers, Julien-Eymard. Stoïcisme et Libertinage dans l'Oeuvre de François La Mothe le Vayer. Revue des Sciences Humaines. July-September, 1954.

Dawson, Christophér. The Historic Origins of Liberalism. Review of Politics. July, 1954.

Defourny, P. Les Fondements de la Religion d'après Cicéron. Les Études Classiques. July, 1954.

Demougeot, Émilienne. À propos des Interventions du Pape Innocent I^{er} dans la Politique Séculière. Revue Historique. July-September, 1954.

D'Ors, Eugenio. Filósofos sin Sistema. Clavileño. March-April, 1954.

Eberhardt, Walter. Die Geschichtsdeutung des Thukydides. Gymnasium. 61/4. 1954.

Eliot, T. S. Vergil und die Christliche Welt. Merkur, July, 1954.

Ensslin, W. Der Kaiser in der Spätantike. Historische Zeitschrift. 177/3. 1954.

Fascher, Eric. Sokrates und Christus. Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft. 45/1-2. 1954.

Fine, Sidney. Is May Day American in Origin? Historian. Spring, 1954.

Fisch, Max H. Alexander Bain and the Genealogy of Pragmatism. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.

Fodor, Heinrich. Ferenc Dávid der Apostel der Religiösen Duldung. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. 36/1. 1954.

Foucault, J.-A. de. Polybe Contre Napoléon. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. June, 1954.

Frisch, Morton J. Lincoln's Concept of Practical Wisdom. Prairie Schooner. Summer, 1954.

Gabba, E. Le Origini della Guerra Sociale e la Vita Politica Romana dopo l'89 A.C. Athenaeum. Fas. 1-2. 1954.

Goodykoontz, Colin B. The Founding Fathers and Clio. Pacific Historical Review. May, 1954.

Grant, G. P. Plato and Popper. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1954.

Greene, John C. American Debate on the Negro's Place in Nature, 1780-1815. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.

Grimsley, Ronald. Rousseau and Kierkegaard. Cambridge Journal. July, 1954.

Hahlweg, Werner. Lenin und Clausewitz. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. 36/1. 1954.

Hampl, F. Alexander der Grosse und die Beurteilung Geschichtlicher Persönlichkeiten in der Modernen Historiographie. La Nouvelle Clio. March-April, 1954.

Hause, J. "Le Grand Cyprus," "Zayde," et Bossuet. Les Lettres Romanes. May, 1954.

Hayek, F. A. Storia e Politica. Il Politico. April, 1954.

Higham, John. Intellectual History and Its Neighbors. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.

Hilton, Ronald. Doña Emilia Pardo-Bazán, Neo-Catholicism and Christian Socialism. Americas. July, 1954.

Houzeau, J.-C. La Terreur Blanche au Texas [Civil War Period]. Europe. May, 1954.

Jacoby, Henry and Cosey, Lewis A. Rückblick auf Utopia. Aufklärung. March, 1953.

Jacquot, Jean. Acontius and the Progress of Tolerance in England. Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance. 16/2. 1954.

Jones, A. H. M. Die Wirtschaftliche Grundlage der Athenischen Demokratie. Die Welt als Geschichte. 14/1. 1954.

Kantorowicz, Ernst H. Inalienability: A Note on Canonical Practice and the English Coronation Oath in the Thirteenth Century. Speculum. July, 1954.

Kessel, Eberhard. Friedrich Meinecke. Die Welt als Geschichte. 14/1. 1954.

Klingender, F. D. Paleolithic Religion and the Principle of Social Evolution. British Journal of Sociology. June, 1954.

Kolf, Martin C. Van der. Priam and Laomedon from a Historical Point of View. Mnemosyne. VII/1. 1954.

Koppers, Wilhelm. Primitive Man, State and Society. Diogenes. Winter, 1954.

Löwith, Karl. Man's Self-Alienation in the Early Writings of Marx. Social Research. Summer, 1954.

Löwith, Karl. Storia e Storicismo. Rivista di Filosofia. April, 1954.

Lqw, J. M. The Rate of Interest: British Opinion in the Eighteenth Century. Manchester School of Economics and Social Sciences. May, 1954.

MacMaster, Robert E. Danilevsky and Spengler: A New Interpretation. Journal of Modern History. June, 1954.

Macpherson, C. B. The Social Bearing of Locke's Political Theory. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1954.

Mann, Golo. Die Amerikaner und Ihre Geschichte. Die Welt als Geschichte. 14/1. 1954.

Maravall, José Antonio. La Idea de Reconquista en la España Medieval. Arbor. May, 1954.

Marlow, A. N. Hinduism and Buddhism in Greek Philosophy. Philosophy East and West. April, 1954.

Marshall, Geoffrey. David Hume and Political Skepticism. Philosophical Quarterly. July, 1954.

Martini, R. La Religione di Lucrezio. Giornale Italiano di Filologia. May, 1954.

Masellis, Vito. Nuovi Argomenti per l'Autenticità della "Grande Etica" [Aristotle]. Rivista di Filologia. XXXII/2. 1954.

McCall, Lillian Blumberg. The Hidden Springs of Sigmund Freud. Commentary. August, 1954.

Mediaeval Representation in Theory and Practice [Various Articles]. Speculum. April, 1954, Part 2.

- Milmed, Bella K. Theories of Religious Knowledge, from Kant to Jaspers. Philosophy. July, 1954.
- Moore, W. G. Pascal and the Scientific Spirit. Cambridge Journal. June, 1954.
- Mosse, George L. The Assimilation of Machiavelli in English Thought: The Casuistry of William Perkins and William Ames. Huntington Library Quarterly. August, 1954.
- Murphy, Arthur L. Darwinism—A Century Later. Dalhousie Review. Spring, 1954.
- Niebuhr, Richard. The Idea of Covenant and American Democracy. Church History. June, 1954.
- Niel, Henri. Philosophie et Histoire. Revue Internationale de Philosophie. No. 29, 1954.
- Novak, D. Anarchism and Individual Terrorism. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. May, 1954.
- Oliver, James H. The Roman Governor's Permission for a Decree of the Polis. Hesperia. April-June, 1954.
- Olmi, Massimo. "The Economist." Civitas. May, 1954.
- Oppel, Horst. Die Gonzala-Utopie in Shakespeare's "Sturm." Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geschichte. 28/2. 1954.
- Palacios, L. E. El Platonismo Empírico de Luis de Bonald. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.
- Parga, Manuel J. de. Hugo Grocio y el Proceso de Constitución de la Realidad Jurídica Moderna. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.
- Persons, Stow. The Cyclical Theory of History in Eighteenth Century America. American Quarterly. Summer, 1954.
- Pire, G. De l'Influence de Sénèque sur les Essais de Montaigne. Les Études Classiques. July, 1954.
- Polin, Raymond. Sur la Signification de la Paix d'après la Philosophie de Hobbes. Revue Française de Science Politique. April-June, 1954.
- Post, Gaines. "Blessed Lady Spain"—Vincentius Hispanus and Spanish National Imperialism in the Thirteenth Century. Speculum. April, 1954.
- Post, Gaines. Two Notes on Nationalism in the Middle Ages. Traditio. IX. 1953.
- Porter, Eugene O. Polydore Vergil—The Forgotten Historian. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. June, 1954.
- Preu, James. Swift's Influence on Godwin. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.
- Prior, Mooky E. Bacon's Man of Science. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.
- Puritans [Various Articles] Church History. June, 1954.
- Putnam, George F. The Meaning of Barresisme. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.
- Reinhardt, John E. The Evolution of William Ellery Channing's Sociopolitical Ideas. American Literature. May, 1954.
- Reinhardt, Karl. Philosophy and History among the Greeks. Greece and Rome. June, 1954.
- Riker, William H. S. G. Fisher and the Separation of Powers During the Civil War. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.
- Rodríguez-Alcala, Hugo. Francisco Romero: Vida y Obra. Revista Hispanica Moderna. January-April, 1954.
- Romero, Francisco. Anotación sobre Spencer. Sur. March-April, 1954.
- Santonastaso, Giuseppe. Ateismo e Spiritualismo in uno Scritto Inedito di Augusto Blanqui. Nuova Rivista Storica. January-June, 1954.
- Schirmann, Jefim. The Function of the Poet in Medieval Spain. Jewish Social Studies. July, 1954.
- Schwartz, Harold. Fugitive Slave Days in Boston. New England Quarterly. June, 1954.
- Seidlin, Oscar. Greatness and Decline of the Bourgeois: Dramas by Schiller and Dumas. Comparative Literature. Spring, 1954.
- Sicot, Lucien. Le Marquis de Chastellux. La Revue Liberale. July-September, 1954.
- Simon, Pierre-Henri. La Conscience Historique de l'Homme du XIX^e Siècle. L'Age Nouveau. July, 1954.
- Smith, James Morton. Alexander Hamilton, the Alien Law, and Seditious Libels. Review of Politics. July, 1954.
- , ———. The Enforcement of the Alien Friends Act of 1798. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1954.
- , ———. Sedition in the Old Dominion: James T. Callender and The Prospect Before Us. Journal of Southern History. May, 1954.
- Smith, John E. Rousseau, Romanticism and the Philosophy of Existence. Yale French Studies. No. 13, Spring-Summer, 1954.
- Smith, Wilson, William Paley's Theological Utilitarianism in America. William and Mary Quarterly. July, 1954.
- Soboul, A. Robespierre and the Popular Movement. Past and Present. May, 1954.

Soleta, Chester A. The Literary Criticism of Orestes A. Brownson. Review of Politics. July, 1954.

Spengler, Joseph J. Richard Cantillon: First of the Moderns (I). Journal of Political Economy. August, 1954.

Stankiewicz, W. J. The Wars of Religion and Their Impact. Proceedings of the Huguenot Society of London. XIX/1. 1953.

Stark, R. Ciceros Staatsdefinition. La Nouvelle Clío. January-February, 1954.

Stark, Tadeusz. La Dottrina e il Diritto di Migrazione. Civitas. June, 1954.

Steinen, Wolfram Von den. Natur und Geist im Zwölften Jahrhundert. Die Welt as Geschichte. 14/2. 1954.

Taubes, Susan Anima. The Gnostic Foundations of Heideggers Nihilism. Journal of Religion. July, 1954.

Tête, M. Le Totalitarisme de Platon. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. June, 1954.

Tibiletti, G. Alessandro e la Liberazione della Città d'Asia minore. Athenaeum. Fas. I-II. 1954.

Topazio, V. W. D'Holbach's Conception of Nature. Modern Language Notes. June, 1954.

Toynbee, Arnold J. Pharisee or Publican? Hibbert Journal. July, 1954.

Valentini, Francesco. Studi Hegeliani in Francia. Rassegna di Filosofia. January-March, 1954.

Watson, A. Irvine. George Buchanan and Antonio Ferreira's Castro. Bulletin of Hispanic Studies. April, 1954.

Wernham, J. C. S. Berdyaev's Debt to Dostoevski. University of Toronto Quarterly. April, 1954.

Wheeler, James E. The Thought of John Dewey in its Historical Setting. Education Theory. April, 1954.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Aquilar Navarro, Mariano. America y el Desarrollo del Derecho Internacional. Estudios Americanos. June-July, 1954.

Arens, Richard. Conspiracy Revisted. Buffalo Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Asís Garroti, Augustín de. La Filosofía General del Derecho en Miguel Reale. Estudios Americanos. May, 1954.

Bloch, Ernst. Über Beziehung des Mutterrechts (Antigone) zum Naturrecht. Sinn und Form. 6/2. 1954.

Brito Melo Boson, Gerson de. Direito e

Sociedade. Revista da Faculdade de Direito. October, 1953.

Chroust, Anton-Hermann. The Managerial Function of Law. Boston University. June, 1954.

Coker, Francis W. Academic Freedom and the Congressional Investigations: Free Speech and the Silent Professor. Journal of Politics. August, 1954.

Fuller, Lon L. American Legal Philosophy at Mid-Century. Journal of Legal Education. 6/4. 1954.

Joyner, Thomas E. Self-Incrimination and the Duty to Testify: Changing Concepts. Journal of Politics. August, 1954.

Kägi, Werner. Das Evangelium und das Völkerrechtliche Soveränitätsproblem der Gegenwart. Humanitas. June, 1954.

Kauper, Paul G. Segregation in Public Education: The Decline of Plessy v. Ferguson. Michigan Law Review. June, 1954.

Lampué, Pierre. Le Developpement Historique du Recours pour Excès de Pouvoir depuis ses Origènes jusqu'au Début du XIX^e Siècle. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. 20/2. 1954.

Latham, Earl. The Supreme Court and the Supreme People. Journal of Politics. May, 1954.

Lavau, Georges E. Le Droit International en U.R.S.S. Esprit. July, 1954.

Legislative Investigations: Safeguards for Witnesses [Various Articles]. Notre Dame Lawyer. Winter, 1954.

Meltzer, Bernard D. Involuntary Confessions: The Allocation of Responsibility Between Judge and Jury. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1954.

Ramella, Pablo A. Derechos del Trabajador en la Constitución Argentina. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.

Sauvel, Torry. Les Fondations, Leur Origines, Leur Évolution. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. April-June, 1954.

Stark, Tadeusz. La Libertà di Migrazione nella Legislazione Moderna. Civitas. April, 1954.

Strauss, E. B. Moral Responsibility and the Law. Dublin Review. Second Quarter, 1954.

Sutherland, Arthur E. The Supreme Court and the Public School. Harvard Educational Review. Spring, 1954.

Special Study and Analysis

Aaron, Daniel. Conservatism, Old and New. American Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Allén, E. L. Nicolás Bédyaev. Contemporary Review. August, 1954.

Anderson, C. Arnold. The Need for a Functional Theory of Social Class. Rural Sociology. June, 1954.

Aron, Raymond. Asia: Between Malthus and Marx. Encounter. August, 1954.

Aron, Raymond. J.-P. Sartre et le Communisme. La Revue de Paris. June, 1954.

Bagolini, Luigi. La Justicia Como Historia. Estudios Americanos. June-July, 1954.

Barback, Ronald H. Economics and Moral Judgments. Australasian Journal of Philosophy. May, 1954.

Beirnaert, L. Marxisme et Psychiatrie. Études. June, 1956.

Belin-Milleron, J. La Crise des Sciences Morales et Politiques devant l'Universel. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. June, 1954.

Bobbio, Norberto. Intelletuali e Vita Politica in Italia. Nuovi Argomenti. March-April, 1954.

Börnski, Ludwig. Die Funktion der Literatur in der Englischen Gesellschaft. Die Neueren Sprachen. August, 1954.

Borne, E. Pouvoir Politique et Pouvoir Religieux. La Vie Intellectuelle. July, 1954.

Bortoloso, G. Identificazione del Problema Teologico. La Civiltà Cattolica. 19 June 1954.

Boudeville, J.-R. L'Économie, Science Politique. Revue Française de Science Politique. April-June, 1954.

Brinton, Crane. The Residue of Pareto. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Brógan, D. W. The Problem of High Culture and Mass Culture. Diogenes. Winter, 1954.

Brunner, O. Das Problem einer Europäischen Sozialgeschichte. Historische Zeitschrift. 177/3. 1954.

Buchheim, Karl. Die Kirche und die Ethik der Politiker. Neues Abendland. July, 1954.

Cappeletti, Vincenzo. Nota sulla Scienza nella Società Contemporanea. Civitas. May, 1954.

Cary, Joyce. The Idea of Progress. Cornhill. Summer, 1954.

Chick, Edson M. Ernst Wiechert and the Problem of Evil. Monatshefte. April-May, 1954.

Clark, Colin. The Twilight of Liberalism. Encounter. August, 1954.

Clark, Pamela M. Some Difficulties in Utilitarianism. Philosophy. July, 1954.

Coates, J. B. Existentialist Ethics. Fortnightly. May, 1954.

Cobban, Alfred. Der Verfall der Politischen Theorie. Der Monat. June, 1954.

Communism [Various Articles]. Estudios Sobre el Comunismo. April-June, 1954.

Coser, Lewis. The Age of the Informer. Dissent. Summer, 1954.

Crick, Bernard. The Science of Politics in the United States. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1954.

Crossman, R. H. S. and Others. Gibt es Politische Neurosen? Der Monat. May, 1954.

Crossman, Richard. The Ethics of Loyalty. Confluence. June, 1954.

Cruikshank, John. Romain Rolland: The Psychological Basis of Political Belief. Hermathena. May, 1954.

Denny, Reuel. The Scientific Corps—A Sixth Estate. Confluence. June, 1954.

Dombois, Hans. Mensch und Sache. Zum Problem des Eigentums. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 110/2. 1954.

Dresch, J. Karl Jaspers in Frankreich. Antares. June, 1954.

Education. Reform in France [Various Articles]. Esprit. June, 1954.

Erval, François. Gottfried Benn ou la Double Vie des Intellectuels Allemands. Les Temps Modernes. June, 1954.

Fallico, Arturo B. Existentialism and Education. Educational Theory. April, 1954.

Feibleman, James K. Toward An Analysis of the Basic Value System. American Anthropologist. June, 1954.

Fiedler, Leslie A. McCarthy. Encounter. August, 1954.

Fillet, Louis. Political Literature: A Post-Mortem. Southwest Review. Summer, 1954.

Friedman, Georges. Heidegger et la Crise Contemporaine de l'Idée de Progrès. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. January-June, 1954.

Friedman, John. Notes on the Social Conditions of Economic Progress. Ethics. July, 1954.

Galíndez, Jesús de. La Libertad en la España de Franco. Cuadernos Americanos. May-June, 1954.

Garraty, John A. Preserved Smith, Harlow, and Psychology. Journal of the History of Ideas. June, 1954.

Gell, C. W. M. The Liberal Party in South Africa. Fortnightly. June, 1954.

Gewirth, Alan. Can Men Change the Laws of Social Science? Philosophy of Science. July, 1954.

Godfrey, E. Drexel. France: Collapse of a Class. Antioch Review. June, 1954.

Hague, John Allen. The Massachusetts Constitutional Convention: 1917-1919. A Study of Dogmatism in an Age of Transition. New England Quarterly. June, 1954.

Hamer, Jérôme. La Teología de Karl Barth. Una Orientación del Protestantismo Contemporáneo. Arbor. July-August, 1954.

Hardaway, R. Travis. Heinrich Mann's Kaiserreich Trilogy and the Democratic Spirit. Journal of English and Germanic Philology. July, 1954.

Hook, Sidney. Security and Freedom. Confluence. June, 1954.

Humphrey, Robert L. Human Nature in American Thought: Reconciliation of the Ages of Reason and Science. Political Science Quarterly. June, 1954.

Jaspers, Karl. Brief an Rudolf Bultmann. Merkur. June, 1954.

Jones, Howard Mumford. Republican Humanism. Social Research. Summer, 1954.

Kampelman, Max M. The Legislative Bureaucracy: Its Response to Political Change. Journal of Politics. August, 1954.

Kennedy, Gail. Science and the Transformation of Common Sense: The Basic Problem of Dewey's Philosophy. Journal of Philosophy. 27 May 1954.

Kirby, J. D. Morals and Institutions. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1954.

Kirchheimer, Otto. Parteistruktur und Massendemokratie in Europa. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. 79/3. 1954.

Kirk, Russell. Ethical Labor. Sewanee Review. July-September, 1954.

Kline, Morris. The Role of Mathematics in Civilization. Confluence. June, 1954.

Knight, Everett W. The Politics of Existentialism. Twentieth Century. August, 1954.

Kolonicki, P. Morale Communiste et Morale Religieuse. Documents. April-May, 1954.

Kopelmanas, Lazare. The Notion of Economic Freedom in International Justice. Journal du Droit International. January-February, 1954.

Le Blond, J. M. Le Chrétien devant l'Athéisme Actuel. Études. June, 1954.

Leibholz, Gerhard. Estado y Sociedad en Inglaterra. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1954.

Lerner, Max. Christian Culture and American Democracy. American Quarterly. Summer, 1954.

Letwin, Shirley Robin. Representation

Without Democracy: The Webb's Constitution. Review of Politics. July, 1954.

Lewis, Bernard. Communism and Islam. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Lord, Clifford De F. The Odyssey and the Western World. Sewanee Review. July-September, 1954.

Lowé, Adolph. The Classical Theory of Economic Growth. Social Research. Summer, 1954.

Macpherson, C. B. The Deceptive Task of Political Theory. Cambridge Journal. June, 1954.

Maranini, Giuseppe. Governo Parlamentare e Partitocrazia. Revista de Faculdade de Direito. October, 1953.

Marx, Fritz Morstein. Betrachtungen zum Amerikanischen Parteiwesen. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. 79/3. 1954.

Maulner, Thierry. Les Utopies Rassurantes. Preuves. July, 1954.

McCulloch, Warren S. Through the Den of the Metaphysician. British Journal for the Philosophy of Science. May, 1954.

Messineo, A. La Solidarietà delle Classi Scopo dell'azione Sociale Cristiana. La Civiltà Cattolica. 17 July 1954.

Meyer, Agnes E. The Attack on the Intellect. American Association of University Professors Bulletin. Winter, 1953-54.

Moix Martínez, Manuel. En Torno al Concepto de Justicia Social. Cuadernos de Política Social. No. 21, 1954.

Molina, Raúl A. España en la Historiografía Argentina. Estudios Americanos. May, 1954.

Mumford, Lewis. The Rise of Caliban. Virginia Quarterly Review. Summer, 1954.

Montanari, Fausto. Política e Cultura. Civitas. June, 1954.

Monypenny, Philip. Political Science and the Study of Groups: Notes to Guide a Research Project. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.

Morales Padrón, Francisco. Historia de América, Historia de Occidente. Estudios Americanos. June-July, 1954.

Moritz, Manfred. Verpflichtung und Freiheit: Über den Satz "Sollen Impliziert Können." Theoria. XIX/3. 1953.

Murray, John Courtney. The Problem of Pluralism in America. Thought. Summer, 1954.

Neumann, William L. Religion, Morality, and Freedom: The Ideological Background of the Peary Expedition. Pacific Historical Review. August, 1954.

Niemeyer, E. Anticlericalism in the Mexican Constitutional Convention of 1916-1917. Americas. July, 1954.

Nikhilananda, Swami. Basic Ideals in Hindu Religion and Philosophy. Modern Review. May, 1954.

Nilson, Sten S. Wahlsoziologische Probleme des Nationalsozialismus. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 110/2. 1954.

Norsa, Achille. Sui Caratteri, le Finalità e il Metodo della Storia della Dottrine Politiche. Nuova Rivista Storica. January-June, 1954.

Perroux, François. The Gift: Its Economic Meaning in Contemporary Capitalism. Diogenes. Spring, 1954.

Perryman, J. N. On the Meaning of "Democracy." Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1953.

Polaschek, R. J. Freedom in Modern Society. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. March, 1954.

Paynter, J. W. The Roman Church in Differing Cultures. Quarterly Review. July, 1954.

Quinn, Edward. Theology of Christendom. Dublin Review. Second Quarter, 1954.

Rauschnig, Hermann. "Konservative Revolution" in den U.S.A.? Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. July, 1954.

Roucek, Joseph S. Sociología de la Opinión Pública. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. XVI/I. 1954.

Saposs, David J. The Split Between Asian and Western Socialism. Foreign Affairs. July, 1954.

Science. La Science et l'Homme [Various Articles]. La Nef. June, 1954.

Shannon, Fred A. Culture and Agriculture in America. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. June, 1954.

Smith, P. H. N. Determinists and Libertarians. Mind. July, 1954.

Spain [Various Articles]. Universitas. May, 1954.

Spiegelberg, Herbert. French Existentialism: Its Social Philosophies. Kenyon Review. Summer, 1954.

Tixier, Gilbert. Les Notions de Droite et de Gauche en France. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. May, 1954.

Torre, A. Mussolini, la Sua Politica Estera e il Salvemini. Paideia. March-April, 1954.

Trauth, Mary Philip. The Bancroft Despatches on the Vatican Council and the Kulturkampf. Catholic Historical Review. July, 1954.

Tugwell, R. G. The Sources of New Deal Reformism. Ethics. July, 1954.

Wagner, Geoffrey. The Classical Revival. A Dossier of Anti-Semitism. Chicago Jewish Forum. Summer, 1954.

Wallace, Elizabeth. Goldwin Smith on England and America. American Historical Review. July, 1954.

Walsh, V. C. The Theory of the Good Will. Cambridge Journal. July, 1954.

Weise, G. Der Humanismus und das Prinzip der Klassischen Geisteshaltung. Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance. 16/2. 1954.

Wiemer, Henry Nelson. Time and Man's Ultimate Commitment. Journal of Religion. July, 1954.

Woodress, James L. Booth Tarkington's Political Career. American Literature. May, 1954.

Yap, P. M. The Mental Illness of Hung Hsiu-ch'üan, Leader of the Taiping Rebellion. Far Eastern Quarterly. May, 1954.

Zucchi, Hernán. Teoría y Praxis en Ortega y Gasset. Notas y Estudios de Filosofía. January-March, 1954.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Science

Abruzzi, Adam. Problems of Inference in the Socio-Physical Sciences. Journal of Philosophy. September 16, 1954.

Crick, Bernard. The Science of Politics in the United States. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. August, 1954.

Edwards, Ward. The Theory of Decision Making. Psychological Bulletin. July, 1954.

Gewirth, Alan. Can Men Change Laws of Social Science? Philosophy of Science, July, 1954.

Jones, Stephen B. A Unified Field Theory of Political Geography. Annals of American Geographers. June, 1954.

MacRae, D. G. Recent Developments in Sociological Research. International Social Science Bulletin. 1954, #1.

Richards, I. A. Toward a Theory of Translating. The American Anthropologist. December 1953, Part 2.

Suppes, Patrick. Some Remarks on Problems and Methods in the Philosophy of Science. Philosophy of Science. July, 1954.

Research Methods and Organization

Arensberg, Conrad M. The Community-Study Method. American Journal of Sociology. September, 1954.

Clausen, John A. and Kohn, Melvin L. The Ecological Approach in Social Psychiatry. American Journal of Sociology. September, 1954.

Dexter, Lewis Anthony. The Use of Public Opinion Polls by Political Party Organizations. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Fernberger, S. W. The Prestige and Impact of Various Psychologists on Psychology in America. American Journal of Psychology. June, 1954.

Getzels, J. W. The Question-Answer Process. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Grace, Harry A. Facilitating Legislative Research. Journal of Applied Psychology. August, 1954.

Indley, T. Foster. The Control Factor in Social Experimentation. Philosophy of Science. July, 1954.

Macpherson, C. B. World Trends in Political Science Research. American Political Science Review. June, 1954.

Perrine, Mervyn W. and Wessman, Alden E. Disguised Public Opinion Interviewing with Small Samples. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Wallace, David. A Case For and Against Mail Questionnaires. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Motivation and Personality

Bernberg, R. E. Personality Correlates of Social Conformity. Journal of Applied Psychology. June, 1954.

Cohn, Thomas S. and Carsch, Henry. Administration of the F Scale to a Sample of Germans. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Dean, Lois R. Social Integration, Attitudes and Union Activity. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1954.

Dreyer, Albert S. Aspiration Behavior as Influenced by Expectation and Group Comparison. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Festinger, Leon; Torrey, Jane; and Willman, Ben. Self-Evaluation as a Function of Attraction to the Group. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Goldberg, Solomon C. Three Situational Determinants of Conformity to Social Norms. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Holt, Robert T. Age as a Factor in the Recruitment of Communist Leadership. American Political Science Review. June, 1954.

Jones, Nobie Warren. The Production of Change in a Pre-Natal Clinic. Human Organization. Winter, 1954.

O'Neil, W. M. and Levinson, Daniel J. A Factorial Exploration of Authoritarianism and Some of its Ideological Concomitants. Journal of Personality. June, 1954.

Perry, Helen Swick. Selective Inattention as an Explanatory Concept for U. S. Public Attitudes toward the Atomic Bomb. Psychiatry. August, 1954.

Rasmussen, Glen and Zander, Alvin. Group Membership and Self-Evaluation. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Sanford, Nevitt. Recent Developments in Connection with the Investigation of the Authoritarian Personality. The Sociological Review. July, 1954.

Siegel, Sidney. Certain Determinants and Correlates of Authoritarianism. Genetic Psychology Monographs. May, 1954.

Somer, Robert and Killian, Lewis M. Areas of Value Difference. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1954.

Steiner, Ivan D. Ethnocentrism and Tolerance of Trait "Inconsistency." Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Stone, Gregory P. City Shoppers and Urban Identification. American Journal of Sociology. July, 1954.

Opinions and Attitudes

Ash, Philip. The Development of a Scale to Measure Anti-Negro Prejudice. Journal of Social Psychology. May, 1954.

Brayfield, A. H.; Kennedy, C. E., Jr.; and Kendall, W. E. Social Status of Industry. Journal of Applied Psychology. August, 1954.

Gerard, Harold B. The Anchorage of Opinions in Face-to-Face Groups. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Hearnshaw, L. S. Attitudes to Work. Occupational Psychology. July, 1954.

Hastings, Philip K. Level of Information and Opinion Content. Political Science Quarterly, June, 1954.

Jahoda, Gustav. Political Attitudes and Judgments of Other People. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Kephart, William M. Negro Visibility. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Kilpatrick, Franklin P. and Garard, James L., Jr. Two Small Sample Opinion Polls. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Manis, Jerome G. and Meltzer, Bernard N. Attitudes of Textile Workers to Class Structure. American Journal of Sociology. July, 1954.

Nagle, Bryant F. Productivity, Employee Attitudes and Supervisor Sensitivity. Personnel Psychology. Summer, 1954.

Nelson, Erland N. P. Persistence of Attitudes of College Students Fourteen Years Later. Psychological Monographs. 1954, #373.

Saenger, Gerhart and Flowerman, Samuel. Stereotypes and Prejudicial Attitudes. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Group Behavior

Adams, Stuart. Social Climate and Productivity in Small Military Groups. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Andrews, T. G.; Smith, D. D.; and Kahn, L. A. An Empirical Analysis of the Effectiveness of Psychological Warfare. Journal of Applied Psychology. August, 1954.

Argyris, Chris. Organization of a Bank. Labor and Management Center, Yale University, Studies in Organizational Behavior, #1.

Argyris, Chris. Human Relations in a Bank. Harvard Business Review. September-October, 1954.

Barnes, J. A. Class and Committees in a Norwegian Island Parish. Human Relations. 1954, #1.

Bass, Bernard M. The Leaderless Group Discussion. Psychological Bulletin. September, 1954.

Blau, Peter M. Patterns of Interaction among a Group of Officials in a Government Agency. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Burns, Tom. The Directions of Activity and Communication in a Departmental Executive Group. Human Relations. 1954, #1.

Comrey, A. L.; Piffner, J. M. and High, W. S. Factors Influencing Organizational Effectiveness: A Final Report. University of Southern California Bookstore.

Dean, Lois R. Union Activity and Dual Loyalty. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. July, 1954.

Festinger, Leon. A Theory of Social Comparison Processes. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Fiedler, Fred E. Assumed Similarity Measures as Predictors of Team Effectiveness. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Friedmann, Georges. Outline for a Psychosociology of Assembly Line Work. Human Organization. Winter, 1954.

Greer, F. Loyal; Galanter, Eugene H.; and Nordlie, Peter G. Interpersonal Knowledge and Individual and Group Effectiveness. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Gross, Edward. Primary Functions of the Small Group. American Journal of Sociology. July, 1954.

Grossack, Martin M. Some Effects of Cooperation and Competition Upon Small Group Behavior. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Guetzkow, Harold and Gyr, John. An Analysis of Conflict in Decision-Making Groups. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Henry, Jules. The Formal Social Structure of a Psychiatric Hospital. Psychiatry. August, 1954.

Herbst, P. G. The Analysis of Social Flow Systems. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Higgin, Gurth. The Effect of Reference Group Functions on Social Status Ratings. British Journal of Psychology. May, 1954.

Hollander, E. P. Authoritarianism and Leadership Choice in a Military Setting. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Hollander, E. P. Peer Nominations on Leadership as a Predictor of the Pass-Fail Criterion in Naval Air Training. Journal of Applied Psychology. June, 1954.

Hoffman, Paul J.; Festinger, Leon; and Lawrence, Douglas H. Tendencies toward Group Comparability in Competitive Bargaining. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Horwitz, Murray. The Recall of Interrupted Group Tasks: An Experimental Study of Individual Motivation in Relation to Group Goals. Human Relations. 1954, #1.

Keefe, William J. Parties, Partisanship, and Public Policy in the Pennsylvania Legislature. American Political Science Review. June, 1954.

Klubeck, Stanley and Bass, Bernard M. Differential Effects of Training on Persons of Different Leadership Status. Human Relations. 1954, #1.

Lanzetta, John T.; Haefner, Don; Langham, Peter; and Axelrod, Howard. Some Effects of Situational Threat on Group Behavior. Jour- nal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Larsen, Otto N. and Hill, Richard J. Mass Media and Interpersonal Communication in the Diffusion of a News Event. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Maccoby, Eleanor E.; Matthews, Richard E.; and Morton, Anton S. Youth and Political Change. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Monypenny, Phillip. Political Science and the Study of Groups. Western Political Quarterly. June, 1954.

Perlmutter, Howard V. Impressions of Influential Members of Discussion Groups. Journal of Psychology. July, 1954.

Schiff, Herbert. Judgmental Response Sets in the Perception of Sociometric Status. Sociometry. August, 1954.

Shaw, Marvin E. Group Structure and the Behavior of Individuals in Small Groups. Journal of Psychology. July, 1954.

Shaw, Marvin E. Some Effects of Problem Complexity Upon Problem Solution Efficiency in Different Communication Nets. Journal of Experimental Psychology. September, 1954.

Shepard, Herbert A. The Value System of a University Research Group. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Strodtbeck, Fred L. and Hare, A. Paul. Bibliography of Small Group Research (1900-1953). Sociometry. May, 1954.

Talland, George A. The Assessment of Group Opinion by Leaders and Their Influence on its Formation. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1954.

Watson, James B. and Samora, Julian. Subordinate Leadership in a Bicultural Community. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Whitin, T. M. On the Span of Central Direction. Naval Research Logistics Quarterly. March, 1954.

Wilson, Everett K. Determinants of Participation in Policy Formation in a College Community. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Culture and Institutions

Anderson, C. Arnold. The Need for a Functional Theory of Social Class. Rural Sociology. June, 1954.

Bott, Elizabeth. The Concept of Class as a Reference Group. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Eisenstadt, S. N. Studies in Reference Group

Behavior. I. Reference Norms and Social Structure. Human Relations. 1954, #2.

Francis, E. K. Variables in the Formation of So-Called "Minority Groups." American Journal of Sociology. July, 1954.

Glass, D. V. Social Stratification and Social Mobility. International Social Science Bulletin. 1954, #1.

Harbison, Frederick H. and Burgess, Eugene W. Modern Management in Western Europe. American Journal of Sociology. July, 1954.

Kirk, Dudley and Huyck, Earl. Overseas Migration from Europe since World War II. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Lenski, Gerhard E. Status Crystallization: a Non-Vertical Dimension of Social Status. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Matthews, Donald R. United States Senators and the Class Structure. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Ranney, Austin and Kendall, Willmoore. The American Party Systems. American Political Science Review. June, 1954.

Rose, Arnold M. and Rose, Caroline B. Intergroup Conflict and Its Mediation. International Social Science Bulletin. 1954, #1.

Ross, Aileen D. French and English Canadian Contacts and Institutional Change. Canadian Journal of Economic and Political Science. August, 1954.

Routh, Guy. Civil Service Pay, 1875-1950. Economica. August, 1954.

Sofer, Cyril. Working Groups in a Plural Society. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1954.

Social Stratification and Social Mobility: U.S.A., Sweden, Japan. Current Sociology. 1953-54, vol. II, #4 (whole number).

Smigel, Erwin O. Trends in Occupational Sociology in the United States: A Survey of Postwar Research. American Sociological Review. August, 1954.

Starr, Betty W. Levels of Communal Relations. American Journal of Sociology. September, 1954.

Thrall, Robert M. and Angell, Robert C. The Mapping of Community Organizations. Sociometry. August, 1954.

Young, Michael. The Role of the Extended Family in a Disaster. Human Relations. 1954, #3.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Buchanan, James M. Individual Choice in Voting and the Market. Journal of Political Economy. August 1954.

Engelbert, Ernest A. Political Strategy of Agriculture. Journal of Farm Economics. August, 1954.

Gabor, Denis and Gabor, Andre. An Essay on the Mathematical Theory of Freedom. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society. Series A, 1954, Part I.

Hoffman, Morton. The Role of Government in Influencing Changes in Housing in Baltimore: 1940-1950. Land Economics. May, 1950.

Levin, Harvey J. Competition among Mass Media and the Public Interest. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1954.

Rolfe, Sidney E. Manpower Allocation under British Planning, 1945-49. American Economic Review. June, 1954.

Streeten, Paul. Programs and Prognoses. Quarterly Journal of Economics. August, 1954.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

AITKEN, HUGH G. J. The Welland Canal Company: A Study in Canadian Enterprise. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 178. $3.50.

ALLEN, CLARK LEE, BUCHANAN, JAMES M. AND COLBERG, MARSHALL R. Prices, Income, and Public Policy: The ABC's of Economics. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. x, 418. $5.00.

ANDRZEJEWSKI, STANISLAW. Military Organization and Society. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, Ltd. 1954. Pp. xiv, 195. $4.50.

ARONSON, ROBERT L. AND WINDMULLER, JOHN P. (EDS.). Labor, Management, and Economic Growth: Proceedings of a Conference on Human Resources and Labor Relations in Underdeveloped Countries. Ithaca: Cornell University, New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations. 1954. Pp. v, 251. $2.00.

AWAD, MAHMOUD M. A Challenge to the Arabs. New York: Pageant Press. 1954. Pp. 120. $2.50.

BARTH, KARL. Against the Stream: Shorter Post-War Writings, 1946-52. New York: Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. 252. $3.75.

BARTHOLOMEW, PAUL C. Summaries of Leading Cases on the Constitution. Ames, Iowa: Littlefield, Adams & Co. 1954. Pp. xxv, 334. $1.75.

BAYLIFF, RUSSELL E., CLARK, EUGENE, EASTON, LLOYD, GRIMES, BLANIE E., JENNINGS, DAVID H., AND LEONARD, NORMAN H. Readings in Social Policy; Values and Policy in American Society; Problems in Social Policy. Dubuque, Iowa: Wm. C. Brown Co. 1954. Pp. xiii, 529. $3.65. Pp. xv, 528, $4.00. Pp. vii, 304. $2.50.

BRUUN, GEOFFREY, AND COMMAGER, HENRY STEELE. Europe and America Since 1492: Western Civilization and Its World Influence. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. 1954. Pp. xiv, 907. $6.75.

BRYSON, LYMAN, FINKELSTEIN, LOUIS, MACIVER, R. M., AND McKEON, RICHARD (EDS.). Symbols and Values: An Initial Study; Thirteenth Symposium of the Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. xviii, 827. $6.00.

BURMA, JOHN H. Spanish-Speaking Groups in the United States. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press. 1954. Pp. ix, 214. $4.00.

CHIANG, SIANG-TSEH. The Nien Rebellion. Seattle: University of Washington. 1954. Pp. xvi, 159. $3.50.

CHILDS, MARQUIS W., AND CATER, DOUGLASS. Ethics in a Business Society. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. 191. $2.75.

Civil Rights in the United States, 1953: A Balance Sheet of Group Relations. New York: American Jewish Congress and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Pp. 189. $6.00.

CONTEMPORARY CIVILIZATION STAFF OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY. Chapters in Western Civilization. Vol. I. New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. 2nd ed. Pp. viii, 545. $4.00.

DEARING, CHARLES L. Industrial Pensions. Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1954. Pp. x, 310. $3.75.

DIRLAM, JOEL B. AND KAHN, ALFRED E. Fair Competition: The Law and Economics of Antitrust Policy. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 307. $4.50.

DODD, EDWIN MERRICK. American Business Corporations until 1860 with Special Reference to Massachusetts. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xix, 524. $7.50.

EATON, CLEMENT. A History of the Southern Confederacy. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1954. Pp. ix, 351. $5.50.

ELLS, WALTER CROSBY. Communism in Education in Asia, Africa and the Far Pacific. Washington: American Council on Education. 1954. Pp. x, 246. $3.00.

- EHMKE, HORST. Grenzen der Verfassungsänderung. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot. 1953. Pp. 144.
- The Federal Reserve System: Purposes and Function*. Washington: Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. 1954. 3rd ed. Pp. xiii, 208.
- FERGUSON, JOHN H., AND MCHENRY, DEAN E. Elements of American Government. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1954. 2nd ed. Pp. x, 649. $5.00.
- FITE, GILBERT C. George N. Peek and the Fight for Farm Parity. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 1954. Pp. xiii, 314. $4.00.
- GABRIEL, RALPH H. (ED.). Hamilton, Madison and Jay on the Constitution: Selections from the Federalist Papers. New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1954. Pp. xviii, 231. $.90 paper, $2.25 cloth.
- GROSS, BERTRAM AND LUMER, WILFRED. The Hard Money Crusade. Washington: Public Affairs Institute. 1954. Pp. xiv, 178. $2.00.
- GUTKIND, E. A. Community and Environment: A Discourse on Social Ecology. New York: Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. xiii, 81.
- HABER, WILLIAM, HARBISON, FREDERICK H., KLEIN, LAWRENCE R., AND PALMER, GLADYS L. (EDS.). Manpower in the United States: Problems and Policies. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. xi, 225. $3.00.
- HALES, E. E. Y. Pio Nono: A Study in European Politics and Religion in the Nineteenth Century. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. 1954. Pp. xiii, 352. $4.00.
- HARNO, ALBERT J. Legal Education in the United States. San Francisco: Bancroft-Whitney Co. 1953. Pp. v, 211.
- HARRISON, BRIAN. South-East Asia: A Short History. New York: St. Martins Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 268. $3.50.
- HEALD, MARK M. An Evaluation of Contemporary Democracy. New York: Philosophical Library. 1953. Pp. xii, 546. $4.75.
- HOYT, ELIZABETH E., REID, MARGARET G., MCCONNELL, JOSEPH L., AND HOOKS, JANET M. WITH A COMMENTARY BY WALTER G. MUELDER. American Income and Its Use. New York: Harper and Bros. 1954. Pp. xxi, 362. $4.00.
- INFIESTA, RAMON. El Pensamiento Político de Martí. Havana: University of Havana. 1953. Pp. 141.
- JAMES, PRESTON E., AND JONES, CLARENCE F. (EDS.). American Geography: Inventory & Prospect. Syracuse, N. Y.: Syracuse University Press for Association of American Geographers. 1954. Pp. xii, 590. $6.00.
- KAMIAT, ARNOLD H. The Ethics of Civilization. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1954. Pp. vi, 80. $2.00.
- KIGER, JOSEPH C. Operating Principles of the Larger Foundations. New York: Russell Sage Foundation. 1954. Pp. 151. $2.50.
- KNIGHT, SIR HENRY. Food Administration in India: 1939-47. Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Pp. xii, 323. $7.50.
- KNOEDLER, CHRISTIANA F. The Harmony Society: A 19th-Century American Utopia. New York: Vantage Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 160. $3.00.
- L'Année Politique 1953*. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1954. Pp. xvi, 707. 1.900 fr.
- LANGE, M. G. Totalitäre Erziehung: Das Erziehungssystem der Sowjetzone Deutschlands. Frankfurt: Verlag der Frankfurter Hefte. 1954. Pp. xlviii, 432.
- LA PIERRE, RICHARD T. A Theory of Social Control. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. xi, 568. $7.50.
- LENSEN, GEORGE ALEXANDER. Report from Hokkaido: The Remains of Russian Culture in Northern Japan. Hakodate, Japan: The Municipal Library of Hakodate. 1954. Pp. xv, 216.
- LOOMIS, CHARLES P. (CH.), BEEGLE, J. ALLEN (ED.). A Committee Report. Rural Social Systems and Adult Education. East Lansing: Michigan State College Press. 1954. Pp. 393. $5.00.
- MACIVER, R. M. (ED.). The Hour of Insight: A Sequel to Moments of Personal Discovery. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. ix, 145. $2.00.
- MCLEAN, JOHN G. AND HAIGH, ROBERT WM. The Growth of Integrated Oil Companies. Boston: Harvard Business School. 1954. Pp. xxiv, 728. $12.00.
- MALLORY, WALTER H. (ED.). Political Handbook of the World: Parliaments, Parties and Press as of January 1, 1954. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. vii, 231. $3.75.
- MUNDY, JOHN HINE. Liberty and Political Power in Toulouse, 1050-1230. New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Pp. xiii, 402. $6.50.
- NEISSER, HANS, AND MODIGLIANI, FRANCO. National Incomes and International Trade: A Quantitative Analysis. Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1953. Pp. xviii, 396. $7.50.
- NORDSKOG, JOHN ERIC (ED.). Contemporary Social Reform Movements: Principles and

- Readings*. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1954. Pp. x, 550. $6.00.
- OLIVER, HENRY M., JR. A Critique of Socio-economic Goals. Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 1954. Pp. 191. $3.00.
- PADOVER, SAUL K. The Living U.S. Constitution: Story, Text, Fully Indexed Guide, Portraits of the Signers. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. 176. $2.50.
- PATTERSON, ROBERT T. Federal Debt-Management Policies, 1865-1879. Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press. 1954. Pp. xi, 244. $4.50.
- PROCHNOW, HERBERT V. (ED.). Determining the Business Outlook. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. xi, 445. $6.50.
- ROCHE, ALPHONSE V. Provençal Regionalism: A Study of the Movement in the REVUE FÉLIBRÉENNE, LE FEU and Other Reviews of Southern France. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press. 1954. Pp. xix, 271.
- ROEDER, WILLIAM S. (COMPILED BY). Dictionary of European History. New York: New York Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. viii, 316. $6.00.
- ROOSEVELT, ELEANOR, AND HICKOK, LORENA A. Ladies of Courage. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1954. Pp. 312. $3.75.
- SAUER, ERNST. Souveranität und Solidarität: Ein Beitrag zur volkerrechtlichen Wertlehre. "Gottingern: Musterschmidt" Wissenschaftlicher Verlag. 1954. Pp. 174.
- SCHANCK, RICHARD L. The Permanent Revolution in Science. New York: Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. xvi, 112. $3.00.
- SCHICKELE, RAINER. Agricultural Policy: Farm Programs and National Welfare. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1954. Pp. x, 453. $6.50.
- SCHMID, CALVIN F. Handbook of Graphic Presentation. New York: The Ronald Press Co. 1954. Pp. vii, 316. $6.00.
- SCHREURS, ANDRE. La Route de Wallonie. Liege: Faculte de Droit de Liege. 1953. Pp. 261.
- SETON, KENNETH M., AND WINKLER, HENRY R. (EDS.). Great Problems in European Civilization. New York: Prentice-Hall. 1954. Pp. xx, 649. $7.65.
- SHEEHAN, DONALD. The Making of American History. Book 1: The Emergence of a Nation. Book 2: Democracy in an Industrial World. New York: The Dryden Press. 1954. 2nd ed. Pp. xi, 462; xi, 450. $2.90 ea.
- SHELDON, BUTLER, JR. The Fifth Freedom: Freedom from Taxation. New York: Library Publishers. 1954. Pp. xiii, 111. $2.75.
- SMITH, D. MACK. Cavour and Garibaldi, 1860: A Study in Political Conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1954. Pp. xii, 458. $8.50.
- SPENCER, PHILIP. Politics of Belief in Nineteenth-Century France: Lacordaire, Michon, Veuillot. New York: Grove Press. 1954. Pp. 284. $6.00.
- TAYLOR, ELEANOR K. Public Accountability of Foundations and Charitable Trusts. New York: Russell Sage Foundation. 1953. Pp. 231. $3.00.
- THOMAS, BRINLEY. Migration and Economic Growth: A Study of Great Britain and the Atlantic Economy. New York: Cambridge University Press. 1954. Pp. xxv, 362. $8.00.
- WHITE, DONALD J. The New England Fishing Industry: A Study in Price and Wage Setting. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1954. Pp. xvii, 205. $4.00.
- WYNEN, ANN VAN. Communism versus International Law: Today's Clash of Ideals. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 145. $3.75.
- YEN, MARIA. The Umbrella Garden: A Picture of Student Life in Red China. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1954. Pp. vi, 268. $4.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

1955 ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

The 1955 Annual Meeting of The American Political Science Association will be held September 7-9, 1955, at the University of Colorado, Boulder, Colorado. The Chairman of the Program Committee is Professor Weldon Cooper of the University of Virginia; the Chairman of the Committee on Local Arrangements is Professor Dayton D. McKean of the University of Colorado.

Fiftieth Annual Meeting of The American Political Science Association

Minutes of the Council Meeting

The Council of The American Political Science Association met at 9:30 A.M., September 8, 1954 in Parlor O of the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, Illinois. President Ralph J. Bunche called the meeting to order. The following officers and members of the Council were present: Walter H. Bennett, Hugh A. Bone, Taylor Cole, Robert A. Dahl, Manning J. Dauer, Hugh L. Elsbree, David Fellman, John Gange, J. A. C. Grant, Claudius O. Johnson, Victor Jones, Earl Latham, Arnaud Leavelle, Harvey C. Mansfield, Dayton D. McKean, Charles McKinley, Jack Peltason, C. Herman Pritchett, Emmette S. Redford, C. B. Robson, Clinton Rossiter, Wallace S. Sayre. Also present were Past Presidents Pendleton Herring, Peter H. Odegard, and James K. Pollock; Evron M. Kirkpatrick, the incoming Executive Director; and Kenneth W. Hechler, Associate Director.

President Bunche asked the Executive Director, Mr. Gange, to report on the present membership of the Association. Mr. Gange noted that as a whole the membership had held up well even though during the past year many were dropped from the roster who were not current in their payment of dues. As of September 1, 1954 there were 4,340 individual members and 1,838 institutional members. He recommended to the Council that consideration be given to appointing a Committee on Membership which would conduct a vigorous membership campaign, seeking to hold current members and enlist new members. Mr. Dauer moved that in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive Director a Committee on Membership (with regional or state members) be established. The motion carried.

Mr. Gange then reported on organizational affiliations of The American Political Science Association for which an annual fee is paid, namely, the American Council of Learned Societies, the American Council on Education, the International Political Science Association, and the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He recommended to the Council that continued affiliation with these organizations be given careful consideration and that, if it is decided to continue the Association's participation, a more active part be taken in the activities of the organizations. Mr. Gange moved that the new Executive Committee be asked to review this matter. The motion carried. It was the consensus of the Council that support of the International Political Science Association should be continued.

In connection with the Association's membership in the Social Science Research Council, the Executive Committee, on May 11, 1954, voted to recommend to the Council the election of Mr. Earl Latham as a director of the SSRC for the term 1955-57. A motion to elect Mr. Latham was carried.

Mr. Jones called attention to the new organization proposed for political theorists and inquired whether it would be wise to consider the formation of various specialized groups within the Association. After some discussion Mr. Jones moved that the general subject be referred to the Executive Committee for careful study. The motion carried.

In the absence of Mr. Litchfield, Mr. Gange presented the Treasurer's report to the Council. He noted that the budget, as adopted by the Council for 1953-54, had been set at $122,125.97. The actual income in 1953-54 was $124,405.13, and the actual expenses were $127,004.04. The deficit was met by using unexpended reserves from grants made in fiscal year 1953. On June 18, 1954 the estate of Frederic A. Ogg paid the Association $10,830.56, representing the bequest of $10,000 by Mr. Ogg plus interest earned while the estate was being settled. The Association's endowment fund now totals $33,580. Mr. Gange noted that while the Association is in good financial health, he would recommend to the Council that a Committee on Finance be created to work closely with the Treasurer, Executive Director, and next year's Executive Committee on the problem of increasing the Association's endowment funds and strengthening the resources for current operating and research project expenses. Mr. Gange pointed out that the present type of accounting system did not give an accurate picture of the Association's financial position on the basis of an artificial fiscal year and recommended that the new Executive Director give consideration to changing it from the cash to the accrual system. Mr. Redford moved that the Executive Committee, the Treasurer, and the Executive Director make a study of the present accounting system within the next year. The motion carried.

President Bunche asked Mr. Gange to report on the proposed budget for 1954-55, which was adopted by the Council with the understanding that adjustments might be made during the course of the year with the approval of the Executive Committee.

There was some discussion of the advantages of having the national Association send a representative to the regional associations' annual meetings. Mr. Gange moved that there be a meeting of the Executive Director of the national Association with the president or a representative of each regional society during this annual meeting, and annually hereafter, to explore possibilities of support and mutual cooperation in arranging for speakers at the regional meetings. The motion carried. Mr. Redford also moved that the government section of the Southwestern Social Science Association be considered one of the regional societies for this purpose. The motion passed unanimously.

President Bunche asked Mr. Elsbree, Managing Editor of THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, to make his report for 1953-54.

The Managing Editor of the REVIEW reported that 240 manuscripts were received during the past year, approximately the same number as in the preceding year. Just under fifty articles were published. Because of the number and quality of manuscripts voluntarily submitted, only a small number of the articles published were solicited.

The editor expressed his gratitude to the members of the Editorial Board and to numerous other political scientists for the valuable service they have rendered in reading and commenting on manuscripts. He also called attention to the increasingly difficult task of selection confronting the Book Review Editor, the section bibliographers, and the News and Notes Editor.

Mr. Elsbree submitted to the Council the names of the present members of the editorial board and recommended that they be re-elected: V. O. Key, Jr., James L. McCamy (Associate Editors); Taylor Cole, Henry W. Ehrmann, Harvey C. Mansfield, C. Herman Pritchett, and Francis O. Wilcox. A motion to this effect was made and carried.

President Bunche reported on the two book publications of the Association this year—American State Legislatures, published by the Association's Committee on American Legislatures with Belle Zeller as editor, and Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952, which was published in five volumes by the Johns Hopkins Press with Paul T. David, Ralph M. Goldman, and Malcolm Moos as editors. He stated that through an additional grant from the Edgar Stern Family Fund of $2,000, excellent publicity was given to these latter volumes, and presentations were made to the President of the United States, ex-Presidents Hoover and Truman, and the governors of twenty-nine states, two territories, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia. President Bunche also reported that certain state chapter reprints of Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952 have been received in the Washington office and are available. The Association will arrange financial support for the publication of these reprints and encouragement for their use in colleges, adult discussion groups, and possible serialization by newspapers.

Mr. Jones moved that the study of the national nominating conventions be repeated in 1956 if possible and that the Executive Director be instructed to see that planning and other necessary action to that end is undertaken. The motion carried.

President Bunche reported that a project design for a comparative public administration project had been completed during the year by a committee drawn largely from the old Committee on Public Administration and chaired by Wallace S. Sayre. After discussions in two Executive Committee meetings it was agreed that the project be approved in principle as deserving support and encouragement but that the Association ought not to undertake the project. It was therefore agreed to refer the project to the Governmental Affairs Institute with the hope that it could obtain foundation support for it.

The President reported that preparation of an Election Statistics Yearbook would not be undertaken by the Association. The project has been referred to the Governmental Affairs Institute. The Institute reports that funds may be forthcoming to carry out the project.

President Bunche reported that this year the Woodrow Wilson Foundation had agreed to offer $1,000 as a cash prize for the best book published in 1953 on government and democracy. Also, the Franklin D. Roosevelt Foundation offered $1,000 for the best book published in 1953 in the field of government and human welfare. There was considerable discussion as to methods of improving and handling the Award Program. Mr. Grant suggested that final arrangements should be completed with the panel members and foundations no later than the end of February for making awards to be presented at the subsequent annual meeting. This suggestion was put in the form of a motion and was carried.

President Bunche reviewed past efforts, beginning in 1950, to obtain foundation funds for a political science "inventory" and indicated that another presentation will be prepared and submitted with some hope for favorable action.

The President asked Mr. Hechler to report on the Congressional Intern Program during 1953-54 and the coming program for 1954-55. Mr. Hechler expressed his appreciation to the Advisory Committee for the Intern Program: Ernest S. Griffith, chairman; Stephen K. Bailey, Senator Irving M. Ives, Representative Richard Bolling, and Merlo J. Pusey. It was noted that the program had received enthusiastic support on Capitol Hill. There were many more congressional requests for assignment of the internes than the Association could possibly fill.

A grant from the Edgar Stern Family Fund enabled the number of internships to be expanded to ten for 1954-55. Five of the new group of internes are journalists and five political scientists. They commence their work on November 1, 1954. Those selected are: Clifford D. Coover, John T. Dempsey, Louis B. Fleming, William C. Gibbons, Marvin A. Harder, Daniel B. Jacobs, W. Astor Kirk, Richard T. Mittauer, Eli Rapaich, and William L. Rivers.

President Bunche asked the Executive Director to report on the Association's Personnel Service. Mr. Gange indicated that over 400 applicants have filed vitae with the Service and the number will probably increase to 600 before the end of the year. About 80 positions have been listed with the Service in the past year. Two trends were noted: (1) an increased number of one-year positions; and (2), despite some increase in enrollments, there is no noticeable increase in the number of positions.

At 12:45 P.M. the Council adjourned for lunch; it reconvened at 2:30 P.M.

In the absence of Mr. Bailey, Mr. Gange read the report of the Chairman of the Program Committee.

President Bunche asked Mr. Gange to report on arrangements for the 1955 Annual Meeting which will be held in Boulder, Colorado. Mr. Gange reported that arrangements had been made in the spring of 1954 with Dean Dayton McKean of the University of Colorado to use university facilities. Rooms and meals at the Student Union Building will be very reasonable and meeting rooms are also adequate. Mr. Odegard inquired about transportation from Denver to Boulder and Dean McKean stated that the University plans to have special buses meet the trains and planes. From the station in Denver to Boulder is approximately a 25-minute trip and from the airport to Boulder is about one hour. President Bunche recommended to the Council that for the 1955 meeting only, the schedule be moved ahead one day, leaving a longer weekend for travel back home after the meeting. Mr. Johnson moved the adoption of the following dates for 1955: Tuesday, September 6, meeting of the Council; Wednesday through Friday, September 7 through 9, the general sessions. The motion carried.

President Bunche asked the Council to set the dates for the 1956 meeting to be held in Washington, D. C. Mr. Fellman moved that the following dates be adopted for 1956: Wednesday, September 5, meeting of the Council; Thursday, September 6 through Saturday, September 8, the general sessions. The motion carried.

The President urged the Council to make a decision as to the place and dates for the 1957 meeting. After much discussion it was decided to wait until after the experiment with the university facilities at Boulder before deciding on a specific site. Mr. Peltason moved that the following dates for the 1957 meeting be adopted: Wednesday, September 4, the meeting of the Council; Thursday through Saturday, September 5 through 7, the general sessions. The motion carried and the Executive Director was instructed to explore hotel and university facilities for this meeting in Cleveland, New York, and Philadelphia.

President Bunche asked Mr. Robson to present the report of the Committee on Nominations. Mr. Robson presented the following recommendations of the Committee on Nominations to the Council for their acceptance and presentation to the Annual Business Meeting: President-Elect, Harold D. Lasswell, Yale University; Vice Presidents: Hubert H. Humphrey, U. S. Senator from Minnesota; Charles S. Hyneman, Northwestern University; Lindsay Rogers, Columbia University; Secretary, Harvey C. Mansfield, The Ohio State University; Treasurer, Edward H. Litchfield, Cornell University; Members of the Council, 1954-56: Gabriel A. Almond, Princeton University; Stephen K. Bailey, Princeton University; James M. Burns, Williams College; Gwendolen M. Carter, Smith College; Samuel J. Eldersveld, University of Michigan; Avery Leiserson, Vanderbilt University; Leslie M. Lipson, University of California (Berkeley); Norman D. Palmer, University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Robson recommended that from time to time the Council reexamine the present nominating procedure and that before publication of the list of nominees in the June issue of the REVIEW, all nominees be consulted. Heretofore, only the President-Elect has been consulted as to his willingness to accept the office. He also recommended that some financial provision be made for the Committee on Nominations to meet before the final list of nominees is prepared. President Bunche asked that a motion be made to this effect. Mr. Rossiter moved that members of the Committee on Nominations meet each year in early spring, after the canvass for suggestions has been completed, when and if money is available. The motion carried.

Mr. Pritchett presented the report of the Local Arrangements Committee. President Bunche expressed appreciation to Mr. Pritchett, on behalf of the Council and the members of the Association, for the excellent work he and his committee had done in arranging for the meeting in Chicago.

President Bunche requested that Mr. Gange report on the 1953 edition of the APSA Directory. Mr. Gange indicated that 1243 copies have so far been sold, about half of which have been paperbound and half clothbound. After some discussion as to whether to consider a 1955 edition of the Directory, Mr. Gange moved that action be deferred for a year and that at next year's Council meeting consideration be given to a 1958 edition of the APSA Directory. The motion carried.

Mr. Cole, a member of the Board of Directors of the Governmental Affairs Institute, was invited by President Bunche to report on the Institute's activities. Mr. Cole mentioned the organizational relationship between the Association and the Institute which was strengthened during the past year when the Governmental Affairs Institute amended its by-laws to include as ex officio members of its Board of Directors the President-Elect and Executive Director of The American Political Science Association. He indicated that other members of the Institute Board include three past presidents and the former executive director of the Association, that any action taken by the Institute Board is taken with the advice of the President of the Association, and that several projects, which the Association as a membership organization did not wish to undertake, had been passed on to the Institute. President Bunche asked that Mr. McKinley and Mr. Gange, who had attended the Institute Board meeting on September 6 and 7 as ex officio members, report as to the efficacy of the present arrangement. Both agreed that it was a very satisfactory arrangement. The question was brought up as to whether the Council of the Association should review the financial report of the Institute, but it was decided that there was no necessity for reviewing internal management problems. Members of the Council felt that more regular reports should be made on Institute activities to the Executive Committee and the Council. Mr. Cole made a motion to approve the Association's ex officio representation on the Institute Board; it was carried.

President Bunche invited Mr. Pollock, senior vice-president of the International Political Science Association, to report on the activities of IPSA. Mr. Pollock read a letter he had just received from Professor William A. Robson of London, president of the international organization, expressing appreciation for the cooperation of American political scientists and inviting them to attend the 1955 Congress to be held in Stockholm in August. Mr. Pollock urged all American political scientists to support IPSA by subscribing to an annual membership, which costs $5.00 and entitles the individual to a year's subscription to International Political Science Abstracts or the Social Science Bulletin. Mr. Gange stated that the new APSA membership forms will have a box for enclosing membership dues in IPSA along with dues in APSA.

President Bunche reported that a survey of the cost of printing a monthly newsletter to be sent to all members of the Association had shown it to be too costly to undertake at this time.

The President asked that Mr. Gange report on the proposed Social Sciences Library Service (a book rental service) which Robert Oshins had been interested in making available to members of the Association. Replies to the questionnaire which Mr. Oshins sent out have been quite favorable.

President Bunche stated that during the past year the Association has had very few requests to assist government agencies. Some suggestions of personnel for government commissions and other positions were made in response to requests from government agencies.

The Council considered requests from the New England Political Science Association, from individual members of the Midwest Conference, and from Professors Manning J. Dauer of the University of Florida and Dale Pontius of Roosevelt University for resolutions to be presented to the Annual Business Meeting on the subject of recent threats to academic freedom and individual liberties. After extended discussion, a committee was appointed to formulate a resolution to be presented to the Annual Business Meeting. Members of the committee were Charles McKinley chairman, Taylor Cole, Manning J. Dauer, and Pendleton Herring.

Mr. Gange stated that the Association had committed itself to the purchase of sufficient copies of a forthcoming publication of the Graduate Education Division of the Southern Regional Education Board on research and teaching in government in the South, for distribution to chairmen of all departments of political science.

President Bunche expressed his appreciation to Mr. Gange for his excellent service to the Association during the past year as Executive Director. He introduced the new Executive Director, Mr. Evron M. Kirkpatrick, who will take over his new duties on October 1, 1954.

The Council meeting was adjourned at 6:15 P.M.—HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Secretary.

Minutes of the Annual Business Meeting

The Annual Business Meeting of The American Political Science Association was held at 4:45 P.M., Friday, September 10, 1954, in the Louis XVI Room of the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, Illinois. The meeting was called to order by President Ralph J. Bunche, who asked Mr. Harvey C. Mansfield, Secretary of the Association, to report to the members present on the action taken by the Council at its meeting on September 8.

Mr. Mansfield summarized briefly the Council's decisions and indicated that two resolutions would be presented by the Council to the Annual Business Meeting.

In the absence of the Treasurer, Mr. Litchfield, Mr. Gange made the financial report. He noted that, in the Frederic A. Ogg bequest to the Association, Mr. Ogg had specified very clearly how the funds were to be used but that no complete record appeared to exist as to the specific purpose for which earlier contributions to the endowment fund might be used. He asked that any members who had information on these funds give it to the Washington office.

President Bunche expressed his deep appreciation to Mr. Gange for the assistance he had given him during his term of office.

Mr. McKinley, chairman of the committee appointed by the Council to draft a resolution on behalf of the Association on academic and civic freedom, was asked to read the draft prepared by the committee.

Mr. McKinley did so and indicated that his committee wanted a separate vote on points 1 and 2 of the resolution. After extended discussion and several proposed amendments and amendments to amendments, point 1 was passed by a majority vote. Point 2 was passed with a unanimous vote. The resolution, as adopted, reads as follows:

"The officers of this Association have received from its members and their local associations during this past year many expressions of grave concern over the growing encroachment upon academic and civic freedom in the United States.

"Your Council believes that this Association should throw its full weight against the forces that seem bent on slamming shut the doors to freedom of inquiry, discussion, and association. Scholars cannot hope to pursue their callings with professional integrity or play their rightful part in civic life in an atmosphere of censorship and coercion of opinion. Your Council therefore recommends that The American Political Science Association at this time take these actions.

"Be it resolved that:

"1. The American Political Science Association advise all members of the Special Committee of the House of Representatives to Investigate Tax-Exempt Foundations, Reece Committee, that it objects to the false statements of fact and conclusion contained in the staff reports of that Committee and to the haste with which its public hearings were closed and rebuttal testimony cut off.

"The statements by the staff show a lack of understanding of how research is carried on and of how learned societies function.

"The American Political Science Association is a voluntary, non-partisan, scholarly society. It is an independent body and composed of over 6,000 political scientists devoted to free inquiry into government in all its aspects.

"The Association is concerned with the advancement of political science as a discipline and as a profession and with the basic understanding of our political institutions and their effective operation. During its fifty years of existence, it has fostered scholarly interchange of thought and freedom of teaching and research. It stands dedicated to high standards of professional integrity.

"We express the hope that despite the misleading statements prepared by the staff, the Committee members will reflect in their own reports an accurate view of this Association and of the other scholarly agencies and foundations concerned with the advancement of knowledge and the strengthening of our democratic institutions.

"2. The Executive Committee of the Association with the aid of the staff initiate as soon as possible exploratory discussions with the American Association of University Professors, the American Civil Liberties Union, and other appropriate organizations to discover ways and means by which members of the Association through informed joint efforts with them may most effectively promote the objectives of academic and civic freedom. The Executive Committee is hereby authorized to put such plans, developed from these discussions, as it deems feasible into effect and report to the Council."

Secretary Mansfield read the following resolution expressing appreciation to the Edgar Stern Family Fund and Dr. Will Alexander:

"Recognizing the importance of first-hand training and observation in the organization and operation of the Congress of the United States for young teachers of political science and journalists concerned with public and governmental affairs, The American Political Science Association wishes to express its deep gratitude to the Edgar Stern Family Fund for the very generous financial support which its trustees have given to the Congressional Intern Training Program of the APSA since the Spring of 1953; the Association also wishes to express its gratitude to Dr. Will W. Alexander for his continuing interest, enthusiasm, and support of this program in collaboration with the officers of the Association and the trustees of the Stern Family Fund."

Mr. Mansfield moved that this resolution be adopted. The motion was seconded and carried unanimously.

President Bunche asked Mr. C. B. Robson, Chairman of the Committee on Nominations, to make the committee's report. Mr. Robson encouraged all members to take an interest in the nominating process and send suggestions of nominees for the Association's officers to the new Chairman of the Nominating Committee. He presented the following recommendations of the Committee on Nominations: President-Elect: Harold D. Lasswell, Yale University; Vice Presidents: Hubert H. Humphrey, U. S.

Senator from Minnesota; Charles S. Hyneman, Northwestern University; Lindsay Rogers, Columbia University; Secretary: Harvey C. Mansfield, The Ohio State University; Treasurer: Edward H. Litchfield, Cornell University; Members of the Council (1954-56); Gabriel A. Almond, Princeton University; Stephen K. Bailey, Princeton University; James M. Burns, Williams College; Gwendolen M. Carter, Smith College; Samuel J. Eldersveld, University of Michigan; Avery Leiserson, Vanderbilt University; Leslie M. Lipson, University of California (Berkeley); Norman D. Palmer, University of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Pollock moved that the Secretary be authorized to cast a unanimous vote for all of the nominees. The motion was seconded and carried unanimously.

Mr. Cole moved that the appreciation of the members of the Association to Mr. Gange for a job well done be made a part of the Association's formal record. The motion was seconded and carried unanimously.

President Bunche introduced Mr. Evron M. Kirkpatrick, who will assume the duties of Executive Director on October 1, 1954.

President Bunche expressed his pleasure in knowing Mr. McKinley and his deep respect for him. The gavel was then turned over to the incoming President.

There was no further business and the Annual Business Meeting was adjourned at 6:45 P.M.—HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Secretary

The International Political Science Association held a Round-Table Conference on Teaching and Research in the Field of Comparative Government at Florence, April 5-10, 1954. Representatives from fourteen countries attended. The United States delegation consisted of James K. Pollock, senior vice-president of IPSA, and Professors Charles Aikin, Samuel H. Beer, Eugene Chase, Carl J. Friedrich, Karl Loewenstein, Roy C. Macridis, Robert E. Ward, and Harold Zink. Numerous papers of high quality were presented and a most fruitful discussion was held. An extensive report of the conference proceedings will shortly be published by Professor Gunnar Heckscher of Sweden, the rapporteur-general. A representative selection of papers submitted has already appeared in the Spring number of the Italian political science journal, Studi Politici. The Executive Committee considered arrangements for the next Congress of IPSA which will be held at Stockholm, August 22-27, 1955. Professor Heckscher will be in general charge of the meeting. The program will include sessions on: (1) the government of great cities; (2) political parties, emphasizing (a) their role in democracy, (b) the place of polls in a study of political parties, and (c) the relation between social classes and political parties; (3) the political implications of development programs; (4) presentation seminars dealing both with comparative government and bureaucracy (the two topics which have occupied the attention of the International Association during the past two years); and (5) large and small states in international relations. Members of the American Political Science Association are cordially invited to attend the Stockholm Congress.—ROBERT E. WARD.

The International Institute of Administrative Sciences held a round-table at The Hague, July 23-28, 1954, which brought together over ninety participants from thirty-nine countries and eight international bodies. Unlike the triennial congresses, the annual round-tables are restricted in principle to members of the various organs of the Institute, all of which held useful meetings defining the Institute's program. The Council of Administration, composed of delegates of member-states and national sections, under the chairmanship of M. René Cassin of France, authorized the creation of sections of international civil servants stationed in the same area, and adopted a new schedule of dues based upon the United Nations' scale of contributions which should greatly facilitate the membership of less developed countries of large population. Observers were present from Japan, India, Pakistan, Burma, Thailand, and other countries in which there is active interest in joining the Institute. Program plans were defined in meetings of the Committee on Administrative Practices (Donald C. Stone, U. S. A., chairman) and the Scientific Committee (Henry Puget, France, chairman). The Committee on Contracts (André Molitør, Belgium, chairman) dealt with proposals for cooperation with UN, UNESCO, and the European Productivity Agency of OEEC. M. Henri Matton, president-emeritus of the Cour des Comptes of Belgium, was elected a vice-president in place of Professor Jules Lespes, whose untimely death was deeply regretted.

The business meetings were garnished with two and a half days of scientific discussions of two principal subjects: Public Economic Enterprise and In-Service Training, carried on in small groups permitting wide-spread participation. Participants from the United States included Charles Aikin, University of California; Charles S. Ascher, Public Administration Clearing House; Lynton K. Caldwell, UN Institute of Public Administration, Ankara; Albert Gorvine, Brooklyn College; William Ronan, New York University; MacDonald Salter, Foreign Operations Administration; and Donald C. Stone, Springfield College. The round-table for 1955 will be a residential week at one of the Oxford colleges during the first half of July, for which the Royal Institute of Public Administration will be host.

The Fourth International Congress of Comparative Law, held at the Law Faculty of the University of Paris, August 1-7, 1954, attracted some 250 political scientists and law professors, of whom some thirty were Americans, including the political scientists Charles Aikin (California), Charles S. Ascher (Brooklyn), Reginald D. Lang (Carlton), Karl Loewenstein (Amherst), Robert R. Wilson (Duke), and J. N. Hazard (Columbia). Roscoe Pound as president of the sponsoring Academy of Comparative Law presided. Subjects discussed ran the gamut of the law, from history and legal philosophy to political parties and commercial treaties. Specialists in each field met in panels with general reporters who had digested reports prepared well in advance to present conclusions for debate. State interference in the internal structure of parties to preserve democratic principles when voters have no real alternative to a single party evoked sharp debate under the guidance of Karl Loewenstein. Control over public corporations as presented by Henry Puget of France drew forth comparisons from Frank Scott of McGill and Charles S. Ascher of Brooklyn College. Robert Wilson of Duke reported to the international lawyers on his experience with commercial treaties, while Reginald D. Lang reported on political regimes and the international community. Papers prepared by American political scientists unable to attend included those by Robert K. Carr (Dartmouth) and Joseph R. Starr (Maryland). The Fifth Congress will be held during the summer of 1959 at The Hague.—JOHN N. HAZARD.

A new International Association for Juridical Sciences will be created soon out of the International Committee of Comparative Law. This was the principal decision of the latter's Executive Bureau at its meeting of July 28-29, 1954, at Munich. In its new form it will parallel more closely the structure of the International Political Science Association and reach out to attract lawyers and political scientists interested in law, regardless of their prior concern with the comparative method. No individual memberships are planned as yet, however, for the American Foreign Law Association will remain the national representative for the comparatists in the United States, and individual Americans will participate in the work of the International Association through their national body.

To relate its work closely to the principal concern of UNESCO, namely underdeveloped areas, the new association will establish a two-year program of study of the impact upon an underdeveloped area of a Western legal system. The country chosen for study will be Turkey, and a preliminary meeting is planned for Istanbul in September, 1955, to prepare for a larger colloquium scheduled for Barcelona in September, 1956. The Barcelona meeting will also include panel discussions of the teaching of law as a social science on the basis of the report by Professor Charles Eisenmann published by UNESCO in July, 1954, and of the maxim, "audi alteram partem."

Barcelona panels will utilize the experience gained at Munich with two colloquiums held concurrently with the Executive Bureau meeting. One concerned the function and structure of comparative law centers. It was presided over by Professor Hessel E. Yntema of the University of Michigan and attracted some fifty representatives from a large part of the world. The other discussed a question posed by UNESCO, namely the method of implementing in domestic legislation obligations assumed in treaties. Professor G. T. Mangone of Swarthmore College presented the procedure in the United States.

A new Secretary General was elected to replace the retiring Professor René David. He is Professor André Bertrand, director of studies of the French National School of Administration. Dr. Kurt Lipstein of Cambridge was named director of research, while Professor Felipe de Sola Cañizares of Barcelona was delegated to prepare for publication a directory of comparative law centers throughout the world so as to facilitate interchange of views and cooperative research.—JOHN N. HAZARD.

The International Union of Local Authorities will hold its Twelfth Congress in Rome, Italy, September 26–October 1, 1955. The two principal subjects for discussion will be "Local Government Finance and Its Importance to Local Autonomy" and "Cultural Activities of Local Authorities." Mayors, city managers, other municipal officials, and students of local government are invited to attend. American municipalities are eligible to join the International Union of Local Authorities through the American Committee for International Municipal Cooperation. This will give their delegations at Rome official recognition and voting rights. Persons desiring to be kept up to date on future developments about the Rome Congress or wishing to join the International Union of Local Authorities are invited to write to the American Committee for International Municipal Cooperation, 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago 37.

The biennial convention of Pi Sigma Alpha was held on September 9, 1954, in conjunction with the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in Chicago. The following officers were elected: president, J. Eugene Harley, University of Southern California; vice-president, Claude E. Hawley, Washington, D. C.; secretary-treasurer, Don L. Bowen, University of Maryland. Newly elected members of the executive committee with terms expiring in 1958 are: A. C. Breckenridge, W. Brooke Graves, and Egbert S. Wengert. Continuing as members of the executive committee with terms expiring in 1956 are: Mona Fletcher, Cullen B. Gosnell, and Charles W. Shull. Winners of Pi Sigma Alpha's first annual essay contest were: William C. Griffith, first prize (Emory University); Stanley Kravit, honorable mention (Rutgers University); and Nancy Whittier, honorable mention (Syracuse University). The first prize winner was awarded $100; honorable mention winners received a choice of any two books cited for award by the American Political Science Association.—DON L. BOWEN.

The University of Minnesota held an Institute on Minnesota Government and Politics during the period July 19–30, 1954. Sessions of the institute were devoted to such issues as constitutional revision, responsible political parties, party designation of legislators, reapportionment, reorganization, financing the government, merit employment, judicial reform, local government problems, and citizen participation. These issues were discussed by panels of public officials, leaders of civic groups, journalists, and educators.

The sixty-two persons who participated in the panels included the governor, the chief justice, the speaker of the House of Representatives, and about an equal number of legislators, state officials, civic leaders, and educators. Political science Professors William Anderson, Asher N. Christensen, Clarence C. Ludwig, Arthur E. Naftalin, and Lloyd M. Short participated in one or more of the panel discussions. George A. Warp, associate professor of political science, served as director of the institute.

Of the 204 persons who enrolled for the sessions of the institute, about one-fourth registered for academic credit. The occupations of those attending the institute included assessor, assistant dean, bacteriologist, budget examiner, businessman, civil service administrator, clerical worker, economist, housewife, journalist, justice of the peace, librarian, lobbyist, medical artist, medical technician, political party official, radio announcer, real estate broker, recreation director, school board member, singer, state legislator, student, teacher, university regent, and welfare worker. Those who attended the institute were enthusiastic in their comments. Most of them (85 per cent) indicated that they were definitely interested in attending another institute.—GEORGE A. WARP.

Supported by a grant from the Ford Foundation to the Social Science Research Council of New York, a Seminar in Political Behavior Research was held on the campus of the University of Michigan, June 21–August 13, 1954, under the joint sponsorship of the department of political science and the Survey Research Center. The purpose of the seminar was to stimulate interest in the quantitative study of political behavior. To this end a group of post-doctoral fellows from the field of political science were brought together in Ann Arbor. As a means of coordinating the activities of the group, a series of meetings was organized in which visiting scholars, political scientists, and other behavioral scientists resident at the University of Michigan participated. Formal presentations of research methodologies were made available through the University's Institute on Survey Research Techniques. Participants in the seminar were: Robert E. Agger, University of North Carolina; Heinz Eulau, Antioch College; William Goodman, University of Tennessee; Robert E. Lane, Yale University; Daniel M. Ogden, Jr., State College of Washington; Stephen B. Sarasohn, Wayne University; Allan P. Sindler, Duke University; and John P. White, University of Michigan. The following served as guest lecturers: Samuel Eldersveld, Ronald Freedman, Gerald Gurin, Morris Janowitz, Dwaine Marvick, Norton Long, Neil Staebler, V. O. Key, Jr., LeRoy Ferguson, Herbert McCloskey, and Paul F. Lazarsfeld.

The thirteenth annual meeting of the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists will be held at Purdue University, May 5-7, 1955. Program suggestions should be sent to James Miller, Michigan State College, chairman of the program committee.

The Emory Institute of Citizenship, a campus activity for fifteen years before the war, was revived this fall with plans for two sessions during the year 1954-55. The subject of the institute will be "Education for World Affairs." Professor Cullen B. Gosnell, of the department of political science, is serving as general director.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The commemorative course in Japanese Civilization sponsored jointly by the Duke University department of political science and the Japan Society was held during the second summer session. Of the ten advanced students who received scholarships, five were political scientists. They were: Yung Ping Chen, a candidate for the doctorate at the University of Maryland; Barbara F. Hampe, of Warren Wilson College, North Carolina; Joel D. Singer, candidate for the doctorate at New York University; Harold W. Sundstrom, graduate assistant in political science at Michigan State College; and Mrs. Edyth F. Winningham, of the faculty of Charlotte College, North Carolina. Two other political scientists attended all sessions of the course as registered auditors: Spencer Gervin, associate professor of political science at Hiwassee College, Tennessee; and Robert T. Hubard, assistant professor of English and government at Hampden-Sidney College. The five other holders of scholarships were: Dr. George Abernathy, professor of philosophy at Davidson College, North Carolina; Dr. Doris E. King, professor of history at Stephen F. Austin State College, Texas; Dr. Janet L. MacDonald, professor of history at Hollins College, Virginia; William H. Baskin, III, candidate for the doctorate in Romance languages, University of North Carolina; and James M. Clifton, graduate student in history at Duke University.

Indiana University has established a special program of public administration training for governmental employees in the Indianapolis area. The initial student group includes representatives of federal, state, and local agencies. The undertaking, developed by the department of government in cooperation with the Division of Adult Education and Public Services, takes the University's facilities to the 20,000 government workers in Indiana's largest city. Current offerings include studies in supervisory training, administrative organization and methods, and public administration, in addition to a wide variety of courses regularly offered to over 2,000 students at the University's Indianapolis extension center.

New York University, the University of Ankara, and the Turkish Ministry of Education have established a three-year cooperative program designed to broaden and strengthen higher education facilities in Turkey. Under the terms of the agreement, the New York University Graduate School of Public Administration and Social Service will play a leading role in planning and developing curricula and research in public administration at the University of Ankara. Arrangements have also been made for research and study programs in the United States for Turkish professors, other faculty members, and their assistants. The program is being financed jointly by the Turkish Government and the Foreign Operations Administration of the United States Government.

Stetson University has announced the inauguration this year of an American Studies Program leading to the bachelor's and master's degrees. Dr. J. Ollie Edmunds, President of the University, stated that the program will aim to expose "the false and stupid hypocrisies of the Communist movement while teaching the development of American ideals and institutions." The Charles E. Merrill Chair of American Studies has been created for this purpose and is named for the investment banker whose gift made the program possible.

Three $4,000 post-doctoral fellowships in statistics are offered for 1955-56 by the University of Chicago. The purpose of these fellowships, which are open to holders of the doctor's degree or its equivalent in research accomplishment, is to acquaint established research workers in the biological, physical, and social sciences with the role of modern statistical analysis in the planning of experiments and other investigative programs, and in the analysis of empirical data. The development of the field of statistics has been so rapid that most current research falls far short of attainable standards, and these fellowships (which represent the fifth year of a five-year program supported by the Rockefeller Foundation) are intended to help reduce this lag by giving statistical training to scientists whose primary interests are in substantive fields rather than in statistics itself. The closing date for applications is February 15, 1955; instructions for applying may be obtained from the Committee on Statistics, University of Chicago, Chicago 37.

The Middle East Institute is preparing for publication an annual Survey of Research in Progress on the Middle East. Countries included in the survey are the Arab nations, Israel, Turkey, Iran, Afghanistan, North Africa, the Sudan, Ethiopia, and Eritrea. Persons engaged in research on the Middle East are urged to submit the following information: name, address, topic of investigation, sponsoring organization (if any), estimated date of completion, and pertinent comment on the nature of the research, sources being used, and method of approach. Correspondence should be addressed to: The Middle East Institute, 1761 N Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

Arthur W. Bromage has been appointed by Governor Williams to Michigan's Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

Maurice G. Burnside, formerly of the Marshall College political science department, has been elected to the U. S. House of Representatives from the Fourth Congressional District in West Virginia. Dr. Burnside represented the Fourth District in the Eighty-First and Eighty-Second Congresses.

Conley H. Dillon, professor and head of the department of political science at Marshall College, delivered a series of lectures on "Minimum Wage Laws and the Fair Labor Standards Act" at the 1954 American Federation of Labor School, held August 30-September 4, at Huntington, West Virginia.

Samuel J. Eldersveld, of the University of Michigan, completed a series of television programs on political parties during 1953-54. Several members of the political science department and other persons of political importance participated in the series with Professor Eldersveld. These programs will be released to educational television centers throughout the country.

Wesley R. Fishel, associate professor of political science at Michigan State College, spent the month of September in Saigon as consultant to the United States Special Technical and Economic Mission to the Governments of Cambodia, Laos, and South Vietnam.

George B. Galloway, senior specialist in American government and public administration, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, has received a grant from the Ford Foundation to make a comparative survey of the legislative procedures of the United States and Great Britain, under the sponsorship of the National Planning Association. Dr. Galloway spent several weeks during the fall in London observing the House of Commons in action and interviewing various members and officials.

John H. Hallowell, of Duke University, gave the principal address at the annual commencement of the General Theological Seminary, New York City, in June.

Earl T. Hanson, of Duke University, again served as director of the International Studies Program for Foreign Students held at Duke for seven weeks during the summer. Forty-eight exchange scholars from twenty-one countries attended the program. Dr. Hugh Hall, also of the Duke political science department, served as one of the staff members of the program.

Richard H. Heindel, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and professor of history and government at the University of Buffalo, has been named to serve on the Committee on International Exchange of Persons as one of the two representatives of the American Council on Education. The committee is responsible for guiding the selection of persons of professional status and advanced workers to receive grants under the Fulbright Act.

Gladys M. Kammerer, associate professor of political science at the University of Kentucky, was named by the Mayor of Lexington as co-chairman of the Greater Lexington Committee, created to study the urban problems of Lexington and Fayette County and to recommend solutions to the city and county governments. Ruth McQuown, research associate of the University of Kentucky Bureau of Government Research, was appointed executive secretary and research director for this committee.

Karl Loewenstein, professor of political science at Amherst College, was a guest professor during the second semester of the academic year 1953-54 in the law school at the University of Marburg, Germany. He also lectured at the Universities of Hamburg, Göttingen and Heidelberg. In August, he attended the Congress of the Academy of Comparative Law where he was general reporter on the subject, "The Legal Status of Political Parties."

Joe W. Neal, special instructor in government and director of the International Advisory Office at the University of Texas, spent eight weeks during the summer of 1954 on a tour of the Middle East under the sponsorship of the Friends of the Middle East.

James E. Pate, of the College of William and Mary, is serving as chairman of the Williamsburg City Planning Commission and as a member of the Colonial Regional Planning Commission recently created to develop a plan and to draft a zoning ordinance for the protection and development of the historic area including Jamestown, Yorktown, and the environs of Williamsburg.

George A. Peek, Jr., assistant professor of political science at the University of Michigan, acted as coordinator and moderator for a series of six television programs on "Tension Areas in the Far East" during the summer of 1954. Mr. Albert Ravenholt of the American University's field staff was the visiting guest for each program. All programs were recorded on kinescope and will be sent to educational television stations throughout the country.

Joseph S. Roucek, professor and chairman of the departments of political science and sociology at the University of Bridgeport, lectured at the Air War College, Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama, in October on "The Commitments of the USSR and Her Satellites."

William H. Simpson, of Duke University, spent the summer in England making a study of installment buying and credit practices of British business.

Dwight Waldo has contracted to write a trend report on American political science for the International Political Science Association. He invites correspondence concerning both intellectual currents of the present and recent past and information concerning research in progress, particularly group research. Correspondence should be addressed to: Department of Political Science, University of California, Berkeley 4.

Harvey Walker, of the department of political science at the Ohio State University, spent the past summer in Europe at the invitation of the Government of Western Germany, studying legislative and administrative institutions in Belgium, Switzerland, and France, as well as in Germany. In August Professor Walker served as a consultant at the National Conference of Professors of Educational Administration held at the University of Denver.

Henry Wells, associate professor of political science at the University of Puerto Rico, presented three papers on recent constitutional and political developments in Puerto Rico at a symposium held at The Hague, September 6-11. The subject of the symposium was "Developments toward Self-Government in the Caribbean Commission Territories." The Netherlands Universities Foundation for International Co-operation sponsored the meetings, which were attended by participants from British, French, and Dutch universities, as well as by Dr. Wells.

Robert R. Wilson, of Duke University, read a paper on "Foreign Economic Interests before National Jurisdictions: The Role of Commercial Treaties" before the panel on public international law at the Fourth International Congress of Comparative Law held in Paris, August 1-7, 1954. Professor Wilson also attended, as a delegate of the American Branch, the forty-sixth annual meeting of the International Law Association held at Edinburgh, August 8-14.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Orville Alexander, chairman of the department of government at Southern Illinois University, has been on leave during 1954 to serve as director of research for the Ohio State School Survey Committee.

Totton J. Anderson, associate professor of political science at the University of Southern California, has been granted a special leave of absence to serve as Associate National Director of the Citizenship Clearing House for 1954-55. The Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation of Pittsburgh sponsors the Citizenship Clearing House, with offices located in the Law Center of New York University.

Morley Ayearst has been appointed acting chairman of the department of government in Washington Square College of Arts and Sciences, New York University. Professor Ayearst spent last year in the British West Indies studying their politics and administration under a Fulbright grant.

James H. Bahti has resumed his duties as assistant professor at the Michigan College of Mining and Technology after spending the past year in graduate work at the University of Michigan.

Chester W. Bain, research assistant in the Bureau of Public Administration of the University of Virginia, has been appointed acting assistant professor of political science for the academic year 1954-55.

Lawrence L. Barber, of Trinity College, recently began a one-year assignment with the United Nations Public Administration Institute in Rio de Janeiro.

Ernest R. Bartley, associate professor of political science at the University of Florida, has received a Ford Foundation grant and is spending the year 1954-55 in Washington observing the operations of federal government agencies.

Paul Beckett has been promoted to a full professorship in public administration at the State College of Washington.

Robert P. Benedict, of Boston University, spent the summer doing research and lecturing in Europe. During the past academic year he was acting chairman of the department of government at Boston University.

A. LeRoy Bennett, recently of Michigan State College, has been appointed professor and acting head of the department of political science at Drake University.

W. E. Benton, formerly assistant professor of government at Southern Methodist University, has joined the staff of the University of Houston as assistant professor in the department of government.

Loren P. Beth is a visiting professor of political science at the University of Florida during 1954-55.

Roy G. Blakey, of the University of Minnesota, has returned from the University of Ankara, Turkey, where he has been visiting professor of public finance during the past three years.

John C. Bollens has been appointed acting director of the Bureau of Governmental Research at the University of California (Los Angeles). He will serve as director during 1954-55 while Winston W. Crouch is on sabbatical leave in India.

John A. Bond has joined the staff of the department of government at Southern Illinois University.

Hugh A. Bone is on sabbatical leave from the University of Washington to study under a Ford Fellowship for the Advancement of Teaching. Major emphasis of Professor Bone's research is upon Congress, and his headquarters in Washington is the office of Senator Henry M. Jackson.

Robert P. Boynton, formerly teaching fellow at the University of Michigan, has been appointed instructor in the department of history and government at Wells College.

Leo Cagan has returned to the political science department at San Francisco State College after a year as public administration specialist with the United Nations Secretariat.

Lynton K. Caldwell, of Syracuse University, succeeded Marshall E. Dimock as co-director of the Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East at Ankara on August 10, 1954. Professor Caldwell's assignment in Turkey is for one year.

Francis Michael Carney has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of California (Riverside).

H. Paul Castleberry has been promoted to an associate professorship at the State College of Washington. He is currently serving for the second year as a Fulbright lecturer at the American University at Cairo, Egypt, and will resume his duties at the State College in the fall of 1955.

David T. Cattell has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Floyd Cave, professor of government at San Francisco State College, is on sabbatical leave during the fall semester of 1954-55, studying political developments in Western Europe and Great Britain.

Warner O. Chapman has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of government at Indiana University.

Harwood L. Childs has resumed his duties at Princeton University after a year's leave of absence in Brazil where he served as lecturer in public relations at the School of Public Administration in Rio de Janeiro sponsored jointly by the Brazilian Government and the United Nations.

Asher N. Christensen, of the University of Minnesota, has been awarded a Fulbright lectureship to the United Kingdom for the 1954-55 academic year. He is teaching at University College, Aberystwyth, Wales. During the months of March and April, 1955, Professor Christensen will teach at the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies.

David Cooperman, of the department of political science at the University of Minnesota, has been granted a Rockefeller Foundation fellowship to study the relationship between legal systems and political ideologies of totalitarian states. His work is being done at Columbia University.

Claude B. Cross has been reappointed for an additional year as acting instructor in the field of international relations at the State College of Washington.

Larry Dennis has been appointed administrative assistant to the President of the Pennsylvania State University.

John C. Donovan has been promoted to an associate professorship in political science at Bates College. During the past summer session, Dr. Donovan was a visiting professor at the University of Maine.

James W. Drury, who has been awarded a Fulbright fellowship in Japan, is on leave from the University of Kansas during the current academic year.

William Ebenstein, of Princeton University, was a visiting professor at the University of Michigan during the past summer session.

David G. Farrelly has been promoted to associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Vernon L. Ferwerda has been appointed assistant professor of government at Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut.

Vincent T. Finneran, formerly financial management assistant in the U. S. Public Health Service, has been appointed research assistant in the Bureau of Public Administration of the University of Virginia.

William S. Flash has been promoted to assistant professor of government at Bowdoin College, effective July 1, 1954.

Ossip K. Flechtheim, who was in Berlin during 1951-1954, has resigned his position at the Hochschule für Politik and has accepted an appointment as visiting professor in the department of history and government at the University of Kansas City.

Julian F. S. Foster, formerly visiting lecturer in political science at the University of Michigan, has received a teaching fellowship in the department of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Guy Fox is on leave from Michigan State College during the academic year 1954-55 as a Fulbright professor of political science in Japan.

Henry C. Galant, who taught at Connecticut College last year, has accepted a position as associate professor and chairman of the department of political science at Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York.

Wallace B. Graves, of DePauw University, was promoted to associate professor of political science, effective July 1, 1954.

Priscilla M. Greeley, recently of Wilson College, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York.

Jay V. Groves has recently been appointed professor of political science and sociology at Potomac State College, Keyser, West Virginia.

Nathan Hakman, who recently received the doctorate at the University of Illinois, has been appointed instructor in political science at Michigan State College.

Owen A. Haley has retired after more than a quarter-century of service in the department of government at the City College of New York.

Earl T. Hanson has been appointed Director of Admissions of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at Duke University. He will continue his teaching in the department of political science on a part-time basis.

Philip Haring, who served as lecturer in political science at Northwestern University during the past year, has accepted a position as assistant professor of political science at Knox College.

Heber R. Harper, formerly instructor of history and government at Wells College, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Dickinson College.

Frederick H. Hartmann resumed his duties as associate professor of political science at the University of Florida in September following one year's leave of absence spent in Germany under a Fulbright research award.

Lashley G. Harvey has resumed his duties as chairman of the department of government and director of the Bureau of Public Administration at Boston University after a year's assignment with the United Nations Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East at Ankara.

William C. Havard, Jr. is serving as acting director of the Public Administration Clearing Service at the University of Florida during the current academic year.

Carroll Hawkins, on sabbatical leave from Michigan State College, is spending this year in Western Europe and in Mexico studying the ideological forces affecting the labor movement.

Ferrel Heady has returned to his duties at the University of Michigan after spending fourteen months as Director and Chief Adviser, Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines.

Samuel Hendel has resumed his regular duties in the department of government at the City College of New York after a year's study in Europe on a Ford Foundation fellowship.

Norman Hill, of the University of Nebraska, will be visiting professor of political science at the University of Washington from January 1 to June 15, 1955.

Ivan H. Hinderaker has been promoted to associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Willard N. Hogan is serving this year as acting chairman of the social science division, State University Teachers College, New Paltz, New York, while Eugene P. Link is lecturing at the University of Annamalai, India, under a Fulbright grant.

John A. Houston, formerly associate professor of political science at the University of Mississippi, has accepted the chairmanship of the department of political science at Knox College, Galesburg, Illinois.

Ronald F. Howell has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at Emory University.

Clyde E. Jacobs has been promoted to assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Davis).

James Jarvis, formerly of the University of Illinois, is a visiting instructor in public administration and local government at the University of Kansas.

Morton A. Kaplan, formerly visiting professor of political science at Haverford College, has accepted a position with the Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C.

Clifford Ketzels has joined the staff of the department of political science, University of Kansas, as an assistant professor. Dr. Ketzels spent two years with the State Department and two years with the Institute of Public Affairs prior to completing his graduate work at the University of California.

Joseph B. Kingsbury returned to Indiana University in August after a year in Turkey, where he served as lecturer in personnel administration in the United Nations Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East. On his way home he attended the conference of Arab states on public administration at the American University at Beirut, July 28-30.

William F. Larsen, assistant professor of political science, University of Florida, has been awarded a research fellowship with the National Municipal League, beginning July 15. Prior to assuming his duties under this appointment, Professor Larsen was in New York City as a research fellow with Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner and Beane to study bond financing.

Luke T. Lee, assistant professor of history and government at the St. Lawrence University, has been appointed as special consultant for the Harvard Law School-Israel Cooperative Research for Israel's Legal Development.

Avery Leiserson, professor of political science at Vanderbilt University, was a visiting professor at the University of Washington during the autumn quarter.

Benjamin E. Lippincott, of the University of Minnesota, has been granted a sabbatical furlough for the current academic year, for the purpose of completing a volume on The State in the Modern World.

William S. Livingston has been advanced to associate professor of government at the University of Texas.

John Logue, who taught at Notre Dame last year, has been appointed instructor in the department of political philosophy at Fordham University.

Richard P. Longaker, who recently received the Ph.D. degree from Cornell and served as an instructor at Kenyon College, has joined the faculty of the University of California (Riverside) as assistant professor of political science.

Arthur W. Macmahon returned in September to his position on the graduate faculty of political science at Columbia University after a half-year's leave of absence spent largely as visiting professor at the College of Europe, Bruges, Belgium, broken in the spring by a month's lecturing at the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies.

Mavis A. Mann is on leave from West Virginia University during 1954-55 to lecture at Keio University, Tokyo, under a Fulbright award.

George Manner resumed his duties in the department of political science at the University of Illinois in September after a year's sabbatical leave spent in the study of international law at The Hague.

Lucian Marquis has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Oregon.

Charles E. Martin, of the University of Washington, has been awarded a Rockefeller grant and is on sabbatical leave this year. He will spend five months in Japan and Southeast Asia followed by study in India and the Middle East.

Curtis Martin is the newly designated chairman of the department of social sciences, University of Colorado.

Dwaine Marvick, of the University of Michigan, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Bruce B. Mason is visiting assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida during 1954-55.

Charles A. McCoy, formerly assistant professor of government at Worcester Polytechnic Institute, has been appointed research assistant in the Bureau of Public Administration of the University of Virginia.

David S. McLellan has been appointed assistant to the dean of freshmen and instructor in political science at Yale University.

George McTurnan Kahin has been promoted to associate professor of government at Cornell University.

Robert O. McWilliams, formerly of Yale University, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

James H. Meisel has returned to the University of Michigan after spending a year in Europe doing research.

Thomas Patrick Melady, of Norwich, Connecticut, and Washington, D. C., has accepted a position as a staff officer with the Foreign Operations Administration in Washington.

Warren Miller, formerly study director in the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of California at Berkeley.

William Monat, formerly of the University of Minnesota, has been appointed to the teaching staff at Wayne University.

Gerhart Niemeyer, member of the staff of the Council of Foreign Relations, New York, has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University.

C. Bickford O'Brien, chairman of the department of history and political science, University of California (Davis Campus), is spending his sabbatical leave this year in Europe.

Maurice E. O'Donnell, who received the doctorate at the University of Wisconsin in 1954, has been appointed instructor in political science at Michigan State College.

Edward S. Overman is on leave from his position as associate professor of political science at the University of Virginia during the academic year 1954-55 for study at Harvard University and Washington, D. C., under a Ford Foundation faculty fellowship.

Gene Overstreet, of Michigan State College, is spending a second year in India as a Ford fellow.

Don Pilcher has joined the Governmental Research Center staff at the University of Kansas as assistant director for child research. Mr. Pilcher has his M.S.W. degree from Kansas University and several years of practical experience in Kansas City and Wichita.

Ira Polley, formerly regional chairman of the Minneapolis Wage Stabilization Board and assistant professor at Michigan State College, has joined the faculty of the department of public administration at Wayne University.

R. Vance Presthus, associate professor of political science, Michigan State College, is serving as research director of the United Nations Institute of Public Administration in Ankara, Turkey, during the academic year 1954-55.

Nathaniel S. Preston is serving for a second year as visiting instructor in political science at West Virginia University.

Emmette S. Redford, professor of government at the University of Texas, is serving during the fall semester as visiting professor at Duke University where he is offering courses in public administration.

James R. Roach has been advanced to associate professor of government at the University of Texas.

James S. Roberts, of the University of North Carolina, is serving as assistant professor in the departments of political science and of the Scandinavian Area Studies at the University of Minnesota during the academic year 1954-55.

William H. Roberts, of the Catholic University of America, has received a grant—sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation—from the School of Advanced International Studies of the Johns Hopkins University for a study on "The Theory of International Politics."

Leo C. Rosten, member of the board of editors of Look Magazine, has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University.

Dankwart A. Rustow, assistant professor of politics at Princeton University, has returned from a year abroad, spent in research on political conditions in Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, Iraq and Israel. He lectured at Istanbul University, at Robert College and at the American University of Beirut.

Ake Sandler has been promoted to the rank of associate professor in the department of government at Los Angeles State College. During the 1954 summer session he was a visiting member of the faculty at the University of Minnesota.

Fayez Sayegh, social affairs officer of the Division of Human Rights, United Nations, has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University.

Herbert Pierre Secher, who recently received his Ph.D. from the University of Wisconsin, has accepted a position as instructor in the department of political science at Western Reserve University.

Walter R. Sharp has been granted a year's leave of absence from Yale University to accept an appointment as co-director of a new Institute of Public Administration to be established in Cairo under the joint sponsorship of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the Government of Egypt. After completion of this assignment, Professor Sharp will spend the summer of 1955 in Europe doing research on the decision-making process in the United Nations system. He plans to resume his regular duties at Yale at the beginning of the fall semester of 1955-56.

Foster H. Sherwood, of the University of California (Los Angeles), taught at Northwestern University during the 1954 summer session.

Edgar L. Shor has joined the faculty of Indiana University as instructor in government.

Marshal D. Shulman, former special assistant to the Secretary of State, has assumed his new duties as associate director of the Russian Research Center at Harvard University.

John F. Sly, professor of politics, Princeton University, has been appointed Director of Studies for the Temporary Commission on Educational Finances of the State of New York.

John Malcolm Smith, formerly of Columbia University and the Foreign Policy Association, has accepted an assistant professorship in political science at the University of California (Riverside).

David Spitz, of the Ohio State University, was a visiting member of the Hunter College staff during the summer session, 1954.

Edwin O. Stene, professor of political science at the University of Kansas, is on leave for a year at the University of the Philippines where he is directing the Research Bureau of the University and consulting on administrative problems of the Philippine Government.

T. Noel Stern has resigned his position at Boston University to become director of the Fondation États Unis, Paris. Professor Stern had been a Fulbright lecturer in France during 1952 and was acting director of the Fondation during the summer of 1952.

John E. Stoner has been promoted to a full professorship in government at Indiana University.

William L. Strauss has joined the Ford Foundation's Fund for the Republic as a consultant.

Marvin R. Summers, a graduate of the University of Iowa, has accepted a position in the department of history and political science at Wisconsin State College in Milwaukee. For the past two years, Mr. Summers has been an instructor at the Michigan College of Mining and Technology.

Joseph L. Sutton has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of government at Indiana University.

Thor Swanson has been appointed instructor in public administration at the State College of Washington.

Charles H. Titus, of the University of California (Los Angeles), has been on sabbatical leave in Europe since June, 1954. He will resume teaching in the spring semester.

Arthur C. Turner has been appointed associate professor of political science and chairman of the division of social sciences at the University of California (Riverside).

Paul W. Van der Veur has been appointed instructor in political science at Yale University.

P. J. Vatikiotis is on military leave from his instructorship in the department of government at Indiana University.

Herbert Von Beckerath, professor of economics and political science at Duke University, has returned from a summer in Germany where he lectured at the University of Tuebingen and at the Institute of Politics in Munich.

E. V. Walter, formerly of Wisconsin State College, Eau Claire, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Ohio Wesleyan University.

Lawrence C. Wanlass is on leave of absence this year from Mount Holyoke College to study communism in Southeast Asia under a Fulbright research grant. He is associated with the University of the Philippines in Manila.

John Harvey Wheeler, Jr., formerly a member of the Johns Hopkins University faculty, has been appointed associate professor of political science at Washington and Lee University, effective in September, 1954.

Urban Whitaker, of the University of Washington, has accepted an instructorship in political science and international relations at San Francisco State College, beginning in the fall semester, 1954.

Arthur Bruce Winter, who was recently associated with the Bureau of Public Administration at the University of Tennessee, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Nebraska, effective in September, 1954.

S. Joseph Wodka, former graduate student in political science at the University of Michigan, has been appointed instructor in the department of government at the University of Detroit.

IN MEMORIAM

FRANZ L. NEUMANN. The inexplicable swerve of a car in which he was riding as a guest of friends on a wet road in Switzerland on September 2, 1954, ended in mid-career the life of a singularly potent teacher and writer in the fields of political theory and comparative institutions. At the time, Franz Neumann was about to return to his post at Columbia University as professor of government after a sabbatical leave spent partly on the faculty of the Free University of Berlin. Behind his seven remarkably successful years in Columbia's graduate faculty of political science there had been three periods of richly varied and maturing preparation.

Born in Upper Silesia on May 23, 1900, Neuman studied law at the Universities of Breslau, Leipzig, Rostock, and Frankfurt am Main, receiving the J.D. degree from Frankfurt in 1923. He had already had two years of training as Referender; this seasoning was resumed in the period 1924-27 after a year as a university assistant in international law. After the completion of his second academic examination in 1927 he became a member of the Berlin bar, specializing in labor and cartel law. Meanwhile he lectured in the Labor Academy of the University of Frankfurt am Main and in the Deutsche Hochschule fuer Politik in Berlin. Moving to England in 1933, Neumann spent three student years at the London School of Economics with emphasis upon the history of political theory; he received the degree of Ph.D. in 1936. His subsequent career was in the United States, first as a member of the Institute of Social Research during its location at Columbia. In the war years he served in the Board of Economic Warfare and later in the Office of Strategic Services in charge of research on central Europe. Subsequently he was for a time a chief analyst in the State Department's Office of Research and Intelligence. Meanwhile, among other lecturing assignments, he participated in the Navy Department's School of Military Government at Columbia and in the early stages of the development of the School of International Affairs. After 1947 he was a permanent member of the graduate department of public law and government.

By the time of his death Professor Neumann had become the central pillar in the teaching of political theory at Columbia. The mere fact that at least a score of dissertations were in various stages of progress under his direction when he died was a clue to his dynamic role as a teacher. It would be an error to say that he had or sought disciples, but the number of his true followers was unusual. Much of his appeal was rigorous intellectual vitality combined with moral earnestness but with them went personal interest and affection. He was downright but subtle; sure but questioning; and his grounding in history suited his emphasis upon the interaction of political thought and political reality in times and places. His writings included the well-known Behemoth: The Structure and Practice of National Socialism, originally published in 1942, a critical edition of The Spirit of the Laws in 1949, and at the time of his death the Free Press, Glencoe, was preparing to bring out in book form certain of the many essays that have revealed the force and range of his mind and interests.

—ARTHUR W. MACMAHON.

1955 CONGRESSIONAL INTERNE PROGRAM

Applications for the 1955 Congressional Intern Program will close on February 1, 1955. The primary purpose of the Congressional Intern Program, now in its second year of operation, is to enable young political scientists and journalists to gain the practical experience of working as staff members of congressional committees and in the offices of House and Senate members. Next year ten internships will be awarded—five for those with graduate training and/or teaching experience in political science and five for journalists or young teachers in schools of journalism. The stipends are $4,000 (tax-free, according to current rulings), plus travel expenses to and from Washington, D. C., for each award winner.

The program will commence on November 1, 1955, with one month of work in the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress. This will include both a general orientation on the activities of the Legislative Reference Service and an attempt to prepare the internes for their future work on committee staffs, with senators and with members of the House of Representatives. Individual projects will be assigned in the Legislative Reference Service according to the interests and objectives of each interne. Frequent group meetings of the internes will be held, enabling the exchange of experiences and the discussion of legislative problems as well as furnishing the opportunity to meet informally with House and Senate members and their staffs.

Following the month's service in the Legislative Reference Service, the internes will divide the next eight months equally between two active staff assignments. These assignments will be worked out with the aim of providing experience in both House and Senate operations and in both committee work and the work of a member's office. As far as possible, each interne will be allowed a free choice with respect to his assignments. The Association office will advise the internes which committees and members of Congress might provide the richest experience in terms of the interest of the interne, as well as which offices have specifically requested that they be assigned internes. The number of requests so far exceeds the number of internes that no difficulty is anticipated in arranging stimulating assignments for the entire group.

Applications should be submitted to the chairman of the department of political science in the case of those who have done graduate work and/or teaching in political science; and to the dean or director of the school of journalism for teachers in schools of journalism. Working journalists should submit their applications through their editor, publisher, or supervisory official at the magazine, radio, or television station where they are working. Preference will be given to applicants in the age group 25 to 30 and preference will be given to those who have not had the opportunity to work or live in Washington, D. C. The following types of experience and training are suggestive rather than binding: (1) completion of doctorate in political science; (2) completion of two years of graduate work in political science, plus one year of experience in politics, teaching, or public administration; (3) undergraduate major in political science and law degree; or (4) A.B. degree with honor average in political science and practical experience on a newspaper or with radio and television (applicants will be considered only if they are currently active in the field and will be able to obtain leaves of absence).

The Association is again asking the chairman of each department of political science and the supervisors in the case of journalists to recommend the one candidate deemed best qualified for a Congressional Internship. These recommendations should reach the Association office by February 15, 1955, and the names of the successful applicants will be announced during April, 1955.

The program will commence on November 1, 1955 and continue through July 31, 1956. Further information and details concerning the Congressional Intern Program may be secured by writing to the Association office, which will also supply application forms.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

Suggestions Requested by Nominating Committee

The Committee on Nominations of The American Political Science Association invites all members to suggest persons for nomination as officers of the Association. The offices to be filled are: President-Elect, three Vice Presidents, Secretary, Treasurer, and eight members of the Council.

Last year's Committee received sixty-four letters which represented the combined suggestions of about two hundred members of the Association. The Committee commented in its report: "Obviously the degree of participation depends upon the initiative of the members. In the present instance a comparatively small percentage of the total membership of the Association availed itself of the opportunity. About one-fifth of these submitted suggestions after the deadline set for their receipt, namely, February 1. If the apathy which is indicated by the non-participation is to any degree due to the existence of a feeling that suggestions are without effect upon the decision of the committee, it may be important to make it clear that such a feeling is totally without justification in so far as the experience of the present committee may be regarded as typical."

Please send your suggestions and with them any additional comments you care to make to Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Massachusetts no later than February 1, 1955.

Program for 1955 Annual Meeting

All members of the Association are invited to send suggestions on topics for the 1955 annual meeting program and comments on panel procedure to Weldon Cooper, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia, chairman of the Program Committee.

INDEX TO VOLUME XLVIII

- Abernethy, Byron R. Book reviews 870
- ADMINISTRATIVE LAW. Harris, Joseph P. and Davis, Kenneth Culp. "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration": An Exchange 174
Book notes 565, 576
- AFRICA. Coleman, James S. Nationalism in Tropical Africa 404
Rivlin, Benjamin. A Selective Survey of the Literature in the Social Sciences and Related Fields on Modern North Africa 826
Young, Roland and Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa 187
Book notices 262, 580, 898
- Aguilera, Francisco. Books of, noticed 887
- Albertini, Luigi. Books of, noticed 897
- AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION
Fiftieth Annual Meeting 1221
News and Notes 279, 612, 917, 1221
Obituaries 289, 623, 933, 1239
Presidential Address 961
- Andreu, Pierre. Books of, noted 1205
- Angus, H. F. Books of, noticed 588
- Anisimov, Oleg. Books of, noted 260
- Appadorai, A. Books of, noticed 601
- ARGENTINA. Book notices 887
- Aron, Raymond. Books of, noticed 898
- ASIA. Scalapino, Robert A. "Neutralism" in Asia 49
Book notices 589, 590, 888
Book reviews on: Holland, William L. (ed.). Asian Nationalism and the West 218
- Aspaturian, Vernon V. The Contemporary Doctrine of the Soviet State and Its Philosophical Foundations 1031
- Atwater, Elton. Book notes 895
- Auguste, Yves L. Books of, noticed 1196
- AUSTRIA. Book notices 579, 590
- Bagge, Dominique. Books of, noted 268
- Baier, Clarence W. Books of, noticed 261
- Bailey, Sydney D. Books of, noted 1180
— Books of, noticed 888
- Ball, W. Macmahon. Books of, noticed 589
- Barclay, George W. Books of, noticed 1185
- Barnes, Harry Elmer. Books of, noted 1193
- Barnett, Vincent M., Jr. Book notes 247, 565
- Barrett, Edward W. Books of, noted 257
- Bartlett, Vernon. Books of, noticed 262
- Bartley, Ernest R. Books of, noted 239
- Battistini, Lawrence H. Books of, noticed 589
- Belknap, George M. Book notes 600
- Beloff, Max. Books of, noticed 262
- Benedict, Murray R. Books of, noticed 570
- Benn, Ernest. Books of, noticed 1207
- Bennett, George. Books of, noticed 249
- Bernstein, Marver. Book notes 288
- Beyer, William C. Books of, noticed 240
- BIBLIOGRAPHY. Burdette, Franklin L. Articles and Documents on American Government and Politics 241, 571, 875, 1174
Burdine, J. Alton. Basic Materials for the Study of State Constitutions and State Constitutional Development 1140
Chamberlin, Waldo and Clark, Hartley. Materials for Undergraduate Study of the United Nations 204
Riggs, Fred W. Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration 515
Rivlin, Benjamin. A Selective Survey of the Literature in the Social Sciences and Related Fields on Modern North Africa 826
Roberts, William H. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government 252, 580, 889, 1186
Simon, Herbert A. Articles and Documents on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences 275, 608, 915, 1214
Steiner, H. Arthur. Articles and Documents on International Law and Relations 263, 591, 898, 1198
Wilson, Francis G. Articles and Documents on Political Theory 269, 602, 908, 1208
Young, Roland and Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa 187
Book notes 249
Book notices 240, 249, 578, 588, 601, 874, 885, 886, 887, 888, 1172, 1173, 1183, 1185, 1195
- Binkley, Wilfred E. Book reviews 227
- BIOGRAPHY. Book notes 565
Book notices 570, 875, 888, 1173, 1183
Book reviews on: LaFollette, Bella Case and LaFollette, Fola. Robert M. LaFollette 1167
- Bisson, T. A. Books of, noted 885

- Black, C. E. Books of, noticed. 1186
- Blum, John Morton. Books of, noticed. . . 875
- BOLIVIA. Book notices. 887
- Bollens, John C. Book reviews. 1153
- Bontecou, Eleanor. Books of, reviewed. . . 225
- Borgese, G. A. Books of, noticed. 897
- Borkenau, Franz. Books of, reviewed. . . . 223
- Borton, Hugh. Books of, noticed. 1185
- Bouscaren, Anthony Trawick. Books of, noticed. 589, 888
- Braibanti, Ralph. The Ryukyu Islands: Pawn of the Pacific. 972
- Book notes. 1195
- Brann, E. R. Books of, noticed. 1206
- BRAZIL. Book notices. 251
- Brecher, Michael. Books of, noticed. . . . 590
- Bretton, Henry L. Book reviews. 563
- Books of, noted. 895
- Brinton, Crane. Books of, noticed. 250
- BRITISH COMMONWEALTH. Book notices. . . 260
- Brookes, Edgar H. Books of, noticed. . . . 898
- Brown, D. Mackenzie. Books of, noted. . . 598
- Brown, William Adams. Books of, reviewed. 548
- Browning, Andrew. Books of, noticed. . . . 249
- Bruce, James. Books of, noticed. 887
- Brunton, D. Books of, noticed. 1183
- Buchanan, Scott. Books of, noticed. 601
- Buchanan, William. Books of, noticed. . . 262
- Bulmer-Thomas, Ivor. Books of, reviewed. . 214
- Bunche, Ralph J. Presidential Address. . . 961
- Bundesministerium des Innern* (Cologne-Berlin). Books of, noticed. 1184
- Burdette, Franklin L. Articles and Documents on American Government and Politics. 241, 571, 875, 1174
- Burdine, J. Alton. Basic Materials for the Study of State Constitutions and State Constitutional Development. . 1140
- Burke, Robert E. Books of, noticed. 570
- Burks, Ardath W. Books of, noticed. . . . 1185
- Busey, James L. Book notes. 905
- Butler, D. E. Books of, reviewed. 214
- Butow, Robert J. C. Books of, noticed. . . 1198
- Butz, Otto. Books of, noticed. 1196
- Cahn, Edmond (ed.). Books of, reviewed. 1165
- Calvocoressi, Peter. Books of, noticed. . . . 897
- CANADA. Book notes. 883
- Book notices. 578, 588
- Cantril, Hadley. Books of, noticed. 262
- Carleton, William G. Book notes. 586
- Books of, noticed. 1196
- Caroe, Olaf. Books of, noticed. 591
- Cartwright, Dorwin, et al. Books of, noticed. 874
- Cassirer, Ernst. Books of, noted. 1204
- Catlin, George. Book notes. 1206
- Chamberlin, Waldo and Clark, Hartley. Materials for Undergraduate Study of the United Nations. 204
- Chamberlin, William Henry. Books of, noted. 586
- Chao Kuo-chün. Mass Organizations in Mainland China. 752
- Chapman, Brian. Books of, reviewed. . . . 862
- Cheever, Daniel S. Books of, noticed. . . . 1196
- Childs, James B. Book notes. 249
- CHINA. Chao Kuo-chün. Mass Organizations in Mainland China. 752
- Book notes. 251, 588, 1197
- Book reviews on: Feis, Herbert. The China Tangle. 216
- Levi, Werner. Modern China's Foreign Policy. 868
- Ching, Cyrus S. Books of, noticed. 875
- Ciriacy-Wantrup, S. V. Books of, noticed. 570
- Clark, Hartley and Chamberlin, Waldo. Materials for Undergraduate Study of the United Nations. 204
- Cohen, Bernard C. Book notes. 1193
- Cohen, Morris R. Books of, noticed. 1207
- Cole, Taylor. Books of, noticed. 577
- Colean, Miles L. Books of, noted. 569
- Coleman, James S. Nationalism in Tropical Africa. 404
- Columbus Memorial Library, Pan American Union. Books of, noticed. 1195
- Committee on Civil-Military Relations Research, Social Science Research Council. Books of, noticed. 1173
- COMMUNISM. Aspaturian, Vernon V. The Contemporary Doctrine of the Soviet State and Its Philosophical Foundations. 1031
- Chao Kuo-chün. Mass Organizations in Mainland China. 752
- Holt, Robert T. Age as a Factor in the Recruitment of Communist Leadership. 486
- Book notes. 259, 599
- Book notices. 250, 589, 591, 888, 1207
- Book reviews on: Borkenau, Franz. European Communism. 223
- Haines, C. Grove (ed.). The Threat of Soviet Imperialism. 1160
- Monnerot, Jules. Sociology and Psychology of Communism. 223
- North, Robert C. Moscow and the Chinese Communists. 546

- COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT. Chao Kuo-chün. Mass Organizations in Mainland China. 752
- Coleman, James S. Nationalism in Tropical Africa. 404
- Epstein, Leon D. Politics of British Conservatism. 27
- Gosnell, Harold F. An Interpretation of the Philippine Election of 1953. 1128
- Johnson, Eldon L. The Accountability of the British Nationalized Industries. 366
- Mendel, Douglas H., Jr. Revisionist Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan. 766
- Riggs, Fred W. Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration. 515
- Spiro, Herbert J. Co-Determination in Germany. 1114
- Vanger, Milton I. Uruguay Introduces Government by Committee. 500
- Book notes. 247, 248, 576, 882, 883, 884, 885, 1180, 1181
- Book notices. 250, 251, 261, 577, 578, 579, 580, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 1173, 1182, 1183, 1184, 1185, 1186
- Book reviews on: Bulmer-Thomas, Ivor. The Party System in Great Britain. 214
- Butler, D. E. The Electoral System in Britain, 1918-1951. 214
- Chapman, Brian. Introduction to French Local Government. 862
- Dragnich, Alex N. Tito's Promised Land. 1157
- Fainsod, Merle. How Russia Is Ruled. 541
- Friedrich, Carl J. (ed.). Totalitarianism. 1164
- Hazard, John N. Law and Social Change in the U.S.S.R.. 541
- Litchfield, Edward H., et al. Governing Postwar Germany. 220
- Moore, Barrington, Jr. Terror and Progress USSR. 1159
- Rostow, W. W. The Dynamics of Soviet Society. 541
- Staley, Eugene. The Future of Underdeveloped Countries. 853
- Wheeler-Bennett, John W. The Nemesis of Power. 563
- CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. Fellman, David. Constitutional Law in 1952-1953. 63
- Book notes. 239
- Book notices. 239
- Book reviews on: Cahn, Edmond (ed.). Supreme Court and Supreme Law. 1165
- Corwin, Edward S. (ed.). The Constitution of the United States of America. 864
- Pfeffer, Leo. Church, State, and Freedom. 556
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court. 849
- Cook, Thomas I. Books of, noticed. 1196
- Cook, Virginia G. State Cooperation in Enforcement of the Federal Wage-Hour Law. 721
- Cooper, Weldon. Book notes. 1170
- Corradini, Alessandro and McCamy, James L. The People of the State Department and Foreign Service. 1067
- Corwin, Edward S. Books of, reviewed. 864
- COSTA RICA. Book notices. 251
- Countryman, Vern. Book notes. 599
- Cousins, Norman. Books of, noted. 259
- Cowan, L. Gray. Books of, noticed. 898
- Craig, Gordon A. Books of, reviewed. 222
- Cresap, Dean R. Books of, noticed. 1172
- Curl, Peter V. Books of, noticed. 1197
- Curran, Charles D. Book reviews. 560
- Dahl, Robert A. Books of, reviewed. 558
- Daland, Robert T. Book notes. 569
- Dauer, Manning J. Books of, reviewed. 856
- David, René. Books of, noticed. 1186
- Davies, James C. Charisma in the 1952 Campaign. 1083
- Davis, Helen Miller. Books of, noticed. 579
- Davis, Kenneth Culp and Harris, Joseph P. "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration": An Exchange. 174
- Degras, Jane. Books of, noticed. 590
- De Schweinitz, Karl, Jr. Books of, noticed. 601
- Deutsch, Karl W. Books of, noticed. 1196
- Books of, reviewed. 554
- Deutscher, Isaac. Books of, noted. 884
- Dimock, Gladys Ogden. Books of, noticed. 240
- Dimock, Marshall Edward. Books of, noticed. 240
- Direction de la Documentation of the Présidence du Conseil and Direction des Affaires Politiques of the Ministère de la France d'Outre-Mer (Paris)*.
- Books of, noticed*. 886
- Djang Chu. Books of, noticed. 1185
- Dorwart, Reinhold August. Books of, noted. 576
- Dragnich, Alex N. Books of, reviewed. 1157
- Dull, Paul S. Book notes. 885
- Dunner Joseph. Books of, noticed. 251

- EAST INDIES. Book notices..... 590
- ECONOMICS. Book notices.....262, 269
- Book reviews on: Dahl, Robert A. and Lindblom, Charles E. Politics, Economics and Welfare..... 558
- Galbraith, John Kenneth. American Capitalism..... 228
- Lilienthal, David E. Big Business... 228
- Quinn, T. K. Giant Business..... 228
- Staley, Eugene. The Future of Underdeveloped Countries..... 853
- ECUADOR. Book notices..... 887
- Eek, Hilding. Books of, noticed.....1196
- Ehrmann, Henry W. Book reviews..... 862
- Elbow, Matthew H. Books of, noted... 598
- Eldersveld, Samuel, et al. Books of, noticed..... 874
- ELECTION ANALYSES. Davies, James C. Charisma in the 1952 Campaign....1083
- Gosnell, Harold F. An Interpretation of the Philippine Election of 1953...1128
- Elisseeff, Serge. Books of, noticed.....1185
- Elsbree, Willard H. Books of, noted.... 587
- Emerson, Rupert. Book reviews..... 853
- Epstein, Leon D. Politics of British Conservatism..... 27
- EUROPE. Book notices.250, 577, 591, 1186
- Book reviews on: Borkenau, Franz. European Communism..... 223
- Ewing, Cortez A. M. Book notes..... 872
- Fainsod, Merle. Books of, reviewed..... 541
- Fairbank, John King. Books of, noticed.....588, 1197
- Fall, Bernard B. Books of, noticed.....1185
- FAR EAST. Book notices.....1185
- FEDERALISM. Cook, Virginia G. State Cooperation in Enforcement of the Federal Wage-Hour Law..... 721
- Zimmermann, Frederick L. and Wendell, Mitchell. Representation of the Region in Missouri Basin Organization..... 152
- Book notes.....883, 1170
- Book notices..... 240
- Feis, Herbert. Books of, reviewed..... 216
- Fellman, David. Constitutional Law in 1952-1953..... 63
- Fernbach, Alfred. Book Reviews..... 868
- Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Books of, noted..1181
- Flechtheim, Ossip K. Book reviews.... 223
- Books of, noted..... 269
- Fleming, D. F. Book notes..... 259
- Fliess, Peter J. Book notes..... 905
- Florinsky, Michael T. Book notes..... 577
- Foerster, Friedrich Wilhelm. Books of, noticed..... 888
- Ford, G. Books of, noted..... 249
- Ford, P. Books of, noted..... 249
- Fox, Guy. Books of, noticed..... 240
- FRANCE. Book notes..... 598
- Book notices.....578, 886, 907, 1184
- Book reviews on: Chapman, Brian. Introduction to French Local Government 862
- Frankel, S. Herbert. Books of, noticed... 262
- Friedel, Frank. Books of, noticed..... 875
- Friedmann, Georges. Books of, noticed.. 578
- Friedmann, W. Books of, noted..... 247
- Friedrich, Carl J. Books of, noticed.... 875
- Books of, reviewed.....562, 1164
- Furniss, Edgar S., Jr. Books of, noticed..1196
- Galbraith, John Kenneth. Books of, reviewed.....228, 562
- Galloway, George B. Books of, noted.... 566
- Garceau, Oliver and Silverman, Corinne. A Pressure Group and the Pressured: A Case Report..... 672
- García-Mora, Manuel R. Book notes....1192
- Garfinkel, Herbert. Book notes..... 257
- Garraty, John A. Books of, noted..... 565
- Garthoff, Raymond L. Books of, noticed. 888
- Gash, Norman. Books of, noticed..... 250
- Gay, Peter. Books of, noted.....1204
- GERMANY. Spiro, Herbert J. Co-Determination in Germany.....1114
- Book notes.....248, 895
- Book notices..250, 579, 590, 888, 1184, 1197
- Book reviews on: Litchfield, Edward H., et al. Governing Postwar Germany 220
- Wheeler-Bennett, John W. The Nemesis of Power..... 563
- Ghosh, Ramesh Chandra. Books of, noticed..... 579
- Gilbert, Felix. Books of, reviewed..... 222
- Gillen, J. F. J. Books of, noticed..... 250
- Glickman, Harvey. Books of, noticed...1196
- Goerlitz, Walter. Books of, noted..... 248
- Goldmark, Josephine. Books of, noticed. 570
- Gosnell, Harold F. An Interpretation of the Philippine Election of 1953.....1128
- Book notes.....1171
- Gottmann, Jean. Books of, noted..... 905
- Grace, Frank. Book notes..... 567
- Book reviews..... 856
- Grant, J. A. C. Book reviews..... 864
- Graves, W. Brooke. Books of, noticed... 240
- Gray, Alisa P., et al. Books of, noticed... 252
- Grayson, Cary Travers, Jr. Books of, noticed..... 590
- GREAT BRITAIN. Epstein, Leon D. Politics

- of British Conservatism. 27
- Johnson, Eldon L. The Accountability of the British Nationalized Industries. . . 366
- Book notes. 247, 249, 906, 1180
- Book notices. 249, 250, 578, 579, 889, 897, 1183
- Book reviews on: Bulmer-Thomas, Ivor. The Party System in Great Britain. 214
- Butler, D. E. The Electoral System in Britain, 1918-1951. 214
- GREECE. Book notices. 590, 889
- Grimes, Alan Pendleton. Books of, noticed. 570
- Gross, Bertram M. Book reviews. 558
- Books of, noted. 238
- and Lewis, John P. The President's Economic Staff During the Truman Administration. 114
- Grosser, Alfred, et al. Books of, noticed. . 1184
- Grulicw, Leo. Books of, noticed. 580
- Gurland, A. R. L. Books of, noticed. . . . 269
- Hacker, Andrew. Capital and Carbuncles: The "Great Books" Reappraised. . . 775
- Hagan, Charles B. Book reviews. 234
- Haines, C. Grove (ed.). Books of, reviewed. 1160
- Hallgarten, George W. F. Books of, noticed. 1182
- Hallowell, John H. Book reviews. 538
- Hammer, Ellen J. Books of, reviewed. . . 1162
- Harbison, Frederick H. and Spencer, Robert C. The Politics of Collective Bargaining: The Postwar Record in Steel. 705
- Harlean, James. Books of, noticed. 875
- Harris, Joseph P. Books of reviewed. . . . 553
- and Davis, Kenneth Culp. "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration": An Exchange. 174
- Harris, Louis. Books of, noted. 1171
- Harris, Robert J. Book reviews. 1165
- Hart, Henry M., Jr. Books of, noticed. . . 241
- Harter, D. Lincoln. Books of, noticed. . . 570
- Hartman, R. S. Books of, noticed. 601
- Haviland, H. Field, Jr. Book reviews. . . 222
- Books of, noticed. 1196
- Hawkins, Carroll. Book notes. 259
- Books of, noticed. 1207
- Hazard, John N. Books of, noticed. 1186
- Books of, reviewed. 541
- Heard, Alexander. Book notes. 883
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. Books of, noticed. 601
- Heimann, Eduard. Books of, noticed. . . . 1207
- Helms, E. Allen. Book notes. 872
- Hendel, Charles W. Books of, noticed. . . . 601
- Herriot, Edouard. Books of, noticed. . . . 1207
- Herz, John H. Book notes. 269
- Hilger, Gustav. Books of, noticed. 590
- Hill, Norman. Books of, noticed. 588
- Hiscocks, Richard. Books of, noticed. . . . 579
- HISTORY. Book notes. 576, 872
- Book notices. 249, 250, 588, 591, 897, 906, 1183
- Book reviews on: Dauer, Manning J. The Adams Federalists. 856
- Neill, Thomas P. The Rise and Decline of Liberalism. 857
- Hockey, Barbara, et al. Books of, noticed. 252
- Hocking, William Ernest. Books of, noticed. 1207
- Hodgkinson, Harry. Books of, noted. . . . 259
- Holland, William L. Books of, reviewed. . 218
- Holt, Robert T. Age as a Factor in the Recruitment of Communist Leadership. . 486
- Hook, Sidney. Books of, noted. 599
- Hovland, Carl I. Books of, noted. 600
- Howard, L. V. Book notes. 567
- Hughes, Christopher. Books of, noticed. . 1184
- Hughes, E. A. Books of, noticed. 250
- Hughes, H. Stuart. Books of, noticed. . . . 262
- Huitt, Ralph K. The Congressional Committee: A Case Study. 340
- Book notes. 568
- HUNGARY. Book notices. 590, 897
- Hunter, Floyd. Books of, reviewed. 235
- Hyman, Harold Melvin. Books of, noticed. 874
- Hyman, Sidney. Books of, noted. 872
- Hyneman, Charles S. Book reviews. 865
- INDIA. Book notes. 598, 883
- Book notices. 251, 601, 888, 1185
- INDO-CHINA. Book notices. 887, 1185
- Book reviews on: Hammer, Ellen J. The Struggle for Indochina. 1162
- INDONESIA. Book notices. 251
- INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION AND ORGANIZATION.
- Book notes. 896
- Book notices. 260, 262, 588, 1196
- Book reviews on: Mack, Robert T., Jr. Raising the World's Standard of Living. 548
- Mead, Margaret (ed.). Cultural Patterns and Technical Change. 854
- INTERNATIONAL LAW. Braibanti, Ralph. The Ryukyu Islands: Pawn of the Pacific. 972

- Book notes 896, 1192
 Book notices 589, 897, 1196
 Book reviews on: Lipsky, George A. (ed.). Law and Politics in the World Community 851
- INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. Braibanti, Ralph. The Ryukyu Islands: Pawn of the Pacific 972
 Scalapino, Robert A. "Neutralism" in Asia 49
 Spain, James W. Military Assistance for Pakistan 738
 Book notes 259, 260, 586, 587, 895, 896
 Book notices 261, 262, 588, 589, 590, 591, 897, 898, 1195, 1196, 1197, 1198
 Book reviews on: Craig, Gordon A. and Gilbert, Felix (eds.). The Diplomats: 1919-1939 222
 Haines, C. Grove (ed.). The Threat of Soviet Imperialism 1160
 Hammer, Ellen J. The Struggle for Indochina 1162
 Levi, Werner. Modern China's Foreign Policy 868
 Mead, Margaret (ed.). Cultural Patterns and Technical Change 854
 North, Robert C. Moscow and the Chinese Communists 546
 Staley, Eugene. The Future of Underdeveloped Countries 853
- ISRAEL. Book notices 251, 262
 ITALY. Book notices 262
- Jackson, R. M. Books of, noticed 579
 Jacobini, H. B. Books of, noted 1192
 Janis, Irving L. Books of, noted 600
- JAPAN. Braibanti, Ralph. The Ryukyu Islands: Pawn of the Pacific 972
 Mendel, Douglas H., Jr. Revisionist Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan 766
 Book notes 885, 1195
 Book notices 886, 1185, 1198
 Jenkins, Shirley. Books of, noticed 589
 Jennings, Sir Ivor. Books of, noticed 1185
 Johnson, Eldon L. The Accountability of the British Nationalized Industries 366
 Jones, Howard Mumford. Books of, noticed 601
 Jorrín, Miguel. Books of, noticed 887
- JUDICIARY. Book reviews on: Pritchett, C. Herman. Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court 849
- Kahn, Alfred J. Books of, noted 1169
 Kállay, Nicholas. Books of, noticed 897
 Kantor, Harry. Books of, noticed 1185
 Katare, S. L. Books of, noticed 250
- Katz, Daniel, et al. Books of, noticed 874
 Keefe, William J. Parties, Partisanship, and Public Policy in the Pennsylvania Legislature 450
 Keeler, Mary Frear. Books of, noticed 1183
 Keeton, G. W. Books of, noticed 579
 Keith-Lucas, Alan. Book notes 1170
 Kelley, Harold H. Books of, noted 600
 Kendall, Willmoore and Ranney, Austin. The American Party Systems 477
 Kenyon, Cecelia M. Book reviews 212
 Kertesz, Stephen D. Books of, noticed 590
 Key, V. O., Jr. The Direct Primary and Party Structure: A Study of State Legislative Nominations 1
 — Book reviews 553
 King, E. M. Books of, noted 249
 Kissinger, Henry A. The Conservative Dilemma: Reflections on the Political Thought of Metternich 1017
 Kneier, Charles M. Books of, noticed 240
 Kogekar, S. V. Books of, noticed 601
 Kolarz, Walter. Books of, noticed 580
 Konvitz, Milton R. Books of, noted 567
 Kousoulas, Dimitrios G. Books of, noticed 590
 Kracke, E. A., Jr. Books of, noticed 251
 Kucharov, Samuel. Books of, noted 577
 Kulski, W. W. Book reviews 541
- LABOR. Harbison, Frederick H. and Spencer, Robert C. The Politics of Collective Bargaining: The Postwar Record in Steel 705
 Book notices 875
 Book reviews on: Richards, Allan R. War Labor Boards in the Field 870
 Laffan, R. G. D., et al. Books of, noticed 589
 LaFollette, Bella Case. Books of, reviewed 1167
 LaFollette, Fola. Books of, reviewed 1167
 Lane, Robert E. Books of, noted 1170
 Lasswell, Harold D. Book reviews 554
 LATIN AMERICA. Book notes 1181
 Book notices 887
 Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Book reviews 216
 Laves, Walter H. C. Book reviews 854
 Lawrynenko, Jurij. Books of, noticed 591
 Ledermann, Laszlo. Books of, noticed 262
 Lee, Alfred McClung, et al. Books of, noticed 874
 Leek, J. H. Book notes 239
- LEGAL THEORY AND INSTITUTIONS. Book notes 577, 1169
 Book notices 241, 579, 886, 1186
- LEGISLATIVE PROCESS. Garceau, Oliver

- and Silverman, Corinne. A Pressure Group and the Pressured: A Case Report..... 672
- Huitt, Ralph K. The Congressional Committee: A Case Study..... 340
- Keefe, William J. Parties, Partisanship, and Public Policy in the Pennsylvania Legislature..... 450
- Lockard, W. Duane. Legislative Politics in Connecticut..... 166
- Neustadt, Richard E. Presidency and Legislation: The Growth of Central Clearance..... 641
- Book notes..... 238, 566
- Book notices..... 569, 874
- Book reviews on: Harris, Joseph P. The Advice and Consent of the Senate.... 553
- Zeller, Belle (ed.). American State Legislatures..... 865
- Lehmann-Haupt, Hellmut. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Leopold, Richard W. Books of, noticed.. 875
- Leuchtenberg, William Edward. Books of, reviewed..... 560
- Levi, Werner. Book notes..... 598
- Books of, reviewed..... 868
- Levinson, Ronald B. Books of, reviewed. 859
- Lewis, John P. and Gross, Bertram M. The President's Economic Staff During the Truman Administration... 114
- Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. and Young, Roland. Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa..... 187
- Lilienthal, Alfred M. Books of, noticed.. 262
- Lilienthal, David E. Books of, reviewed. 228
- Lindblom, Charles E. Books of, reviewed 558
- Lindsay of Birker. Book reviews..... 546
- Linebarger, Paul M. A. Books of, noticed. 1185
- Linke, Lilo. Books of, noticed..... 887
- Lipsky, George A. Books of, reviewed... 851
- Lipson, Leslie. Books of, noticed..... 1207
- Lissitzyn, Oliver J. Book reviews..... 851
- Litchfield, Edward H., et al. Books of, reviewed..... 220
- Livingston, William S. Book reviews... 214
- Lockard, W. Duane. Legislative Politics in Connecticut..... 166
- Lockwood, William W. Book reviews... 1162
- Books of, noticed..... 1185
- Longrigg, Stephen Hemsley. Books of, noticed..... 1197
- Lowie, Robert H. Books of, noticed..... 1184
- Lukacs, John A. Books of, noticed..... 591
- Mabileau, Albert. Books of, noticed..... 578
- McCamy, James L. and Corradini, Alessandro. The People of the State Department and Foreign Service..... 1067
- McCloskey, Robert G. Books of, noticed. 875
- McClosky, Herbert. Book notes..... 884
- McConnell, Grant. Books of, noted.... 568
- McCormick, Richard P. Books of, noticed..... 874
- McCoy, Charles N. R. The Logical and the Real in Political Theory: Plato, Aristotle, and Marx..... 1058
- Macdonald, Austin F. Books of, noticed. 887
- Macdonald, H. Malcolm. Book notes.... 248
- Machlup, Fritz. Books of, noticed... 241, 269
- Mack, Robert T., Jr. Books of, reviewed. 548
- Macmahon, Arthur W. Books of, reviewed..... 551
- Macpherson, C. B. World Trends in Political Science Research..... 427
- Books of, noted..... 883
- Macridis, Roy C. Book notes..... 906
- Mangone, Gerard J. Books of, noted... 896
- Manning, Clarence A. Books of, noticed. 591
- Mansergh, Nicholas. Books of, noticed... 260
- Mansfield, Harvey C. Book reviews.... 1155
- Martin, Roscoe C. Book notes..... 1172
- Masaldan, P. N. Books of, noted..... 883
- Mason, Alpheus Thomas. Books of, noticed..... 239
- Maurois, André. Books of, noticed.... 1207
- Mead, Margaret. Books of, noticed.... 1184
- Books of, reviewed..... 854
- Meisel, James H. Book notes..... 598, 1205
- Meissner, Boris. Books of, noticed..... 1197
- Mendel, Douglas H., Jr. Revisionist Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan..... 766
- Merriam, Charles E. Books of, noticed.. 1173
- Merriam, Robert E. Books of, noticed.. 1173
- Merton, Robert K., et al. Books of, noticed..... 252
- METHODOLOGY. Davies, James C. Charisma in the 1952 Campaign..... 1083
- Shapley, L. S. and Shubik, Martin. A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System..... 787
- Book notes..... 600
- Book notices..... 907
- Métraux, Rhoda. Books of, noticed.... 1184
- Meyer, Alfred G. Book reviews..... 1160
- Books of, noticed..... 590
- MIDDLE EAST. Book notices..... 579, 1197
- Millett, John D. Books of, noticed..... 1173
- Millikan, Max. Books of, noted..... 238
- Ministry of Information and Broadcasting (India). Books of, noticed..... 251

- Monnerot, Jules. Books of, reviewed.... 223
- Moore, Barrington, Jr. Books of, reviewed..... 1159
- Morris, Christopher. Books of, noted.... 906
- Mosher, Frederick C. Books of, reviewed. 1155
- MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT. Book notes....
- 569, 1169
- Book notices..... 240, 874, 1174
- Book reviews on: Woodbury, Coleman
- . (ed.). The Future of Cities and Urban
- Redevelopment*..... 1153
- Urban Redevelopment..... 1153
- Musolf, Lloyd D. Books of, noted..... 564
- Myers, Denys P. Book notes..... 565
- National Diet Library (Tokyo). Books of,
- noticed..... 886
- NATIONALISM. Coleman, James S. Na-
- tionalism in Tropical Africa..... 404
- Book notices..... 589
- Book reviews on: Deutsch, Karl W. Na-
- tionalism and Social Communication*. 554
- Holland, William L. (ed.). Asian Na-
- tionalism and the West*..... 218
- NATURAL RESOURCES. Zimmermann, Fred-
- erick L. and Wendell, Mitchell. Re-
- presentation of the Region in Missouri
- Basin Organization..... 152
- Book notices..... 570
- Book reviews on: Leuchtenberg, Wil-
- liam Edward. Flood Control Politics. 560
- Neill, Thomas P. Books of, reviewed.... 857
- Nemzer, Louis. Book reviews..... 1156
- Neustadt, Richard E. Presidency and
- Legislation: The Growth of Central
- Clearance..... 641
- Nevins, Allan. Books of, noticed.... 241, 1173
- Newsam, Sir Frank. Books of, noticed... 1183
- North, Robert C. Books of, reviewed.... 546
- Nourse, Edwin G. Books of, reviewed... 234
- Nussbaum, Arthur. Books of, noticed... 589
- Office of Supervisor of Government Pub-
- lications (Ottawa). Books of, noticed 578
- Olzog, Günter. Books of, noticed..... 269
- Opie, Redvers. Books of, reviewed..... 548
- Orfield, Lester Bernhardt. Books of, no-
- ticed..... 886
- Örvik, Nils. Books of, noticed..... 589
- Osborne, Harold. Books of, noticed.... 887
- Osgood, Robert Endicott. Books of, re-
- viewed..... 544
- Ostrom, Vincent. Books of, noticed.... 874
- Overstreet, Gene D. Book notes..... 883
- Oxnam, G. Bromley. Books of noticed... 1173
- Padelford, Norman J. Book reviews.... 544
- Padover, Saul K. Books of, noticed.... 1184
- Palmer, Norman D. Book notes..... 896
- PARAGUAY. Book notices..... 887
- Pate, James E. Books of, noticed..... 1173
- Patterson, Caleb Perry. Books of, re-
- viewed..... 227
- Patterson, Edwin W. Books of, noticed.. 241
- Pelling, Henry. Books of, noticed..... 889
- Peltason, Jack W. Book reviews..... 849
- Pelzel, John C. Books of, noticed..... 1185
- Pendle, George. Books of, noticed..... 887
- Pennington, D. H. Books of, noticed.... 1183
- Pennock, J. Roland. Book notes..... 576, 882
- Pfeffer, Leo. Books of, reviewed..... 556
- Pfiffner, John M. Books of, noticed.... 240
- Philip, Kjeld. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- PHILIPPINES. Gosnell, Harold F. An In-
- terpretation of the Philippine Elec-
- tion of 1953..... 1128
- Book notices..... 1185
- Phillips, William. Books of, noticed.... 261
- Piquet, Howard S. Books of, noticed.... 241
- Plischke, Elmer. Books of, noticed.... 261
- Plönees, Bartho. Books of, noticed..... 888
- POLITICAL LEADERSHIP. Davies, James C.
- Charisma in the 1952 Campaign.... 1083
- Holt, Robert T. Age as a Factor in
- the Recruitment of Communist Lead-
- ership..... 486
- Book notices..... 241
- Book reviews on: Dauer, Manning J.
- The Adams Federalists*..... 856
- POLITICAL PARTIES. Epstein, Leon D.
- Politics of British Conservatism.... 27
- Holt, Robert T. Age as a Factor in
- the Recruitment of Communist Lead-
- ership..... 486
- Keefe, William J. Parties, Partisan-
- ship, and Public Policy in the Penn-
- sylvanian Legislature..... 450
- Key, V. O., Jr. The Direct Primary
- and Party Structure: A Study of
- State Legislative Nominations..... 1
- Lockard, W. Duane. Legislative Poli-
- tics in Connecticut..... 166
- Ranney, Austin and Kendall, Will-
- moore. The American Party Systems 477
- Roady, Elston E. Florida's New
- Campaign Expense Law and the 1952
- Democratic Gubernatorial Primaries 465
- Sorauf, Frank J. Extra-Legal Politi-
- cal Parties in Wisconsin..... 692
- Book notes..... 568, 882, 883, 1171
- Book notices..... 578, 889, 1172
- Book reviews on: Bulmer-Thomas,
- Ivor. The Party System in Great
- Britain*..... 214

- Butler, D. E. The Electoral System in Britain, 1918-1951..... 214
- Dauer, Manning J. The Adams Federalists..... 856
- POLITICAL SCIENCE. Bunche, Ralph J. Presidential Address..... 961
- Hacker, Andrew. Capital and Carbuncles: The "Great Books" Reappraised..... 775
- Macpherson, C. B. World Trends in Political Science Research..... 427
- Book notes..... 269
- Book notices..... 269, 601, 1207
- POLITICAL THEORY. Aspaturian, Vernon V. The Contemporary Doctrine of the Soviet State and Its Philosophical Foundations..... 1301
- Hacker, Andrew. Capital and Carbuncles: The "Great Books" Reappraised..... 775
- Kissinger, Henry A. The Conservative Dilemma: Reflections on the Political Thought of Metternich.... 1017
- McCoy, Charles N. R. The Logical and the Real in Political Theory: Plato, Aristotle, and Marx..... 1058
- Spitz, David. Democracy and the Problem of Civil Disobedience..... 386
- Wilson, Francis G. Public Opinion and the Intellectuals..... 321
- Wolin, Sheldon S. Hume and Conservatism..... 999
- Book notes..... 268, 598, 905, 906, 1204, 1205, 1206
- Book notices..... 269, 601, 906, 907, 908, 1206, 1207
- Book reviews on: Deutsch, Karl W. Nationalism and Social Communication..... 554
- Levinson, Ronald B. In Defense of Plato..... 859
- Neill, Thomas P. The Rise and Decline of Liberalism..... 857
- Patterson, Caleb Perry. The Constitutional Principles of Thomas Jefferson..... 227
- Pfeffer, Leo. Church, State, and Freedom..... 556
- Rossiter, Clinton. Seedtime of the Republic..... 212
- Strauss, Leo. Natural Right and History..... 538
- Wild, John. Plato's Modern Enemies and the Theory of Natural Law..... 859
- Pollock, James K. Books of, noticed.... 250
- Poore, Ben Perley. Books of, noticed.... 1172
- Possony, Stefan T. Books of, noticed.... 1197
- PRESS. Book notices..... 570
- Presthus, R. Vance. Books of, noticed... 240
- Pritchett, C. Herman. Book reviews.... 562
- Books of, reviewed..... 849
- PSYCHOLOGY. Book notes..... 600
- PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION. Cook, Virginia G. State Cooperation in Enforcement of the Federal Wage-Hour Law..... 721
- Gross, Bertram M. and Lewis, John P. The President's Economic Staff During the Truman Administration. 114
- Harris, Joseph P. and Davis, Kenneth Culp. "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration": An Exchange..... 174
- McCamy, James L. and Corradini, Alessandro. The People of the State Department and Foreign Service.... 1067
- Neustadt, Richard E. Presidency and Legislation: The Growth of Central Clearance..... 641
- Redford, Emmette S. The Protection of the Public Interest with Special Reference to Administrative Regulation..... 1103
- Riggs, Fred W. Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration..... 515
- Somers, Herman Miles. The Federal Bureaucracy and the Change of Administration..... 131
- Wilson, Francis G. Public Opinion and the Intellectuals..... 321
- Book notes..... 576, 1171
- Book notices..... 240, 252, 1173, 1183
- Book reviews on: Friedrich, C. J. and Galbraith, J. K. (eds.). Public Policy. 562
- Macmahon, Arthur W. Administration in Foreign Affairs..... 551
- Mosher, Frederick C. Program Budgeting..... 1155
- Nourse, Edwin G. Economics in the Public Service..... 234
- Richards, Allan R. War Labor Boards in the Field..... 870
- PUBLIC OPINION. Mendel, Douglas H., Jr. Revisionist Opinion in Post-Treaty Japan..... 766
- Book notes..... 600
- Book notices..... 262, 570, 874
- PUBLIC REGULATION. Cook, Virginia G. State Cooperation in Enforcement of the Federal Wage-Hour Law..... 721

- Harbison, Frederick H. and Spencer, Robert C. The Politics of Collective Bargaining: The Postwar Record in Steel..... 705
- Redford, Emmette S. The Protection of the Public Interest with Special Reference to Administrative Regulation..... 1103
- Book notes..... 238, 873, 1170
- Book notices..... 241, 908
- Book reviews on: Dahl, Robert A. and Lindblom, Charles E. Politics, Economics, and Welfare..... 558
- Quinn, T. K. Books of, reviewed..... 228
- Quint, Howard H. Books of, noticed..... 570
- Rackow, Felix. Book notes..... 873
- Ranney, Austin. Books of, noted..... 882
- and Kendall, Willmoore. The American Party Systems..... 477
- Redford, Emmette S. (ed.). Book Reviews, Notes, and Bibliography..... 186, 514, 825, 1139
- The Protection of the Public Interest with Special Reference to Administrative Regulation..... 1103
- RESEARCH. Macpherson, C. B. World Trends in Political Science Research. 427
- Rourke, Francis, E. Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science..... 793
- Book notices..... 898
- Reshetar, John S., Jr. Book reviews..... 1164
- Rich, S. Grover, Jr. Book notes..... 1193
- Richards, Allan R. Books of, reviewed.... 870
- Richmond, Admiral Sir Herbert. Books of, noticed..... 250
- Riesman, David. Books of, noticed..... 269, 1206
- Riggs, Fred W. Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration..... 515
- Riksdagsbiblioteket* (Sweden). Books of, noticed..... 885
- Ritcheson, Charles R. Books of, noticed... 1183
- Rivlin, Benjamin. A Selective Survey of the Literature in the Social Sciences and Related Fields on Modern North Africa..... 826
- Roady, Elston E. Florida's New Campaign Expense Law and the 1952 Democratic Gubernatorial Primaries..... 465
- Roberts, William H. Articles and Documents on Foreign and Comparative Government..... 252, 580, 889, 1186
- Roche, John P. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Rodick, Burleigh Cushing. Books of, noted..... 567
- Rolland, Romain. Books of, noticed..... 1207
- Romani, John H. Books of, noticed..... 1185
- Rossiter, Clinton. Books of, reviewed.... 212
- Rostow, W. W. Books of, reviewed..... 541
- Rourke, Francis E. Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science..... 793
- Roussier, Michel. Books of, noticed..... 588
- Ruchames, Louis. Books of, noted..... 873
- RUSSIA. Book notes..... 577, 884
- Book notices..... 250, 262, 580, 590, 591, 888, 1186, 1197
- Book reviews on: Fainsod, Merle. How Russia Is Ruled..... 541
- Hazard, John N. Law and Social Change in the U.S.S.R...... 541
- Moore, Barrington, Jr. Terror and Progress USSR..... 1159
- Rostow, W. W. The Dynamics of Soviet Society..... 541
- SAAR. Book notices..... 579
- Sallet, Richard. Books of, noticed..... 261
- Savastano, Luigi. Books of, noticed..... 1207
- Saville, Russell. Books of, noticed..... 874
- Sayre, Wallace S. Book reviews..... 1167
- Scalapino, Robert A. "Neutralism" in Asia..... 49
- Schleicher, Charles P. Books of, noticed... 1196
- Schlesinger, Rudolf. Books of, noticed.... 579
- Schram, Stuart R. Books of, noticed..... 1184
- Scott, Robert E. Book notes..... 1181
- Seckler-Hudson, Catheryn. Books of, noticed..... 240
- Selvin, Hanan C., et al. Books of, noticed 252
- Shapley, L. S. and Shubik, Martin. A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System 787
- Sharp, Walter R. Book reviews..... 548
- Shields, Currin V. Book reviews..... 857
- Shubik, Martin and Shapley, L. S. A Method for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System 787
- Sibley, Mulford Q. Book reviews..... 556
- Silverman, Corinne and Garceau, Oliver. A Pressure Group and the Pressured: A Case Report..... 672
- Simon, Herbert A. Articles and Documents on Methodology and Research in the Social Sciences. 275, 608, 915, 1214
- Slusser, Robert. Books of, noticed..... 590
- SOCIALISM. Book notices... 570, 601, 906, 1207
- SOCIOLOGY. Book notices..... 241, 570, 578
- Book reviews on: Hunter, Floyd. Com-

- munity Power Structure*..... 235
- Somers, Herman Miles. The Federal Bureaucracy and the Change of Administration..... 131
- Sorauf, Frank J. Extra-Legal Political Parties in Wisconsin..... 692
- Spain, James W. Military Assistance for Pakistan..... 738
- Spencer, Robert C. and Harbison, Frederick H. The Politics of Collective Bargaining: The Postwar Record in Steel..... 705
- Spiro, Herbert J. Co-Determination in Germany..... 1114
- Spitz, David. Democracy and the Problem of Civil Disobedience..... 386
- Staley, Eugene. Books of, reviewed..... 853
- Stanner, W. E. H. Books of, noticed..... 262
- STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Burdine, J. Alton. Basic Materials for the Study of State Constitutions and State Constitutional Development..... 1140
- Garceau, Oliver and Silverman, Corinne. A Pressure Group and the Pressured: A Case Report..... 672
- Keefe, William J. Parties, Partisanship, and Public Policy in the Pennsylvania Legislature..... 450
- Key, V. O., Jr. The Direct Primary and Party Structure: A Study of State Legislative Nominations..... 1
- Lockard, W. Duane. Legislative Politics in Connecticut..... 166
- Roady, Elston E. Florida's New Campaign Expense Law and the 1952 Democratic Gubernatorial Primaries..... 465
- Sorauf, Frank J. Extra-Legal Political Parties in Wisconsin..... 692
- Book notices..... 240, 570, 874, 875, 1172, 1173
- Book reviews on: Zeller, Belle (ed.). American State Legislatures..... 865
- Statistiska Centralbyran* (Stockholm). Books of, noticed..... 886
- Stebbins, Richard P. Books of, noticed..... 261
- Stedman, Murray S. Books of, noticed..... 1182
- Stein, Gunther. Books of, noticed..... 589
- Steiner, H. Arthur. Articles and Documents on International Law and Relations..... 263, 591, 898, 1198
- Stern, H. Peter. Books of, noticed..... 591
- Stocking, George W. Book reviews..... 228
- Stokes, William S. Book notes..... 1181
- Stourzh, Gerald. Books of, noted..... 1192
- Strauss, Leo. Books of, reviewed..... 538
- Strausz-Hupé, Robert. Books of, noticed..... 1197
- Street, H. Books of, noted..... 576
- Strong, Donald S. Book notes..... 568
- Book reviews..... 235
- Sturm, Albert L. (ed.). News and Notes..... 279, 612, 917, 1221
- Sullivan, John. Books of, noticed..... 570
- SWEDEN. Book notices..... 885, 886, 1184
- Sweet-Escott, Bickham. Books of, noticed..... 889
- Sweezy, Paul M. Books of, noticed..... 601
- Swift, Richard N. Book notes..... 896
- SWITZERLAND. Book notices..... 579, 1184
- Taborsky, Eduard. Book notes..... 260
- Takeuchi, Tatsuji. Book notes..... 587
- Tate, H. Clay. Books of, noticed..... 1174
- Teng, Ssu-yü. Books of, noticed..... 1197
- Thomas, Homer. Books of, noticed..... 250
- Thomas, M. Ladd. Books of, noticed..... 1185
- Thomas, Norman. Books of, noticed..... 874
- Thompson, Faith. Books of, noticed..... 1183
- Thompson, Kenneth W. Books of, noticed..... 601
- Thorelli, Sarah V. Books of, noticed..... 1184
- Thornton, Willis. Books of, noticed..... 1174
- Tomasie, Dinko. Books of, noticed..... 250
- Towster, Julian. Book reviews..... 1159
- Trewin, J. C. Books of, noted..... 249
- Tunc, André R. Book notes..... 268
- Books of, noticed..... 1173
- Tunc, Suzanne. Books of, noticed..... 1173
- Turner, John E. Book reviews..... 218
- UKRAINE. Book notices..... 591
- UNITED NATIONS. Chamberlin, Waldo and Clark, Hartley. Materials for Undergraduate Study of the United Nations..... 204
- Book notices..... 262
- UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY. Braibanti, Ralph. The Ryukyu Islands: Pawn of the Pacific..... 972
- McCamy, James L. and Corradini, Alessandro. The People of the State Department and Foreign Service..... 1067
- Spain, James W. Military Assistance for Pakistan..... 738
- Book notes..... 257, 1192, 1193, 1195
- Book notices..... 261, 589, 897, 1196, 1197
- Book reviews on: Brown, William Adams and Opie, Redvers. American Foreign Assistance..... 548
- Feis, Herbert. The China Tangle..... 216
- Osgood, Robert Endicott. Ideals and Self-Interest in America's Foreign Relations..... 544
- UNITED STATES NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

- AND POLITICS. Gross, Bertram M. and Lewis, John P. The President's Economic Staff During the Truman Administration..... 114
- Huitt, Ralph K. The Congressional Committee: A Case Study..... 340
- McCamy, James L. and Corradini, Alessandro. The People of the State Department and Foreign Service... 1067
- Neustadt, Richard E. Presidency and Legislation: The Growth of Central Clearance..... 641
- Somers, Herman Miles. The Federal Bureaucracy and the Change of Administration..... 131
- Book notes..... 238, 565, 566, 567, 568, 872
- Book notices... 569, 570, 874, 875, 1172, 1173
- Book reviews on: Bontecou, Eleanor. The Federal Loyalty-Security Program 225
- Cahn, Edmond (ed.). Supreme Court and Supreme Law..... 1165
- Harris, Joseph P. The Advice and Consent of the Senate..... 553
- LaFollette, Bella Case and LaFollette, Fola. Robert M. LaFollette... 1167
- Macmahon, Arthur W. Administration in Foreign Affairs..... 551
- Nourse, Edwin G. Economics in the Public Service..... 234
- Upson, Lent D. Books of, noted..... 1171
- Upthegrove, Campbell L. Books of, noticed..... 897
- URUGUAY. Vanger, Milton I. Uruguay Introduces Government by Committee..... 500
- Book notes..... 1181
- Van Aduard, Baron E. J. Lewe. Books of, noted..... 1195
- Vanger, Milton I. Uruguay Introduces Government by Committee..... 500
- Van Klaveren, J. J. Books of, noticed... 590
- Van Raalte, E. Books of, noticed..... 886
- Veale, F. J. P. Books of, noticed..... 897
- Vernant, Jacques. Books of, noticed.... 590
- Voegelin, Eric. Book reviews..... 859
- Von Klass, Gert. Books of, noticed..... 888
- Vieg, John A. Book reviews..... 551
- Vilela, Arturo. Books of, noted..... 1181
- Books of, noticed..... 887
- Waldo, Dwight. Book notes..... 576
- Walker, Richard Louis. Books of, noticed 588
- Warne, J. D. Books of, noticed..... 1196
- Warner, W. Lloyd. Books of, noticed... 241, 570
- Warth, Robert D. Books of, noticed..... 591
- Wechsler, Herbert. Books of, noticed.... 241
- Weeks, O. Douglas. Book notes..... 566
- Books of, noted..... 568
- Wehle, Louis B. Books of, noted..... 872
- Weldon, T. D. Books of, noted..... 1206
- Wendell, Mitchell and Zimmermann, Frederick L. Representation of the Region in Missouri Basin Organization..... 152
- Wengert, Egbert S. Book reviews..... 225
- Wheeler, Harvey. Book notes..... 1205
- Wheeler-Bennett, John W. Books of, reviewed..... 563
- White, Leonard D. Books of, noticed.... 240
- Wild, John. Books of, reviewed..... 859
- Wildes, Harry Emerson. Books of, noticed..... 1198
- Williams, John R. Book notes..... 1180
- Wilson, Francis G. Articles and Documents on Political Theory..... 269, 602, 908, 1208
- Public Opinion and the Intellectuals..... 321
- Wilson, H. H. Books of, noticed..... 1196
- Wolin, Sheldon S. Hume and Conservatism..... 999
- Woodbury, Coleman. Books of, reviewed..... 1153
- Woodruff, Philip. Books of, noticed..... 888
- Woolf, Leonard. Books of, noted..... 1206
- Wormuth, Francis D. Book notes..... 1171
- Woytinski, E. S. Books of, noticed..... 261
- Woytinski, W. S. Books of, noticed.... 261
- Wright, Quincy. Books of, noted..... 896
- Young, Roland and Liebenow, J. Gus, Jr. Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa..... 187
- YUGOSLAVIA. Book reviews on: Dragnich, Alex N. Tito's Promised Land..... 1157
- Zeller, Belle. Book notes..... 238
- Books of, reviewed..... 865
- Zimmermann, Frederick L. and Wendell, Mitchell. Representation of the Region in Missouri Basin Organization 152
- Zink, Harold. Book reviews..... 220

Two Brand-New Texts

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN AMERICA

Jewell Cass Phillips, University of Pennsylvania

This important book provides a thorough treatment of the most significant aspects of state and local government. The historical development of local government units is discussed in detail. Local-state-national co-operation in the field of local-state government services is emphasized. Careful examination is given the proper techniques and accurate measurement standards involved in solving the problems of government reform.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION Principles and Problems

James E. Pate, College of William and Mary

Helping every student to become an informed and active citizen of his community, this book lays the foundation for future work in the field of local government. It traces the historical development of legal and political foundations, describes intergovernmental relations, and examines current problems of local government and administration.

Two Widely Used Texts

THE GREAT POWERS AND EASTERN EUROPE

John A. Lukacs, Chestnut Hill College and LaSalle College

"The author has a dramatic sense and a lively style. . . . His account is generally impartial scholarly, and based on a very wide reading of documents and memoirs. . . ."

—Sidney B. Fay, Harvard University

ROOTS OF POLITICAL BEHAVIOR Introduction to Government and Politics

Richard Carlton Snyder and H. Hubert Wilson, Princeton University

"This is a volume political scientists are forced to examine, to weigh, and to consider. It provides live material for the younger citizen seeking a better understanding of the force underlying political institutions."

—Lashely G. Harvey, Boston University

American Book Company

COLLEGE DIVISION, 55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 3, N.Y.

CINCINNATI • CHICAGO • ATLANTA • DALLAS • SAN FRANCISCO

Books from Chicago

The Moral Foundation of Democracy

By JOHN M. HALLOWELL. A distinguished political scientist issues a grave warning that the real threat to democracy is internal—a betrayal in the minds and hearts of our citizens of the faith which gives it life. Democracy must find the basis for its continued life in a new liberalism which has a balanced view of man. $3.50

Britain—Uneasy Ally

By LEON D. EPSTEIN. An incisive analysis of Britain's national attitudes toward American foreign policy which suggests ways and means of settling a number of pressing problems, and points to ways of anticipating Britain's often ambivalent reactions to our actions abroad. $4.00

Voting

A STUDY OF OPINION FORMATION DURING A PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

By BERNARD R. BERELSON, PAUL F. LAZARSFELD, and WILLIAM N. MCPHEE. Prior to the 1948 election, a corps of social scientists moved into the vicinity of Elmira, New York, to get the answers to such perennial questions as: Why do people vote the way they do? How do social class, family loyalties, and business connections affect their vote? When do they make up their minds? What they learned, and how they learned it, makes one of the most fascinating books that has appeared in recent years. $7.50

People of Plenty

ECONOMIC ABUNDANCE AND THE AMERICAN CHARACTER

By DAVID M. POTTER. Economic abundance, more than any other single factor, has distinguished America from other countries and left its mark upon the character of the people. Professor Potter's lucid and witty study breaks new ground, bringing a historical perspective to bear upon the work of Margaret Mead, David Riesman, and Karen Horney. $3.50

Interviewing in Social Research

By HERBERT H. HYMAN. With CLYDE W. HART, WILLIAM J. COBB, JACOB J. FELDMAN, and CHARLES HERBERT STEMBER. The result of a four-year investigation conducted by the National Opinion Research Center. This work is concerned with the systematic analysis of sources of error in research studies using the method of personal interviewing. $8.00

The American Lawyer

A SUMMARY OF THE SURVEY OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION

By ALBERT P. BLAUSTEIN and CHARLES O. PORTER. With CHARLES T. DUNCAN. Foreword by REGINALD HEBER SMITH. Distills from the many reports and bulky library volumes of the vast four-year Survey of the Legal Profession a candid picture of the practice of law and its practitioners in the forty-eight states. $5.50

At your bookstore, or from

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5750 Ellis Avenue, Chicago 37, Ill.

THE LEGAL COMMUNITY OF MANKIND

A Critical Analysis of the Modern Concept of World Organization

WALTER SCHIFFER. A study of the attempts—theoretical and practical—to establish a legal framework for international organization. The intention is to encourage—to force—men of good will to be also men of clear vision. At a time when revision of the United Nations Charter is under discussion, this distinguished critical survey will be an important and vital contribution to realistic judgment. $5.50

A HALF CENTURY OF INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS

A Lawyer's Views

FREDERIC R. COUDERT. Edited by ALLAN NEVINS; with an Introduction by PHILIP JESSUP. Mr. Coudert's opinions, often given in the heat of crisis, offer profound insights into law and change; problems of an American Empire; judicial reform, true and false; arbitration, international law, and world peace; neutral America, 1914-17; the League of Nations. $4.00

A HISTORY OF THE FACULTY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE, Columbia University

R. GORDON HOXIE and others. This volume presents not only the history of a pioneer graduate faculty of the political and social sciences and the first graduate faculty at Columbia University, but also the role of that faculty in Columbia's transformation from a college to a university. The Bicentennial History of Columbia University. $4.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
MORNINGSIDE HEIGHTS NEW YORK 27

FOR JANUARY PUBLICATION . . .

THEORY and PRACTICE of AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

GORDON & VINES

SIXTY-FIVE READINGS

presenting a balanced and thorough treatment of the problems and functions of American foreign policy.

1. PATTERNS IN INTERNATIONAL POLITICS
2. THE AMERICAN APPROACH TO INTERNATIONAL POLITICS
3. FORCES THAT SHAPE DECISIONS
4. THE FORMATION OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY
5. THE EXPRESSION OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY
6. THE CONTEMPORARY DESIGN OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

January, 1955 562 pages 5 $\frac{5}{8}$ x 8 $\frac{3}{8}$ Hard cover \$2.95

SOVIET POWER and POLICY

HUSZAR & ASSOCIATES

Basic information on Soviet Russia's geography, population, industry, agriculture, economic planning, transportation, political and administrative structure, ideology, education, police apparatus, armed forces, trade, and foreign policy.

Since no one person can discuss with authority the several phases of Soviet power and the Kremlin's policy of expansion, this volume is a cooperative venture in which a specialist discusses each aspect of Soviet power and expansion.

January, 1955 598 pages 6 x 9 $6.50

Thomas Y. Crowell Co.

432 Fourth Avenue
New York 16, N.Y.

Announcing
The Fourth Edition of a Standard Text

Bates and Field's
STATE GOVERNMENT

By PRESSLY S. SIKES and JOHN E. STONER
Indiana University

For more than a quarter of a century this text has been known as one of the most successful texts available for college courses in American State and Local Government, and each edition has been more widely used than the preceding one. Some 300 colleges and universities have now adopted it in one or more editions.

An up-to-date edition of the text will therefore be welcomed by college teachers, especially since governmental adjustments have been proceeding at an accelerated pace in the last few years, under the pressures of the "cold" war.

The present revision has been made in the light of these changes. The authors have refocused emphasis at many points, and have described and discussed new functions, activities, and undertakings of government at both state and local levels. The revision has been carried out without altering the basic organization of the text. Clear and concise exposition is still a major feature of the work, and it is still an outstandingly "teachable" text.

690 pages

$6.00

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

49 East 33d Street

New York 16, New York

YANKEE REFORMERS IN THE URBAN AGE

By ARTHUR MANN. What groups were sensitive to the social problems of the last quarter of the 19th century, why did they care, and what did they do about them? Here is a study of the moral conscience of one city—Boston—showing the reactions of each social, racial, and religious group to the social and economic inequalities brought about by growing urbanization and industrialization. "Must reading for . . . anyone wishing to understand the assets and liabilities of the reform ethos of the eighties and nineties."—C. Wright Mills, N. Y. Times Book Review. A Belknap Press Book. $5.00

CONSTRUCTIVE LIBERALISM

THE ROLE OF THE STATE IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN GEORGIA TO 1860

By MILTON SYDNEY HEATH. A study of early intervention by the state and local government of Georgia into economic affairs (1732-1860). The greatest attention is paid to land policy, human resources, commerce and industry, money and banking, internal improvements, railroads, regulation, taxes, and public debts. By showing the legislative, administrative, and judicial actions of the government, this book contributes greatly to an understanding of American economic enterprise. A Study in Economic History. $7.50

THE STRUCTURE AND GOVERNMENT OF LABOR UNIONS

By PHILIP TAFT. A thorough study of American unions, devoid of both unreasoning fright and undue optimism, showing the interrelations between these organizations and their membership, and illuminating several misconceptions concerning: the influence of Communism . . . the lack of freedom . . . rigidity of discipline . . . the question of appeals . . . increasing centralization of power. By the author of The History of Labor in the United States, 1896-1932. A Wertheim Publication in Industrial Relations. $6.00

THE FRENCH LABOR MOVEMENT

By VAL R. LORWIN. A full and revealing picture of "unions in crisis" in a "democracy in crisis." Their history and development; what they are today; how they function; their relations to French politics and to the Communist party. The trade unions play a critical role in the politics and economy of France, and this book sheds new light on many perplexing aspects of French national and international affairs. A Wertheim Publication in Industrial Relations. Coming January 21. $6.00

Through your bookseller or order from

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Publishers of HARVARD GUIDE TO AMERICAN HISTORY, $10.00
44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

THE LAW OF PRIMITIVE MAN

A STUDY IN COMPARATIVE LEGAL DYNAMICS

E. ADAMSON HOEBEL begins his book with a working definition of law among primitive peoples and with a discussion of the principles and methods of anthropological work in this area. Then, concentrating on five distinctive societies, he describes the dynamics of legal conflict and the methods of settlement as these are revealed in human behavior in a host of real cases. Mr. Hoebel also enlarges on the general nature, functions, and evolution of the law in the light of the evidence given by primitive folk-ways. $5.50

LAW AND MORALITY: LEON PETRAZHITSKY

Translated by Hugh W. Babb, with a Introduction by Nicholas S. Timasheff. Petrazhitsky was the most eminent of the Russian legal philosophers of the early 20th century. Here, for the first time in English, is his constructive and original thought on the central problem of the philosophy of law: the relationship of law and morals. Here also is his new logical methodology, with particular reference to the formation of class concepts and their scientific productivity. 20th Century Legal Philosophy Series. Coming January 20. $7.50

SOVIET INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION, 1928-1951

By DONALD R. HODGMAN. The Russians claim that their planned economy is the most efficient ever developed. By using a new index that measures Soviet production far more accurately than has been possible heretofore, the author presents a comprehensive analysis of their actual achievements. Appendices contain detailed physical output data; an explanation of the author's statistical procedures; and the latest data on 1952-53 production. Russian Research Center Studies, 15. $5.00

THE MAIN STREAM OF JACOBITISM

By GEORGE HILTON JONES. A narrative of Jacobite activities from the overthrow of James II in 1689 to the defeat of the Young Pretender at Culloden in 1746. The history of Jacobitism is one of rebellion and intrigue, and this study clarifies and supplies new information on: the part played by the Jacobites in European diplomacy; in important crises in England (such as the South Sea Bubble); in English political ideas . . . and presents new viewpoints on the Old Pretender; the Duke of Marlborough; Viscount Bolingbroke; and the Young Pretender, Bonnie Prince Charlie. $4.50

At your bookseller, or order from

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Publishers of HARVARD GUIDE TO AMERICAN HISTORY, $10.00
44 FRANCIS AVENUE, CAMBRIDGE 38, MASSACHUSETTS

A New Publication

CAPITOL, COURTHOUSE AND CITY HALL

READINGS IN AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Edited by Robert L. Morlan

And Established Texts

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Norman D. Palmer

Howard C. Perkins

ORGANIZING FOR PEACE

Daniel S. Cheever

H. Field Haviland, Jr.

From Houghton Mifflin Company

For introductory courses in American Government

THE FERGUSON AND McHENRY TEXTS

All New Editions in the McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science

By John H. Ferguson, The Pennsylvania State University and Dean E. McHenry, University of California at Los Angeles

Second Edition . . . ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Elements of American Government, 660 pages, $5.00, covers simply and briefly the entire field of American Government—federal, state, and local. It is designed to supply information, focus attention on current questions of public policy, and stimulate interest in government affairs. The second edition is thoroughly revised to include the latest information on such topics as reorganization, civil rights, immigration and naturalization, military justice, loyalty review for civil servants, powers of the President, and government and business.

Third Edition . . . THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

The American System of Government, 1056 pages, $6.00, is an exceptional revision of a major work offering a full and complete treatment of American Government. The first part, on federal government, is made up of general principles of political science, ideas and institutions throughout American history, the Constitution, the federal system comprised of congress, the executive branch, and the courts, and national powers and functions. The last part takes account of state and local governments, their constitutions, charters, legislative bodies, executives, selected functions, and problems.

Third Edition . . . THE AMERICAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

The American Federal Government, 902 pages, $5.50, is a revised and up-to-date edition for those who wish a separate coverage of only national government institutions and functions. Presentation is simplified and clarified, and a better integration of treatment of powers and functions is achieved. Recent trends are pointed out, and the activities of the United Nations are emphasized.

CORRELATED TEXT-FILM FILMSTRIPS SERIES available. Presented in a concentrated, attention-compelling form, these films serve as valuable amplification to class lectures. Charts, diagrams, and graphs have been combined with carefully prepared captions to make each strip vivid, thought-provoking and lucid.

McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc.

330 West 42nd Street

New York 36, N.Y.

Send for copies on approval

An Announcement of Forthcoming texts from OXFORD

FEBRUARY, 1955

Marxism and Democracy

By H. B. MAYO, University of Alberta

With a foreword by Walter Bedell Smith

SPRING, 1955

Principles and Problems of American National Government

Second Edition, completely revised and reset

By JOHN M. SWARTHOUT, Oregon State College
and ERNEST R. BARTLEY, University of Florida

Authors of Materials on American National Government

589 pp.

1952

$2.95

ALREADY PUBLISHED

Elements of Democratic Government, 2nd Edition

By J. A. CORRY, Queen's University, Canada. This recently revised introductory text provides the student with a clear, comparative picture of democratic government at work in America, England and Canada.

672 pp.

1951

$5.00

Further information on these books may be obtained from the College Department

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

114 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. 11

Publishers of Fine Books for Nearly Five Centuries

Prentice-Hall

NEW!

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: INTRODUCTORY ESSAYS AND SELECTED CASES

by ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON and WILLIAM M. BEANEY, both of Princeton University

This new type of casebook contains over 100 selected cases plus special introductory essays that provide historical background for each case. The clash of political and social ideas characterizing leading constitutional decisions is pointed up with unique effectiveness by the representation, for every major case, of concurring and dissenting opinions. Special attention is devoted to outstanding dissenting opinions which have replaced, or exerted strong influence on, later decisions.

669 pages

• 6" x 9" •

Published September 1954

TODAY'S ISMS: COMMUNISM, FASCISM, CAPITALISM, SOCIALISM

by WILLIAM EBENSTEIN, Princeton University

Outstanding Features:

1. Broad Approach—Each of the major issues is analyzed as a way of life, with consideration of economic, political, social and cultural factors and a clear examination of the psychological roots of each system.
2. Integration of Doctrines and Policies—The key ideas of each ism are carefully related to and illustrated by recent and current world events and are examined for their complex effect on national policies and ways of life.
3. Historical Background—Sufficient historical background is included in the text to make clear the ideas and forces out of which today's isms have evolved.

191 pages

• 5 $\frac{5}{8}$ " x 8 $\frac{3}{8}$ " •

Published 1954

For approval copies write

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc. • 70 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 11, N.Y.

New

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY: Formulation, Principles, and Program

RICHARD D. SNYDER, Associate Professor of Politics and Director of the Foreign Policy Analysis Project, Princeton University

EDGAR S. FURNISS, JR., Assistant Professor of Politics, Princeton University

The first book of its kind designed specifically for courses in Political Science, which supplies the necessary historical background (1898 to the present) and provides a framework and method for analysis of the problems confronting the United States as it assumes a new role in world leadership. September publication—845 pages—$7.50.

MODERN POLITICAL THOUGHT

WILLIAM EBENSTEIN, Professor of Politics, Princeton University

The great political ideas from Machiavelli to the present, this text promises to be even more enthusiastically received than the author's MAN AND THE STATE, of which this book is a thorough revision. August publication—806 pages—$7.00.

And forthcoming—early spring

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY IN THEORY AND PRACTICE:

ROBERT K. CARR, Joel Parker, Professor of Law and Political Science, Dartmouth College, Executive Secretary of President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights

MARVER H. BERNSTEIN, Associate Professor of Politics, Princeton University Consultant to Economic Stabilization Administration

DONALD H. MORRISON, Professor of Government and Dean of the Faculty, Dartmouth College, Consultant to The Bureau of the Budget since 1942

RICHARD C. SNYDER, Associate Professor of Politics, and Director of the Foreign Policy Analysis Project, Princeton University

JOSEPH E. McLEAN, Associate Professor of Politics and of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University; Commissioner of Conservation and Economic Development for the State of New Jersey

Our editor sums it up:

"In this complete revision the authors have succeeded in retaining the rich historical and philosophical background of the first edition (the theory) together with the whole dynamic account of government in action (the practice) and doing it all in 35 chapters instead of 49."

Two editions in preparation: AMERICAN NATIONAL AMERICAN NATIONAL, STATE AND LOCAL

Examination copies available upon request from:

RINEHART & CO. 232 Madison Avenue, N.Y. 16

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California; and
R. Vance Presthus, *Michigan State College

Up-to-date Third Edition offers a realistic appraisal of public administration in America and the role it plays in a democratic society. Relates formal organization and the routines of public administration to informal organization and the functioning of administrators. Accenting the human side of organization and management, it sheds light on the nature of group action, individual motivation and leadership. Throughout, public administration is seen as part of a larger social process which includes legislatures, pressure groups, and the separation of powers. Fully discusses the philosophy and goals of public administration. 626 pp.

Fundamentals of Political Science

Edited by Ossip K. Flechtheim, Colby College—with 7 Contributing Authorities

An introductory textbook integrating the entire field of political science. Stressing the historical, philosophical, psychological, and anthropological elements of government and politics, the book surveys, compares, and evaluates the ideas and practices of all major nations.

Throughout, principles and problems rather than institutions and theories are highlighted and illustrated with specific examples. Each area of the subject is analyzed by a specialist adding authority and breadth of coverage. 587 pp.

Federal Administrative Law

Rinehart John Swenson, New York University

Thorough study of the growth, nature, and control of administrative action in the United States. Emphasizing the various forms of administration and the means of their enforcement, the book analyzes the development of the administrative process and shows the need for formalizing administrative action into a coherent body of law supervised by special courts of limited jurisdiction. Consideration is given to the review of administrative action by the regular courts, and the role of Congress in controlling administration. 376 pp.

Judicial Legislation

Fred V. Cahill, Jr., University of Massachusetts

A study in American legal theory which analyzes modern developments in jurisprudence and examines arguments for modifying the law-making function of judges, particularly in the light of significant decisions of the Supreme Court. Discusses these decisions in terms of effect upon social legislation, civil liberties. Presents a balanced survey of legal theory from Holmes to Frankfurter, illustrating the increasing shift from rigid, literal interpretations to a flexible, realistic application of the law. A sound textbook for advanced courses in Constitutional Law, Legal Theory, the Judiciary. 164 pp.

Handbook of Graphic Presentation

Calvin F. Schmid, University of Washington

Detailed working manual for all concerned with the clear presentation and interpretation of statistical data by means of charts and graphs. Shows how complicated data of many kinds can be put into easily intelligible form. Each basic type of statistical chart is analyzed in detail, with particular reference to its advantages and disadvantages in presenting data of different kinds. Profusely illustrated with examples drawn from a wide variety of fields. Includes the first full treatment of three dimensional charts and graphs. 210 ills., tables; 316 pp.

Important historical studies and biographies

SOUTH-EAST ASIA: A SHORT HISTORY

By Brian Harrison. A concise background study of this vital area, showing how it has developed, and the external forces that have shaped that development. "A useful introduction to Southeast Asian history, thoroughly reliable as to sources, compact in its presentation of facts."—Christian Science Monitor. $3.50

AN OUTLINE ATLAS OF EASTERN HISTORY

By R. R. Sellman. An important contribution to the understanding of Eastern affairs by reason of its presentation of the political geography of the East from earliest times. Maps of Eurasia are included for wider comparison, and there are maps of Europe covering the periods of Western impact on the history of the East.

Index, 53 maps, $2.50

THE MEN WHO RULED INDIA

By Philip Woodruff. A brilliant two-volume portrait of the men who conquered, governed, and trained India to take its place in the community of nations.

THE FOUNDERS OF MODERN INDIA extends from 1600 to the Great Mutiny of 1857.

THE GUARDIANS covers the development of modern governmental machinery to the point at which two independent nations emerged.

Illustrated, $5.00 each

BURMA UNDER THE JAPANESE

PICTURES AND PORTRAITS

By Thakin Nu. A revealing picture of the mind and psychology of the Burmese and Asiatic political leaders of today. The Prime Minister of Burma tells a warmly personal narrative of his country's bitter disillusionment with the Japanese occupation and its wartime co-operation with the Allies. A brief history of modern Burma prefaces the book. $3.00

At your bookseller bearing on current international problems . . .

ORIGINS OF THE LABOUR PARTY 1880-1890

By H. M. Pelling. This thoughtful book does more than describe the birth of a political party, it shows the parentage from which that party sprang—discussing in detail the social, religious and economic environment of the movement, and providing a permanent record of the beginnings of working-class democracy in England.

Illustrated, $4.00

HISTORY OF SOCIALIST THOUGHT

By G. D. H. Cole. The first two volumes of an encyclopaedia of socialist ideologies. Volume I, The Forerunners, 1789-1850, deals largely with early French theories, and covers the period from the French Revolution to the Communist Manifesto. Volume II Marxism and Anarchism, 1850-1890, deals with the growth of doctrine in Germany, Belgium and Russia, and continues to the First International and the Paris Commune. The latter part analyzes Marxism and its struggles for control of the working-class, and includes new material on the Socialist movement in America.

Volume I, $5.00; Volume II, $6.00

AN ADVANCED HISTORY OF INDIA

By R. C. Majumdar, Vice-Chancellor, Dacca University. "The best and most comprehensive account of the political development of India . . . its characteristics, clarity of outline, absence of unessential detail and scholarly impartial handling of disputed questions."—Times Literary Supplement. Second edition, 1,122 pages, 11 maps, many illustrations.

$7.00

WARREN HASTINGS

By Keith Feiling. The story of the first British Governor-General of India whose actions laid the foundations of regular civil government and of the political clique whose nine-year effort to impeach him by slander ended in a tardy exoneration.

Illustrated, $6.00

ST MARTIN'S PRESS, 103 Park Avenue, New York 17

Publishers in the U. S. of all books to which Macmillan and Co. Ltd., London have the world rights

HERE IS THE ANSWER TO A GROWING VITAL NEED FOR LOW COST, AUTHORITATIVE TEXTS!

ANVIL BOOKS

A NEW ORIGINAL paper bound series in History and the Social Sciences published by Van Nostrand under the General Editorship of Louis L. Snyder, Professor of History, The City College of New York. about 200 pages • only $1.25 each

These original up-to-date scholarly studies are the answer to your search for authoritative, inexpensive basic reading. Brief, balanced, readable, ANVIL BOOKS make desirable texts and valuable supplementary material. Each book is a perfect balance of the essentials of interpretative narrative text and basic pertinent documents with emphasis on neglected and hard to find sources.

In addition to the distinguished authors listed below, such scholars as Sidney Hook (N.Y.U.), James A. Corbett (Notre Dame), J. Salwyn Schapiro (C.C.N.Y.), J. S. Curtiss (Duke), Peter Viereck (Mount Holyoke), Roland H. Bainton and David N. Rowe (Yale), Ray Billington (Northwestern) and Geoffrey Bruun are contributing future volumes to ANVIL BOOKS.

The first six titles published in January, are:

- No. 1. MAKING OF THE MODERN FRENCH MIND by Hans Kohn
- No. 2. THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION: A BRIEF HISTORY
by Richard B. Morris
- No. 3. THE LATE VICTORIANS: A SHORT HISTORY by Herman Ausubel
- No. 4. THE WORLD IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY by Louis L. Snyder
- No. 5. FIFTY MAJOR DOCUMENTS OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY
by Louis L. Snyder
- No. 6. THE AGE OF REASON by Louis L. Snyder

see them at your college bookstore or write:

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC., 250 4th Ave., New York 3

POPULAR DIPLOMACY AND WAR

By SISLEY HUDDLESTON

"The author contends that diplomacy as practiced before the First World War was radically different from diplomacy as practiced since and that the difference is the main cause of the distressing inability of the quarreling states of the world to return to an effective peace. While he admits that the difference is the consequence of a lower and coarser order of men taking up the practice of diplomacy, he explains their advent as resulting from 'the rise' of the masses in history. Their invasion of the foreign field signified the abandonment of the calm in which diplomatic decisions should be made. After a luminous review of the chaos that has continued since the official ending of the Second World War, he once more declares his conviction, which we may accept as the thesis of his book, 'that popular diplomacy, obedient to the instincts of the crowd, must necessarily . . . lose every war in which it engages.' I wish this lively and biting work may be widely read, especially by Americans who have gone far astray in their view of the functions of diplomacy."

Ferdinand Schevill, Professor Emeritus, University of Chicago

"His theme is so sobering as to make his book required reading for people with even the slightest interest in their destinies, whether immediate or ultimate."

Harry R. Rudin, Yale University

"I read it with great interest. . . . I believe that his book will stimulate much careful thinking. I have no doubt that out of its criticism a better understanding of the world situation will emerge."

Quincy Wright, University of Chicago

"His relentlessly honest and penetrating analysis of modern diplomacy will be welcomed by all those who take international affairs seriously."

Paul F. Boller, Southern Methodist University

"An excellent book. Here is advice of the greatest candor and importance from a veteran journalist who for a generation observed intimately the contemporary management of foreign affairs."

George A. Lundberg, University of Washington

"This is a great book. Sisley Huddleston has bequeathed to his age a deeply perceptive analysis of its follies, and he has given his counsel as to how it may still change its ways."

George W. De Armond, Jr.

"A devastating case against the vulgarization of international relations. Huddleston affirms that diplomacy is still the art of negotiation and not political pandering to mass prejudice."

William L. Neumann, Goucher College

288 pp., photographs, map. $3.50

Order this "lively and biting" analysis of the perils of "Goldfish Bowl" diplomacy from your bookstore or from

RICHARD R. SMITH PUBLISHER, INC.

Topside West Rindge New Hampshire

MEDIEVAL POLITICAL IDEAS

EWART LEWIS

Translations from significant medieval writings illustrating characteristic medieval treatments of basic topics

"This important book is designed as a help to 'teachers and advanced students of political theory and medieval history,' and I know of no other book so likely to give it. The author's scholarly introductions to the extracts from contemporary writers are admirable, and the extensive extracts, here accurately translated into English for the first time, will prove to be a boon to all teachers and students. . . . It is impossible to praise too highly the purpose of these two volumes, or its brilliant accomplishment."—C. H. McIlwain, Eaton Professor of the Science of Government, Emeritus, Harvard University.

10 x 6½ inches, 662 pages, 2 volumes boxed, $12.50

ALFRED A. KNOPE, Publisher

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

THE AMHERST SERIES—A GROWING SUCCESS

PROBLEMS IN AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

26 titles now available

$1.10 each

IN PRESS

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN AND THE AMERICAN CHARACTER
THE PULLMAN BOYCOTT OF 1894—The Problem of Federal Intervention
AMERICAN IMPERIALISM IN 1898
THE YALTA CONFERENCE

CAUSES OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION
THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AND THE CONSTITUTION

HAMILTON AND THE NATIONAL DEBT
JACKSON VERSUS BIDDLE—THE STRUG-GLE OVER THE SECOND BANK OF THE
UNITED STATES

DEMOCRACY AND THE GOSPEL OF WEALTH

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER—ROBBER BARON
OR INDUSTRIAL STATESMAN?

ROOSEVELT, WILSON, AND THE TRUSTS
THE NEW DEAL—REVOLUTION OR EVOLUTION?

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE SUPREME COURT

PEARL HARBOR—ROOSEVELT AND THE COMING OF THE WAR

INDUSTRY-WIDE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING —PROMISE OR MENACE?

LOYALTY IN A DEMOCRATIC STATE

D. C. Heath and Company

SALES OFFICES: NEW YORK 14 CHICAGO 16 SAN FRANCISCO 5 ATLANTA 3 DALLAS 1

HOME OFFICE: BOSTON 16

Where will Red China go from here? READ

THE PROSPECTS FOR COMMUNIST CHINA

By W. W. ROSTOW, Professor of Economic History, The Massachusetts Institute of Technology; with the collaboration of RICHARD W. HATCH, FRANK A. KIERMAN, JR., and ALEXANDER ECKSTEIN.

An acute analysis of what has happened, is happening, and may happen in China. It probes the motives and government of a regime whose power prospects are shaping world history. Much of what we know about Communist China is unified in these pages for the first time.

This extraordinary report was written by a former Assistant Chief in the Department of State and a group of Far East experts at the Center for International Studies. The study assesses in highly readable fashion the changing human response to Communist rule on the mainland from 1949 to the present. It examines in detail the character of Communist China's obligations to Moscow and the relationship of these debts to the rest of the world. It also considers the economic foundations for the regime's power aspirations. The interconnection among these elements as they are likely to affect the future course of Communist society is the book's ultimate theme. A Technology Press book, M.I.T. 1954. 379 pages. $5.00

Send for an on-approval copy.

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

440-4th Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

YALE BOOKS

THE ECONOMICS OF LOCATION

Augustus Lösch

This unique treatise on the dispersion and location of farms, cities, and manufacturing centers in relation to their environment has become something of a classic in the original German edition. Now available for the first time in English, this book pioneers a new field—the relation of economic goods and geography—and opens the way to a new dimension in economics. $7.50

THE ECONOMIC STATE OF NEW ENGLAND

This comprehensive regional study by the Committee of New England offers detailed information on all phases of New England's economy—showing what it has, and what it lacks. $6.00

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE
YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
NEW HAVEN 7 CONN

CHARLES BURTON MARSHALL

The Limits of Foreign Policy

"One of the finest statements of its kind that I have ever read . . . A superb job in presenting essential information and in developing a sound approach to thinking about international affairs. Along with this, it is highly readable, and the combination is rare indeed."—JOHN GANGE, Director, Woodrow Wilson Department of Foreign Affairs, University of Virginia

1954, 128 pages, $2.25

C
O
M
I
N
G

ALAN P. GRIMES, Michigan State College

A History of American Political Thought

A well-written treatment of the history of American political thought from the period of the Puritans to the present. Coming in Spring, 1955

HERMAN FINER, University of Chicago

The Government of Great European Powers

A truly comparative text on the government of Great Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union. Coming in Spring, 1955

Check List . . .

- DESCHWEINITZ and THOMPSON
Man and Modern Society $5.50
- WIT
Comparative Political Institutions $4.75
- ANDERSON and WEIDNER
American Government, Fourth Edition $6.50
- CHRISTENSEN and KIRKPATRICK
The People, Politics, and the Politician $4.60
Paper Cover Edition, $3.25; Brief Edition, $2.90

HENRY HOLT and CO., N. Y. 17

Books from Chicago

The Moral Foundation of Democracy

By JOHN M. HALLOWELL. A distinguished political scientist issues a grave warning that the real threat to democracy is internal—a betrayal in the minds and hearts of our citizens of the faith which gives it life. Democracy must find the basis for its continued life in a new liberalism which has a balanced view of man. $3.50

Britain—Uneasy Ally

By LEON D. EPSTEIN. An incisive analysis of Britain's national attitudes toward American foreign policy which suggests ways and means of settling a number of pressing problems, and points to ways of anticipating Britain's often ambivalent reactions to our actions abroad. $4.00

Voting

A STUDY OF OPINION FORMATION DURING A PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

By BERNARD R. BERELSON, PAUL F. LAZARSFELD, and WILLIAM N. McPHEE. Prior to the 1948 election, a corps of social scientists moved into the vicinity of Elmira, New York, to get the answers to such perennial questions as: Why do people vote the way they do? How do social class, family loyalties, and business connections affect their vote? When do they make up their minds? What they learned, and how they learned it, makes one of the most fascinating books that has appeared in recent years. $7.50

People of Plenty

ECONOMIC ABUNDANCE AND THE AMERICAN CHARACTER

By DAVID M. POTTER. Economic abundance, more than any other single factor, has distinguished America from other countries and left its mark upon the character of the people. Professor Potter's lucid and witty study breaks new ground, bringing a historical perspective to bear upon the work of Margaret Mead, David Riesman, and Karen Horney. $3.50

Interviewing in Social Research

By HERBERT H. HYMAN. With CLYDE W. HART, WILLIAM J. COBB, JACOB J. FELDMAN, and CHARLES HERBERT STEMBER. The result of a four-year investigation conducted by the National Opinion Research Center. This work is concerned with the systematic analysis of sources of error in research studies using the method of personal interviewing. $8.00

The American Lawyer

A SUMMARY OF THE SURVEY OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION

By ALBERT P. BLAUSTEIN and CHARLES O. PORTER. With CHARLES T. DUNCAN. Foreword by REGINALD HEBER SMITH. Distills from the many reports and bulky library volumes of the vast four-year Survey of the Legal Profession a candid picture of the practice of law and its practitioners in the forty-eight states. $5.50

At your bookstore, or from

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5750 Ellis Avenue, Chicago 37, Ill.

COMING IN DECEMBER —

THE FIFTH EDITION of ► American State Government and Administration

By Austin F. Macdonald, University of California

REVISED and reset. This is the most thorough revision since first publication.

NEW chapters on Planning and on Towns, Townships, Villages, and Special Districts; sections dealing with constitutional revision commissions, one-party dominance in the South, pensions for legislators, public authorities, performance budgeting, regional cooperation in higher education, and the prevention of racial discrimination in industry. Many of the other chapters and sections have been substantially altered.

MORE charts and tables than ever before.

CONTENTS

Part One: State Government

1. History of American State Government
2. Federal-State Relations
3. Interstate Relations
4. State Constitutions
5. Nominations and Elections
6. Parties and Politics
7. Direct Legislation and the Recall
8. State Legislatures
9. The Legislative Process
10. State Executives
11. State Courts
12. State Control over Local Governments
13. City Government
14. County Government
15. Towns, Townships, Villages, and Special Districts

Part Two: State Administration

16. State Administrative Organization
17. Personnel
18. State Expenditures
19. State Revenues
20. State Indebtedness
21. Enforcement of Law
22. Correction
23. Welfare
24. Education
25. Health
26. Highways
27. Natural Resources
28. The State and Business
29. The State and Labor
30. Planning
- Table of Cases

700 PAGES (approx.)—CHARTS and TABLES—6 x 9—$5.50 (prob.)

Thomas Y. Crowell Company

432 Fourth Avenue

New York 16, New York